“She really set a high standard,” Clinton said of Toner, explaining that the journalist focused on policy over politics. “Journalism that informs our debates, educates our citizens, and makes it possible to base public policy decisions on evidence rather than ideology,” she said.

The former secretary of state and made it clear that Toner was the exception, however, and worried that economic and technological forces have made it even more difficult for journalists to do serious journalism today.

And with her praise for Toner and serious journalism, and calls for more journalism awards, Clinton suggested a guide for how she thinks reporters should cover presidential campaigns.

“We need more than ever smart, fair-minded journalists to challenge our assumptions, push us towards new solutions, and hold all of accountable,” Clinton said. That didn’t mean she expects brown nosing. Toner was “relentless,” Clinton said, “She always put you in the spot, but in a way that you felt was totally fair. It was a search for understanding.”

The war words were refreshing from from a politician who once tried to kick reporters out of the White House. Who, in a healthcare forum in 1993 said, the “bane of all people in political life” is “the unfair, unjust, inaccurate reporting that goes on from coast to coast, North to South, East to West.” Who, according her friend Diane Blair’s diaries, thought journalists had only “big egos and no brains.”

Who, as former White House Press secretary Dee Dee Myers told PBS’ Frontline in 2000, had an “intense distrust of the press” that “really affected…the way [Bill Clinton] viewed it.”

Who avoided the press during her 2008 campaign until she started losing and hired spokespeople who seemed to relish being rough with reporters. Who, just last year, speaking speaking in Connecticut, said that “with professional tweaking and some creativity, we could address some of the issues we know are plaguing journalism today.”

At the same time, the Washington press corps has hardly been blameless. It relentlessly and often baselessly hounded the then-first lady in her White House daus, pursuing scandal after scandal that ended up evaporating. And in 2008, it seemed enthralled with a fresh-faced Barack Obama over Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But now, with a new generation of reporters covering her and the lessons of both her negative 2008 experience and her more positive experiences with the State Department press corps, Clinton seems ready for a “reset.”

For her upcoming presidential bid, the Democrat he has hired a new team of senior spokespeople, none of whom had top jobs in her 2008 campaign and all of whom are well respected by the reporters that worked with them in their previous jobs.

Even with the warmer tones, the common thread running through Clinton’s media criticism from the 1990s to today is a desire for substantive policy coverage over the shallowness of day-to-day horse race coverage.

During her speech Monday, Clinton took a momentary break from her joking to discuss health care reform, an issue Toner covered, as if daring testing reporters to cover the substance of her remarks instead of focusing on her joke she had just about Meerkat.

Monday marked the fifth anniversary of the Affordable Care Act, which Clinton celebrated earlier in the day with a tweet that included a photo of her embracing Obama from the day the law passed the House. She also quietly met with the Obama earlier in the afternoon, which was only announced to reporters after she left the White House. No details of the meeting were given.

We need reporters “explaining what’s at stake” with health care reform, she said.

“Now I don’t want to get carried away here,” she continued. “Those of us on the other side are not always going to be happy with whatever it is you do. But we understand – in our more rational moments – that is your job. And we and our democracy depend on you.”

With both sides wary, the question now is whether this “reset” goes better than one she attempted with a different adversarial power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton jokes with press about her email, privacy at Syracuse University event (Syracuse Post Standard)
By Mark Weiner
March 23, 2015
Syracuse Post Standard

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Hillary Rodham Clinton joked about her relationship with the press and her controversial private emails while speaking Monday night at a Syracuse University journalism prize ceremony.

Clinton, delivering a keynote address at SU's Toner Prize event, told a crowd of almost 300 people -- mostly journalists -- that they might be surprised to see her at an event for the press.

"With a room full of political reporters, I thought to myself, 'What could possibly go wrong?' " Clinton joked, conceding that her relationship with the press has been at times "complicated."

"But I am all about new beginnings," Clinton said. "A new grandchild, another new hairstyle, a new email account. Why not a new relationship with the press? So here it goes: No more secrecy. No more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do for me?"

Clinton's went on to deliver a serious speech about the importance of journalism to substantive political debate in a media landscape changing with technology.

"I think the stakes are really high," Clinton said. "Too many of our most important debates occur in what I call an evidence-free zone."

Clinton's address at the prize ceremony sponsored by SU's S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communication was the last public speech before her expected announcement of a presidential campaign in early April.

The Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting honors the late Robin Toner, a 1976 Newhouse School graduate who became the first woman to serve as national political correspondent for the New York Times.

Toner died of cancer in December 2008. She covered the Clinton White House in the 1990s, including Hillary Clinton's efforts to establish Early Head Start and establish the Children's Health Insurance Program.

Clinton said she first met Toner in 1992, and admired her approach to reporting. "I saw a reporter who really liked to delve into the substance of issues," she said. "And that was particularly meaningful to me, being kind of a policy person myself."

After her 20-minute speech, Clinton stayed for the rest of the awards dinner and worked the crowd for about 15 minutes after the event at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. She did not take questions from reporters or the audience.

Dan Balz, chief correspondent for the Washington Post, won this year's Toner Prize for a series of political profiles on the partisan divide in Washington. The prize, which includes $5,000, is for the best national or local political reporting in print, broadcast or online.

Toner Prize judge Adam Clymer said in a statement that Balz's coverage provided a "thoughtful look at the state of the Republican Party through the eyes of the old-line faction that put governing ahead of ideology."

Among the non-journalists in attendance Monday was New York Lt. Gov. Kathy Hochul, a Syracuse University graduate, and other prominent SU grads who live in the Washington area.

Before the event, Friends of the Earth and the Center for Biological Diversity, two environmental groups, protested in front of the office building where Clinton spoke.

The groups said they were concerned about Clinton's "commitment to climate justice" and her positions on hydrofracking for oil and natural gas. The groups also oppose construction of the Keystone XL pipeline.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton keynotes event to honor political journalism (CBS News)
By Kylie Atwood
March 24, 2015
CBS News

Hillary Clinton made an unusual appearance Monday evening - she keynoted an awards ceremony to honor political journalists.

"I am well aware that some of you may be a little surprised to see me here tonight," she said to the room of about 300 people, many of them journalists. "You know my relationship with the press has been at times, shall we say, complicated."

Clinton joked that everyone had non-disclosure agreements under their seats, and then moved on to reflect on the life and legacy of Robin Toner, for whom the award was named. Toner was a longtime New York Times reporter who passed away in 2008, the first woman named to be the Times' national political correspondent. Clinton's appearance at the ceremony was a testament to her respect for Toner.

"Mostly I am here because I really admired Robin, I admired her approach toward covering the events that I was involved in, directly, starting in the 1992 presidential campaign, when she covered that campaign," Hillary explained.

Toner, who was also the Times' lead reporter for Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential run, sat down with Hillary Clinton for multiple interviews, the last one in 2007 when they spoke about healthcare. Clinton had just rolled out her healthcare plan for the 2008 presidential campaign.

"We had a long substantive conversation about what I had learned what the country had learned from the '93, '94 experience," Clinton reflected, describing Toner as a reporter who immersed herself in the details and hammered questions of substance in a way that was "totally fair."

Clinton held up Toner, known to be a tough, meticulous reporter, as an example to be emulated even as the journalistic landscape changes. She challenged the journalists in the room to be thorough and measured.

"You are facing fundamental questions that may not fit into 140 characters but are nonetheless vital to our democracy. I think the stakes are really high," Clinton said. "Too many of our most important debates occur in what I call an evidence-free zone, ideology trumping facts, made-for-cable shout-fests, twitter storms, drowning out substantive dialogue and reporting that often leads to shallower more contentious politics and even no or not the best public policy."

On the same day that Sen. Tex Cruz (R-TX) renewed his commitment to repealing Obamacare, as a part of his speech announcing that he would run for president in 2016, Clinton talked about her policy priorities, should she decide to run for President. She'd still fight to expand healthcare to more Americans, she said, but hinted that she might be open to slight alterations to Obamacare.

"We should be exploring those [questions about the future of healthcare] but at the same time trying to ask ourselves how to improve the Affordable Care Act," Clinton said, adding "there is so much more to do."

Clinton also praised Toner's twins -- noting that one of them, the editor-in-chief at her high school newspaper, might "Meerkat us at any moment."

Despite what most would concede have been tough weeks for her in terms of the media attention paid to her email accounts and foreign donations to her family foundation, Clinton closed with a pitch for journalism, saying, "We need, more than ever, smart, fair-minded journalists to challenge our assumptions, push us toward new solutions and hold all of us accountable."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton seeks 'new beginning' with the press (CNN)
By Dan Merica
March 23, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)"Complicated" is how Hillary Clinton described her relationship with the political press corps at an event on Monday night.

The honest admission provided a rare glimpse into how the former secretary of state -- and frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination -- views the journalists who constantly follow her.

"I am aware some of you may be a little surprised to see me here tonight," Clinton said.

Clinton, who most recently held an adversarial press conference with throngs of reporters over her use of personal email as secretary of state, has a long, often antagonistic history with the national media.

When she was asked to headline an event with hundreds of political reporters, editors and executives, she recounted thinking, "What could possibly go wrong?"

"I am all about new beginnings," Clinton said at the Toner Prize event in Washington. "A new grandchild, another new hair style, a new email account, why not a new relationship with the press? So here goes, no more secrecy, no more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do me?"

At the cozy event, Clinton hinted at her 2016 bid by noting that she has been "ruminating" lately.

Clinton has operated with the media almost exclusively on her terms for the last two years. At her paid speaking engagements and foundation events, the press is generally kept hundreds of feet away. During the 2014 midterm election -- and at times during Clinton's 2014 book tour -- media was sometimes close enough to ask a question, but the occurrences were rare.

Her press conference two weeks ago at the United Nations was the first time since September 2014 she gaggled with the cadre of reporters that have followed her for the better part of a year.

"Before I go any further, if you look under your chairs, you will find a simple non-disclosure agreement. My attorney's drew it up. Old habits last," she joked.

Clinton struck a serious note in her keynote address, however, outlining her vision for a noble media.

"I believe we need more Robin Toners," Clinton said about the journalist who died in 2008. The former first lady argued that today's media focuses too much on the political horse race and too little on policy. Clinton -- a proud policy wonk -- noted that Toner "really liked to delve into the substance of issues" and would ask incisive, but fair, questions.

"It has gotten even harder to do the kind of journalism that she did," Clinton said as a pool of reporters tweeted her remarks in the back of the room.

"Everyday, you, the reporters and the writers in this room, are under more and more pressure from changes in technology, in the marketplace and, of course, in our politics," she said.

In particular, Clinton noted knocked "Twitter-storms drowning out substantive dialogue and reporting" and "cable shout fests."

Honored on Monday was reporter Dan Balz, The Washington Post's chief correspondent and an icon in the political reporting world. Upon accepting his prize, Balz thanked Clinton and said, "I am happy to yield my time back to you if you want to take some questions."

Clinton declined, but did chat briefly with some of the reporters in the room before leaving the event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Jokes About Fresh Start With the Press (Bloomberg)
By Jennifer Epstein
March 23, 2015
Bloomberg

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton acknowledged her rocky history with the political press on Monday and said she hopes to turn over a new leaf as she heads into a new campaign season as she implored journalists to focus on telling substantive stories.

“My relationship with the press has been, at times, shall we say, complicated,” she said as she addressed an awards ceremony celebrating the late New York Times political reporter Robin Toner. Journalists filled the two-dozen tables at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, as did a few press-facing current and former White House staffers.

But as she prepares to launch her second presidential campaign and builds a press team that’s notably more cooperative than the one that worked for her in 2008, she conveyed that ready for a reset.

"I am all about new beginnings,” she said. "A new grandchild, another new hairstyle, a new e-mail account. The relationship with the press. So here goes: no more secrecy. No more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do me?”

Then, she joked, with a hint that her transformation may not be a full one: "before I go any further, look under your chair, you’ll find a simple non-disclosure agreement my attorneys drew up. Old habits last."

Clinton started on a light note but turned more serious. "We and our democracy depend on you,” she said before urging the reporters in the room to follow Toner’s lead and write substantive stories about policy.

She conceded that “it has gotten even harder to do the kind of journalism that she did” as the country and the media have gotten more polarized, and technology has put new pressures on reporters.

“I think the stakes are really high,” she said, with too much political discourse taking place in an “evidence-free zone.” The realities of the industry make it difficult, but it’s important to try to "get us out of the echo chambers we all inhabit.”

“I believe we need more Robin Toners,” she added.

Toner covered politics and also had an emphasis in her reporting on health care policy. Her final interview with Clinton, in the fall of 2007, was about the then-senator’s health care proposals during the Democratic presidential primary.

Monday is the fifth anniversary of the passage of the Affordable Care Act and, while Republican Sen. Ted Cruz entered the presidential race vowing to repeal the law, Clinton said she hopes to improve the law, not dismantle it.

The questions to ask are "how to improve the ACA...how to build on the successes,” she said. “I’m well aware none of this will be easy,” she continued, but it will be even more difficult without people like those in the audience explaining the policies and personalities at play.

Clinton said the role of the press is to “hold us all accountable.” Still, she said, "those of us on the other side are not always going to be happy about what whatever it is you do but we understand in our more rational moments."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Offers the Media an Olive Branch... and a Lecture (National Journal)
By Emily Schultheis
March 23, 2015
National Journal

Hillary Clinton opened her speech to a room full of political reporters by acknowledging an awkward, if obvious, fact: she's not known for being media-friendly. But Monday night, she also pledged to make a change.

"I am well aware that some of you may be a little surprised to see me here tonight," she said. "My relationship with the press has been at times, shall we say, complicated."

The former secretary of State spoke at the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting ceremony, and her address was part olive branch—and part not-so-subtle suggestions about the need for "serious" and "substantive" journalism going forward.

"I am all about new beginnings: a new grandchild, another new hairstyle, a new email account," she quipped, "Why not a new relationship with the press? So here goes. No more secrecy. No more zone of privacy." (She then joked that ceremony attendees could find non-disclosure agreements under their chairs.)

Following the nearly 20-minute speech, she did not take questions.

Washington Post reporter Dan Balz, who won this year's award, made Clinton an offer: "I am happy to yield my time back to you if you want to take some questions," he said, making Clinton laugh.

The speech was the last on Clinton's schedule, and the next time she appears publicly, it will likely be to kick off her 2016 presidential campaign.

She acknowledged her at-times tumultuous relationship with the press, making light of both it and the controversy over her private email server that again made her the subject of negative headlines in recent weeks.

Clinton also talked at length about former New York Times reporter Robin Toner, for whom the Toner Prize is named. The two got to know each other during the 1992 presidential campaign and during Clinton's health care push in 1993 and 1994. She praised Toner's brand of journalism, which she said was substantive, serious, and based on asking tough questions—and in the process, she offered what sounded like advice to the 2016 press corps who will chronicle her every move on the campaign trail.

In Toner, she said, "I saw a reporter who really liked to delve into the substance of issues … the details were complicated and she immersed herself in them, but she understood that the details really mattered."

Clinton added that Toner didn't hold back from criticizing her when necessary, but that she always did so with context and perspective. "I appreciated that even if sometimes it was my stumbles and setbacks she was sharing with the world, it was always in a context I could recognize and make sense of," she said.

Without quality journalism, the former senator added, Washington politics can at times enter "an evidence-free zone," citing partisan discussion about the Affordable Care Act—which had its fifth anniversary Monday—as a prime example. "Over these five years we've heard plenty of scare tactics, wild claims about socialism and death panels," she said, "but not enough about how to keep expanding access, lowering costs and improving quality."

Clinton acknowledged that public figures will be put under the microscope, and that she usually understands that, regardless of whether public officials like the coverage, they understand reporters are just doing their job.

"Those of us on the other side are not always going to be happy about whatever it is you do," she said. "But we do understand, in our more rational moments, that is your job. And we and our democracy depend on you."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton to News Media: 'No More Secrecy' (The New York Times)
By Amy Chozick
March 24, 2015
The New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton was all about new beginnings on Monday night.

"A new grandchild, another new hairstyle, a new email account," she said at a journalism awards dinner to honor the Times reporter Robin Toner, who died in 2008. "Why not a new relationship with the press?" she said.

Turning over a new leaf, Mrs. Clinton said: "So here goes, no more secrecy, no more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do me?"

Then, Mrs. Clinton told the audience of political reporters and editors to first look under their chairs. "You'll find a simple nondisclosure agreement," she joked. "My attorneys drew it up. Old habits last."

The event signaled what would most likely be Mrs. Clinton's last public appearance before declaring her candidacy for president. It seemed only fitting that she used the evening to mingle with the news media and try to put aside grievances. Or, as Mrs. Clinton put it, "My relationship with the press has been at times, shall we say, complicated."

Showing some admiration for the profession, Mrs. Clinton reminisced about Ms. Toner, the first female national political correspondent for The Times, as a serious journalist who "really liked to delve into the substance of issues," and she expressed concern that the changing media landscape threatened such thoughtful journalism today.

She concluded with a defense of the Affordable Care Act, which Senator Ted Cruz, the Texas Republican, said earlier on Monday that he would repeal should he win the presidency in 2016.

The political news media, Mrs. Clinton said, can help explain to the American public what is at stake should the benefits be rolled back. "I believe we need more Robin Toners," she said

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Hillary Clinton, sharp tweets foreshadow imminent campaign (CNN)
By Dan Merica
March 23, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)At speaking engagements and paid appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has cast herself as a relationship-building politician who argues that spending time with people you disagree with can fix Washington's dysfunction.

That's not the message coming through on Clinton's Twitter account, though, a platform the former secretary of state has turned into her main venue for political messages that bashes Republicans.

The recent uptick in partisan tweets foreshadows the next month in Clinton's life, when the former first lady and senator is expected to announce a second presidential bid. But given Clinton's past benign use of Twitter -- where she regularly sent tweets about wonky studies, her foundation's successes and messages of congratulations -- the change has been stark.

Last week, Clinton faulted the GOP for a "congressional trifecta against women," hitting the opposing party for slow-walking Loretta Lynch's attorney general confirmation, playing "politics with trafficking victims" and "threatening women's health and rights."

Hillary Clinton @HillaryClinton
Congressional trifecta against women today: 1) Blocking great nominee, 1st African American woman AG, for longer than any AG in 30 years…
3:59 PM - 16 Mar 2015

Hillary Clinton @HillaryClinton
...2) Playing politics with trafficking victims… 3) Threatening women's health & rights.
4:01 PM - 16 Mar 2015

The next day, Clinton fired off a series of tweets that went after Republicans again, hitting the party's planned budget for failing Americans and noting that "budgets reflect our priorities."

Hillary Clinton @HillaryClinton
Budgets reflect our priorities. They should help families get ahead, educate our kids, and spark small business growth.
8:04 PM - 17 Mar 2015

Clinton's spokesman would not describe how the former secretary of state tweets and whether she sends her own messages.

Though Clinton stepped up her partisan rhetoric during the 2014 midterm campaign, knocking Republicans on women's and equality issues, she spent most of 2014 touring the country to sell her latest memoir or on the paid speaking circuit and staying above the partisan fray.

Clinton's tweets have also become news-making events, thanks to her general lack of media availability. Before her March 10 press conference, Clinton hadn't gaggled with reporters since September 2014.

A Democrat with knowledge of Clinton's campaign plans told CNN news outlets should expect Clinton to use Twitter as a way to get a message to voters without going through the media. The platform, the source said, allows the campaign more message control and is a one-way conversation, as opposed to two-way discussions with journalists.

One of the first pioneers of social media political messaging was former Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, the 2008 Republican vice presidential nominee. As a rising conservative star with an adversarial relationship with the "lamestream media," Palin took to Facebook to post her unfiltered commentary. The venue allowed her to connect directly with supporters and prepare her thoughts in advance so as to avoid any "gotcha" moments she often accuses the press of contriving.

But President Barack Obama, as well, has honed the art of circumventing traditional media to press his message. Obama released the entire text of his 2015 State of the Union address via Medium, a social media site, allowing the public to see it at the same time as the press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Days after, he invited three YouTube stars to the White House to conduct interviews, rather than traditional news outlets. And frequently White House photographer Pete Souza releases pictures on Instagram of meetings or events that the White House press corps isn't privy to.

The motivation is clear: politicians don't need to rely on the press to be their megaphones any more.

So it comes as no surprise that Clinton, facing scrutiny over her exclusive use of private email while she was secretary of state, initially turned to Twitter to address the issue.

Nick Pacilio, Twitter's spokesman on government and news, sent reporters an email the next day noting that Clinton's tweet was seen 3.3 million times in less than 24 hours.

Given the obvious reach and advantage to employing social media rather than traditional, it's likely the event was just a tweet of things to come.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton meets Barack Obama at the White House (Politico)
By Edward-Isaac Dovere
March 23, 2015
Politico

No word on whether she came with a ruler to measure the curtains, but Hillary Clinton did meet privately with President Barack Obama on Monday at the White House.

Clinton was in Washington for an event about the future of urban policy hosted by the Center for American Progress in the morning and the presentation of the Toner Award at a dinner in the evening.

In between, the all-but-declared Democratic presidential candidate swung by to see her old boss in the building she's hoping to move into.

The White House wouldn't comment about whether a meeting was going to happen earlier in the day, but White House press secretary Josh Earnest confirmed afterward that it had happened — though he provided few details.

"President Obama and Secretary Clinton enjoy catching up in person when their schedules permit," Earnest said. "This afternoon they met privately for about an hour at the White House and discussed a range of topics."

Reflecting the growing message coordination between the White House and the Clinton near-campaign, immediately after the White House announced the meeting, her official account tweeted out a photo of her going in for a hug with Obama, with a message noting the fifth anniversary of the president's signing of the Affordable Care Act on Monday.

"Young ppl. Preexisting conditions. Women get better coverage. Repeal those things? Embrace them!" she wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, Hillary Clinton Meet Privately at the White House (Associated Press)
March 23, 2015
Associated Press

President Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton met privately at the White House Monday afternoon.

The White House says the former rivals-turned-colleagues met for about an hour and discussed a range of issues.

Obama and Clinton have met occasionally since she left the administration in 2013 after serving as secretary of state. Monday's meeting comes as Clinton prepares to launch another presidential campaign.

Moments after the White House confirmed the meeting, Clinton posted a message on Twitter praising Obama's health care law and its provisions aimed at covering young people and those with preexisting conditions. In a jab at Republicans who want to get rid of the law, she wrote: "Repeal those things? Embrace them!"

To emphasize her point, Clinton shared an old photo of her and Obama hugging.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Make No Mistake, Hillary Clinton Loves Obamacare (Bloomberg)
By David Knowles
March 23, 2015
Bloomberg

On this, the fifth anniversary of the signing into law of the Affordable Care Act, aka Obamacare, many of the presumed and actual Republican candidates for president much of the day attacking the legislation.

While Texas Senator Ted Cruz asked his audience at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University to "imagine in 2017, a new president signing legislation repealing every word of Obamacare," former Florida Governor Jeb Bush kept pace by declaring the law a "disaster."

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, meanwhile, used the anniversary to try and bolster his growing database of supporters.

Across the ideological divide, however, one prospective presidential candidate, Hillary Clinton, was busy embracing the law, as well as the man who's name is so closely associated with it.

Clinton, who had tried and failed to push through a single payer healthcare system as First Lady, has defended the Affordable Care Act before, even while acknowledging some of its faults.

“I think we are on the right track in many respects but I would be the first to say if things aren’t working then we need people of good faith to come together and make evidence-based changes,” Clinton said at a healthcare event in Orlando, Fla., last June. Ahead of the 2014 midterm elections, Clinton had urged Democratic candidates to run on Obamacare's successes, rather than let Republicans control the narrative of what they portrayed as a failed law.

“On a very personal, self-interested basis, you should have health insurance to protect yourself and your families from unpredictable costs that none of us know will be striking whenever,” she said. “You can’t sit here today and tell me for sure you won’t have a car accident, you won’t have a slip or a fall, you won’t have some kind of disease that you never thought you’d ever be stricken by.”

But Clinton has also signaled that she might be open to amending the law, specifically targeting the medical device tax.

"On the tax itself, again, I think we have to look to see what are the pluses and minuses that are embodied in a decision about either to remove or alter or continue this particular piece of the Affordable Care Act," Clinton told a Chicago conference of medical device makers in October.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley boosters say 2016 bid increasingly likely (Washington Post.com)
By John Wagner
March 24, 2015
Washington Post.com
.
The former Maryland governor, who's said he will probably make a decision by May, huddled with more than 150 donors and other boosters at the Baltimore Hilton for what was billed as an "issues conference." The event was closed to the press and included discussions about foreign policy, health care and education.

Though O'Malley said nothing explicit about his plans, those in attendance said his upbeat nature and assessments offered by top political aides gave them the distinct impression that he is willing to challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic nomination, however long the odds.

"I think he's energized by the reception he got this past weekend in Iowa," said Rob Werner, a supporter from New Hampshire who came down for the gathering Monday. "I think he's poised to do it, to get in the race. He certainly seems to be heading in that direction."

Senior members of O'Malley's political team made presentations, participants said, and a speech by O'Malley echoed the populist addresses he gave in Iowa, the nation's first presidential caucus state. O'Malley aides said the former governor plans to give several policy speeches in coming months to flesh out his agenda.

On recent trips to South Carolina, New Hampshire and Iowa, O'Malley has been aggressively trying to position himself as a more progressive, forward-looking alternative to Clinton. At the same time, some Democrats have started looking more seriously for other options in the wake of recent controversies over Clinton's use of a private e-mail account as secretary of state and foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation.

"A month or so ago, there was a view that Hillary's it," said Phil Noble, a longtime Democratic activist in South Carolina who's known O'Malley for more than 30 years. "Now, there's a view that there is room for an alternative, and O'Malley's on the radar screen."

At Monday's gathering, Clinton's name wasn't really part of the conversation, said Terry Lierman, a former chairman of the Maryland Democratic Party who has helped raise money for O'Malley's political action committee.

"That name was not mentioned at all today," Lierman said. "It was about Martin and what his vision is and where he thinks the country should be going."

While most of those in attendance were longtime O'Malley boosters, some said they remain undecided about a 2016 White House hopeful, including Vincent Sheheen, the unsuccessful Democratic nominee for governor of South Carolina in 2010 and 2014.

"I guess I came up here to see if [O'Malley] is serious, and I came away with the impression that he's very serious," Sheheen said. "I think he's a legitimate candidate and contender."
O'Malley plans to be in New Hampshire next Tuesday for a "Politics & Eggs" address to business and political leaders, a Granite State tradition that is considered a rite of passage for White House hopefuls. It will be his second trip this month to the state that holds the first presidential primary. And he's booked to be back in Iowa in early April, with an itinerary that includes a speech to the Polk County Democrats in Des Moines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Cruz: Hillary Clinton's wrecking ball (Politico)
By Gabriel Debenedetti
March 24, 2015
Politico

Hillary Clinton's embattled pre-campaign team breathed a sigh of relief Monday as a central player in their grand strategy to win the White House strode boldly onto the 2016 battlefield.

His name? Rafael Edward Cruz, the Republican junior senator from Texas.

Democrats from both inside and outside the Clinton camp have groused for months that the all-but-certain candidate was moving too slowly in formulating and projecting a rationale for running for the White House outside of her gender and the dreaded "it's my time" argument. She was relying too much on a platform of inevitability, they said — the same platform that doomed her bid in 2008. But those closest to the former secretary of state have counseled patience, arguing that a core element of Clinton's plan was to get out of the way and let the dueling wings of the Republican Party savage each other while she floats above it all.

Cruz, they say, is Hillary's wrecking ball.

People close to Clinton smiled at the sight of the first-term senator wandering alone on stage at Liberty University, implicitly threatening a civil war with the "mushy" establishment of his party that he loves to decry — while at the exact same time Clinton sat comfortably alongside heavyweights from her own party's progressive and labor elements, who have thus far entirely declined to challenge her.

"Imagine repealing every word of Common Core," Cruz implored his audience while announcing his presidential campaign in Lynchburg, Va., in the morning, implicitly previewing a fight over education policy that he intends to pick with Republican establishment favorite Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor. It was just one line of many Cruz has delivered since joining the Senate in 2013 that highlights his appetite for combat even within his own party — an appetite that flared up famously when he helped spearhead the government shutdown in October of that year.

Meanwhile the clamoring of some liberal groups to recruit Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, the progressive darling, was entirely unheard in downtown Washington as Clinton spent her morning discussing domestic policy at the headquarters of the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank run by her allies. The presumptive Democratic front-runner sat near a pair of union bosses and current and former urban mayors, making sure to throw in some love for liberal hero Bill de Blasio, the New York City mayor, as she previewed pieces of her likely domestic policy platform.

She touched all corners of the Democratic Party in the morning performance before meeting with President Barack Obama in the White House and speaking at an award ceremony for political reporters in the evening, dogged only by barbs from her Republican critics.

So for Clinton, Monday was smooth sailing. For Republicans, her camp figures, it signaled the beginning of a wild and messy primary contest that will let Clinton appear to be the adult in the room before she takes on a bloodied GOP nominee.

Cruz "could go a very long way in the Republican primary, and give whoever emerges as the Republican establishment candidate a fight," said Maria Cardona, a Democratic strategist and senior adviser to Clinton during her 2008 run. "That is going to be something Republicans will focus on while Hillary is going to be talking about fighting income inequality and expanding opportunity, like she did today."

"While Ted Cruz and other Republican politicians are fighting to outdo each others' Tea Party bona fides and score political points with the conservative right wing, Hillary Clinton is continuing, as she always has, to spread her vision of opportunity and success for all Americans," added Adrienne Watson of Correct the Record, the pro-Clinton group that has recently started mounting attacks on her possible opponents in the Republican field, including Jeb Bush today.

As publicly excited as Clinton allies profess to be, the Democratic exuberance is not universal, and the Republican National Committee hit Clinton in eight separate emails to reporters on Monday, including criticizing her for her notoriously high speaking fees and her history of a bad relations with journalists — her "pathological aversion to transparency," in spokesman Michael Short's words.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But most members of Clinton's circles looked beyond that and the still-lingering controversy over Clinton's use of a private email address as secretary of state, happy on Monday that this particular Texan was the first contender to throw his hat in the ring. They recalled the divisive Republican primary battles of 2008 and 2012, and pointed to the continued tension between the establishment, Tea Party, and libertarian wings of the party.

"Even if an establishment candidate wins, there is no question that Ted Cruz being in the race is going to pull the Republican Party much more to the right, and we know how that turns out," Cardona added. "Just ask Mitt Romney."

Clinton previewed her model of weighing in on policy while Republicans scuffle over politics in early February, when her late-night tweet about mandatory vaccinations after a day of GOP struggles aimed to paint her as above the squabbling. Her recent rhetoric about bipartisan compromise is similarly calibrated to portray her as apolitical, even as she has unleashed a stream of tweets aimed at congressional Republicans rather than her likely 2016 opponents.

On Monday night, at a journalism award ceremony in Washington, she spoke of the importance of embracing, but improving, Obamacare — anathema to congressional conservatives, and to Cruz in particular.

Still, some Clinton allies urged their fellow Democrats to be cautious, looking back on 2008's Democratic primary between Clinton and then-Senator Obama as a model for how a lively primary could strengthen a party. But they also see Cruz's ideological positioning on the far right of the conservative spectrum as an indication that Republicans are in for a fight, and that Clinton could benefit from the lack of her own drawn-out battle.

"The Hillary-Barack death-match was the best thing that ever happened to the Democratic Party, but that's because they kept it between the ditches," said longtime Clinton ally and Democratic operative Paul Begala, drawing a contrast between the Obama-Clinton disagreements and Cruz's testy policy fights with his colleagues. "They didn't run on radical, crazy stuff. They both ran on progressive, moderate sets of ideas."

But as the primary season begins in earnest, liberals have not coalesced behind any likely candidate aside from Clinton, even as a Sunday Boston Globe editorial urged Warren to jump into the race and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley has been speaking out about bank regulation, ever-so-slightly drawing a contrast with the Clintons. Instead, Clinton has been able to consolidate the party's influential forces, which her allies see as the starkest contrast with Cruz's Republicans.

That contrast, Cardona said, is a particular powerful one as Cruz — who 2008 GOP nominee John McCain once called a "wacko bird" — launches his first withering criticisms on fellow Republicans.

"I'm sure she's happy he's running," Cardona said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some Dems echo GOP's 'no compromise' demand in primaries (Associated Press)
By Charles Babington
Associated Press
March 24, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Republicans from sharply conservative House districts have won recent elections by promising to "never compromise," and now some Democrats are eyeing the same motto for their primaries.

Liberal activists, frustrated by the absence of a potent challenger from the left to Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential hopes, are turning some of their energies to congressional and mayoral races.

In Maryland, key liberal groups are assailing a well-regarded Senate candidate for his earlier refusal to rule out bipartisan deals that could combine tax increases with cuts in the projected growth of Medicare and Social Security. These liberals demand no nicks in such social programs, even if conservatives bend on tax hikes and other matters.

Democratic insiders question how far the strategy might spread in a party that generally wants government to work. But if it does expand, it could make life harder for legislative leaders in a Congress whose political middle already has largely vanished.

The Maryland target is seven-term Rep. Chris Van Hollen. Now the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee, Van Hollen has held other party leadership posts, including the one overseeing congressional campaigns in 2008 and 2010, and won the endorsement of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

By most measures, Van Hollen's record is mainstream liberal or progressive. Americans for Democratic Action gives him an 80 percent rating. That ranks him fourth among the seven House Democrats from Maryland, one of the nation's most liberal states.

But Van Hollen isn't ideologically pure enough for liberal groups that prefer Rep. Donna Edwards for the seat being vacated by five-term Democratic Sen. Barbara Mikulski. ADA gives Edwards a 95 percent approval rating, and her political persona is more unabashedly liberal than is Van Hollen's.

Van Hollen's liberal critics include Daily Kos columnists and the group Moveon.org. The group began in response to President Bill Clinton's 1998 impeachment and strongly backed Barack Obama's presidential campaigns.

Moveon.org calls Van Hollen "accomplished and capable." But the group says "it was deeply disappointing" when Van Hollen praised the basic framework of the 2010 Bowles-Simpson deficit-reduction plan.

Obama commissioned the report but never embraced it, and it eventually fell victim to attacks from all sides. The report called for tax increases and spending cuts, saying both parties must yield hallowed political ground to make significant progress against future deficits. Neither party did.

The Bowles-Simpson plan would have slowed the projected growth of Medicare and Social Security, something many nonpartisan analysts advocate.

Over time, however, key liberal groups hardened their stand against any trims to these large and growing programs. They now question whether Democrats such as Van Hollen are sufficiently liberal.

Some lawmakers blamed the collapse of Bowles-Simpson and similar bipartisan "grand bargains" on congressional Republicans who promised voters they would never compromise their conservative principles, even if Democrats gave up a lot in return. Such "don't compromise" rhetoric is now animating at least a few Democratic primaries.

In Chicago, some liberal groups say Democratic Mayor Rahm Emanuel — a former congressman and Obama's onetime chief of staff — is too centrist and pro-establishment. They are backing his challenger, Jesus "Chuy" Garcia, in the April 7 primary runoff.

Political analysts say the Democrats' remarkably uncrowded presidential field — so far, anyway — is pushing liberal activism elsewhere.

"The absence of a prominent progressive in the ranks of Democratic presidential hopefuls has accelerated the quest for congressional candidates who could hold Hillary Clinton's feet to the fire," said Rutgers University political scientist Ross K. Baker. The Clintons' "centrist legacy," he said, "causes considerable anxiety in the ranks of Occupy Wall Street groups, unions, liberal media," and candidates like Van Hollen can become collateral damage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dan Schnur, who was an adviser to President George H.W. Bush and GOP Sen. John McCain, said demands for ideological purity are familiar to many Republicans but are "a newer dynamic for the Democrats."

"The only powerbroker strong enough to discourage these types of infra-party brawls is usually the president," Schnur said. As Obama becomes increasingly seen as a lame duck, he said, "there's no one in the party with the ability to discourage a potential spoiler."

Polls find Democratic voters more inclined to see government as a force for good, and therefore more accepting of compromises to make divided government work. That's why some analysts think a "no compromise" mandate won't go far in Democratic primaries.

"Nothing like the 'no new taxes' pledge has been duplicated on the Democratic side," said Brookings Institution scholar Thomas E. Mann. "The center-left position on most issues espoused by Obama remains relatively safe ground in Democratic primaries."

In Maryland, Mann said, "Van Hollen clearly occupies that space."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One More Question on Hillary Clinton E-Mails: Where Was the Watchdog? (Bloomberg)
By Arit John
March 24, 2015
Bloomberg

One of the many unanswered questions of the Hillary Clinton e-mail story has been: Whose job was it to raise and address concerns about her exclusive use of a private account? According to open government advocates, it would have been the agency's permanent, independent Inspector General—someone nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate—if such a person had existed.

For five years, including all of Clinton's time as secretary, the State Department's Office of Inspector General never had a confirmed inspector. Instead, it was lead by acting inspector Harold W. Geisel, a former ambassador who was accused of being too cozy to agency leadership by transparency groups like the Project on Government Oversight. Throughout the first half of President Obama's first term, the absence of a State Department Inspector General while internal scandals and Benghazi rocked the department drew bipartisan criticism.

"For no one to raise concerns, it's almost impossible to believe," said Danielle Brian, the executive director for POGO.

For years POGO has been highlighting "the frequency and the longevity of vacancies in Inspectors General offices," as Brian put it. She added that while it was ironic that the Clinton story broke so close to last week's Sunshine Week—a time for open government advocates to raise awareness of transparency issues—it was also an opportunity to highlight the importance of why open government issues like Inspectors General vacancies.

"It seems like a really boring issue, but this is why it's not," Brian said. "These are people who … were in a position to have received tips or created a sense of there being accountability on these matters. But those vacancies scream essentially that there's nobody whose really interested in making sure that someone is a junkyard dog in those agencies, looking for these kinds of problems."

Beyond the State Department

The Inspector General Act of 1978 established independent watchdog offices for every major federal agency, led by an official nominated either by the president or the agency. There are currently 11 inspector general positions open—either because President Obama or the agency have yet to nominate anyone, or because a presidential nominee has yet to be confirmed by Congress.

Some positions have gone without nominees for years—according to a database maintained by POGO, the Department of Interior hasn't has a permanent inspector, or presidential nominee, since early 2009; the Agency for International Development's OIG hasn't had a leader or presidential nominee since 2011. The National Archives and Records Administration hasn't had an inspector since September 2012, when Inspector General Paul Brachfield was put on administrative leave while being investigated for racial and sexual comments.

The State Department's permanent inspectors haven't been above reproach—in 2007 then-IG Howard J. Krongard resigned over allegations that he'd impeded investigations into Blackwater and corruption in Iraq—but the work of vetted and confirmed officials carry more weight. In a 2011 report, the Government Accountability Office called on the State Department to address concerns regarding it independence writing that "the appointment of management and Foreign Service officials to head the State OIG in an acting capacity for extended periods of time is not consistent with professional standards for independence."

In other words, if you wanted to inspire confidence in whistleblowers and others that the State Department is being held accountable by an independent official, that official shouldn't be a former State Department official.

By September 2013, several months after Clinton left State, the department finally had a permanent inspector, and the department recently released a report documenting how few e-mails the State Department has saved for government records. But the long-time gap, as well as the ones at other agencies, raise questions about what other problems aren't being investigated.

"If there was any confidence that those were robust office then people within the agency or others would have turned to them," Brian said. "I have to believe that at some point we'll find out that there were people who were saying 'Why am I getting this weird email from what should obviously be state.gov?'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Where does Hillary Clinton stand on the Middle East? (The Washington Post)
By Jennifer Rubin
March 23, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Clinton's experience as secretary of state is supposed to be the main selling point for her presidency. Oddly, we know very little about her specific views on matters of pressing concern directly within her sphere of supposed expertise. If the press ever corners her, here is what we would like to know:

Does she think the president's relationship with the elected leader of our closest Middle East ally is strong, and if not, what would she do differently?

Would you feel free to criticize the Israeli prime minister as openly and harshly as the president has? If an adviser in your administration were to use a barnyard epithet to characterize him, would you want to know who that staffer is and dismiss him?

Do you agree with the notion that settlements are the main barrier to a peace deal? If so, why didn't the prime minister's building freeze and extension of the freeze jump-start a deal?

Should the Palestinian people get to choose their leaders or be stuck with a president who has continued to occupy office long after his term expired?

How can there be a comprehensive peace deal so long as Gaza is controlled by Hamas?

Israel withdrew from Gaza and got war. What makes you believe further withdrawals would have a different result?

Does the Palestinian Authority's attempts to unilaterally seek recognition of statehood violate its obligations under the Oslo Accords?

How many times has Israel offered a peace deal that includes more than 90 percent of the West Bank? Your husband was closely involved in a negotiation of one such offer. Could that have been the basis of a lasting peace deal?

Martin Indyk has blamed Israel for the failure in the peace process. Do you agree?

If Israel were to pull out entirely from the West Bank now, with Hamas and Hezbollah firmly in place and the region in turmoil, what do you think would be the result? Would Jordan fear such a move?

Should Iran be allowed to keep 6,000 centrifuges?

Why did we never impose those crippling sanctions of which you spoke? Might we have gotten more cooperation from Iran if we did?

With a 10-year sunset, what would prevent Iran from then kicking out all inspectors, withdrawing from the NPT and/or racing to develop a bomb?

Since the Obama administration refused to recognize for months that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad was using chemical weapons, drew a red line and then erased it, what makes you think the administration would recognize reported violations of the deal swiftly enough to take action to prevent a nuclear breakout?

Do you think you are a better negotiator than the president when it comes to Iran? If so, shouldn't Congress try to fend off a bad deal in order to give you or whoever is the next president the chance to negotiate a better one?

Are there "moderates" in power in Iran? Who are they, and what evidence of moderation do you see?

Had you known where we would wind up with Iran, would you have done anything differently when you were in office?

The president held up Yemen as a great success, and now it is in turmoil and falling under Iranian influence. Why should we trust his judgment on Iran if his predictive powers are so poor?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton ponders who she'll call after White House win (The Washington Times)
By S.A. Miller
March 24, 2015
The Washington Times

Undaunted by an email scandal and congressional investigation, former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton exuded wholehearted confidence Monday that she'll win the White House as she publicly mused about hires for her administration.

Speaking at a policy roundtable at a liberal Washington think tank, Mrs. Clinton hinted at a future job offer for Compton, California, Mayor Aja Brown.

"Don't be surprised if you get a call," Mrs. Clinton said after praising the Democratic mayor's anti-gang programs.

"Maybe we'll start not too far from here in a beautiful domed building, where we'll get everybody in the same room and start that conversation," continued Mrs. Clinton. "It could lead to collaboration and better results for our cities and our country."

The remarks provoked laughs from the friendly crowd at the Center for American Progress. But Mrs. Clinton wasn't joking about her self-assurance and unabashed determination to win the presidency in 2016.

The event marked the beginning of a new phase in Mrs. Clinton's quest for the White House. She has ended two years of high-priced speaking gigs while she mostly kept out of the headlines since stepping down as secretary of state.

The days are over for her to lay the groundwork for a presidential run, although last year's book tour was marred by multiple gaffes — she remarked about how "dead broke" she and former President Bill Clinton were in 2001, had a testy interview with National Public Radio and was defended by Mr. Clinton's saying the two regularly took weekend trips to grocery stores to meet "regular people."

Mrs. Clinton soon will officially announce her campaign, with little more than token opposition currently standing between her and the Democratic nomination.

Mrs. Clinton holds a commanding lead over every potential challenger for the Democratic nomination, including Vice President Joseph R. Biden, Sen. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

She leads in theoretical match-ups against every potential Republican contender as well. In a Real Clear Politics average of recent polls, Mrs. Clinton topped former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush by 15 points and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who announced his candidacy Monday, by 11 points.

At the policy roundtable, which focused on urban economics, Mrs. Clinton slipped into campaign mode, carefully reciting Democratic catch phrases such as "social mobility," "income inequality" and "wage stagnation."

"One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality combined with wage stagnation. They really go hand in hand," she said. "We don't have enough good jobs. We don't have people being placed into those jobs. We don't have enough social mobility."

"A lot of our cities truly are divided," she said. "They have a lot of inequality that has only gotten worse. They have some of the most dynamic, well educated and affluent people in the world and people who are trapped in generational poverty and whose skills are not keeping up with what the jobs of today and tomorrow demand."

Mrs. Clinton also checked off policy positions from a liberal to-do list. She called for universal pre-kindergarten and gave a shout out to New York Mayor Bill de Blasio, a liberal champion for the pre-K cause.

Still, Mrs. Clinton has faced sharp criticism for exclusively using a private email account and a private server in her home for conducting official business while serving as Secretary of State.

The unorthodox practice has shielded her official communications from Public Information Act requests and from attempts by Congress to access those documents, likely violating federal records-keeping laws.

A House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks and the administration's response formally requested Friday that Mrs. Clinton turn her email server over to an independent third party so it can be scrutinized to determine whether she and the Obama administration complied with the law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The email flap and revelations that the Clinton Global Initiative accepted foreign donations during Mrs. Clinton's tenure as America's top diplomat have fueled speculation that Mrs. Clinton's presidential ambitions could be imperiled.

Mrs. Clinton has shrugged off the criticism. A Boston Globe editorial board joined the chorus that has called for liberal firebrand Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Massachusetts Democrat, to enter the presidential race and give Mrs. Clinton come stiff competition.

"Fairly or not, many Americans already view Clinton skeptically, and waltzing to the nomination may actually hurt her in the November election against the Republican nominee," said the editorial in Monday's newspaper.

The editorial board slammed Mrs. Clinton for lacking "gumption" to tackle Wall Street reforms and the country's deep-seeded economic problems.

"Warren's dedication is obvious to anyone who watched her raise funds by rallying thousands of grass-roots supporters in her 2012 Senate campaign. She should not shrink from the chance to set the course for the Democratic Party or cede that task to Hillary Clinton without a fight," they wrote.

Mrs. Warren, who is considered the most potent challenger for the party's nomination, so far has rebuffed liberal activists' persistent calls that she run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama scrambles to limit Hillary Clinton email scandal damage (The Washington Times)
By Stephen Dinan and S.A. Miller
March 24, 2015
The Washington Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton's email practices are now becoming a legal headache for the Obama administration, which for the first time has admitted to a court that the former secretary of state withheld her emails.

Administration attorneys are now scrambling to contain the damage by promising to redo what eventually could be hundreds of open records searches that were tainted by Mrs. Clinton's email practices and those of her top aides, who, according to a New York Times report Monday, also occasionally used private emails to communicate.

The government attorneys, however, insist that the officials didn't break the law or act in bad faith by not revealing to anyone that it never searched Mrs. Clinton's emails, despite hundreds of requests for her electronic communications that were unable to be completely fulfilled because the department didn't gain access to her messages until late last year.

"It's a con game. They've been caught in a con," said Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, a conservative public interest law firm that filed 160 open-records requests that could have been tainted by Mrs. Clinton's email practices. "The concern is there's been misconduct and misrepresentation and fraud on the courts, and certainly on Judicial Watch."

His organization has asked a court to reopen one case seeking Mrs. Clinton's emails, saying the State Department couldn't have completed a search last year because it never had her emails in the first place.

Justice Department lawyers defending the State Department told Judge Royce C. Lamberth that while the government didn't get Mrs. Clinton's emails until last year, they have since searched the 30,000 or so messages to determine whether any of them should be released in response to Judicial Watch's request. The lawyers promised to share the results of their search next month.

"Those documents were not in [the State Department's] possession and control when the original search was completed," the lawyers told U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. "Once those emails were provided to the department and thus entered the department's possession and control the department, on its own initiative, searched them for records responsive to the [open-records] request."

The attorneys said the fact that they didn't disclose that Mrs. Clinton's emails weren't searched "was neither a misrepresentation nor a material omission" because the government didn't have control of them.

But the revelation that other top Clinton aides may have used personal addresses to communicate with Mrs. Clinton or with one another creates a bigger headache for the department, opening a number of other potential searches.

Gawker Media sued earlier this month seeking access to emails from Philippe Reines, a top aide to Mrs. Clinton. Gawker was stunned when the State Department earlier said it couldn't find any Reines emails on a particular topic, even though another news outlet confirmed that Mr. Reines emailed on the subject.

"Based on the facts known thus far the developing story appears to be that the use of personal e-mails by Secretary Clinton and members of her senior staff may have been a deliberate attempt to shield communications from capture by governmental systems and the public's eye, for reasons yet unknown," Gawker's attorneys told the federal court.

The New York Times on Monday reported that Mr. Reines and at least three other top Clinton aides, Huma Abedin, Jake Sullivan and Cheryl Mills, occasionally used private emails to communicate with Mrs. Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton's office told the paper that her aides rarely used their nongovernment email accounts to conduct business, amounting to "the tiniest fraction of the more than one million emails they sent or received."

The State Department this month asked Mrs. Clinton's team whether any members still have emails on their personal accounts that should be considered public business.

The White House and State Department have tried to keep the controversy at arm's length, saying the law made it Mrs. Clinton's responsibility to follow email guidelines and regulations. They have directed questions on the matter to her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Open-records laws require that communications involving government business generally be stored — though the laws leave a good deal of discretion to agencies and to the individuals creating the records. Official email accounts are usually automatically cataloged and stored, but those who use nonofficial accounts are supposed to forward messages involving government business to their official accounts to ensure that they, too, are collected.

Mrs. Clinton instead relied on her own email account and a private server kept at her home in New York for all business during her time in the administration. She said it was more convenient than having a personal and a work account.

Nearly two years after she left office, and after a congressional probe learned about her account, she turned over about 30,000 messages to the State Department but said she didn't keep another 32,000 messages she deemed private business, not government-related.

The State Department didn't respond to a request from The Washington Times on Monday, and spokeswoman Marie Harf refused to comment at the department's daily press briefing about reports that top Clinton aides also used private accounts.

Mr. Fitton said the Obama administration is trying to keep the courts from delving too deeply into the situation, but he said plenty of unanswered questions pose tricky problems for the administration and for Mrs. Clinton, who is expected to announce a bid soon for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"We still don't know who has separate email accounts, who had these alias accounts, how many records there are, were records destroyed, who was responsible for these records legally, who in the agency knew about these records, when did the Justice Department know about these records, why wasn't Judicial Watch aware of these records, why wasn't the court aware of these records?" Mr. Fitton said.

If Mrs. Clinton were a CEO or some other private individual whose records came under scrutiny, Mr. Fitton said, the FBI would have rushed to secure the records and ensure they weren't being destroyed. The government then would try to recover any lost or deleted records.

One legal hurdle for those seeking to pry into the emails is a federal judge's ruling this month that courts cannot compel agencies to dig into their employees' private email accounts to dig up messages dealing with government business. The court ruled that it is up to agencies to police themselves, not for judges to intervene.

Mr. Fitton, though, said Mrs. Clinton's situation goes beyond an employee occasionally using a private account, and he said it's wrong to describe Mrs. Clinton's emails as private because the server and account were set up to handle government business.

"This is an unprecedented case. This is the head of an agency setting up an email specifically to make sure that no one could search and review that material as the law requires," he said.

A House investigative committee has requested that Mrs. Clinton's emails be turned over to an independent third party such as a retired judge or inspector general, but the documents could end up in front of an active judge or inspector general. Sen. Chuck Grassley, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees open-records laws, has asked the State Department's inspector general to take a look at the department's email rules and Mrs. Clinton's behavior and to report back on what the next steps should be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Clinton to win she needs Liz to run (Boston Herald)
KIMBERLY ATKINS
March 23, 2015
Boston Herald
Copyright © 2015 Boston Herald, All rights reserved. Distributed by NewsBank, Inc.
WASHINGTON — Elizabeth Warren, as we now know her, would make a terrible presidential candidate. But her party, the Democrats — including presumptive nominee Hillary Clinton — need Elizabeth Warren to run.

Because they need a primary, and no one else can give them one.

The MoveOn.org faction of the party might be ready for Warren, but Warren is not ready for presidential prime time.

At a time when the world's on fire, her foreign policy chops are weak. Her domestic agenda, as important as economic equality may be, is too one-note for the Oval Office. Making the same speech over and over might raise a lot of money, but it won't win votes. Her severe aversion to the press evidences a thin skin that makes her denials about presidential plans completely understandable.

But right now Warren is also the only Democrat capable of saving Clinton from her own self-destruction. That's why Democrats need her to run. She probably won't win — though who knows what could happen on the campaign trail. But she's got to be willing to take one for the team if she wants the White House to stay blue.

To call Clinton's campaigning skills rusty would be kind. For someone who has been running for president for the better part of the last decade, she's has managed to make a complete mess of things. Unforced errors like Emailgate and the Clinton Foundation foreign funding scandal and her “dead broke" comment last summer have Democrats sweating.

These gaffes don't mean Clinton isn't qualified to be president. On paper, it's easy to see how the former senator and secretary of state has kept the field clear. But presidential campaigns aren't fought on paper.

Clinton needs to be challenged. She needs to be reminded that the word “campaign" is a verb as well as a noun. Mettle must be tested and proven, even by formidable players. Big Papi doesn't skip spring training, and Clinton shouldn't be given a primary pass.

Potential Democratic challengers like former Maryland Gov. Marty O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb have shown an unwillingness to take Clinton on. They wouldn't touch on Emailgate, even though Clinton's conduct raised fair questions. That sort of deference toward Clinton — or fear of her — does her no good.

Now imagine the entry of Warren, whose top attribute is her willingness to take on a fight. Warren would hold Clinton's feet to the fire in debates, call out her cozy Wall Street ties, and give Democrats something to get excited about — and possibly embolden other Democrats to jump in.

Sparring with Warren would breathe some life into Clinton's lethargic operation, force her to fight like she wants to win this thing, and get her ready to take on the GOP.

That's why even Clinton backers should urge Warren to run, Liz, run!

— kimberly.atkins@bostonherald.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another Clinton presidency would be a dreary, endless battle (Record-Journal)
David Horsey
March 24, 2015
Record-Journal
Copyright 2015 Record-Journal, All Rights Reserved. Distributed by NewsBank, inc.
This may sound harsh, but the thought of another Clinton presidency is just plain dreary. Certainly there are far worse fates for the country (can you say "President Huckabee?") and some scenarios scary enough to set off a stampede to Canada (can you say "President Ted Cruz?"), but the election of Hillary Rodham Clinton would be like a return to trench warfare - a grueling, mud-spattered battle fought over the same ground day after day after dispiriting day.

Clinton has not yet announced her candidacy, but Fox News commentators are already on the attack, fulminating about the "Clinton scandals" (note the plural). In the 1990s, Hillary was mocked for blaming her troubles, and Bill's, on "a vast right-wing conspiracy." She was merely describing what has become a familiar reality. The broadly arrayed forces of the conservative media, right-wing billionaires and Republican attack artists engaged in an all-fronts assault on the Clintons. Then, after an eight-year break, the same people came back with enhanced power to mount a relentless siege aimed at destroying Barack Obama's presidency.

At least Obama brought something new to our political life. Contrary to the bizarre and cynical fantasies promulgated by the conservative scare machine (Obama wasn't born here! Obama is a Muslim! Obama is the Antichrist!), Obama has proven to be one of the most decent, eloquent and intelligent men ever to take up residence in the White House. There has not been a whiff of personal scandal during his presidency and the so-called political scandals - Benghazi, Fast and Furious, et al. - have been almost entirely trumped up tempests in very tiny teapots.

Obama has not been a president without flaws and disappointments. As predicted by his opponents in the 2008 campaign, his lack of governmental experience has sometimes been a detriment. He was naive in his initial dealings with the Republican opposition, failing too long to recognize that they had absolutely no interest in governing with him for the common good. His solitary nature, his intellectualism and his mocking sense of the absurd were less than perfectly suited for the back-slapping, ego-stroking, dumbed-down ethos of the inside-the-beltway political game. Still, now in his final two years, the president is beginning to live up to the hope he inspired in his "Yes We Can" campaign. Compared to the country bumpkins, snake oil salesmen and bomb throwers running Congress, he is a calm, firm voice of reason and inspiration. Just the fact that our first nonwhite president won re-election gives the modest hope that this country can become a more perfect union and that American government will one day rise from the current trough of dysfunction, mendacity and willful, self-serving ignorance. It is much harder to imagine that hope being sustained in a new Clinton presidency. In 1993, the young Clintons did bring a rush of energy and high expectations. After eight years of triangulations, investigations and sordid revelations, that energy and those expectations were spent. Now, even the exciting prospect of electing the first female president is dimmed because this particular female and her husband have been here before. We know what to expect, both from the Clintons and from their enemies, and it is far from new.

If they get their second chance - and I say they because, whatever role he is given in a Hillary Clinton administration, there is no way Bill will confine himself to serving tea like Mamie Eisenhower - they will arrive like a veteran rock band on a farewell tour. They will arrive with all the complicated connections to foreign governments and opportunistic power players who have donated millions of dollars to the Clintons' philanthropic efforts and all the super-rich friends they have made at Davos and on Wall Street. They will arrive with mountains of baggage, including all the baggage from past controversies, from Whitewater to Monica Lewinsky.

They will not intend to bring that old stuff along, but it will be delivered to their doorstep by their right-wing enemies, who are eager to cull through all the dirty laundry of the past. Of course, any Democratic president now has to contend with a perpetual assault from conservatives. But at least someone who has not been around as long might get a brief respite, a narrow opportunity to launch new initiatives and raise hopes that progress is possible.

For Hillary Clinton, there will be nothing close to a honeymoon. It will be a "Groundhog Day" of a presidency with each new morning bringing the same weary repetition of old battles between a power couple we know too well and reactionary political forces that would rather destroy another presidency than give an inch of ground for the sake of our nation.

Two-time Pulitzer Prize winner David Horsey is a political commentator for the Los Angeles Times.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Is Daring Us to Look Into the Clinton Foundation (The Daily Beast)
By Eleanor Clift
March 24, 2015
The Daily Beast

Hillary Clinton can't stop talking about the Clinton Foundation everywhere she goes because at the end of the day, they believe the good works outweighs the shady foreign money.
Hillary Clinton spent Monday morning talking to a friendly audience about policies that could help cities, and with unabashed pride, name checked Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), her controversial family foundation, several times.

The message? CGI is an asset, not an albatross.

Republicans and reporters look at CGI as a treasure trove of scandals, laden with foreign money from governments with questionable human rights practices and potential conflicts of interest.

But to Clinton, it's a living laboratory of programs that work alongside government, or instead of government, and in partnerships with corporations or foreign entities that may raise eyebrows among the pesky press but do good works.

The panel discussion at the Center for American Progress on Monday wasn't the first time she has talked up the family foundation since the news of the foreign donations broke a few weeks ago.

Clinton touted CGI in both her paid speech to the American Camp Association last week as well as at the United Nations before and after her dismal press conference about her State Department emails.

"Her long relationship with CGI is a matter of public record; she's not going to be able to run away from it, and if it's a good idea, I wouldn't advise her to stay silent about it," says Bill Galston, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and a former policy advisor in the Clinton White House. "If she's going to get a lot of the downside of the relationship, why shouldn't she get the upside?"

Nick Merrill, Clinton's spokesman, said that while he doesn't speak for the Foundation, the press scrutiny "doesn't stop her from being proud of the very substantial work and innovative ideas that have come out of there."

When Neera Tanden, president of Center for American Progress, and a former Clinton staffer, asked Clinton why the country should care about the success, or failure, of cities, Clinton referenced the CGI's work as "a convener" in addressing the issue of rampant inequality in cities where a highly educated and affluent population exists alongside people trapped in generational poverty.

She then described a CGI program called "Job One," that works with companies to place people who've never had jobs.

Her comments were met with approving nods.

Clinton was very much in her element on the revitalization of cities panel.

She sat in the center of a roundish table that stretched out on both sides to accommodate other panelists, including HUD Secretary Julian Castro, who the audience was sizing up as a potential running mate should Clinton make it across the finish line on her second try.

"If she's going to get a lot of the downside of the relationship, why shouldn't she get the upside?" Bill Galston, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and a former policy advisor in the Clinton White House.

"Well Amen," Clinton said in her closing thoughts on the panel discussion. "I love conversations like this. It's really nice to be getting back in on evidence-based solutions," a remark that brought knowing laughter from the invited audience.

"We need to abolish the silos," she said, a reference to the repeated declaration by the participants that the various parts of government need to talk to each other, and finally, that what's needed is a culture of collaboration rather than a culture of confrontation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And then came the hint – which has also become part of every Clinton speech lately.

“Mayor,” she said, turning to the mayor of Compton, California, 32-year-old Aja Brown, citing her work in disbanding gangs, “Don’t be surprised if you get a call, not too far from here, beautiful domed building…..” where help is needed to bridge gaps, Clinton said amidst the laughter at her teasing acknowledgment of what lies ahead should her campaign succeed.

In the audience were Victor and Sarah Kovner, longtime Democratic activists and fundraisers in New York.

They thought Clinton did well, that she was relaxed and appears ready for the rough road ahead. They acknowledged the recent Boston Globe editorial calling on Elizabeth Warren to enter the primaries, if only to insure Clinton is in fighting form for the general election.

“Sure she could use a debate, but not one that’s going to tear us apart,” Sarah Kovner told The Daily Beast.

Asked what she thought of Castro as a potential running mate, Kovner said no, too young and inexperienced. Democrats did that with the current president. Clinton could be seen nodding approvingly as the 40-year-old former mayor of San Antonio declared, “We’re falling in love with cities again,” as he recounted programs he put in place for his city’s poorest residents, including such simple things as improving bus routes.

That’s all well and good, but Kovner’s candidate is Virginia Senator Tim Kaine, former governor, old enough (57), experienced, no skeletons, no drama, and from a state Clinton would need to win.

But then that’s getting way ahead of where we are in this process, so many more stories to write, and boxes to check before we know whether the rules are truly different this time, and which ones apply to the Clintons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gary Ritterstein" <info@johndouglassforcongress.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/6/2012 2:31:51 AM
Subject: dangerous

JOHN DOUGLASS
HELP VIRGINIA FAMILIES

John --

John Douglass is urging Corporate Congressman Robert Hurt to introduce a federal ban on uranium mining near residential communities. If Hurt fails to act now, families and farmers throughout our district could be at risk. Studies show ties between uranium mining and the threat of cancer.

Get Hurt and his allies in Congress to ban dangerous mining in our district before the election. Read the letter and add your signature.

We have already seen what happens when we let these corporations take over -- Canonsburg, Pa is now called the "most radioactive town in America" since uranium waste contaminated buildings and soil, costing taxpayers $48 million for the clean-up.

Yet in response to news that the Virginia legislature is soon expected to consider lifting the ban, Hurt said it's "a state issue," leaving it up to the same politicians that tried to force painful procedures on Virginia women.

Don't leave it up to the state legislature -- tell them that No means No by urging Hurt to act now.

In Congress, Hurt got caught trying to block oversight of what his campaign admits is "radioactive matter produced from uranium". His campaign tries to get away with claiming that the final Farm Dust bill keeps mining subject to the Clean Air Act, but refuses to come clean about the fact that Hurt opposed that very requirement.

Hurt understands that introducing a federal ban of uranium mining could cost him politically and personally. It has been widely reported that uranium executives have funded his campaigns and his family owns a financial stake in the mine itself.

Share your concerns with Congressman Hurt by co-signing General Douglass's letter.

John Douglass is ready to help build bipartisan support for a federal ban in Congress, before this becomes a matter of life and death. Having put his life on the line in defense of our country, he will always put the safety of our families first.

Gary Ritterstein

Campaign Manager
Douglass for Congress

P.S. Hurt and his Republican allies recently voted to take a month-long break from their work in Congress. And if they don't get back to work on a federal uranium mining ban by November, it will be up to us to send him packing permanently.

MAKE A CONTRIBUTION

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paid for by John Douglass for Congress

14249 Hume Road
Hume, VA 22639

TO UNSUBSCRIBE FROM THIS MAILING LIST, CLICK Þ&HERE POWERED BY Þ'NGP VAN, INC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Zayneb Shaikley" <zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org>
To:	"Hannah Richert - PC" <hannah@presidentclinton.com>
	"Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
	"Laura Graham" <lgraham@clintonfoundation.org>
	"Stephanie Streett" <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org>
Date:	12/7/2012 12:28:33 PM
Subject:	Biweekly Report
Attachments:	Biweekly Report 12.07.12.docx

Hannah,
I have attached and pasted below the latest Biweekly Report for President Clinton.
Please let me know if he has any questions or comments.
Thanks,
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
December 7, 2012

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative (CEO)

- CEO reached out to mentee participants in the NYC-based Entrepreneur Mentoring Program (EMP) to understand the extent to which Hurricane Sandy impacted their businesses and is currently working to identify additional mentors and advisors for the businesses that were hardest hit by the hurricane and have requested additional advisory support.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

- The Peru Ministry of Tourism has agreed to jointly fund a project with CGSGI to provide capacity building and link small suppliers to the hospitality sector in Cusco, Peru. This project is a replication of the successful project that CGSGI has operated for the last three years in Cartagena. The project will involve 30 supplier groups linked to 26 buyers including 7 hotel chains and 5 restaurant chains. The hotels and restaurants have actively participated in a demand analysis in advance of launching the project and based on this analysis the project is expected to yield over $5M in cumulative producer income over 3 years and create over 500 jobs. The product lines that will be developed include vegetables and fruit, traditional meats, dairy products, processed foods and grains, and fish. The target start date for the project will be in early 2013.

Clinton Development Initiative
Malawi

- Rains have still not been sufficient for significant planting on the commercial farms. Major sales contracts are in place. CDI had a good meeting with an Israeli company that specializes in drip irrigation systems for commercial and smallholder farms. The company is expected to submit a proposal to CDI.

Rwanda (CHDI)

- An estimated 70% of the work on the Mt. Meru Soyco site has is complete. Most of the civil work is done and a large amount of equipment is on site. The refinery's boiler is currently in transit and a boiler operator has been hired for a period of 2 years.
- With regards to the AGRA project, planting is complete. The results are mixed, with good crops in regions that experienced regular rainfall and poor crops in regions affected by drought. This week, Dr. Rebbie from AGRA visited CDI. She analyzed soil and rainfall data from last season in addition to overall performance over the season.
- Construction of the coffee roasting factory is moving along well and CDI is up-to-date on all payments. The director general of the National Agricultural Export Development Board (NAEB) has agreed to provide equipment specifications within the next week.

Zayneb K. Shaikley
Associate Counsel & Initiative Liaison | William J. Clinton Foundation
77 Water Street, New York, NY 10005
Direct: 917.720.0295 | Mobile: 646.873.0244
zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org | www.clintonfoundation.org

This e-mail, and any attachments hereto, is intended only for use by the addressee(s) named herein and may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. Any unauthorized use or dissemination of this message in whole or in part is strictly prohibited. If you have received it by mistake please notify the sender by return e-mail and delete this message from your system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/5/2016 6:00:00 PM
Subject: GMF's World Wire: What to Watch in 2016 | GMF to Host Kissinger | Call for Brussels Forum Volunteers

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | GMFUS.org

GMF's World Wire

January 6, 2016

What to Watch in 2016: GMF Experts Look at the Year Ahead

2015 was a tumultuous year for the transatlantic partners. The refugee crisis, terrorist attacks, Russian aggression, and economic issues dominated discussions on both sides of the Atlantic in ways that would have been difficult to predict at the start of the year. What will 2016 bring?

READ MORE

Helmut Schmidt: The Life and Legacy of a German Statesman

On January 12, GMF will host a discussion on the life and legacy of Former German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt with Henry Kissinger, Theo Sommer, Constanze Stelzenmüller, and David Ignatius.

READ MORE

The Fallacies of Treating Turkey as Europe's Gatekeeper

Emiliano Alessandri
Ongoing developments in EU-Turkey relations are as significant as they are worrying. The Globalist chose this publication as one of the top essays of 2015.

READ MORE

Tweet of the Week

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

@LundqvistMC :
Interesting take by @gmfus on what were this year's wins and losses? Transatlantic 2015 - The Year in Review http://shar.es/1Gi9QP

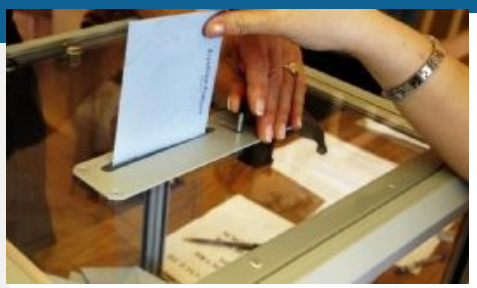
RETWEET

Brussels Forum: Call for Volunteers

GMF seeks volunteers for Brussels Forum , which will take place March 18-20. Volunteers will provide essential operational support at this annual, major international conference held in Brussels.

APPLY NOW

Here's What We Know About How to Help Spread Democracy



Nelli Babayan
Programs that familiarize leaders from transitioning countries with democratic rules and principles have the best chance of success at spreading democracy. | The Washington Post

READ MORE

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Hudson Institute" <info@hudson.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 6/25/2015 8:33:48 AM
Subject: News from Hudson: Turkey's Future, Oil Abundance, Targeting ISIS, and More

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/30/2008 7:33:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Employee Town Hall in Aurora, CO 07/30/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Kelli, on the ground in Aurora, CO. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Promises "I will not raise your taxes nor support a tax increase," not even to pay for Social Security
- Repeats attacks on Obama that
    - he voted for tax hikes for people making $32,000/ year (vs. http://www.factcheck.org/elections-2008/the_32000_question.html)
    - his words don't mean much, for all his eloquence
- Lumps Obama with Bush Administration and Congress: people saying whatever they need to score political points
- Touts community college partnerships as "centerpiece" of dealing with displaces workers
- Says he's humbled to go from bottom of his class at Naval Academy to top of the GOP ticket

Aurora, CO: McCain Employee Town Hall 07/30/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- 350-400 people in audience, all Wagner Manufacturing Co employees
- McCain speaks in front of 2 giant tractors and a large American flag
- Tracker didn't see protesters outside the event
- Security pretty tight, only letting in employees and press
- Joe Wagner gives introductory remarks
    - coal-mining and uranium-mining very important to our business - we support these endeavors but also conservation and development of alternative energy sources - we are on both sides of the energy equation
    - As chair of her own company, Cindy can understand how government can help or hurt small privately-owned businesses
- Cindy introduces her husband
    - These Rwandan women watched their families killed in front of them. But on my trip, I saw a rebirth, led by women. Rwanda will succeed because of their strength, courage and deliberate attitude and leadership. I saw in these women what I have seen in my husband for 28 years. They made sure they put their countries first.
    - I hope I'm introducing you to the next POTUS.
- Event noticeably shorter than most McCain events (trend of the week)
- McCain reads from papers, not teleprompters
- Stump speech an almost-verbatim copy of yesterday's town hall
- McCain's non-cancer spot visible

Speech Highlights

- TY Cindy, Wagner (your son is doing a great job -- not as great as his dad), TY for the tour
- I was surprised to hear your business is as far-reaching as Mongolia - i hope you all get to visit
- Happy to hear you're making good use of community colleges. We need to provide training and education to workers, esp displaced workers. We can't leave people behind. The best way we can take care of displaced workers is to get them a quality, high-paying job.
- Probably the best test is workers that stay for a long time. I know you're proud.
- The purpose of this meeting is so I can respond to your questions, comments and insults. Town halls are the essence of America. Americans want to be heard today, they're hurting.
- I've been called a maverick, someone who marches to the beat of his own drum. Sometimes meant as a compliment sometimes an insult. I don't work for a President, a party, special interests or myself - I work for you and the country I love.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

  - I spoke up against a President when he had a strategy I thought wasn't working, against a party when I believed they had wasteful spending, against a Congress for an irresponsible energy bill.
  - This hasn't made me friends in DC. I've heard pundits tell me this isn't a smart way to go, but

- We need to change everything, from education to energy to
- We have a lot of work to do and to get it done, we're really going to have to have the energy to change Washington
- Obama wants to raise your taxes to pay for bigger government. I promise you this: "I will not raise your taxes nor support a tax increase"
- Obama's requested about $1billion in pork-barrel projects. I never have. I will veto every bill that comes across my desk. It's wrong and I know how to fix it. We'll stop We won't spend millions investigating the DNA of bears.
- Obama says he'll only vote for tax increases on the rich, but in the Senate he's voted for raising taxes on people making $32k.
- I am opposed to raising taxes on Social Security. I want to fix the system without raising taxes. That's a debate I'm willing to have. We need to sit down together to fix SS.
- We are Americans first before GOP or Dem, i will always put my country first.
- Raising taxes in a bad economy is about the worst thing you can do because it kills jobs. I want to keep jobs
- Obama has said every domestic energy sources has a problem, I think every domestic energy source can be part of the solution
- We ought to start drilling for more oil at home, including offshore! Obama opposes that. Meanwhile Congress is gridlocked, esp on offshore drilling. That's what's wrong with DC.
- Obama says he wants peace. But his policy of unconditional withdrawal could lead to more violence and a third Iraq war. I believe in withdrawal based on conditions on the ground. I hate war and I know its cost.
- For all the eloquence of Obama's words, they dont mean very much. Not just Bush Admin or Congress, but everyone says what they need to get elected and score political points. If Obama cant say what he means openly and honestly, how can he stand up and change Washignton? We don't need another politician in Washington.
- I always chose my country first. I will always put our country's greatness, prosperity and peace and hopes and ambitions of its people before partisan politics.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) Do you view term limits as an effective resolution to an ineffective Congress?
  - MCCAIN: It's addressing a symptom of the problem rather than the problem itself. There are great people in Congress who have irreplaceable experience, e.g. Sen. Lugar. What we need is more people involved in the political process and have those who aren't as good in judgment leave. I go back adn forth, but I prefer leveling hte playing field for challengers adn give them a chance. We've seen a rise in voter reg and in independents, saying I'm not happy with GOPs or Dems. I think we on both sides have to put our country first. And we GOPs have seen our base disaffected by our wasteful spending. Sometimes I feel differently when I try to do the Lord's work in the city of Satan.

- 2Q) I'm not prejudiced, but what's your view on immigration?
  - MCCAIN: Twice Sen. Kennedy and I, working with Administration, sought to get comprehensive legislation and secure our borders. We failed because public didn't believe we would. We need to secure our borders, then truly temporary worker program (prosecuting employers who hire ppl without tamper-proof biometric IDs), then address the 12million people here illegally in a human fashion (they shouldnt' get precendence over people who came legally, and they should come here legally and they should have to learn English). Another issues is the Mexican drug cartels, a life-and-death struggle in Mexico. Calderon has a huge struggle on his hand because the corruption bred by these cartels goes up through the govt. And we have an interest in this because their product is coming across the border and killing our people. We also have to do something about the demand, which is anohter subject.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 3Q) I've also been critical of you reaching across the aisle too much. When things liek offshore drilling and the Fairness Doctrine are put up in Congress adn the leadership does nothing, I start to lose faith that DC will ever change.
    - MCCAIN: First, there's a poll that shows 9% Congressional approval and 80% people think USA on wrong track. So we see gridlock in Congress. Is there anyone here taht thinks we shouldn't at least vote on offshore drilling? They won't get spending under control. Let's face it, we are in crisis in America. These are tough times. these are times when Americans historically stood up together and said we're not GOPs or Dems, we're Americans. I have a record of reaching across the aisle, from Abramoff investigations to Boeing deal to campaign finance and other issues. You may disagree with me on some of these issues, but I know how to get things done.

- 4Q) What are you going to do to help those of us who have to choose between buying gas to get to work versus buying groceries?
    - MCCAIN: On the price of food?
    - Audience member: On both.
    - MCCAIN: They're not disconnected. Cost of energy, e.g. ethanol has a direct effect on cost of food. There are Americans who have to choose between buying gas and buying food. Mostly the lowest-income Americans. We have to lift the moratorium on offshore drilling. Will it solve the problem? No, but it will send a message to the world. We can't afford this $700B transfer of wealth. We also need wind, tide, solar. We need nuclear. The French do it. We need to store and re-process. I want to build 45 nuclear plants. And green technology. I saw GM's new Volt. This is a leap forward in technology. We have to understand that it took us 30 years to get into this position, so we're not going to get out tomorrow. I believe offshore drilling and conservation can get us where we need. I call it the Lexington Project. We will start as soon as I'm POTUS.
    - FOLLOWUP: In the meantime what are we supposed to do?
    - MCCAIN: I'd like to give you a gas tax holiday. It's been much derided. Is that going to help? It'll help some. Diesel-truck driver doesn't like that his tax goes to bridge to nowhere, etc. I'd remove the ethanol subsidies and the tariff on imported sugar-energy, I'd invest $2m in R&D.

- 5Q) [President of Aurora Community College]
    - MCCAIN: Can you tell us more about the partnership between Warner and your community college? I've been briefed, but I think this is the future of dealing with the displaced worker.
    - ACC President: We provide training and they provide equipment, very successful.
- My question is these programs only exist when there's a huge investment like Wagner has done.
    - MCCAIN: We all know that because of international competition and jobs fleeing, we have lost tons of jobs. I think the centerpiece is, the govt should sponsor these programs. If you're a small-business person and you need a person educated in your particular specialty, you can turn to the community colleges and get that person. And I'd be glad to supplement an older worker's income while they're getting retrained. And i say that as a small-government, low-taxes conservative because we all know that a job is more than a job.

- 6Q) What is your stance on benefits for veterans?
    - MCCAIN: Say what? Oh. First of all, TY for your service to this country. I carry around with me a quote from George Washington ('willingness of young Americans to serve is directly related to how we treat vets). you know about the disgraces of Walter Reed. The good thing is that we've improved in the speed we can get people from the battlefield to care. And there are going to be a lot of people coming out this current conflict are going to have PTSD because of its horrific nature. So we're going to have to increase our capability to deal with combat-related wounds and injuries. But for routine health care needs, they should get a plastic card and see a doctor of their choice.

- CO is going to be a battleground state. I will be back. I want to thank the people here for the work they're doing, as far away as Mongolia - that's one thign I didnt expect when I came here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- I'm very humbled that a guy that stood 5th from the bottom of his class at the Naval Academy could stand with the nomination of the party of Lincoln and T. Roosevelt. But I'm also honored. I'm the luckiest guy.
- Years ago, N Vietnamese offered me to leave early and I wanted to, but I also wanted to honor a guy who had come there first, Everett Alvarez, and our code of conduct. I put my country first then and I always will.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Suzy George" <sgeorge@albrightstonebridge.com>
To: "Aaron Connelly" <AConnelly@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Bill Antholis" <wantholis@brookings.edu>
"Bill Perry" <wjperry@aol.com>
bill.danvers@gmail.com
"Brian Katulis" <bkatulis@americanprogress.org>
"Bruce Riedel" <briedel@brookings.edu>
"Bill?? Woodward" <bwoodward@mkalbright.com>
"Caitlin McDonnell" <cmcdonnell@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Carol Browner" <cmbrowner@me.com>
"Catherine Whitney" <Catherine.Whitney@skadden.com>
"Chris Roberts" <croberts@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Dan Benjamin" <dbenjam61@hotmail.com>
"Deborah Gordon" <DCgordon@stanford.edu>
"Denis McDonough" <denis.mcdonough@gmail.com>
"Derek Chollet" <dhchollet@gmail.com>
"Don Baer" <donbaer@ps-b.com>
"Don Gips \(don.gips@gmail.com\)" <don.gips@gmail.com>
donkerrick <donkerrick@comcast.net>
"Eryn M. Sepp \(eryn.sepp@gmail.com\)" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
"Frank Lowenstein" <frankl03@yahoo.com>
"Greg Craig" <gcraig@skadden.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Jamie Rubin" <JamesPRubin1960@gmail.com>
"Jan Vulevich Stewart" <jstewart@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jeff Smith" <jeffrey_smith@aporter.com>
"Jeremy Bash" <jeremybash@gmail.com>
"Jessica Lewis" <lewisje03@yahoo.com>
"Jim O'Brien" <jobrien@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Joanna Nicoletti?? \(info@forwardengagement.org\)" <info@forwardengagement.org>
"Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Julianne Smith" <julsmi@gmail.com>
"Ken Lieberthal" <klieberthal@brookings.edu>
"Kurt Campbell" <kurtmcampbell@yahoo.com>
"Laura?? Huber" <lhuber@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Leon Fuerth" <hdpf@msn.com>
"Maida?? Stadtler" <mstadtler@apcoworldwide.com>
"Marcel Lettre" <mlettre@verizon.net>
"Mariah Sixkiller" <Mariah.sixkiller@mail.house.gov>
"Marisa DeAngelis" <MDeAngelis@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Martin Indyk" <mindyk@brookings.edu>
"Michele Flournoy" <micheleflournoy3@gmail.com>
"Nadia Nowytski" <nadia.nowytski@aporter.com>
"Pat Griffin" <pgriffin@pmj-dc.com>
"Rand Beers" <rand1142@verizon.net>
"Rich Verma" <rverma@steptoe.com>
"Rick Kessler" <rjkessler@verizon.net>
"Rob Malley" <rmalley555@gmail.com>
"Samuel Berger" <sberger@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Steve Ricchetti" <sricchetti@cox.net>
"Strobe Talbott" <stalbott@brookings.edu>
"Susan Rice" <ricesusane@aol.com>
"Tara Sonenshine" <tsonenshine@earthlink.net>
"Tim Roemer" <tjroemer@gmail.com>
"Tom Daschle" <tom.daschle@dlapiper.com>
"Tom Donilon" <tdonilon@gmail.com>
"Tom Downey" <tdowney@dmggroup.com>
"Tommy Ross" <tommy_ross@reid.senate.gov>
"Toni Verstandig" <tonigverstandig@gmail.com>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Tony Blinken" <ablinken@aol.com>
"Veronica Pollack" <Veronica.Pollock@dlapiper.com>
"Wendy Sherman" <wendyrsherman@gmail.com>
"Wyndee Parker" <wyndee.parker@mail.house.gov>

Date: 2/1/2014 9:32:47 PM

Subject: Bruce Riedel article

Article by Bruce

Al-Qaeda now frontline threat to Israel - Al-Monitor: the Pulse of the Middle East

http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/01/al-qaeda-israel-threat.html

Al-Qaeda now frontline threat to Israel

Al-Qaeda's affiliates and al-Qaedism the idea are gradually, inexorably, surrounding Israel. Safe havens and bases are sprouting up north and south of Israel like never before in the history of the global jihad, fulfilling the dreams of Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri. Israel remains a very hard target for terrorists and is fully capable of defending itself, but the challenges facing Israeli counter terrorists are becoming more difficult.

Summary Print With gains in Syria, Lebanon and Egypt, al-Qaeda and its affiliates threaten Israel more than ever.

Author Bruce Riedel Posted January 31, 2014

Israel has always been at the core of al-Qaeda's narrative and ideology. From the beginning of bin Laden's jihadist war on the "Crusader-Zionist" enemy, Israel was a key target. The "liberation" of the holy mosques of Jerusalem actually came before the "liberation" of the holy mosques of Mecca and Medina in his writings. When he endorsed the attempt to blow up an American jetliner over Detroit on Christmas 2009, he said attacks like it would continue as long as America supported Israel. But until recently al-Qaeda and its affiliates found it hard to get to the promised land and attack Israel. Israeli and/or Jewish targets in Kenya or Tunisia or elsewhere were attacked, but Israel itself was too hard to get to.

Most of al-Qaeda's activity until two years ago took place in parts of the Islamic world remote from the center of the Arab world and Israel. Al-Qaeda thrived in Pakistan, Yemen, Algeria and Iraq, but it had little presence in the Eastern Mediterranean.

The Arab Awakening has changed the geography of al-Qaedism dramatically. The Iraqi branch of al-Qaeda — the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS) — gave birth to a Syrian branch, Jabhat al-Nusra , in 2012 that has thrived in the Syrian civil war. Now the two groups are competitors for influence in eastern and northern Syria. Israeli intelligence sources claim that they together command the loyalty of 40,000 fighters. An American intelligence source put the number at around 25,000. Many are foreigners drawn to Syria by the vision that they are part of a campaign to liberate Jerusalem after first defeating the Assad dictatorship. US officials estimate 7,000 foreign volunteers are in Syria from 50 countries. Even tiny Luxembourg has been identified as a country from which foreign volunteers have gone to fight and die in the Syrian jihad.

Jabhat al-Nusra has also created a Lebanese franchise, the Abdullah Azzam Brigades, named after the iconic Palestinian ideologue who was bin Laden's partner in Afghanistan in the 1980s war against the Soviet Union. With Lebanon's Sunni community frustrated by Hezbollah's dominance of the country, the situation is ripe for al-Qaeda to grow. Zawahri in January urged all al-Qaeda affiliates in Syria and Iraq to work together to set the stage for the final liberation of Jerusalem. Zawahri has backed Jabhat al-Nusra's leader, Mohammad al-Golani , as the rightful leader of the Syrian war; Golani's nom de guerre itself tells you his ultimate objective is Israel.

In the south, al-Qaedism is growing in Egypt in the wake of the army coup last summer that toppled the democratically elected Muslim Brotherhood government. Zawahri had predicted from the start of the Arab Spring in Egypt that the army would stage a counterrevolution and he urged his sympathizers to prepare for an armed struggle, a jihad, to fight them. In the mind of al-Qaeda supporters, the coup validated their narrative: Peaceful, democratic change was an illusion, the Brotherhood was too weak and the army too determined to keep power. Al-Qaeda propaganda charges that the coup was arranged behind the scenes by the Saudi intelligence service with the silent blessing of Israel and the collusion of the Americans.

Now a number of groups have emerged in Egypt waging jihad on the military government. The most dangerous is Ansar Bayt al-Maqdis, or Ansar Jerusalem, which has carried out a series of terrorist attacks in Cairo and other Egyptian cities and also in the Sinai Peninsula. On Jan. 25, the group took responsibility with a video for shooting down an Egyptian military helicopter with a sophisticated man-portable surface-to-air missile. Analysis of the video suggests the MANPAD (Man-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Portable Air Defense system) was more advanced than the usual state of the art in the region. Zawahri has more than once praised the jihadists in the Sinai Peninsula for their operations, especially against Israeli targets like the gas pipeline that delivers gas from Egypt to Israel and Jordan. The group's name betrays its ultimate objective.

Israeli intelligence announced last month that they had foiled an al-Qaeda plot to attack multiple targets inside Israel, including the US Embassy in Tel Aviv. The embassy is a vulnerable target since it sits on a major road with virtually no standoff from traffic. The Israeli internal intelligence service, the Shin Bet, reported it had arrested a number of Palestinians who were said to be in touch with Zawahri indirectly via jihadists in the Gaza Strip who were involved in planning the attacks. There may have also been contacts with Jabhat al-Nusra in Syria. The Israelis indicated that several Russian Muslims, probably from Chechnya, would participate in the actual suicide attacks. The operation appears to have been thwarted fairly early in its aspirational phase — that is, before the planning was complete and the operatives in place. If the accusation that Zawahri were directly involved in the planning was true, it would suggest a more active operational level of activity for the Egyptian head of al-Qaeda than is usually adduced.

The Israeli intelligence community would be especially alarmed if al-Qaeda could develop an infrastructure in Jordan. Then the noose would be complete. Jordanian intelligence is extremely effective in fighting al-Qaeda, but the group has a long history of recruiting in the Hashemite Kingdom. The founder of al-Qaeda in Iraq was, of course, the Jordanian Abu Musab Zarqawi. Jordanian sources say that some 2,500 Jordanians are fighting with the two al-Qaeda groups in Syria, Jabhat al-Nusra and the ISIS. Most are with Jabhat al-Nusra.

Israel has a long history of fighting terrorism and has exceptional capabilities to counter terror threats. It is a hard target with hard border security, including at airports and other entry posts. The Israeli intelligence and security services like the Shin Bet are among the best in the world. Al-Qaeda bases in Syria, Lebanon and Egypt are undoubtedly high on the collection priority lists of the Israeli security community.

The growth of al-Qaeda franchises and al-Qaedism in the neighborhood is the result of the Arab Awakening and the chaos it has produced, not some al-Qaeda master plan. Zawahri was caught off balance by the Egyptian revolution in 2011. But al-Qaeda is an adaptive ideology and it has taken advantage of the regional situation to fulfill the aspiration of its founders, bin Laden and Zawahri, to take the war to Israel’s border and someday into Israel itself.

Read more: http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/01/al-qaeda-israel-threat.html#ixzz2s8UQQZsp

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
"David Binder" <David@db-research.com>
"Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
"Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/23/2015 1:56:26 PM
Subject: Fwd: Stories for tomorrow 4.24

For our eight am call tomorrow

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: Rebecca Chalif <rchalif@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: April 23, 2015 at 8:53:05 PM EDT
To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Ferguson <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@gpg.com >, Josh Schwerin <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Lehrich <jlehrich@hillaryclinton.com >, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Stories for tomorrow 4.24

Stories for tomorrow:

- Washington Post - Ros, Hamburger - Giustra profile
- New York Times, weekender - Tony Rodham
- ABC Brian Ross- Giustra, Canadian
- Ruth Marcus- no quid pro quo, but this is a problem for the Clintons, typical, they blur lines all the time
- WSJ- Cheryl holding up FOIAs for political reasons (next week)
- Bloomberg- tbd story, has Giustra on the record (tbd time)
- Bloomberg- Laureate
- NY Daily News- did we tell the NY Times whether or not HRC was briefed

Story Lines:

1. Nervous Dems
2. Playing by their own rules, fatigue
3. WJC isolated/wealth, foundation as a continuing drag on the campaign

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sandler, Herbert" <hms@sandlerfoundation.org>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 9/15/2014 9:56:42 AM
Subject: FW: Hillary by Joseph Lelyveld (New York Review of Books - Sept 25, 2014 issue)

Any reaction to this review?
Any history with Lelyveld and Hillary?

Hillary

Joseph Lelyveld

SEPTEMBER 25, 2014 ISSUE

The memoirs of Hillary Clinton have to be viewed, like their author, as a work in progress. Volume one carried her all the way from her days as a Goldwater girl in Park Ridge, Illinois, to her years as a political lightning rod in the Clinton White House, then finally to the United States Senate, which was never going to be her last stop.* Volume two, picking up the story at the end of her 2008 presidential campaign, recounts her four years at the State Department as what she accurately enough but a tad vainglorously calls "the chief diplomat of the most powerful nation on earth."

Taken together, the two volumes add up to nearly 1,200 pages, and a third can hardly be ruled out. Passages toward the end of the latest, on building the middle class at home and abroad and restoring the American dream for the twenty-first century, read like early drafts for an acceptance speech at the next Democratic convention. Just possibly, by the time that third volume is written, the first African-American president will have long since given way to the first woman to hold the office; and Hillary and Bill will have spent more time in the White House than Eleanor and Franklin.

If it comes to that, Hard Choices won't be the reason. The book landed with a thud. It's a stiff-jointed, careful performance, assembled by a "book team" of former and present aides from briefing papers, old speeches, town hall transcripts, and interviews. What we get are the highly edited reflections of a prospective candidate: part résumé, designed to reveal the depth of her immersion in global affairs and the extent of her familiarity with the world's great and near great, scores of them (from the Empress of Japan to His All Holiness, the Ecumenical Patriarch of the Greek Orthodox Church, to Bono); part rampart, designed not to reveal too much.

Here and there, maybe every eighty pages, it's flecked with stabs at wry humor, mostly about her wardrobe and hair. ("How many times, as Senator from New York, did I go on David Letterman's show to deliver a pantsuit joke?" she asks.) Here and there also, flashes of real feeling briefly light up dry recitals of yet another trip, another itinerary. "That drove me crazy," Clinton exclaims over her discovery that there were no schools in a vast Congolese refugee camp she visited. A "senior administration official" invites a blast from the secretary by posing a question about the wound that could be inflicted on Pakistan's sense of national honor by a raid on Osama bin Laden's presumed hideout. "What about our national honor?" the exasperated Clinton shoots back. The senior official—unnamed, of course—is left to absorb this notice that there may not be a place for him (or her) in the next Clinton administration.

This edgy, tough Hillary often stays home in Hard Choices. Her other persona, the exceptionally diligent chief diplomat, escorts us on a literal tour d'horizon through many of the 112 nations she visited while foreign policy was largely being shaped in the White House by the man who defeated her. Republican campaign hirelings engaged in what's called opposition research are likely to read these pages more avidly than casual Clinton adherents who may have difficulty getting past clunky, cursory accounts of how she pulled off a thaw in relations with New Zealand or spoke up for democracy in Kyrgyzstan, Mongolia, and Kosovo. The book has few revelations, let alone pleasures. Its gazetteer notes compete with one another for lameness. (The Sinai is "famous for its role in the Bible." Lahore is "full of fantastic Mogul architecture." Copenhagen is "a picturesque city, full of cobblestoned streets.")

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, there's more here than impressions gathered from a motorcade. This installment of Clinton's memoirs is strewn with clues to the way the odds-makers' favorite for next president thinks about the world and our place in it. Fond as she is of proclaiming "new eras" and "new beginnings," little in her approach reflects new thinking.

Having it both ways, she describes herself as neither an idealist nor a realist in foreign policy but an "idealistic realist," which is to say a "hybrid" (her word). On the evidence here, Hillary Clinton belongs to the Yes…but school on foreign policy whose basic premise boils down to this: Yes, our interventions in other countries don't always or often work out the way we mean them to, but we have to get involved, have to uphold the leadership role history has assigned us, for we are the "indispensable nation." That self-glorifying slogan, usually attributed to Madeleine Albright, Bill Clinton's second secretary of state, rolls easily off her lips: "Everything that I have done and seen has convinced me that America remains the 'indispensable nation.'" No opponent will ever get away with accusing her of not embracing the doctrine of American exceptionalism, a civil religion to which every recent president, including Barack Obama, has had to pay homage.

On a swing through North Africa, confronted by a question from a Tunisian lawyer who asks whether she understands why her country is so mistrusted by young people aspiring to democracy, given its compromises with corrupt autocrats who abuse human rights, Clinton gives the Yes…but response. "Yes," it's true, she concedes, "We've made a lot of mistakes. But I think if you look at the entire historical record, the entire historical record shows we've been on the side of freedom, we've been on the side of human rights."

Not to the Tunisian lawyer but in an aside to her readers, almost as if she's letting them in on a secret, she also says: "America will always do what it takes to keep our people safe and advance our core interests. Sometimes that means working with partners with whom we have deep disagreements." It's a proposition she illustrates by conceding that American values were bent in our dependence on the then president of Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh: "He was corrupt and autocratic, but he was also committed to fighting al Qaeda and keeping his fractious country together." He's our man in Sanaa, at least until we drop him.

She writes of "actual, real-world trade-offs" and acknowledges: "There are always choices we regret, consequences we do not foresee, and alternate paths we wish we had taken." For instance, in Iran ("a classic Cold War move," she calls the 1953 coup there), Indochina (Laos paid "a terrible price"), Chile ("a dark chapter"), and Iraq. She ticks off each as blemishes on our sterling record but doesn't see a pattern. Her hardheaded credo boils down to this: "Making policy is a balancing act. Hopefully we get it more right than wrong."

The hard choice she regrets most keenly is her vote in the Senate in 2002 authorizing President Bush to use military force in Iraq. She says she took too long to acknowledge that it was a mistake, held out too long "against using the word mistake" during the 2008 primary season. Indirectly, she attributes her defeat to that vote, referring to Obama as "a President who had been elected in part because of his opposition to the war in Iraq and his pledge to end it."

She also writes about her 2007 vote against the "surge" in Iraq that Bush promoted on the advice of General David Petraeus. But we have to turn to Duty, the recent memoir by former Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who isn't running for anything, to find her admission to Obama that the vote had more to do with her need not to be wrong-footed by him in the Iowa caucuses than her real thoughts about Iraq. Politics aside, it seems, she could have supported it. Gates then has the president indicating "vaguely" that the same could have been true of him. As a peace candidate, Gates infers, Obama couldn't support a strategy for war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A cold warrior of the old school who spent most of his career in the CIA, Gates harrumphs: "To hear the two of them making these admissions, and in front of me, was as surprising as it was dismaying." As a moment of truth viewed in retrospect with a measure of candor, it might also be called refreshing.

An earnest-sounding Clinton leads us to believe her conclusions about hard choices have been hard-won. When choices on war and peace are made at the highest level, she writes, it's necessary to search for "the unintended consequences of every decision." She says she vowed to do this "with more experience, wisdom, skepticism, and humility." How this vow played out in strategy sessions in the White House situation room, when she was consulted on major decisions, tells a lot about her instincts and what they say, or imply, about any differences she may have had with the instinctively prudent Barack Obama. By the standards of recent American statecraft, he's more unconventional, more inclined for better or worse to question the predictable options and the supposedly tried-and-true assumptions behind them.

Faced with a thorny choice—on Afghanistan, Iran, Syria, Libya—her own instinct is usually to act in furtherance of America's "global leadership" role, not abstain. On Afghanistan, for instance, she supports Obama's 2009 decision to send in a "surge" of 30,000 more troops but wishes he hadn't capped the number so firmly or publicly committed himself to their withdrawal by the end of this year. But when the Arab Spring sweeps into Cairo's Tahir Square she's understandably confounded.
It's Yes…but time again. Mubarak may have been "a heavy-handed autocrat who presided over a corrupt and calcified regime," but he was "a longtime partner" who "supported peace and cooperation with Israel and hunted terrorists." Here she advances the best (at least, the normative) thinking of State Department professionals who worry about "other partners" (synonymous with other autocrats) who might "lose trust and confidence in their relationships with us" if we pushed this "key strategic ally" out.

The argument is "unpopular in some quarters of the White House." This is Clinton's recurrent narrative trope for a situation in which she finds herself out of sync with the president. In such circumstances, his residence is more likely to be named than he is. Over time, as she explains it, he has evolved in her mind from opponent to partner to the even more exalted rank of personal friend. Of course, he's also president. She not only writes of their "shared agenda," but touchingly describes "a lovely, quiet moment" shared in a Cairo mosque, followed by similar stolen moments in a Buddhist temple in Bangkok and the Shwedagon pagoda in Yangon. So comfortable have they become in one another's company that he doesn't hesitate to nudge her aside at an international summit to whisper, "You've got something in your teeth."

Strains with the disembodied "White House" are frequently ascribed to "younger White House aides" who are invariably nameless. The president is "swayed" when they appeal to his "idealism," according to the self-described "idealistic realist" who has—at least in this retrospective, inevitably self-serving rendition—a more nuanced view of the forces at work, of the staying power of the pro-democracy demonstrators; still, Obama calls on Mubarak to step down.

When a retired former ambassador to Egypt voices an apparently dissenting view about Mubarak after visiting him on behalf of Clinton, Obama phones his secretary of state to complain about "mixed messages." Clinton explains: "That's a diplomatic way of saying he took me to the woodshed."

A longer-lasting, more serious strain was over the role of Richard Holbrooke, Clinton's choice to oversee diplomatic strategy and tactics in the conflict- ridden region known in State Department jargon as Af-Pak. The freewheeling Holbrooke, credited with ending the war in Bosnia in 1995, never succeeded in getting on the same wavelength as the president (and vice versa). The harder he pushed, the more he tried Obama's patience. Soon the source of power known as the White House was finding ways to trim his mandate and circumvent him. Increasingly unveiled messages were sent to Clinton to ditch him. She went to Obama to save Holbrooke's job but it's not clear in this retelling how forcefully she supported the game plan he was seeking to advance, or indeed what the game plan was beyond drawing the Taliban into a negotiation and sponsoring some kind of détente between the Pakistani military and the government in Kabul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Hamid Karzai was convinced that Holbrooke was scheming to undermine him, she says. Clinton considered Karzai "a linchpin of our mission in Afghanistan." She doesn't say her chief representative agreed. They didn't agree on everything. She thought more troops were needed; he didn't. One time in Pakistan, she tells us, this self-propelled "force of nature" pursued the secretary of state into a ladies' restroom to continue making a point.

The standoff over the envoy's role ended in December 2011 with his collapse in Clinton's office with a torn aorta and death two days later. Our author doesn't say what thoughts ran through her mind as she listened to Obama's somewhat wooden, not much more than adequate eulogy at the memorial service at the Kennedy Center.

Built to thwart opposition researchers scrounging for vulnerabilities, Hard Choices has more pages on Libya than China, including a whole chapter on Benghazi and the 2012 attack there on the US consulate in which Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans died. House Republicans and Fox News have kept up a clamor on Benghazi ever since in hopes of wounding a presumptive nominee with no discernable challenger in the ranks of her own party. A feisty Clinton shows in these pages that she's ready for them.

In October 2011, she landed in Tripoli and declared, "I am proud to stand here on the soil of a free Libya." It was a typical Hillary moment. "Proud" is a favorite word, used to congratulate her audience as well as herself, to bask in a sense of shared accomplishment. But now that Libya has descended into anarchy, with the militias that arose with Western (and Arab) backing to oust Muammar Qaddafi carrying on as local mafias and fighting among themselves, how are we to weigh that accomplishment, that pride? Is this unraveling any business of the United States and its allies? Having intervened once to prevent what was branded a "humanitarian catastrophe," do we have any residual interest or responsibility there, let alone in Afghanistan or Iraq where, as it happens, we've decided we have a new "humanitarian catastrophe" on our hands? So severe was this latest crisis, brought on by the rise of ISIS, that US aircraft had to be sent in for the first time in more than two years to halt the jihadist advance, raising the question: How many times, in how many places, can we reintervene?

From where we now sit, Clinton's day in Tripoli seems faintly reminiscent of George W. Bush's "Mission Accomplished" show on a carrier flight deck. More recently, Clinton was off on her book tour when, taking no chances, the snake-bitten State Department transferred its Libya personnel to a temporary station in Tunisia. "When America is absent, extremism takes root," she warns in her Benghazi chapter. Retreat, she asserts, is "just not in our country's DNA." So what would she do now? The best wisdom we can draw from these pages is the self-evident observation that Libya might face "very difficult challenges translating the hopes of a revolution into a free, secure, and prosperous future." It seems a fair translation to say that that amounts, in present circumstances, to "Good luck, Libya."

President Obama, more willing to focus on bad results, to try to draw lessons from them, recently told Thomas Friedman in an interview that the time to move on is emphatically not the moment "when everybody is feeling good and everybody is holding up posters saying, 'Thank you, America.'" That's when "there has to be a much more aggressive effort to rebuild societies that didn't have any civic traditions." The United States and its allies "under-estimated" what would be needed in Libya, he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At this point, the discussion threatens to turn circular. Isn't it possible, even likely, that we wouldn't have intervened at all if we'd allowed ourselves a more realistic estimate, understood from the start that intervening to the extent we did meant taking on the burden of trying to rebuild a ferociously divided Libya? Wasn't that one of the many lessons of Iraq?

"Challenges" is another favorite Clinton word. And they are everywhere demanding a response, none more so than Syria. In these pages, she's respectful of Obama's deliberative approach but eagerly backs a plan drawn up by David Petraeus, by then heading the CIA, for arming and training certifiably "moderate" Syrian rebels. A cautious Obama asks for "examples of instances when the United States had backed an insurgency that could be considered a success." No one, it seems, has a ready answer. The idea of success has to be redefined. It's not to overthrow Bashar al-Assad, Obama is told; it's to take the initiative away from Qatar and Saudia Arabia, which are "dumping weapons into the country," in order to have "a partner on the ground we could work with." It was, Clinton writes, "the least bad option among many even worse alternatives." Leon Panetta, Gates's successor at the Pentagon, is on her side. "He knew from his own time leading the CIA what our intelligence operatives could do."

"Some in the White House" are skeptical. They doubt that a credible "moderate" force can be created. It may not be irrelevant that Obama was in the midst of his reelection campaign. In any case, he wasn't persuaded. "He had promised me," she writes, "that I would always get a fair hearing. And I always did. In this case, my position did not prevail."

In her memoir, she presents the choice as a close call, one on which reasonable people could differ. Now, with the launch of her second run for the presidency presumably drawing near and Obama's poll numbers in the dumps, she views it as having been a no-brainer. "The failure to build up a credible fighting force," she recently told Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic, left "a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled." The "least bad option" was always the obvious one to grasp. The former secretary speaks again in the voice of the senator who was proud to serve on the Armed Service Committee, who cultivated top generals, showing that a woman commander in chief could be trusted to command.

She thus aligns herself, at least in one interview, with the commentators for whom Obama's decision to reject "the least bad option" on Syria stood as proof of his weakness, America's decline. Now that we see ISIS fighting in Iraq with American weapons seized in armories abandoned by forces we trained, the argument has become muddled. Possibly it takes more strength for a president to reject military intervention when the national security establishment lines up behind it than to give the order everyone is expecting. What seems pretty clear is that Hillary Clinton, experienced and knowledgeable as she now is, wouldn't be such a president. Like Panetta, she knows what our intelligence operatives can do.

The rollout of Hard Choices hasn't been helped by the summer's depressing news feeds from around the world. Vladimir Putin's reckless, thumb-in-your eye forays in eastern Ukraine began early enough for Clinton to work in a mention of his seizure of Crimea. This suggests that she may have recast other parts of her chapter on Russia, which now is appropriately downbeat. There had been high hopes of a new relationship with Russia, nicknamed "the reset" when Obama reached the White House in 2009. Clinton, who early on staged the jokey presentation of a gift-wrapped "reset button" to her Russian counterpart, now tells us she had only "modest expectations" herself. Leaving office, she advised Obama in what was presumably a highly classified memo that Putin was on a "negative trajectory" and it was now time to hit the "pause button," to take a tougher line. This was another of those occasions when "not everyone at the White House agreed." Obama accepted an invitation to a Moscow summit she'd advised him to skip. Months later he "began taking a harder line with Putin" and finally did back out of the Moscow visit. Now it's important for her to have us (and those pesky opposition researchers) know that she was never taken in, even if that means leaving an impression that the president was a little soft.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her care in distinguishing her inclinations from Obama's is even more conspicuous in her pages on the Israelis and Palestinians. As might perhaps be expected of a former senator from New York, she can't find it in herself to scold Israel over its occupation of the West Bank; in fact, she never uses the word "occupation." She recognizes the expanding settlements as a political problem, and she pressed hard while in office for a limited construction "freeze," but says nothing to suggest that the problems posed by existing settlements or the actual conditions on the West Bank—the suffocating overlay of security checks, road blocks, army patrols—offend her sense of fairness or human rights. Of course, like all secretaries of state of the last half-century, she doesn't mention that Israel never signed the nuclear nonproliferation pact, the treaty we're rightly pressing Iran to observe. First she says that she feels "personally invested in Israel's security and success," then that she's "someone who cares deeply about Israel's security and future."

We get the point. Still, it's instructive to see how carefully she distances herself from Obama in recounting his difficulties with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The two men repeatedly go to the edge of confrontation while she and the Israeli leader are able to work together as "partners and friends."

"I learned that Bibi would fight if he felt he was being cornered, but if you connected with him as a friend, there was a chance that you could get something done together." Someone who was "friending" long before the invention of Facebook, she believes in "building relationships and understanding how and when to use them." What she gets out of this one is an agreement to extend the freeze on settlement construction for ninety days, except in East Jerusalem, at the cost of an additional $3 billion in military aid. Earlier, when Joe Biden was greeted on a visit to Israel with an announcement of new Jewish construction in the Arab quarter of Jerusalem, a "furious" Obama instructed her to tell Netanyahu that he viewed the provocation "as a personal insult to him, the Vice President, and the United States." Clinton puts the words in quotes so we understand that they're the president's. She delivers the blast but almost seems to excuse herself. "I didn't like playing bad cop," she writes, "but it was part of the job."

Late in 2012, with her time in office running down, she persuades the president to let her fly to the Middle East to see if she can head off a threatened Israeli ground invasion of Gaza. An air campaign is already underway in retaliation for rockets fired into Israel by Hamas. Civilian casualties are rising. "There was no substitute for American leadership," she argued. She even succeeds in lining up Mohamed Morsi, the Muslim Brotherhood president of Egypt who'll soon be on his way to jail. A cease-fire is struck, thanks to her "diplomatic intervention." Now in the summer of 2014, less than two years later, her account of this achievement makes sour reading (no fault of Clinton's, obviously). Hamas and Israel have been at it again. Another "intervention" is required. Clinton's successor flies in and out of Cairo, doing what he can through the good offices of Hosni Mubarak's real successor, Egypt's latest military ruler.

Florida's Marco Rubio, twenty-four years her junior, a first-term senator hoping to replicate Obama's 2008 run, recently put Hillary Clinton down as a "twentieth century candidate." She could see this line of attack on her longevity in politics and her age—sixty-nine on Election Day 2016—coming. Having been there in 1992 as well as 2008, she doesn't need to be told that a new face often trumps a long résumé. So she stakes out positions on the near side of the generational line. The last pages of her memoir are crammed with up-to-the-minute references not only to her struggles on behalf of women but also (for eight of those pages) efforts as secretary to inscribe the fraught subject of LGBTrights on the international agenda.

She mentions, too, a push to spread democratic values by offering technological support and smart phones to networking young dissidents around the globe. Of course, if they then rise up against rulers who have been important strategic partners, she could face even more hard choices.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kayo Sumisaki
Executive Assistant Sandler Foundation
ksumisaki@sandlerfoundation.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Karen Sack" <Karen.Sack@oceanunite.org>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 4/15/2015 5:13:40 PM
Subject: Re: Human polar bear in DC Tuesday

No worries. Hope all is well.

K

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 15, 2015, at 6:10 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> On the road. Sorry
>
> On Apr 15, 2015 4:18 PM, "Karen Sack" <Karen.Sack@oceanunite.org > wrote:
> Dear John,
>
> I am sure you are wickedly busy given everything going on at the moment, however, if you have time for a 30 minute break on Tuesday, Lewis Pugh will be in DC and if you are interested, I can arrange for him to have a quick sit-down with you. After doing a series of swims in the Antarctic to protect the Ross Sea, he joined forces with a Russian ice hockey star in Moscow and seemed to have taken the Russian media by storm. He also met the Defense Minister. We call it speedo diplomacy ☺ - a little piece from an interview Lewis did, attached.
>
> Let me know if you have any time on Tuesday afternoon and I can try and set something up.
>
> Best,
>
> Karen
>
> Karen Sack
>
> Managing Director, Ocean Unite
>
> e-mail: Karen.Sack@oceanunite.org
>
> m: + 1 202.415.5403
>
> skype: karensack
>
> twitter: @karen_sack
>
> "We must protect the ocean as if our lives depend upon it -- because they do." --Sylvia Earle

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joe Patterson" <viejojoe@outlook.com>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/16/2015 2:40:57 PM
Subject: A 2016 game changing, feature film project for your consideration.

Dear Professor Podesta,

Hello from a D.A.R. documented descendant of Ohio Governor Robert Lucas, chairman of the very first DNC Convention that was held in Baltimore.

He was appointed by the President to become the territorial governor of Iowa.

I also sent this to gpataki@chadbourne.com

Remember what happened when President Reagan said
"Tear Down This Wall?" to Mr. Gorbachev,

A gigantic economic expansion was ignited.

That's the goal of this film project.

I have the script, the budget and a producer for this 2016 political, game changing film project - funding is needed.

You would be in charge of the content and selecting the producer.
~~~~~~~~~~~~jp

Presenting "INEZ COMES TO AMERICA"

The entire film is scored with a very up-beat Mariachi/Mexicana theme.

Below is the beginning of the final scene, but first, some set-up detail.

Most Americans (and for that matter, the entire rest of the world) either don't remember or might not even have heard about our war with Mexico and - The Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo which forced Mexico to accept $15 million for all the land in this link.

http://www.smithsonianeducation.org/educators/lesson_plans/borders/map1a.html

It's time to redress this old wrong!

Log Line: INEZ, a young Mexican girl, crosses the border in search of work and her missing mother.

She finds political corruption, murder and cover-up.

ALEX, a young border guard/law student of mixed ethnic heritage (American/Mexican) intercepts her, and listens to her story.

Trained in the art of body language, he can see that she is very worried about her mother - they have not heard from her in weeks and her bank transfers have stopped.

Alex points to the moon and tells her, "Keep the moon on your right shoulder and you'll be ok."

Some days later, he can't seem to shake the image of this brave young woman and the danger she faces. He feels he could have, should have, offered to help her.
~~~~~~~~~~~~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He tries to find her but she has disappeared into the barrios of Santa Ana.

When she is caught again - Alex is alerted and races down to stop the bus before it gets to the Mexican border and - He sets her free again!

Alex is called on the carpet for his actions.

He mumbles in his defense, “She’s my fiancée.”

Alex is given 72 hours to find her and marry her or go to prison.

Frantically, Alex searches and finally makes contact with MARIA, Inez’s new friend.

Result: a lively Mexican wedding celebration - where some new drama is revealed.

Now - Alex and Inez begin the search for her missing mother.

The search leads them to an isolated ranch house with a massive underground tunnel at Tecate, Ca. -

The HQ of ARMANDO, the drug lord and his partner - U.S. CONGRESSMAN ROBERT LONGHORN.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~jp

If “Fahrenheit 911” could deliver $211 million on a budget of $6M, this film would be in demand to be screened in all of North and South American theaters and some pirated copies could even find there way into Russia and China.

I believe this important film is deserving of the services of a major producer, However, Ken Del Conte is an expert in producing low budget features.

He knows film people who will work for part of their compensation based on a box office bonus.

Ken penciled out a budget of $1.5 million.

For a no obligation copy of the WGA registered script, please contact me.

Joe Patterson - Southern California.

viejojoe1@cox.net

https://www.facebook.com/viejojoe1/about?section=bio - for more about me.
and my five film projects.
two are political one is spiritual and two are just for fun

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~jp

This exciting action/drama takes place in Orange County, Ca. and the Mexican border at San Diego.

Your input is welcome.

Below is the first part of the final scene. ~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~jp

INT./THE GRETA VAN SUSTEREN SHOW/FOX/NIGHT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Inez, and Alex are on with Greta.

GRETA
Alex, you now have your law degree and are running for Congress; correct?

ALEX
(grins))
Yes, congressman Longhorn's vacant seat.

GRETA
Tell me about your plan for Mexican statehood. I hope it's not like the Russian's plan for the Ukraine.

ALEX
No, but that's another good reason to team up with our good neighbor to the South. China has 1.2 Billion citizens and they are also looking to expand.

GRETA
Are you suggesting...

ALEX
(interrupts)
Remember the boy scout motto Greta and in our case it has to be the will of the people in both countries, not the politicians and certainly not an invasion.

GRETA
A referendum vote?

ALEX
(nods in the affirmative)
Yes, we will invite the Mexican people to merge with us; to form one great Nation, thereby narrowing our Southern border to the easily protected strip with Guatemala.

GRETA
But that would create a massive shift in our ethnic balance.

ALEX
Not at all, the people who are established with family, friends and good jobs will most likely remain. The rest of the 11 million estimated total, would go back home, because that's where most of the new jobs will be.

Inez joins in.

INEZ
This may be the answer to our budget and social security issues. It would set off the largest influx of talented young immigrants in One hundred years and ignite an explosive economic boom.

~~~~~~~~~~more in the actual script..
~~~~~~~~~~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/5/2015 2:02:05 AM
Subject: News Update - August 5, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Wednesday, August 5

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Obama: If Congress Kills Iran Deal, Rockets will Fall on Tel Aviv
- U.S. to Join Israel in Fight against Iranian Terror Funding
- Qatar: Gulf Arabs Confident Region Safer with Iran Deal
- US Official: "Obama and Netanyahu Will Meet to Discuss Deal"
- Rajoub: Israelis' Condemnation of Arson didn't Fall on Deaf Ears
- UN Chief seeks Urgent Funding for Palestinian Refugees
- Ya'alon Orders Administrative Detention for Jewish Extremist

Commentary:

- Yedioth Ahronoth: "Hatred is Killing the Foundation of Israel's Existence"
  - By Nahum Barnea
- New York Times: "Do we, Israelis, Still Care about Justice?"
  - By Etgar Keret

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

Obama: if Deal Killed, Rockets will Fall on Tel Aviv

If the US Congress shoots down the Iranian nuclear deal, America will eventually be pressured into a military strike against Tehran's nuclear facilities, which will in turn increase terror against Israel, US President Obama told Jewish leaders Tuesday, a source who was present at the meeting said. During the two-hour meeting, Obama said it was legitimate for opponents of the deal to lobby lawmakers to reject it, but added that a discussion focused on personal attacks, rather than the merits of the deal, could jeopardize the coherence of the American Jewish community and ultimately the resilience of US-Israel relations. See also, "Obama to Tell Congress: Rejecting Deal Would Be a 'historic Mistake'" (Ha'aretz)

Ha'aretz

U.S. to J oin Israel in Fight against Iran Terror Funding

In the wake of the nuclear deal with Iran, a high-level U.S. delegation plans to come to Israel early next month to discuss increasing cooperation in stopping Iran's funding of terror groups in Gaza and Lebanon, a senior administration official said Tuesday. Heading the delegation will be Adam Szubin, undersecretary of state for terrorism and financial crimes. The Americans are due to meet with officials from the Foreign Ministry, Mossad, National Security Council and Military Intelligence. The administration official said some of the money generated from sanctions lift is likely to go to Iran's Revolutionary Guard, and from there to find its way to Hezbollah and Palestinian terror groups, the official said, adding that the US will invest more effort than before in keeping an eye on these funds.

Reuters

Qatar: Gulf Arabs Confident Region Safer with Deal

Qatari foreign minister Khalid al-Attiyah said on Monday Gulf Arab states were confident that a historic nuclear agreement between Iran and world powers made the Gulf region safer. Speaking at a news conference after hosting talks between Gulf Arab foreign ministers and visiting U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, Attiyah said: "We are confident that what they undertook makes this region safer and more stable." Qatar currently holds the rotating chair of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), which comprises Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Qatar, Bahrain and Kuwait.

Ma'ariv

US Official: "Obama and Netanyahu Will Meet"

According to a senior US official, President Obama and Prime Minister Netanyahu will end the rift between them and will meet sometime in the next two months to discuss the nuclear agreement with Iran. "We have profound disagreements on the issue, but we must make sure that it does not affect our relations," the senior official told Ma'ariv. "I do not know what Netanyahu's motives were when he spoke to Congress," the senior official added cautiously. "He talked about the threats to Israel and about exporting terror, but he knew that we only intended to negotiate on the issue of the nuclear program. Israel can deal with an Iranian military threat, but nuclear weapons are a game changer so we focused on that issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

Rajoub: we Heard Israelis' Condemnation of Arson

"I very much appreciate all the condemnations that were expressed by Israeli society," senior Fatah official Jibril Rajoub told Ynet in an interview following the hate crime that killed Palestinian infant Ali Dawabshe in Duma last week. "It makes me hopeful that the Israeli people have rejected this heinous crime that was committed in Duma." With that said, Rajoub clarified that he was not convinced by the condemnations that were uttered by the government in after the attack, specifically the condemnation aired by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "Netanyahu and his right wing government are responsible, and stand behind every act of terror in the West Bank," said Rajoub. "They incite and provide funding, security, and support to the 'price tag' bullies. The murder of a child is a dark stain. I hope that after the shock and the upheaval, Israeli society will wake up and understand that the true existential threat to Israel's future is the occupation, and the settlements."

Times of Israel

UN Chief seeks Urgent Funding for Pal. Refugees

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon on Tuesday raised alarm over a $100 million shortfall in funding for the UN aid agency for Palestinian refugees and called for urgent donations. Ban said in a statement that the UNRWA relief agency was “a pillar of stability” for five million Palestinian refugees at a time when the Middle East is in the throes of crises and suffering. He called “on all donors to urgently ensure that the $100 million required be contributed to UNRWA at the earliest possible date so that the children of Palestine can begin their 2015-2016 school year without delay.”

Ynet News

Ya'alon Orders Detention for Jewish Extremist

Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon signed an order Tuesday night to allow the administrative detention of right-wing activist Mordechai Meir (18) to last as long as six months without trial. Meir, a resident of Ma'ale Adumim, just east of Jerusalem, was arrested Tuesday evening on suspicion of organizing an arson attack on the Church of Loaves and Fishes on the Sea of Galilee several weeks ago. The suspect had been under house arrest and forbidden from going to certain places after spending some time in jail. A second suspect, Avitar Salonim, was also arrested Tuesday for helping organize the activities of Jewish extremists and forbidden from going to the West Bank or Jerusalem. An official statement from the Defense Ministry said that Meir had been involved in violent incidents and terror attacks as part of a "Jewish terrorist group."

Yedioth Ahronoth – August 4, 2015

Hatred is Killing the Foundation of Israel's Existence

Freedom of expression is a noble value, the air democracy breathes; but the court has failed to equip democracy with tools to defend itself against those who are using freedom of expression to recruit hate criminals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Nahum Barnea

Since Friday morning I have been asking myself why I am so angry: After all, hate crimes are a global epidemic. They are directed at foreigners, at immigrants and at ethnic, racial, religious and gender minorities.

We often cover anti-Semitic outbursts, but attacks on Jews are just one link in the chain. The United States has been dealing in recent years with white hate criminals who murder black people and with Muslim hate criminals who murder soldiers. Europe is dealing with Muslims who murder Jews and Christians and with Christians who murder Muslims.

The law authorities are doing the best they can to prevent such acts or at least to jail the culprits. Nonetheless, they are failing time and again.

So why get angry? It's the way of the world. Our forefathers believed that only when we have a Jewish prostitute and a Jewish thief here, we will become a normal state. Miraculously, we outdid their expectations: We have Jewish prostitutes and thieves, murderers and rapists of all kinds, and we have hate criminals.

Two people were murdered in hate crimes over the weekend: Two-year-old Ali Dawabsheh of the village of Duma and 16-year-old Shira Banki of Jerusalem. The prime minister offered his condolences.

I am angry because Israel is not a state like all other states. It's an idea, a project, an initiative. There is a hotel chain in the country which advertises itself on the radio as "a hotel with an idea." I never understood what that means when it comes to hotels, but I can understand why the ideological plan which led to the Jewish state's establishment is still part of it, 67 years after it was established. That's how we are judged by others; that's how we should judge ourselves. The villains who burn babies or stab teenage girls because of their hatred towards the other are sabotaging the foundation of our existence.

Looking back, Israel's governments should have treated the settler public differently. They shouldn't have gave in to the lawbreakers in Sebastia, they shouldn't have pardoned the Jewish Underground terrorists prematurely, they shouldn't have – acting on an order from above – skipped the rabbis who inflamed Yigal Amir, funded their whims, winked at them and flattered them.

Governments are not the only ones who sinned deeply here. The Supreme Court, under the leadership of Chief Justice Meir Shamgar and mainly under the leadership of Chief Justice Aharon Barak, gave full, remarkably liberal protection to the freedom of expression on the one hand, while on the other hand legitimizing the settlement enterprise in the territories in different ways.

In the issue we are discussing, it was a lethal combination. It opened the door to weeds like Kahane Chai, the Lehava organization and the price tag gang. It conveyed a message to the judges in the lower courts, to the State Prosecutor's Office, to the police, that political delinquency can be forgiven as part of the freedom of expression. There is no wonder that slain Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's widow,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leah, refused to shake Justice Barak's hand over her husband's grave. She knew exactly why.

Freedom of expression is a noble value, the air democracy breathes. But the court has failed to equip democracy with the tools it needs to defend itself against those who are turning freedom of expression into a basis for recruiting hate criminals. This applies both to extreme right-wing organizations and to the haredim. Hate crimes are usually not committed in an empty space: There is an atmosphere, there are instigators, there is a supportive community.

The recurring waves of terror and the failure of the peace process, and perhaps the demographic changes as well, have made the Israeli street more rightist. That's natural and understandable. The voters wanted a government led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Little did they know they would be getting a government which depends on the finger of one Bezalel Smotrich, a Knesset member on behalf of the Bayit Yehudi faction, who combines both haredi for Arabs and hatred for the LGBT community. He is the supreme authority.

Education Minister Naftali Bennett, the head of Smotrich's party, asked if he could speak at the LGBT protest on Saturday evening. He was offended when his request was turned down. "I wanted to tell them I love them," Bennett said. "I disagree with them and I love them."

Bennett is a legitimate representative of his voters, a worthy politician from several aspects. But his expressions of love are unrestrained. "I love you," he told the stone and bottle throwers in Beit El. A sea of love. If you want, love will cover every crime.

The members of the LGBT community don't need his patronizing love. They need security. The education system Bennett is in charge of is afflicted with racism and homophobia. He should start with the state-religious education and the ultra-Orthodox streams.

P.S. The LGBT community asked every speaker to sign a document summarizing its demands. Bennett and MK Yinon Magal, both from the Bayit Yehudi party, refused to sign. No one forbade them to come and express their solidarity with the victims, just like thousands of people did in Jerusalem and in Tel Aviv. Magal, who used to be a journalist, arrived at the protest, but the moment he realized he won't be allowed to speak, he broke off contact. Either he speaks, or he goes home.

New York Times – August 3, 2015

Do we, Israelis, Still Care About Justice?

By Etgar Keret

"This isn't everyone," my son said Saturday as we stood on the steps of the Tel Aviv City Hall, in Rabin Square. "There are more people coming, right?"

It was already 9 p.m., an hour and a half past the official opening of the anti-violence, anti-incitement demonstration. He's not even 10 yet, but he's already seen that square full of people demonstrating for less important causes and he's sure that, as in every good Western, the cavalry is on the way, that tens, maybe hundreds of thousands of citizens horrified by the terrible events that occurred in Israel this week will be thronging the square. How is it possible that fewer people would come to demonstrate against the murder of children and innocent people than to demonstrate against the high cost of housing or the halt to building in the settlements?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The next day, Sunday, the newspapers reported that there were "thousands of demonstrators," the word "thousands" designed only to conceal the empty spaces in the square. Skilled photo editors produced pictures for the front pages that made the relatively small crowd appear huge. That sad effort to enlarge the size of the demonstration was not a result of hidden political motives, but of a collective sense of shame.

Because the embarrassing truth is that a demonstration against two hate crimes — the firebombing on Friday of a home in a Palestinian village, which killed an 18-month-old boy, and the stabbing of six marchers on Saturday in Jerusalem's Gay Pride Parade, including a 16-year-old girl who later died of her injuries — did not get many people out of their homes, definitely not in this especially hot, humid August. And that truth is not a pleasant one for anybody.

I'm old enough to remember Rabin Square, when it was still called the Kings of Israel Square, full of demonstrators on many occasions. I remember, as a teenager, hundreds of thousands of people railing against the Lebanon War after the Sabra and Shatila massacre in 1982 and a crowd so full of hope at the demonstration for the peace agreement, after which Yitzhak Rabin was murdered in 1995. I remember it full of men in their knitted skullcaps demonstrating against the disengagement, and the eager young people singing at the demonstration for social justice. But today it's half-empty. Where are all the people who filled it then?

Have the young men and women who failed miserably in their struggle for social justice given up hope and lost their faith in the ability of this democratic tool to have an impact? Have the people on the left who come to sweat in this square every time a new injustice is perpetrated in our country — not an infrequent occurrence — begun to tire?

And where are those settlers in their skull caps who instantly filled this square when demonstrations were held against the demolition of illegal settlements — but who are now choosing not to demonstrate against the murder of babies? Do they think that, when it comes to Palestinians and the L.G.B.T. community, the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" has been erased from their set of stone tablets? That we have some sort of division of labor here: The right demonstrates for the sanctity of the land, and anything related to murder of innocents who are not Jewish or straight falls completely outside their jurisdiction?

And what about all those who don't really take an interest in politics, but simply live here and try to survive — do they also think that this demonstration has nothing at all to do with their lives?

It seems that we've all given up on the belief that we can change something here — the fact is that even the few who have come to the demonstration look tired. Many of them are sitting on the rim of the fountain and the steps of City Hall. Only a few have come to the demonstration on Saturday night, and even they don't have the strength to stand. The speakers finished their speeches and the crowd began to disperse, but my son refused to leave.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To his mind, every person who believes that the murder of children and the stabbing of innocent people are wrong should come out to demonstrate against those acts. As he sees it, there should be millions of such people in our country, millions. If people haven't arrived yet, he insists, it's only because something's holding them up. Maybe their kid can't find his shoes or the babysitter is late. It's only a matter of time until they come, that's clear.

"Let's wait a little longer," he said, placing his small hand in mine. "Another tiny little bit, just until they come." The only answer I managed to mumble: It's late already and it might take a long time, a really long time, for all the people who should be in the square to make their way here.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tait Sye" <taitsye@gmail.com>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/2/2008 4:48:49 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Huffington Post: Women's Health: Yet Another Issue Sarah Palin is Out of Touch On

Huffington Post: Women's Health: Yet Another Issue Sarah Palin is Out of Touch On by Cecile Richards
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/cecile-richards/add-womens-health-to-the_b_131186.html

Over the last several weeks, it has become apparent that Sarah Palin is out of touch on a whole host of issues, ranging from the bailout and the economy to foreign policy to the Supreme Court. After this week's interview with Katie Couric, we can now add women's health to the list.
Her answers on reproductive health issues, such as criminalizing abortion, exceptions for rape and incest, and what exactly the morning-after pill is, were a rambling mix of contradictions and platitudes, much like her answers about Russia bordering Alaska, the bailout, health care, and the economy.

So, for the vice-presidential debate tonight, here's what I'd ask Sarah Palin to answer directly:

1. You said in your interview with Katie Couric that you are "all for contraception," but then you said you don't support the morning-after pill. Do you know that the morning-after pill IS contraception, it's simply a higher dose of hormonal birth control? Now that you know that, does it change how you feel about it being made available?

2. You said that abortion should be illegal even in the cases of rape or incest, but then you said no one should end up in jail for having an abortion. I assume when you say it should be illegal, that you mean it should be a crime - if you don't think anyone should go to jail, how would you enforce it?

3. You say that you believe there is an inherent right to privacy in the Constitution, yet you want to overturn Roe v. Wade, which is based on a right to privacy. How do you reconcile these two conflicting beliefs?

4. You say that you support abstinence-only policies, which have been proven over and over to be ineffective. Then you seem to contradict yourself, saying that you are "pro-contraception." What exactly are you for, comprehensive sex education, which includes teaching of abstinence as well as contraception and prevention; or "abstinence-only until marriage," which typically does not cover contraception. As vice president, would you like to continue President Bush's legacy in funneling millions of federal dollars to ineffective "abstinence-only" programs, or do you support comprehensive sex education programs that include abstinence and have proven to reduce the number of teen pregnancies?

5. Will you continue to cut funding for support of young mothers? After cutting funding by 20 percent for Covenant House Alaska, a place with the resources and assistance to help teen mothers gain the necessary skills to create a stable life, will you extend this to the rest of young, low-income mothers in the U.S.?

6. Considering all of these things, would you say that the women of America will have a champion in Sarah Palin as vice president?

We thought it couldn't get more anti-choice and more extreme for women and for health care than George Bush and John McCain. But let's face it -- with Sarah Palin, John McCain has outdone himself. Women voting for McCain-Palin is like chickens voting for Col. Sanders. That is not a risk we can afford to take.

Sign our letter today -- tell Sarah Palin that she is not your candidate.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
Date: 1/15/2016 1:10:21 PM
Subject: Clinton Foundation News & Guidance

Hi all – As we gear up for the 5th Annual Health Matters Activation Summit, we wanted to give you some updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news.

Abby Wambach to join health leaders for 2016 Health Matters Activation Summit
On Sunday, January 24, and Monday, January 25, President Bill Clinton and Clinton Foundation Vice Chair Chelsea Clinton will host the Clinton Health Matters Initiative's (CHMI) Fifth Annual Activation Summit, a yearly convening of the country's foremost health experts and implementers. Participants will engage in action-oriented dialogue, take examples and cues from CHMI's key programs and partners, and use case studies of universally applicable successes and less-discussed failures to chart the path for scaling and sustaining what works in health advancement.

Key themes at this year's Summit will include communities as centers of health innovation, the quest for longevity and healthy aging, health-tech innovation, and reducing health disparities. The Activation Summit further aims to underscore the value of facilitating cross-sector solutions and systemic strengthening of chronic disease prevention efforts. The event will follow the CareerBuilder Challenge, a PGA TOUR event held January 21 – 24 in La Quinta, CA, in partnership with the Clinton Foundation.

World Cup and Olympic Champion Abby Wambach will be joining the 2016 Health Matters Activation Summit, where she and Chelsea Clinton will discuss the inclusion and empowerment of girls and women in sports. Read a piece in the Desert Sun on Abby's participation and what to expect at this year's Summit.

Sessions at this year's Health Matters Activation Summit will include:

Town Hall focused on addressing health disparities through technology and innovation;

Celebrity morning workout led by Jenna Wolfe;

Opening plenary session on the quest for longevity and our rising death rates with specific regards to the Coachella Valley and CHMI's work to reduce health disparities in additional communities including Little Rock, Houston, Jacksonville, Natchez, and Galesburg;

Discussion between Chelsea Clinton and Abby Wambach on girls and women in sports; and Closing plenary session on how communities and local organizations across the country, despite the national landscape, are driving the development and scale of solutions that are best suited to their local needs.

Share the announcement on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/688055672957734912

Also, make sure to RSVP to watch the Activation Summit live and join the conversation: http://wjcf.co/1ZnYpzZ

Bringing together stakeholders to address unique health challenges
Key to CHMI's work is community health transformation. Last weekend, the Natchez Democrat published a story on CHMI's work in Adams County, Mississippi, where we've brought stakeholders together to address the unique health needs of the community.

"It's time to get healthy. With the help of the Clinton Foundation and an army of lifestyle coaches and health advocates, the City of Natchez is planning to do just that.

In May, the Clinton Health Matters Initiative released a Blueprint for Action document, detailing its strategy for improving the overall health of Natchez and Adams County. The document includes what it calls 'bold action steps,' as well as ways the foundation will mature each step's effectiveness."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/687385543416610816
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/907558112698964

Fighting childhood obesity and breaking world records
The Washington Post wrote a story about how pro endurance athlete Colin O'Brady is working to raise $1 million to combat childhood obesity in partnership with the Alliance for a Healthier Generation. Colin is attempting to break a world record by completing the Explorers Grand Slam in six months. Colin will climb the tallest peak on each continent and trek to the North and South Poles. Learn more about the challenge and his crowdfunding campaign here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> "He calls this incredible endurance challenge an "inspirational campaign" and he hopes to promote active, healthy lifestyles throughout his travels. He has partnered with the Alliance for a Healthier Generation and is accepting donations on his website (beyond72.com) to help fund programs that will combat childhood obesity."

Bob Harrison on the "Five things we learned in 2015 about the future of philanthropy"

Clinton Global Initiative CEO Bob Harrison authored a piece for Quartz that outlines what CGI and its members learned about philanthropy in 2015, including the importance of working together across sectors, being inclusive, inspiring impact with technology, empowering millennials to become social entrepreneurs, and challenging others to raise the bar. The article was also published on LinkedIn Pulse .

> "But this new world of philanthropy wasn't built overnight. Ever since the Clinton Global Initiative was founded as an experiment in 2005, we have seen firsthand how bringing together the world's top business, government, and civil society leaders could help address the great challenges of the 21st century. A decade—and by our count, more than 430 million improved lives—later, CGI members are helping shape modern philanthropy."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/682647799129833473
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/899161023538673

Chelsea Clinton picks her six most memorable Clinton Foundation stories of the year

As 2015 came to an end, Clinton Foundation Vice Chair Chelsea Clinton selected six of the most memorable stories of the year. From "Seeds of Progress" in Haiti to ways "We Can Save African Elephants" – see her top picks here .
Share the blog post on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ChelseaClinton/status/682683079912206336
Share the blog post on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/899682790153163

CGI commitments encourage private sector to increase LGBT inclusion wherever they do business

The Huffington Post published an op-ed by Cynthia Marshall, AT&T's Chief Diversity Officer, which highlights two LGBT-related 2015 CGI Commitments to Action made by the Brunswick Group and Human Rights Campaign. Cynthia calls on private sector leaders to increase inclusion for LGBT workers around the world:

> 'While many individual companies have stepped up on LGBT issues, the private sector now has an opportunity to pool our resources and speak with one voice to drive even greater change. Many of the world's top business leaders took a collective leap forward in September at the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI) Annual Meeting. This gathering of world leaders saw the launch of two seminal LGBT rights-related commitments to make the private sector more inclusive."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonGlobal/status/684832335137779712
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/902993039822138

13 photos from the front lines of impact

CGI published a photo essay on Medium that highlights and reflects on some of the most compelling commitment photos submitted in 2015. Take a look at the photos here .
Share the photo essay on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonGlobal/status/684365084672548864

In Case You Missed It:

The Chronicle of Philanthropy reported on Charity Navigator's removal of the Clinton Foundation from their Watchlist.

On Tuesday, President Clinton commemorated the sixth anniversary of the 2010 earthquake in Haiti. He said, "Together, Haitians and their partners are working today to create jobs, grow small businesses, revitalize Haiti's once-vibrant agricultural sector, and protect the environment." Read the full statement here.

A piece in AllAfrica discusses a partnership between the Clinton Development Initiative (CDI) and Visa to help farmers in Rwanda conduct business through digital transactions.

The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership's CEO Mark Gunton was profiled as one of GOOD's "local globalists" who is helping to turn the U.N.'s global goals into reality.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A recent post on Mother.ly, "Talking is teaching: 5 creative ways to help your baby learn today," incorporates tips from Too Small to Fail on how simple actions such as talking, reading, and singing to children can help improve babies' brain development.

An article published in Quartz discusses Sistema Biobolsa , a CGI commitment-maker that develops and installs "biodigesters" to convert animal waste into energy and fertilizer. With the help of CGI, Sistema Biobolsa aims to scale up their commitment.

In just two weeks, we will be returning to the Coachella Valley where President Clinton and Chelsea Clinton will host the Clinton Health Matters Activation Summit. This anchor event of the Clinton Health Matters Initiative will bring together more than 400 leaders in healthcare, technology, business, education, and government to highlight systemic approaches to chronic disease prevention nationwide. Read a story in the Desert Sun on what to expect at the 2016 summit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
"Huma Abedin" <ha16@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
"David Binder" <David@db-research.com>
"Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"Teddy Goff" <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com>
"Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/4/2015 4:14:08 AM
Subject: RE: Immigration remarks

Apologies if this was already discussed, but I thought one of the constructs of this would be "if Congress doesn't act in X time, I will do y and z." If that is still the case, I think we should change the "right away as president" formulation.

From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Monday, May 4, 2015 10:52 AM
To: Joel Benenson; John Podesta; Kristina Schake; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; Huma Abedin; Jennifer Palmieri; Jake Sullivan; Brian Fallon; John Anzalone; David Binder; Jim Margolis; Teddy Goff; Oren Shur; Tony Carrk
Cc: Marissa Astor
Subject: Immigration remarks

Here's a revised topper for tomorrow that spells out a bit more of what we're talking about in terms of the sympathetic cases. Also takes Joel's point about punching up the "can't wait" up top.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 11:57 PM, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> In advance of this discussion, here's a draft of her Las Vegas topper. It's a little long so I'm going to try to tighten it up, but this attempts to lay out the contrast on path to citizenship and move the ball forward with the parents of dreamers.
>
> On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 8:23 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
>
> > Agree with Jake and John
> > We're not running against King.
> >
> > Sent from my iPhone
> >
> > On May 3, 2015, at 7:28 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
> >
> > > I'd stick with Bush/Rubio.
> > >
> > > On Sunday, May 3, 2015, Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com > wrote:
> > >
> > > > It always makes sense to whack Steve King. And this is particularly outrageous and bigoted and [fill in the bad word]. But the question from you and the comms team is whether hitting King takes away from our effort to get a clean contrast with Bush/Rubio et al. They would also attack King, so it sort of lets them off the hook.
> > > >
> > > > On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 7:09 PM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com > wrote:
> > > >
> > > > > If you won't be on the call, Jake, can I ask one immigration question. Does it make any sense to whack Steve King for trying to change the Constitution to deny babies born here the right to American citizenship if their parents aren't citizens? (basically get rid of the 14th amendment). It seems like a great contrast to what HRC is proposing.
> > > > >
> > > > > Mandy Grunwald
> > > > > Grunwald Communications
> > > > > 202 973-9400

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-----Original Message-----
From: Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >
To: Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Margolis, Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; David Binder <David@db-research.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >; Marissa Astor <mastor@hillaryclinton.com >; Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com >; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >; Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >
Sent: Sun, May 3, 2015 7:03 pm
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls

Marlon and I will be on a plane to Atlanta. Dan can walk through our immigration gameplan.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 6:48 PM, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Our agenda for tomorrow's 8 am is:
>
> - Immigration plan
> - Clinton Cash update
>
> Just to remind everyone that these are our standing meetings/calls going forward:
>
> Monday, Wednesday, Friday 8 am Call
>
> Week & Month Look Ahead - Thursdays
> Normally this call will be every Thursday, but due to scheduling conflicts this week it will be Friday at 1 pm. It will be a one hour call and then every other week it will be a 2 hour in-person meeting. The first in-person meeting will be on May 14. Marissa is scheduling it with your offices.
>
> --
> Kristina Schake
> Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Clinton, Press Office \(Clinton\)" <Press_Office@clinton.senate.gov>
To:
Date: 12/1/2007 1:09:03 AM
Subject: Clips: Sat 12/1

Office of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton
Saturday, December 1st, 2007

Front Pages

The New York Times: http://www.nytimes.com/pages/pageone/scan/index.html

Daily News: http://www.nydailynews.com/front/covers/

New York Post: http://www.nypost.com/frontback

Albany Times Union: http://www.timesunion.com/news/frontpage/

HRC Articles/Mentions

Standoff Ends Peacefully At A Clinton Field Office NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/01hostage.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Standoff Ends With Surrender At Clinton Office WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002546_pf.html

Standoff Ends At Clinton Office In N.H. LAT
http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/la-na-hostage1dec01,1,5277636.story

Clinton's Hostage Standoff Ends Peacefully Newsday
http://www.newsday.com/news/nationworld/nation/ny-ushost1130,0,1554946.print.story?coll=ny_home_rail_headlines

Arrest Ends Clinton Office Standoff Concord Monitor
http://concordmonitor.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071201/FRONTPAGE/712010380

Hostage Crisis Ends Peacefully Union Leader
http://unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Hostage+crisis+ends+peacefully&articleId=4a266b60-526d-46eb-a6af-764c7792920c

Clinton Visits With Hostages, Thanks Police After Standoff Union Leader
http://unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Clinton+visits+with+hostages%2c+thanks+police+after+standoff&articleId=676ddd10-2f0c-42c8-aa8a-3ceb7ed4efa5

Defused: Somersworth Man Surrenders After More Than 5-Hour Ordeal Foster's Daily Democrat
http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071201/GJNEWS04/712010063

Clinton Makes Emergency Appearance To Thank Police, Hostages For Their Courage Foster's Daily Democrat
http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071201/GJNEWS_01/712010061

'Bomber' Takes Hostages At Hillary Clinton's Campaign Headquarters NY Daily News
http://www.nydailynews.com/news/us_world/2007/12/01/2007-12-01_bomber_takes_hostages_at_hillary_clinton-1.html?print=1&page=all

Terror At Hill's HQ NY Post
http://www.nypost.com/php/pfriendly/print.php?url=http://www.nypost.com/seven/12012007/news/nationalnews/terror_at_hills_hq_742726.htm

Hostage-Taker Surrenders At Hillary's N.H. Campaign Office Washington Times
http://www.washingtontimes.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071201/NATION/112010051/1002

Analysis: Clinton Calm In Hostage Crisis AP
http://www.nytimes.com/aponline/us/AP-Clinton-Hostage-Leadership.html?pagewanted=print

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Seizes Opportunity After Crisis Politico
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=9383CEBB-3048-5C12-00CE4804C1900437

Suspect In Trouble Before Hostage Drama AP
http://www.nytimes.com/aponline/us/AP-Clinton-Office-Hostages.html?pagewanted=print

Democrats' Battle Shifts To Healthcare LAT
http://www.latimes.com/features/health/la-na-health1dec01,1,4484202.story

Clinton Blasts Obama Health Care Television Ad Newsday
http://www.newsday.com/news/nationworld/nation/ny-ushill015484077dec01,0,2748148.print.story

Campaign Takeout: Barack's Health Care Ad Is Bull, Says Hillary NY Daily News
http://www.nydailynews.com/news/politics/2007/12/01/2007-12-01_campaign_takeout_baracks_health_care_ad_-1.html?print=1&page=all

Black Leaders Torn Over Endorsement WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002257_pf.html

Clinton Adviser Was On Air At GOP Debate AP
http://www.newsday.com/entertainment/tv/wire/sns-ap-republicans-debate-cnn-flap,0,6010188.print.story

Naive Media Aghast At News Of HRC Plants Politico
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=92AD2175-3048-5C12-009A04F332D55416

Tony For Hillary NY Post
http://www.nypost.com/php/pfriendly/print.php?url=http://www.nypost.com/seven/11302007/gossip/pagesix/tony_for_hillary_169032.htm

Op-ed: Hillary's False Claims By Merrill Matthews WSJ
http://online.wsj.com/article_print/SB119646509038709996.html

Column: Death, Taxes aNd Mrs. Clinton By Peggy Noonan WSJ
http://online.wsj.com/article_print/SB119646166232809922.html

Blog Post: Okay, Hillary Is Now My "Gal" Daily Kos
http://www.dailykos.com/story/2007/11/30/2267/4179

Blog Post: Clinton Workers Taken Hostage; Rightwingers Fast To Exploit The Crisis Mother Jones
http://www.motherjones.com/mojoblog/archives/2007/11/6370_hillary_clinton_5.html

Blog Post: Debunking Polarization Watching Those We Choose
http://proctoringcongress.blogspot.com/2007/11/debunking-polarization.html

Blog Post: Top Ten Reasons For Mandated Universal Health Care Daily Kos
http://www.dailykos.com/story/2007/11/30/21135/421

Blog Post: Icon Douglas Wilder Cools On Obama MyDD
http://www.mydd.com/story/2007/11/30/21242/197

Blog Post: Is Obama Committed To Universal Health Care? Left Coaster
http://www.theleftcoaster.com/archives/011423.php

Blog Post: Rudy's Judy Problem Digby
http://digbysblog.blogspot.com/2007/11/rudys-judy-problem-by-digby-matthews.html

2008

Candidates Speak To Democratic Leaders WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002258_pf.html

Barackfast Obama-Bloomy Diner Summit NY Post
http://www.nypost.com/php/pfriendly/print.php?url=http://www.nypost.com/seven/12012007/news/regionalnews/barackfast_obama_bloomy_diner_summit_783555.htm

City Taxpayers Picked Up Tab For Judith Giuliani's Visit To Kin In Pennsylvania NY Daily News

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/politics/2007/12/01/2007-12-01_city_taxpayers_picked_up_tab_for_judith_-1.html?print=1&page=all

Giuliani's Profitable Partnership WSJ
http://online.wsj.com/article_print/SB119647627254210408.html

Lone Star Kick-Starts Huckabee Campaign WSJ
http://online.wsj.com/article_print/SB119647069382910204.html

Thompson Bid, Criticized As Sleepy, Is At The Least Unconventional NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/politics/01thompson.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Foot Soldiers For The Ron Paul Revolution LAT
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/front/la-na-ronpaul1dec01,1,10685.story?coll=la-headlines-frontpage

Column: Rudy's Security Blanket By Gail Collins NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/opinion/01collins.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

WP Editorial: Mr. Giuliani And The Tax Fairy
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002190_pf.html

Column: Rambo And The G.O.P. By Bob Herbert NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/opinion/01herbert.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Op-ed: Flat-Tax And Spend GOP By Michael Kinsley LAT
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/opinion/la-oe-kinsley1dec01,1,4184329.story?coll=la-news-comment

New York

Firm Employing Bruno Handles Unions' Money NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/nyregion/01bruno.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Process Begins At Ethanol Plant In Shelby Rochester D&C
http://www.democratandchronicle.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071130/BUSINESS/711300342/1001

Op-ed: Buffalo's Field Of Dreams By Jake Halpern WSJ
http://online.wsj.com/article_print/SB119646634517310042.html

National

Dozens Hurt In Train Crash In Chicago NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/01chicago.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Washington: Health Care Bill Heads To The President Reuters
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/01brfs-HEALTHCAREBI_BRF.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Witness Names To Be Withheld From Detainee NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/nationalspecial3/01gitmo.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Bush Seeks More Funds For AIDS Fight WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113001165_pf.html

Estimate Of AIDS Cases In U.S. Rises WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002535_pf.html

Advisers Say F.D.A.'s Flaws Put Lives At Risk NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/washington/01fda.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

News Analysis: Wall St. Sees Silver Lining In Economy NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/business/01econ.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Mothers Skimp As States Take Child Support NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/us/01child.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Deal In The Works To Freeze Rates On Subprime Loans WP

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002627_pf.html

Lawmakers Set Deal On Raising Fuel Efficiency NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/washington/01energy.html?_r=1&oref=slogin&ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Op-ed: Let's Unite Against HIV-AIDS By Laura Bush WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113001787_pf.html

NYT Editorial: Behind The Stem Cell Breakthrough
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/opinion/01sat1.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

NYT Editorial: Endangered Species
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/opinion/01sat4.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Political/Administration/Capitol Hill/Media

WH Says 1,000,000 Docs Handed Over Politico
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=92CA550B-3048-5C12-00F4890276C086BA

Iraq/Afghanistan

Rove's Version Of 2002 War Vote Is Disputed WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002256_pf.html

In Iraq, U.S. Shifts Its Tone On Iran LAT
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/front/la-fg-iraqiran1dec01,1,5720368.story?coll=la-headlines-frontpage

News Analysis: A Fuller Picture: U.S. Looks To Iraqi Data NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/world/middleeast/01assess.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Iraq Seeks To Execute 3 Former Officials NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/world/middleeast/01iraq.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

International

U.S. Withdraws Draft On Mideast At U.N. WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002307_pf.html

Putin Withdraws Russia From Major Arms Treaty WP
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113000221_pf.html

Saudi Rape Case Spurs Calls For Reform NYT
http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/01/world/01saudi.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

WP Editorial: Hope Against A Pandemic
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/11/30/AR2007113002191_pf.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Wilson Center" <wwics@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/31/2015 3:15:07 AM
Subject: Invitation: Global Energy Forum: Revolutionary Changes and Security Pathways

To view this email as a web page, click here

Special Event

Wilson Center

Global Energy Forum: Revolutionary Changes and Security Pathways

The international energy system is going through revolutionary changes. Oil and natural gas production is growing in the United States and elsewhere in response to new technologies. Geopolitics face several inflection points, from a turbulent Middle East to increased Russian pressure in Europe, and Chinese pressure in East Asia. Furthermore, new pathways must be developed to advance global energy security at a time of revolutionary change. The system must be more resilient, as energy trade is vulnerable to interruption, and as strategic petroleum reserves need to be modernized. Up to and beyond the next climate change conference (COP-21) in Paris, national security, energy and climate goals need to be better integrated in future policies.

Panel 1: A Global - and Revolutionary - Energy System

Amy Myers Jaffe
Executive Director, Energy and Sustainability, University of California, Davis

Robert Johnston
CEO and Natural Resources Head, The Eurasia Group

David G. Victor
Professor, School of International Relations and Pacific Studies, University of California, San Diego

Keynote: The Energy World Ahead

To Be Announced

Panel 2: Pathways to Global Energy Security

Leon Fuerth
Practitioner in Residence, Elliott School of International Affairs, George Washington University

David L. Goldwyn
Principal, Goldwyn Global Strategies LLC

Jan H. Kalicki
Public Policy Fellow and Energy Lead, Woodrow Wilson Center

Conference Rapporteur

Julia Nanay
Principal, Energy Ventures LLC

RSVP NOW

Monday, September 21, 2015
1:15 pm-4:30 pm

6th Floor Flom Auditorium

Directions

Wilson Center
Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza
1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW
Washington, D.C. 20004

Phone: 202.691.4000

wwics@wilsoncenter.org

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RSVP NOW » Forward to a Friend

© Copyright 2014, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jon Soltz, VoteVets.org" <info@votevets.org>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/13/2015 8:32:15 AM
Subject: Koch Brothers connection to anti-Iran deal campaign

VoteVets.org
Country. Service. Action.

John -

Opponents of the negotiated deal to prevent Iran obtaining nuclear weapons have the money.

But we have the people.

Since the deal was announced, outside groups receiving untraceable contributions have spent over $10 million on ads attempting to convince legislators to oppose the deals.

VoteVets was built for moments like this -- there is no other progressive organization with the ability to organize tens of thousands of veterans and military family members nationally, and dozens in each congressional district.

We are the key to countering this attack on diplomacy, but we need the resources to amplify the voices of veterans who support the deal.

Contribute $3 to VoteVets today to help us lift up the voices of the veterans and military family members who support a diplomacy-first approach to preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon.

We don't know much about their funding, but we do know something about two of the largest shadowy groups opposing the deal.

The first, Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran counts Joe Lieberman as a prominent advisor. You may remember him as the Senator who led the our charge into Iraq before retiring in shame years later. The other includes the CEO of the Koch Brothers' funded Concerned Veterans for America on their board.

This is who we're up against, and it's so important that the voices of veterans who support this deal aren't drowned out by dark money.

Contribute $3 to VoteVets today and help us elevate the voices of veterans who support this deal.

There are two alternatives: support diplomacy as the best way to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, or there will be war.

Thanks for choosing the right side.

Jon Soltz
Iraq War Veteran & Chairman
VoteVets

Contribute

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PAID FOR BY VOTEVETS ACTION FUND

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com. If that is not your preferred email address, click here . Click here if you'd like to unsubscribe. We try to send only the most important information and opportunities to participate via email. To sustain VoteVets with a contribution click here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Alla Konstantinova" <allak1979@gmail.com>
To: "Tiffany Davis" <tmd@georgetown.edu>
Date: 8/8/2014 1:40:07 PM
Subject: Re: Sign up to be a tutor with Peer to Peer Tutoring!

Likewise. 2001 and I live in Russia:)

Alla

2014-08-09 0:34 GMT+04:00 Tiffany Davis <tmd@georgetown.edu >:

> Hello,
>
> I think you sent this to the wrong person. I graduated Georgetown in 1994 and live in Atlanta; I"m nowhere in the geographical proximity to give peer-to-peer tutoring.
>
> Thank you, and Hoya Saxa.
>
> Tiffany M. Davis
> CAS 1994
>
> On Fri, Aug 8, 2014 at 4:29 PM, Georgetown Peer-to-Peer Tutoring <georgetownp2ptutoring@gmail.com > wrote:
>
> > Hi M3's!
> >
> > M1's and M2's start classes next week and we are looking for more tutors to participate in the Peer to Peer Tutoring Program!
> >
> > Why be a tutor? You get paid for tutoring, help your peers, meet new students, review old material and it's a great activity to put on your CV! This year in addition to one-on-one tutoring, we have added walk-in tutoring hours. These will be held in SEB-5 from 5:30-7:30 every Tuesday and Thursday.
> >
> > Once you're approved by the deans the only requirement for participation is attendance at a short training session (with free food!). You can attend one of two training sessions to be held on Wednesday, August 13th at noon or Tuesday, August 19th at 7pm in GA2/4.
> >
> > Please RSVP on the attached google doc:
> > https://docs.google.com/spreadsheets/d/1nwEdiBedo_Hz3V9HE3I3CFJW-mTuZSrXiJSOvrzV0jI/edit?usp=sharing
> >
> > We hope to see you next week!,
> >
> > Haley Bunting, Emily Kivlehan, Tyler Kingdon
> > Peer to Peer Coordinators
>
> --
> Tiffany M. Davis
> www.linkedin.com/in/tiffanymdavis > tmd@georgetown.edu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Scott Lilly" <slilly@americanprogress.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 11/10/2008 9:14:09 AM
Subject: Obama Cabinet

I don't know why you had to leave us and go off to Chicago when your former employee already had it figured out.

22 to Know

Our Picks for an Obama Cabinet: Parts 1 & 2

By IN THESE TIMES EDITORS AND CONTRIBUTORS

In 2007, the Pew Research Center conducted a poll asking Americans if they could identify a man named Robert Gates. As the Iraq War raged, fewer than one in four respondents knew he was the secretary of defense. Is this a sad commentary on whether the public is following events in Iraq? Perhaps. But more likely it's a reflection of the overall obscurity of our government's top decision makers
In a media environment that portrays presidents as the sole messianic implementer of their agenda, the steep drop-off in name recognition is predictable — even if it belies how power really works.

Far more than a brain trust of advisers, the U.S. Cabinet has been the instrument by which political rhetoric becomes public policy. From Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins (under FDR) to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld (under Ford and Bush II), Cabinet officials have been the chief sculptors and enforcers of the best — and worst — presidential policies.

In many ways, administrations are the sum of their Cabinets' work, and that axiom would be especially powerful should Sen. Barack Obama win the 2008 election. With just four years of federal legislative experience, the Illinois senator would be the antithesis of the old Washington hands who tend to occupy the Oval Office — and based on his campaign themes, he will likely enter office with a mandate for progressive change.

Which raises the question: What would a truly progressive Cabinet look like? There has been no such thing in at least a generation (if not longer), so it is a difficult — but critical — question to answer. After all, who heads our federal government's major departments will have an impact on all issues, from Africa policy to zero-tolerance criminal sentencing.

In These Times asked its editors and writers to suggest their top progressive choices for a potential Obama Cabinet. We asked that contributors weigh ideological and political considerations, with an eye toward recommending people who have both progressive credentials and at least an arguable chance at being appointed in an Obama White House.

This group of people would represent at once the most progressive, aggressive and practical Cabinet in contemporary history. Of course, it is by no means a definitive list. It is merely one proposal aimed at staring a longer discussion about the very concept of a progressive Cabinet — and why it will be important to a new administration, especially if that administration is serious about change.

-David Sirota

Energy: Dan Reicher

Climate change and America's fossil-fuel dependency are two of the biggest challenges an Obama administration will face. Ironically, the job of energy secretary is ill-suited for tackling them. Most of the Energy Department's $25 billion budget goes toward maintaining the nation's nuclear-weapons stockpile and handling waste disposal — leaving only a fraction for developing alternative energy sources. It's tough to direct a clean-energy revolution with that portfolio.

Still, there's room for improvement. Under the Bush administration, the department has abandoned many of its successful partnerships to boost efficiency and curb emissions in dirty industries, while prioritizing costly clean-coal and hydrogen fuel-cell boondoggles that have achieved little.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has voiced interest in this position, but a head-cracking superstar like him might be better slotted in a new "climate czar" role. After all, the task of de-carbonizing the U.S. economy will be so titanic that someone will need to coordinate all the different agencies — from agriculture to transportation.

The Energy Department needs a smart manager who values sound research and understands the importance of efficiency — the cheapest, quickest way to curb our carbon output. Over the past year, Dan Reicher, a former assistant secretary of energy under President Clinton, has been doing just that — as head of Google's new climate and energy fund, seeding innovative projects across the country, from geothermal research to plug-in hybrids. His recent congressional testimonies have smartly laid out how better federal policy could spur trillions in private investment toward cleaner and more-efficient technologies — just the questions the department should be obsessing over.

—Bradford Plumer

Labor: David Bonior

Obama's best choice for secretary of labor would be David Bonior, who from 1976 to 2002 served as the progressive congressman from the Macomb and St. Clair County suburbs outside Detroit — the famous district of Reagan Democrats. During his tenure, Bonior championed unions, opposed trade agreements like NAFTA, and criticized both President Reagan's Central American counter-insurgency policies and President Clinton's civil liberties policies.

After Michigan Republicans re-drew his district in 2000 and he lost a bid for governor two years later, Bonior became chair of American Rights at Work, a labor-sponsored coalition of non-union groups advocating worker rights, especially the freedom to organize unions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That work bolsters his credentials for pushing one of organized labor's top legislative goals: the Employee Free Choice Act. The measure would provide for union recognition when a majority of workers in a workplace sign cards indicating they want a union, increase penalties for labor law violations and guarantee access to arbitration to establish a first contract if employers refuse to bargain seriously.

Leaders on both sides of the AFL-CIO/Change To Win divide respect Bonior, who managed John Edwards' presidential campaign. Bonior's time as party whip for a decade gives him experience working with Congress for what will be a tough fight on behalf of the Employee Free Choice Act, even with a large Democratic majority. And his stature would guarantee a strong voice in Obama's Cabinet for both unions and broader workers' interests, from the local workplace to the global economy.

—David Moberg

Transportation: Earl Blumenauer

Last summer, as Congress wrestled with energy legislation, Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.) offered a simple, $1 million proposal to encourage bike commuting. To his disbelief, the plan was ridiculed by a number of Republicans, including Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.), who called two-wheelers "a 19th century solution to a 21st century problem." In a prospective Obama administration, Blumenauer should get the last laugh.

An eco-friendly labor advocate from Portland, Blumenauer couldn't be more representative of his liberal district, which he's served since 1996. In the Oregon legislature and later on the Portland city council, Blumenauer helped direct Portland's planning renaissance, championing bike lanes, light rail and streetcars. He brought his emphasis on smart growth to Washington, advocating for high-speed rail and launching the Congressional Bike Caucus. In fact, nobody in his congressional office applies for a parking permit.

An early and vocal supporter of Obama, Blumenauer could be tapped as transportation secretary, a post that will undoubtedly grow in importance as the United States grapples with rising energy prices and climate change. He seems to be preparing for the role. In July, he co-wrote a substantive energy bill that subsidizes telecommuting, public transit and transit-friendly affordable housing.

But the biggest challenge facing the new transit guru will come next year, when Congress revisits the Transportation Bill. If Blumenauer can redirect more revenue from the nation's gas tax to alternative forms of transit, he'll be laughing his way to a future where Americans live better with less oil.

—Adam Doster

U.S. Trade Representative: Marcy Kaptur

Polls show the public overwhelmingly opposes America's NAFTA-style trade policies, and Obama has committed to reforming those policies as president. Part of doing that means naming a fair-trade voice as his lead trade negotiator — and no voice for trade reform has been more dogged than Rep. Marcy Kaptur's (D-Ohio).

A 13-term House member, Kaptur serves on the Appropriations Committee — one of Congress' most powerful panels. As Toledo's representative, she has seen firsthand the devastation that comes with unfair trade pacts, and has led the fight against every major lobbyist-written deal that has come through Congress — from NAFTA to China PNTR to CAFTA.

That personal connection to the trade issue would serve Kaptur well in international negotiations where compromise too often means selling out the American worker. Similarly, Kaptur's longtime experience in the House would be critical in powering fair-trade deals through what remains a corporate-dominated Congress.

Presidents of both parties have treated the trade representative position as an ambassadorship to a banana republic, appointing go-along-to-get-along hacks — such as former Clinton campaign chairman Mickey Kantor — who use the department as a taxpayer-funded training program for their post-government career in the corporate whorehouse.

Kaptur would be far different.

—David Sirota

Head of EPA: Daniel Kammen

To head the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), Obama would make a smart choice with University of California, Berkeley, public policy professor Daniel Kammen.

A senior energy and environmental aide to the Obama campaign, Kammen is the founder and director of the school's Renewable and Appropriate Energy Laboratory, which designs, tests and disseminates renewable energy systems for industrialized and developing nations. He is also co-director of the Berkeley Institute of the Environment, which looks at environmental problems and their solutions.

At 46, Kammen signals the kind of youthful vitality the EPA needs. And as someone outside the Washington bubble, he hasn't been tainted by the political wranglings that have screwed up U.S. environmental policies for so many years.

As someone with a background in environmental issues and a primary focus on energy, Kammen has the necessary experience to address the two-headed beast of sound energy and climate policy.

He was also a coordinating lead author of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change reports, which means that, unlike the current political appointees in the EPA, Kammen is well aware of the significance and urgency of this threat.

—Kate Sheppard

Federal Reserve Chair: Marion or Herbert Sandler

Firing up the printing press at the U.S. Mint and handing over billions in cash to Wall Street con artists isn't a serious monetary policy — but that's been Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's response to the housing and credit crisis. When Bernanke's term expires in 2010, either Marion or Herbert Sandler would be a welcome replacement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over four decades, the husband-and-wife team built Golden West Financial into one of the most stable and successful mortgage companies — and they did it through the kind of responsible lending practices that the greed-is-good crowd mocked.

As the Wall Street Journal reported in 2007, "Golden West historically had very low levels of bad loans, which Mr. Sandler has attributed to his bank's careful vetting of borrowers and their credit." Indeed, the Journal noted that the Sandlers were "frequent critic[s] of competitors who required no down payment, set interest rates that reset quickly at high rates and sold bundled loans to far-off investors." They also spoke out against "the lax lending practices that pervaded the industry for the past few years — even writing a letter to federal regulators last year in support of tighter standards." That's precisely the kind of foresight America's bank of banks desperately needs.

What's more, the Sandlers are about as progressive as bankers come — and they put their money where their politics are. Their foundation underwrites, among others, the Center for Responsible Lending and the National Women's Law Center.

A Federal Reserve chairperson with a vague familiarity with — much less a connection to — such groups would inject a populist perspective into an institution whose secrecy and insularity has made it one of the elite's most reliable weapons in the class war.

—David Sirota

Defense: Sarah Sewall

Admittedly a long-shot candidate, Sarah Sewall should be the next defense secretary.

During the Clinton administration, Sewall served as the first deputy assistant secretary of defense for peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance.

Currently the executive director of the Carr Center for Human Rights Policy at Harvard University and a lecturer in public policy, Sewall also directs the Center's program on national security and human rights.

Sewall has worked at a variety of defense research organizations. In addition to writing the introduction to the University of Chicago edition of the U.S. Army and Marine Corps Counterinsurgency Field Manual (2007), she has written widely on U.S. foreign policy, multilateralism, peace operations and military intervention. She currently focuses on civilians in war, facilitating dialogue between the military and human rights communities on the use of force.

One of the biggest challenges facing our country today is recognizing — and adequately responding to — the broad spectrum of threats we face in our globalized world. That includes environmental changes and disease pandemics that are contributing to global conflicts. It also includes the weaponization of space; the proliferation of nuclear weapons; and the extravagance of bloated military budgets — while our schools crumble and nearly 46 million Americans go uninsured.

The mindless use of military might — at the expense of meaningful diplomacy — has left the United States much disliked today. America seems to have lost its moral compass and with it, the ability to lead by example — once a hallmark of our nation.

With Sewall's extensive background in policy, defense and national security, she understands these challenges and would work to restore American leadership.

—Jody Williams

Commerce: Margot Dorfman

For decades, the Department of Commerce has represented the interests of the U.S. global business elite to the detriment of healthy and sustainable commerce.

Since the '80s, the department has done little to abate the destruction of Main Street enterprise, the collapse of our manufacturing base, the looting of our public infrastructure, massive global outsourcing of jobs, and rampant tax shifting to overseas tax havens.

A prospective Obama administration should nominate Margot Dorfman for secretary of commerce. Dorfman would advocate for Main Street, not Wall Street, and for business owners and employees, not absentee shareholders. She would support high-road enterprise that encourages real investment and healthy growth, not speculation, outsourcing and exploitation.

As CEO of the U.S. Women's Chamber of Commerce, Dorfman has supported sustainable business development, durable economic policies, community entrepreneurship, worker education, and small business development for women and people of color. Prior to that, Dorfman worked for General Mills and several small enterprises.

When the U.S. Chamber of Commerce led the fight against raising the federal minimum wage in 2007, Dorfman and the Women's Chamber led the fight to raise it. "We all lose when American workers are underpaid," she said. She has been a leading voice with Business for Shared Prosperity, a national network of forward-thinking business leaders.

Sub-appointments: Van Jones, of the Ella Baker Center, to direct the Commerce Department's new "green jobs initiative," and John Arensmeyer, of Small Business Majority, to oversee the economic development administration.

—Chuck Collins

Interior: Susan Williams

The most serious challenge facing the new secretary of interior will be the bureaucratic mayhem that politicians have created. Worse, many of these lawmakers still fail to recognize Native people as part of true sovereign nations, especially in relation to the United States.

Susan M. Williams — a member of the Sisseton-Wahpeton Dakota tribe — would help untangle this mess. Her commitment to the environment and her involvement in civic affairs make her an excellent choice for the post.

After getting a degree from Harvard Law School (and working there as a lecturer), Williams worked in firms committed to Native law and served on boards that focus on improving relations between the federal government and tribes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Typically, the Interior Department oversees efforts to uphold treaty rights and agreements with the federal government. What's at stake for Native people is the right to live on healthy land, have access to clean water and maintain control over their natural resources. The department also assists Indigenous tribes in creating a sustainable future for themselves.Williams lobbied for amendments that affected tribes' water rights and tax status.

Add to this résumé Williams' membership in various bar associations — the American Bar Association, District of Columbia Bar, New Mexico Bar and the U.S. Supreme Court Bar — and she couldn't be better qualified for the position.

—Winona LaDuke

FDA Commissioner: David Blumenthal

For Food and Drug Administration (FDA) commissioner, the pick should be Dr. David Blumenthal, director of the Institute of Health Policy at Massachusetts General Hospital and a professor at Harvard Medical School.

One of the top issues the next commissioner will face is regulating the pharmaceutical and medical-device industries.

Under the Bush administration, FDA scientists have been beset with low morale and widespread concern that they cannot do their jobs without risk of inappropriate political interference.

This decade, Blumenthal has shown independence from the pharmaceutical industry. He is a critic of detailing, drug-makers' use of salespeople to pressure physicians to prescribe their most expensive medicines. He supports government use of drug formularies, which is an effective way of negotiating lower drug prices and protecting access to needed medicines. Blumenthal also advocates for comparative effectiveness research — an approach to studying the safety and efficacy of medicines that could save many lives.

Blumenthal was the founding chairman of AcademyHealth, the national organization of health services researchers. From 1995 to 2002, he served as executive director for the Task Force on Academic Health Centers at the Commonwealth Fund — a foundation whose goal is to improve healthcare quality for low-income people, the uninsured, young children, people of color and the elderly.

—Raman Castellblanch

Director of National Intelligence: Ellen Laipson

For director of national intelligence, President Obama should nominate Ellen Laipson, president and CEO of the Henry L. Stimson Center — a nonprofit public policy institute that focuses on peace and security issues.

I worked with Laipson at Stimson for four years and I know she values the knowledge found inside the bureaucracy — even if that knowledge can be difficult to extract. As director, Laipson would modernize the institution so that the intelligence community is the best information resource in government.

From 1997 until 2002, Laipson was vice chair of the National Intelligence Council. Before that, she was special assistant to the U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations. She has had stints working for the Congressional Research Service, on the policy planning staff of the State Department and as a policy director at the National Security Council, giving her an invaluable perspective on policy.

In 2000, Laipson was responsible for one of the most forward-thinking public documents on intelligence and national security: Global Trends 2015, which pointed out transnational threats like criminal networks and terrorism. It remains highly relevant today.

Successful intelligence gathering in the coming years will require mending international good will. In that regard, Laipson's U.N. experience will serve her well. More importantly, her expertise lies in the Middle East — especially Iran, Iraq and the Arabian Peninsula.

As director of national intelligence, Laipson must restore Americans' trust in its intelligence agencies. She can do this by working to resolve concerns about torture and surveillance, by putting a stop to the privatization of intelligence, by including Congress in the dialogue, and by communicating with Americans to build mutual understanding and respect.

—Lorelei Kelly

Secretary of State: Jim McDermott

Secretary of state has two major tasks: To define and represent U.S. interests in the world, and to bring the rest of the world's interests to the United States. Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) — a 10-term member of Congress and a Progressive Caucus stalwart — would do both.

McDermott has been a consistent voice for single-payer healthcare, for increased funding for the U.S. and global HIV/AIDS crisis, and for maintaining the estate tax. And he has stated unequivocally that Big Oil and the Iraq War are causing skyrocketing oil prices.

Like any U.S. politician, his record isn't perfect, particularly on trade. But unlike most of his colleagues, McDermott is independent and willing to think and act outside the Washington box.

McDermott actively opposes U.S. threats of war against Iran, and he has challenged Israel directly, saying it's "both appropriate and urgent for the U.S. to raise questions about [Israel's] intentions" toward Iran.

Secretary McDermott would not only call for redeploying combat troops out of Iraq, he would also press for bringing home all U.S. troops and mercenaries. He would enforce ignored laws prohibiting U.S. bases there. And he would immediately renounce U.S. efforts to control Iraq's oil. In fact, he read into the Congressional Record the full text of the 1930 Anglo-Iraqi treaty, which set the same terms for British control of oil that the Bush administration is trying to impose on Iraq today.

Secretary of State Jim McDermott would reclaim the primacy of diplomacy in U.S. foreign policy.

—Phyllis Bennis

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

FCC Chairman: Michael Copps

In his two terms on the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), Michael Copps has done yeoman's duty, consistently protecting the public's stake in the communications spectrum under a string of hostile chairmen.

In his first term, Copps helped launch a series of public hearings about media consolidation. In 2007, he announced his American Media Contract, which asserts citizens' rights to "programming that isn't so damned bad so damned often." And at the 2008 National Conference for Media Reform, Copps called for tougher, more frequent FCC monitoring of local broadcast licenses, and the enforcement of net neutrality principles.

Trained as a historian at the University of North Carolina, Copps would bring nearly four decades of public and private sector experience to the position. He'll need all of it to deal with the coming disruptions in the media environment.

On Feb. 17, 2009, the analog broadcast signal will be shut off, turning many Americans' TVs into doorstops unless they subscribe to commercial cable or satellite services, or obtain a converter box. Coupons for those boxes are limited, and advocates for elderly, minority and low-income Americans warn that they may be cut off from crucial emergency and public information services.

A battle is also raging over new spectrum allocations: Consumer advocates argue that "white spaces" should be left open to provide options for affordable public wireless networks, while broadcasters counter that this would interfere with broadcast quality.

Meanwhile, media consolidation continues. Current FCC Chairman Kevin Martin approved the recent merger of XM and Sirius, even though the move created a monopoly in satellite radio. Copps dissented, citing, as usual, the public interest.

It's long past time such dissent became mainstream.

—Jessica Clark

Education: C.J. Prentiss

An African American from Ohio, C.J. Prentiss has the background needed to confront the key tasks of any education secretary: maintaining a focus on student achievement, closing the achievement gap and mobilizing a broad constituency to demand reform beyond the current emphasis on teaching children to fill in bubbles on standardized tests.

For more than a quarter-century, Prentiss has been a legislator, policy-maker and community activist adept at building bridges among diverse groups. She currently heads a new initiative by Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland to increase the state's graduation rate for African-American males.

Prentiss began as an organizer in the '80s, working on literacy campaigns in housing projects. She went on to serve 15 years in the Ohio legislature, rising to become the Democratic leader in the Ohio Senate. For eight years, Prentiss also headed the Education Committee of the National Black Caucus of State Legislators.

She has developed initiatives that put into practice oft-stated goals of investing in children, involving parents and community, changing teacher practices, and closing the achievement gap. She demands more of teachers and schools, but refuses to scapegoat them: a delicate balance essential to any meaningful reform.

Because education is primarily a state responsibility, such a background will serve Prentiss well as education secretary.

—Barbara Miner

Urban Development: Valerie Jarrett

Valerie Jarrett's blue-ribbon résumé delivers a potent blend of corporate, government and civic "street cred."

Jarrett, 51, is CEO of the Habitat Co. — a clout-heavy Chicago real estate firm — and the court-appointed overseer of the city's massive plan to transform its notoriously decrepit public housing developments.

A lawyer by trade, Jarrett has served as Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's deputy chief of staff and planning commissioner, and has chaired the boards of the Chicago Transit Authority and Chicago Stock Exchange.

In 1991, Jarrett recruited Obama's then-fiancée Michelle Robinson, for a job in Daley's office. But first Jarrett had to pass muster with Obama. They sealed the deal over dinner, and today, Jarrett is a tight family friend and indispensable Obama confidante.

She's well prepared for the treacheries of the Washington Beltway. Jarrett has stood down an array of Chicago characters, like cranky transit riders, vociferous public housing activists and mendacious aldermen. Friend and foe consider her a no-nonsense, astute operative.

The first woman at Housing and Urban Development's helm will need to navigate multiple threats to the American Dream of home ownership: the subprime loan debacle, an affordable-housing crisis and skyrocketing foreclosures, to name a few. Whatever her prescriptions, she'll have the president's ear.

Then again, Jarrett — who has been called "the other side of Obama's brain" — may be better suited for a Karl Rove-ian role in the White House.

—Laura Washington

Attorney General: Charles Ogletree Jr.

For the post of attorney general in an Obama administration, Charles Ogletree Jr. would be a good choice.

Ogletree, a tireless advocate for social justice causes, is the founder and director of the Harvard Law School's Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice, which focuses on issues relating to race and justice, sponsors research and provides policy analysis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ogletree is another one of Obama's Harvard professors-turned-adviser. He counsels the candidate on constitutional and criminal justice issues. He would be the perfect antidote to a justice department poisoned by illegal, politicized hiring, a reprehensible tolerance for torture and a refusal to enforce civil rights legislation.

Before joining the Harvard faculty in 1985, Ogletree served as a public defender in the District of Columbia, a position that helped shape his focus on civil rights and criminal justice issues. He has since earned a reputation as a brilliant legal theorist.

In 1991, he was legal counsel to Anita Hill during the Senate confirmation hearings for Justice Clarence Thomas.

Ogletree has also been a prominent media presence, moderating several PBS forums and serving as a commentator on national news programs.

He is author of several books, including From Lynch Mobs To The Killing State: Race And The Death Penalty In America in 2006, and the 2004 book All Deliberate Speed: Reflections on the First Half Century of Brown v. Board of Education.

Ogletree is co-chair of the Reparations Coordinating Committee, a group of attorneys pursuing a legal route to reparations for descendants of enslaved Africans.

In 2000 and 2002, the National Law Journal named him one of the "100 Most Influential Lawyers in America."

—Salim Muwakkil

Agriculture: Jim Hightower

Two current U.S. senators would make excellent secretaries of agriculture.

One is Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). Harkin has been a committee chair and leader on agriculture issues, opposing deregulation and favoring supply management, conservation, antitrust actions and many progressive policies — only some of which he has managed to put into law.

The other is freshman Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.), an organic farmer with a distinctive flat-top haircut. Tester is a populist who is sympathetic to environmental issues and critical of corporate globalization. He might push more comprehensive reform than Harkin would.

But here's the problem: Both are needed in the Senate.

Luckily, Obama can call on Jim Hightower, who is best known for his crusading print and radio journalism and his pithy, punchy, populist proverbs — like his book title, "There's nothing in the middle of the road but yellow stripes and dead armadillos."

But the funny, feisty Hightower also knows his farm and food issues. As Texas Agriculture Commissioner from 1983 to 1990, he promoted organic agriculture, alternative crops (like wine grapes and native plants), direct international marketing by small farmers, strong pesticide control and comprehensive environmental management.

Hightower would be a cheerfully combative complement to Obama's ultra-cool post-partisanship (although he may have been too post-partisan for some Democrats by supporting Ralph Nader in 2000).

If Obama ever needs a Cabinet member to attack the fat cats who keep the sweet stuff for themselves on the top shelf — out of reach for the little guy — he could send Hightower, who would perform the task with glee.

—David Moberg

Homeland Security: Donald J. Guter

Retired Rear Adm. Donald J. Guter, one of the many principled military lawyers who voiced strong opposition to the failed policies of the Bush administration, would make a great secretary of homeland security.

Guter was the Navy's top lawyer from 2000 until retiring in 2002, after 32 years of service. (He was also in the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001.)

One of the first insiders to challenge then-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Guter waged an internal battle against the military tribunal system, arguing that it was inherently unjust.

In 2003, he was one of three high-ranking military officers to file an amicus brief on behalf of detainees being held indefinitely at the U.S. Navy base at Guantánamo Bay.

Last year, when Attorney General Michael Mukasey was mumbling murky answers about the legality of waterboarding during his Senate confirmation hearings, Guter and three other retired military lawyers sent a letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), arguing that "waterboarding is inhumane, it is torture, and it is illegal." He is currently dean of Duquesne University's law school.

First order of business for Guter as secretary of homeland security? Change the department's awful, Third Reich-sounding name. Next, he should work closely with the attorney general to restore the full rule of law, from which true security derives, by abolishing racial and religious profiling, repudiating programs that encroach on the privacy rights of citizens (warrantless wiretapping, spy satellites on domestic targets, and the like), and implementing a humane and equitable immigration policy.

—Moustafa Bayoumi

FEC Chairman: Spencer Overton

If Barack Obama is elected, he would take office with arguably more knowledge about what's wrong with our current election system — and how to reform it — than any president since the framers of the Constitution. At the University of Chicago, Obama taught election law courses covering public financing, the Electoral College, proportional representation and universal voter registration. He has sponsored state legislation to establish instant runoff voting and federal legislation to stop deceptive electoral practices.

As a result, Obama's choice to head the Federal Election Commission (FEC), which regulates campaign finance legislation and provides a bully pulpit for improving democracy, should be a good one. He could do little better than

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

George Washington University law professor Spencer Overton.

A visionary academic grounded in reality, Overton has served on the boards of Common Cause — a nonprofit that advocates for an open and accountable government — and of Demos — a nonpartisan public policy research and advocacy organization. He has written widely on campaign financing and knows the rules, regulations and needed reforms.

More than one in four eligible U.S. voters is unregistered to vote, and campaign finance inequities are worse than ever. Moreover, our system's winner-take-all rules make most voters spectators in presidential and congressional races.

With more than 12,000 jurisdictions making independent decisions affecting federal elections — often with limited guidance and insufficient funding — a strong FEC member is needed to revamp the country's antiquated, voice-suppressing, vote-wasting elections, and to unify a partisan commission. Overton would bring the passion, knowledge and civility necessary to do just that, and ensure every vote counts and every vote matters.

—Rob Richie

Secretary of Veterans Affairs: Maj. Ladda "Tam my" Duckworth

The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) is the federal government's second largest department (after defense). With an annual budget of more than $90 billion, the VA employs more than 230,000 people at hundreds of VA medical centers, clinics and benefits offices that assist many of the 60 million U.S. veterans and their families.

But the Bush administration has woefully mismanaged the department, which is suffering from overcrowded facilities, lenghty waiting lists and a backlog of disability claims. The present state of affairs is the result of poor leadership and a failure to anticipate and allocate the requisite funding to support the needs of an escalating veteran population.

According to Nobel Prize laureate Joseph Stiglitz, "The number of disability claims exceeds 600,000, with another 1.6 million claims expected in the next two years." Overcrowded VA mental health facilities cannot provide comprehensive care to the hundreds of thousands of veterans suffering from post-traumatic stress. Not surprisingly, the suicide rate among veterans and service members is the highest it has ever been.

Maj. Tammy Duckworth, a double amputee pilot of the Iraq War, has the character and credentials to serve as our nation's secretary of veterans affairs. Her years of distinguished military service and her firsthand knowledge of the VA system — she has served as director of the Illinois Department of Veterans' Affairs since 2006 — would serve her well.

Duckworth is the best choice to deliver what millions of veterans need — and have failed to receive from the current administration.

—Luis Carlos Montalván

Health & Human Services: Kathleen Sebelius

For secretary of health and human services, Obama would do well to pick Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius.

Three major obstacles face the next secretary. One, tens of millions of Americans lack health insurance. Two, any attempt to deal with this crisis will result in the private insurance industry — and its lobbyists — swooping in to turn policy changes into a windfall for itself. And three, for eight years, the department has been crippled by low morale and staff departures caused by Bush administration mismanagement.

The next secretary must have the ability to help undo this damage.

Sebelius has shown independence from the healthcare industry. While serving as Kansas insurance commissioner from 1995 to 2003, she rejected an attempt by Anthem insurance company to buy out Blue Cross Blue Shield of Kansas. As governor, she has challenged the pharmaceutical industry by advocating for the import of prescription drugs. She also set up a state agency to work on plans to obtain better prices for prescription drugs and other healthcare services.

Sebelius has a strong background in health policy, having served on President Clinton's Commission on Consumer Protection and Quality in the Health Care Industry.

Most importantly, her experience as a governor could provide her with the needed executive ability to fill this vital post.

—Ramon Castellblanch

Treasury: Elizabeth Warren

If treasury secretaries have legacies, the two with the most memorable in the last 16 years are Clinton Treasury Secretary Bob Rubin and recent Bush Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson. At different points in their careers, both men championed extremist free-trade policies, had a hand in the deregulatory policies that led to corporate meltdowns; contributed to boom-bust cycles; and spent time heading investment banking behemoth Goldman Sachs. Perhaps the latest financial meltdown will break Goldman Sachs' death grip — and maybe, just maybe, Elizabeth Warren will be the first woman to head this key department.

A renowned Harvard Law professor, Warren may seem an unconventional choice for a position typically held by a business titan. But a presidency whose economic prospects will pivot on cleaning up conservatives' laissez-faire wreckage could use a tough-minded regulator at the helm of the government apparatus responsible for collecting taxes and policing Wall Street. Warren fits that description perfectly as one of the nation's leading experts on the laws and regulations that the treasury department is supposed to enforce, but too often doesn't.

Having made national headlines as a bestselling author and a leader in the fight against the lobbyist-written Bankruptcy Bill of 2005, Warren would set a new tone for a treasury department that has often been a bought-and-paid-for appendage of Corporate America.

—David Sirota

David Sirota is a senior editor at In These Times and author of The Uprising: An Unauthorized Tour of the Populist Revolt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scaring Wall Street and Washington (Crown Publishers). For a full list of biographies, click on "More Information."

More information about In These Times Editors and Contributors

Scott Lilly

Senior Fellow
Center for American Progress
1333 H Street N.W. Tenth Floor
Washington, D.C. 20005
Tel: 202-682-1611
Fax: 202-682-1867
slilly@americanprogress.org www.americanprogress.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com>
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/24/2015 2:33:59 AM
Subject: Fwd: The Note: Inside 'Clinton Cash'

--BUT THE BOOK OFFERS NO PROOF THAT HILLARY CLINTON TOOK ANY DIRECT ACTION TO BENEFIT THE GROUPS AND INTERESTS THAT WERE PAYING HER HUSBAND: An independent review of source material by ABC News uncovered errors in the book, including an instance where paid and unpaid speaking appearances were conflated. Schweizer said the errors would be corrected. But those same records supported the premise that former President Clinton accepted speaking fees from numerous companies and individuals with interests pending before the State Department. http://abcn.ws/1DhN8Fe

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Falcone, Michael P. <Michael.P.Falcone@abc.com >
Date: Fri, Apr 24, 2015 at 9:14 AM
Subject: The Note: Inside 'Clinton Cash'
To: "Falcone, Michael P." <Michael.P.Falcone@abc.com >

The Note: Inside 'Clinton Cash'

http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/note-inside-clinton-cash/story?id=30552766

By MICHAEL FALCONE

NOTABLES

--BILL CLINTON CASHED IN WHEN HILLARY BECAME SECRETARY OF STATE: After his wife became Secretary of State, former President Bill Clinton began to collect speaking fees that often doubled or tripled what he had been charging earlier in his post White House years, bringing in millions of dollars from groups that included several with interests pending before the State Department, an ABC News review of financial disclosure records shows. Where he once had drawn $150,000 for a typical address in the years following his presidency, Clinton saw a succession of staggering paydays for speeches in 2010 and 2011, including $500,000 paid by a Russian investment bank and $750,000 to address a telecom conference in China, ABC's MATTHEW MOSK and BRIAN ROSS report. That steady flow of income has come under scrutiny in recent days, as it formed an element of a book by author and conservative think tank fellow Peter Schweizer called "Clinton Cash," due for release in coming days. http://abcn.ws/1DhN8Fe

--BUT THE BOOK OFFERS NO PROOF THAT HILLARY CLINTON TOOK ANY DIRECT ACTION TO BENEFIT THE GROUPS AND INTERESTS THAT WERE PAYING HER HUSBAND: An independent review of source material by ABC News uncovered errors in the book, including an instance where paid and unpaid speaking appearances were conflated. Schweizer said the errors would be corrected. But those same records supported the premise that former President Clinton accepted speaking fees from numerous companies and individuals with interests pending before the State Department. http://abcn.ws/1DhN8Fe

--CHELSEA CLINTON PLAYS DEFENSE: Chelsea Clinton defended her family's charity yesterday against allegations that foreign governments received favors in return for donations, saying that despite all the questions, the Clinton Foundation does "important" work and is "among the most transparent" of foundations. "What the Clinton Foundation has said is that we will be even more transparent, even though Transparency International and others have said we're among the most transparent of foundations," the former First Daughter and Vice Chair of the Clinton Foundation said when asked Thursday morning. ABC's LIZ KREUTZ has more. http://abcn.ws/1Qod1h5

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--ANALYSIS -- ABC's RICK KLEIN: No joke here, but how hard is President Obama making things for Hillary Clinton on trade right now? His speech to his old campaign organization Thursday night featured a spirited passage characterizing his critics' views that – according to the official White House transcript – was punctuated three times by laughter. His "good friends who are opposed to this trade agreement," he said, are making an argument "that doesn't make any sense." It's vintage Obama, getting his loyalists fired up by characterizing the other side of an argument with a little snark. "When I ask them specifically what is it that you oppose," the president said, "they start talking about NAFTA. (Laughter.)" The "they" are usually Republicans in these types of presidential riffs. This time, though, they include Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Martin O'Malley, and Sen. Bernie Sanders. All of which increases the pressure on Clinton, who's been noncommittal on trade questions since launching her candidacy two weeks ago. And the president's lines about fixing NAFTA, which Obama reminded the audience was passed when he had "just come out of law school"? That's got to be a special kind of grating on Clinton-era ears.

THIS WEEK ON 'THIS WEEK': Sunday on "This Week," author Peter Schweizer discusses his new book, "Clinton Cash." And the powerhouse roundtable debates all the week's politics, with Democratic strategist and ABC News contributor Donna Brazile, CNN political commentator and former House speaker Newt Gingrich, and Mark Halperin and John Heilemann, managing editors of Bloomberg Politics and hosts of "With All Due Respect." Check the "This Week" page for full guest listings. Be sure to use #ThisWeek when you tweet about the program. TUNE IN SUNDAY: http://abcnews.go.com/thisweek

IN THE NOTE'S INBOX

RICK SANTORUM, FOSTER FRIESS, MAJOR DONORS GO GOLFING. Likely presidential candidate Rick Santorum and some of his top -- and most deep-pocketed – supporters gathered in Scottsdale, Arizona yesterday for a luncheon and golf outing. An aide to Santorum tells The Note: "Over 25 major Republican and conservative donors from nearly a dozen states were in attendance, where they heard from Santorum, senior political advisors to the Senator, and Friess regarding the status of a potential 2016 run. The topics discussed included political updates, strategic plans, and finance plans. Following a strategy luncheon, participants took part in a golf outing with Santorum and Friess."

THE BUZZ

with ABC's VERONICA STRACQUALURSI

OBAMA: 'I TAKE FULL RESPONSIBILITY' FOR US OPERATION THAT KILLED INNOCENT HOSTAGES HELD BY AL QAEDA. President Obama said Thursday that he takes "full responsibility" for a U.S. government counterterrorism operation that killed two innocent hostages held by al Qaeda. Dr. Warren Weinstein, an American held by the terror group since 2011, and Giovanni Lo Porto, an Italian national who had been an al Qaeda hostage since 2012, were "accidentally" killed in a U.S. operation in January, the president acknowledged. "I want to express our grief and condolences for the families of two hostages," Obama said from the White House briefing room, noting that at the time, the U.S. believed no civilians were present at the operation site, ABC's ERIN DOOLEY and LUIS MARTINEZ write. http://abcn.ws/1bluXZf

--BOEHNER: 'WE NEED ALL THE FACTS.' House Speaker John Boehner expressed condolences to the families of Weinstein and Lo Porto, emphasizing that he believes the independent review that the president announced “is entirely appropriate." "As President Obama indicated, this is not a time for excuses," Boehner said. "We need all the facts, for the families and so that we can make sure that nothing like this ever happens again in our efforts to keep Americans safe." Boehner said he has not spoken personally to President Obama about the killed Americans, although he said he was "notified prior to the public disclosure of this," ABC's JOHN PARKINSON notes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--WARREN WEINSTEIN'S CONGRESSMAN WANTS 'HOSTAGE CZAR.' The congressman who represents the family of slain American Dr. Warren Weinstein in the House of Representatives is crafting legislation to create a "hostage czar" who would be empowered to cut through bureaucracy in order to maximize the capabilities of the U.S. government to deal with hostage situations. "There should be no tolerance for a bureaucracy when it comes to dealing with an American held overseas," Rep. John Delaney, D-Maryland, told ABC News in an interview in his office Thursday, ABC's JOHN PARKINSON reports. http://abcn.ws/1yYm2YJ

SENATE CONFIRMS LORETTA LYNCH AS ATTORNEY GENERAL -- 166 DAYS AFTER NOMINATION. The Senate narrowly confirmed Loretta Lynch as the next attorney general Thursday, 166 days after she was first nominated for the post. The Senate approved Lynch's nomination with a vote of 56 to 43. After her confirmation, President Obama said "America will be better off for it." Lynch, a North Carolina native who serves as a U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York, will be the first African-American woman to serve as attorney general, ABC's ARLETTE SAENZ notes. Her confirmation period was the longest of any attorney general nominee in recent history. http://abcn.ws/1JhonBA

OBAMA TRIES SELLING THE TRADE DEAL AS THE ANTI-NAFTA. President Obama went straight into the progressive lions' den Thursday to sell the Pacific trade deal he’s trying to pass: his old campaign organization-turned-advocacy-group, Organizing for Action. His goal was clear: convince the audience at the spring meeting that this is the best possible trade negotiation, with stringent labor and environment requirements built in. Boiled down: it isn't the North American Free Trade Agreement, ABC's ALI WEINBERG writes. "I've been listening to this debate, I've got some good friends who are opposed to this trade agreement but when I ask specifically what you oppose, they start talking about NAFTA," he said. "And I'm thinking, well I had just come out of law school when NAFTA was passed! That's not the trade agreement I'm passing!" Labor unions and other progressives remain opposed to the Bill Clinton-brokered North American Free Trade Agreement because they say it stole U.S. jobs, furthered income inequality and widened the trade deficit with Mexico and Canada.

WHAT WE’RE WATCHING

RONALD REAGAN IN THE NUDE: A FORMER WHITE HOUSE USHER TELLS ALL. Skip Allen was new to being a White House usher for President Ronald Reagan when it fell to him to deliver a top-secret document to the commander in chief in the private residence. While the document was designated "for the President's eyes only," Allen would end up seeing more than he bargained for that day in 1981: a naked president. "I took it up, and I'm looking for him, and the steward comes out and says, 'He's in there.' So I went over and knocked on the door and he said, 'Come in,'" Allen recalled Reagan saying in an interview with ABC's JONATHAN KARL. "And there he was getting out of the shower." Allen remembers a much less friendly rapport with the Clinton's, calling their transition to the White House the most difficult of his time as usher from 1979 to 2004, ABC's JORDYN PHELPS writes. WATCH: http://abcn.ws/1INV463

IN CASE YOU MISSED IT

OBAMA MAKES FUN OF DEFLATE-GATE. President Obama couldn't help himself as he honored the Super Bowl champion New England Patriots yesterday, poking fun at their “deflate-gate” controversy. "I usually tell a bunch of jokes at these events, but with the Patriots in town, I was worried that 11 out of 12 of them would fall flat,” Obama said at a White House ceremony. The joke was met with groans from the crowd on the South Lawn, ABC's MARY BRUCE notes. "That whole story got blown a little out of proportion," he added. The president went on to laud the Patriots, saying "even in the midst of a huge distraction during the biggest media circus of the sports year, they stayed focused."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WHO'S TWEETING?

@Creativity_Con : Watch the 2015 #CreativityCon live, starting today at 9am ET: http://thecreativityconference.com

@amyewalter: So much happening in WH 16 - so little of it matters. Focus on these fundamentals instead http://cookpolitical.com/story/8384

@jackshafer: "Former Pres. George W. Bush's typical speaking fee is apparently $110,000." Nonprofit Quarterly 2014 http://bit.ly/1yYg9uG

@alexis_levinson: A new year, a new video about Boehner's love affair with his lawn mower. https://www.youtube.com/watch?Source=GovD&v=hWdfb_YfePk ...

@matthewjdowd: Fabulous Friday! i realize open-mindedness is the path way to truth, joy, and fulfillment. allowing people, purpose, plans to change me.

--
Josh Schwerin
Cell: 518-369-5469

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Andrew Schwartz" <externalrelations@csis.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/13/2014 1:47:44 PM
Subject: CSIS Releases 2015 Global Forecast: Crisis and Opportunity

To ensure receipt of our email, please add us to your address book.

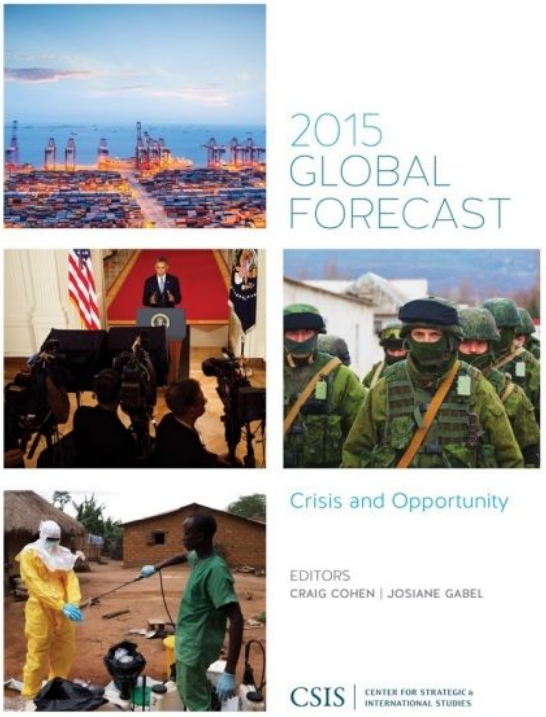
CSIS | CENTER FOR STRATEGIC & INTERNATIONAL STUDIES

Web Flash

H. ANDREW SCHWARTZ 202-775-3242 ASCHWARTZ@CSIS.ORG

CSIS Releases
2015 Global Forecast: Crisis and Opportunity

The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) today releases Global Forecast 2015, an annual CSIS signature publication providing analysis of the key issues that will determine the future trajectory of American power in 2015 and beyond.



CSIS explores the questions:

- What role will deterrence play in America's national security strategy?

- What are the implications of Putin's New Russia?

- How can the United States best exert influence in today's Middle East?

- Is the rebalance to Asia sustainable?

- Is a competing economic order emerging?

- Will Ebola evolve from a health crisis to an economic and governance crisis?

This volume includes contributions from a cross-section of CSIS's top scholars about the main security challenges and opportunities likely to arise in 2015.

Read the report here

1616 RHODE ISLAND AVENUE NW, WASHINGTON, DC 20036 (202) 887.0200 / WWW.CSIS.ORG

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If you prefer to unsubscribe from future CSIS emails, please click here .

If you would prefer not to receive emails from us, go here .
Please send any comments about this email to imisadmin@csis.org

Powered By informz

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jacob Roberts" <jacob@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/6/2008 4:55:26 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/06/08

Main Topics: energy, drilling, fully-inflated tires

Summary: GOA shows the Iraqi government could have $79M budget surplus at year's end. Federal officials set to reveal possible motive behind the 2001 anthrax attacks. President Bush expresses hope N Korea will be off the axis of evil soon. Senate Democrats refuse to enter summer recess in order to prevent appointments without their approval while House Republicans refuse to leave because of a drilling bill they'd like to pass. An NRA spy allegedly infiltrated two anti-violence groups. Maryland officials found a Camp David map at the home of a teenager held on firearm charges. MSNBC plays a significant amount of Olympic games. Late in the morning, reports came out that a jury of military officials reached a guilty verdict on the trial of Osama Bin Laden's driver.

Paris Hilton's response to John McCain's 'Celeb' ad continues to grab airtime this morning. Energy is once again the central issue in campaign coverage with a strong emphasis on offshore drilling. Speculation over vice presidential picks is a recurrent subject of stories and panels.

Highlights:

1. Energy
   a. MSNBC: Crist talks about the tone and energy platform of McCain's campaign
   b. FNC: Crist debates Bayh
   c. CNN: Jeanne Moos: McCain does agree with Obama that tire inflation is a good thing

Highlights No YouTube:

1) MSNBC – JOE SCARBOROUGH: 'John McCain had a great story until George [W] Bush became president.'
2) WTTE- FOX-OH: Summary of responses from candidates to Paris Hilton ad followed by, 'Tomorrow McCain will be in Wilmington, OH, tackling DHL's plan to use UPS for air cargo shipping. If that company were to leave, it would cost Ohio 10,000 jobs.'
3) WJBK-FOX-MI: '[…] republican presidential hopeful, John McCain is coming back to Michigan. John McCain is expected to return to the state in less than a week from today for high-priced fundraisers in Birmingham. He was here yesterday for a visit to the Fermi nuclear plant. He called for the construction of 45 new nuclear plants by 2030. He's a supporter of offshore drilling.'

Clips:

Highlight #1

Crist Talks about the Tone and Energy Platform of McCain's Campaign (MSNBC 08/06/08 7:08am)

JOE SCARBOROUGH: [...] You supported [sic] a candidate that went from being concerned about protecting the environment to running around motorcycle events shouting, 'Drill, drill, drill.'

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: It's kind of a change.

SCARBOROUGH: It's kind of a change and we're a little confused. Explain.

BRZEZINSKI: It's a shift.

CHARLIE CRIST: Well, the facts have changed. The reality is Senator McCain has been somebody concerned about the environment for a long time. First guy who really talked to me about climate change.

He is a great leader on these issues. He also understands the importance of how this issue, the rising price oil is affecting the American family and certainly families here, in Florida, too, Joe. When it gets to about $4 a gallon it's a crisis and it's a problem and it's rippling through our entire economy.

So Senator McCain took a leadership position, said we should stop having the moratorium at the federal level and let states decide individually. I know that Senator Bayh is with us this morning. Good morning to you, sir. As a former governor—

EVAN BAYH: Good morning, Charlie.

CRIST: I think he ms he would appreciate—it's good to be with you—probably would appreciate the fact that, you know, state's ought to have that independent right. The tenth amendment gives states those kind of rights. I think Senator McCain is right on this again….

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]

SCARBOROUGH: Charlie Crist, let's talk about the tone of the campaign over the past week. Even John McCain's 96-year-old mother is critical of these ads that have been put out showing Paris Hilton and Britney Spears next to Barack Obama. She says it's silly. Don't you agree?

CRIST: Well, you know, what's wrong with a little humor. I think it's important we not get so intense in this political environment that we lose sight of a little of humor injected into a campaign. You talked about it earlier on the show today, this is an expensive business, unfortunately.

It takes an awful lot of money to get a message out. Look at the brilliance of what the McCain campaign can has been able to achieve. They make a commercial for about $10 and get millions of dollars of exposure.

SCARBOROUGH: Why do they show images of Britney Spears and Paris Hilton? Why is that juxtaposed next to Barack Obama?

CRIST: I think the point they are trying to make is Senator Obama is a very charismatic figure. He's a guy that is a celebrity, a true American celebrity and they are comparing him with other celebrities evidently and making that point, but the question is, is he ready to lead? Does he have the judgment? Does he have the experience to really lead our country?

SCARBOROUGH: All right, but Britney Spears didn't go to Harvard. Britney Spears wasn't a community organizer. Britney Spears isn't a United States Senator. That's a false analogy, isn't it?

CRIST: I don't know if it's a false analogy. I think they are both celebrities. I think that's the only point they are trying to make. I don't think they are trying to match up their resumes together. They are trying to show these people are famous, well-known, are they ready to lead? That's the real question in the presidential campaign.

Governor Crist and Senator Bayh Debate their Candidates Energy Policies on Fox and Friends (FNC 08/06/08 07:18am)
[…]
GRETCHEN CARLSON: Governor Charlie Crist, you would know something about the energy policy. You are one of the states where this is incredibly important, Florida. You obviously support John McCain's stance on this.

CHARLIE CRIST: Senator John McCain, once again, is leading on this issue. It's very important I think to understand that you do need a comprehensive approach. Senator McCain certainly understands that. He talks about the possibility of offshore oil drilling to increase our domestic production of oil so we are not so dependent on foreign oil. When you realize that about 500 to $700 billion a year are being sent to the middle east in order for us to have oil for our vehicles here in America, something has to be done to offset that. Senator McCain understands that, as well as conservation. Using nuclear power. He went to a nuclear plant yesterday in Michigan to make that point.

[…]

CLAYTON MORRIS: Let's go back to Florida and talk more about Florida on this energy issue. Isn't it really an infrastructure issue? […] Offshore drilling there is little infrastructure to get the oil from the water back to the main land. Now that's unlike what's up there in Anwar where you have the pipelines already in there. Isn't it disingenuous so say there can be quick turn around with offshore drilling?

CRIST: Well not from what I hear from people in the industry. What they tell me is they can, instead of in 10 years period of time, within about a year and a half. Remember there is an awful lot of pipelines already hooked up off of Louisiana and Texas. Some of those are not that far from the Florida coast. It's important for me to emphasize this, too. We've talked about it in terms of allowing it but only if it's far enough, safe enough, and clean enough. We have an important tourist industry here in the sunshine state. We want to increase our domestic oil production to help our country, obviously. But we want to do it in way that is smart. And that's what Senator McCain believes in doing. Doing it in a way that is consistent with protecting our environment, protecting our beaches in Florida. It's a beautiful place to come visit. We want to make sure that while were doing that though we do conserve, that we look to solar, wind, nuclear, tide energy. All these things is what we have to do. It has to be all hands on deck with this issue. A crisis, issue number one to voters of my state. When gas hits $4 a gallon it's a crisis point. It affects the price of tourism and food and I have been touring small businesses across the state and it's having an impact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]

BRIAN KILMEADE […] Senator Bayh, will you have a hard time supporting Barack Obama because you've worked so well with John McCain and you supported Senator Hillary Clinton?

EVAN BAYH: No, not at all. Look, I respect John McCain. He is a good man. But he is badly mistaken in embracing many of the Bush policies, particularly the economic policies. And I think John was just wrong when he said the last eight years have been pretty good for us economically and that things are going pretty well today economically. We need a change in Washington, a fundamental change. And I think Barack Obama is best positioned to provide that change.

Jeanne Moos Examines McCain's Tire Gauge Stunt (CNN 08/06/08 06:51am)
ROBERTS: Well when it comes to solving Americas energy problems, John McCain seems to think Barack Obama is full of hot air.

CHETRY: […] The McCain campaign has a brand new weapon to drive the point home.

JEANNE MOOS: Could this be the hiss of the air going out of a political stunt? The tire pressure gauge has become the political prop of the week, as the McCain campaign tries to use it to deflate Senator Obama.

MCCAIN: He suggested that we put air in our tires to save on gas. We're not going to achieve energy independence by inflating our tires. The only thing I've heard him say is that we should inflate our tires.

MOOS: This is what Senator Obama did say as he ticked off things individuals could do to save energy.

OBAMA: Making sure your tires are inflated.

MOOS: Those seven words became what the McCain campaign dubbed, Obama's Energy Plan. Emblazoned on tire pressure gauges they handed out on the press plane. The McCain folks even handed out tire gauges to people lining up for an Obama rally. They're being sold on eBay for 10 bucks. And over and over, Senator McCain used tire inflation to tread on Obama.

MCCAIN: Do you think that's enough to break our dependence on Middle Eastern oil? My opponent doesn't want to drill, he doesn't want nuclear power, he wants you to inflate your tires.

MOOS: Tire pressure, tire pressure! All this talk about tire pressure is raising my blood pressure. There's something wrong with my blood pressure. Hoo Hiss is what columnist Joe Klein is saying.

JOE KLIEN: I think the McCain campaign has some weird idea that you can win a presidential election through mockery.

MOOS: But the Automobile Association of America isn't mocking tire inflation, on a vehicle like this just one tire: So you're about 4lbs under inflated.

MOOS: Can result in this:

AAA EXPERT: So you're losing about 8% of your fuel economy.

MOOS: After several days of Republican spin on the tire issue Obama got tired of it.

BARACK OBAMA: They're going around, they're sending like little tire gauges, making fun of this idea as if this is Barack Obama's energy policy.

MOOS: His actual energy plan fills page after page on his website.

OBAMA: It's like these guys take pride in being ignorant. They think it's funny that they are making fun of something that's actually true.

MOOS: But watch your back, tire gauges can be hazardous. This guy used one to create a pipe to smoke ghanga. And our AAA expert found out it's not just the gauge that's feeling the pressure. [Expert hit in head with camera]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHETRY: By the way the McCain campaign emailed us with a reminder that John McCain did say that he does agree we should keep our tires inflated to the optimum level. He just doesn't think that it's enough to break our dependence on foreign oil. And as we said there are a bunch of these websites like politifect, who say that if your talking plausibility, there is a chance perhaps that if we all were running on optimum tire pressure we could save as much as we could possible get from offshore drilling.

--
Jacob Roberts
PAO
208.420.3470 (c)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/13/2008 10:14:42 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Media Avail in Birmingham, MI 08/13/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately, our tracker was not allowed into this closed event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online streaming video. Below are the notes from our effort.

Big Highlights

- Says that "In the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations"
- Says he "applauds" Bush's remarks on Georgia this morning and steps he called for
- Evades questions on where his hard-line view on Russia came from and whether Lieberman's comments in Teaneck yesterday were too political; says this isn't a time for partisan sniping
- Says he hopes he can make his faith clear at event with Rick Warren

Birmingham, MI: McCain Media Avail 08/13/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Speech Highlights

- Someone shook Cindy's hand too hard and sprained it
- situation in Georgia is perilous
- I'm pleased by Bush's remarks earlier today
- situation is of concern not only to Georgians but to all
- I welcome Sarkozy's visit
- ceasefire agreement omitted
- anyone committing acts of war should be held accountable
- the Baccaru pipleline has been shut down and Tbilisi pipeline is also closed
- US has planned a joint military op w/ Russia - we will now need to review nature of alliances, we need to assess whether it makes sense to continue to have Russia in G8 and consider
- discussion should begin anew on whether to include Georgia and Ukraine in NATO
- situation in Georgia remains fluid and dangerous
- ASAP lieberman and Graham will be travelling to Georgia - I hope other members of Armed Services Committee will seek an assessment - we need to protect independence and frdm of this brave nation

Question & Answer

- 1Q) Do you think there ought to be tightened security for Ukraine, Baltic States?
    - MCCAIN: Yes i do. Most heartening aspect of this has been visit of 5 presidents in this region to Tbilisi. What they ahve in common is having been under thumb of Russai. We need to help them maintain their independence. But I hope this is isolated.

- 2Q) Obama advisor said your comments on situation were initiially aggressive, belligerent and complicating matters - your response? and does your hard position make them less cooperative?
    - MCCAIN: This isn't a time for partisanship or sniping b/t campaigns. It's a time when thousands of innocent are dying or homeless. 2nd, there was another POTUS, Reagan, who spoke strongly about USA's advocacy for democracy adn frdm and he was criticized then.
    - 2nd, I know Saashkivili well, I've been to Georgia. I know that Georgians are suffering. Maybe later we can have a back-and-forht but now we should concentrate on helping situaiton.

- 3Q) [Carl Cameron] Disitnction b/t yourself and Lieberman yesterday in Teaneck. Obama has moral neutrality due to inexperience, vs you was strong and clear. A little political, no?
    - MCCAIN: Whatever we think at the moment that we can all reserve that for a future time. I think judgments will be made about how we handle this situation, the situation in Iraq, and American ppl will judge experience and judgment. There will be a time for that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 4Q) You said heightened security for Baltic states and Poland might be order - what shape might that take?
    - MCCAIN: We need to make sure that our NATO allies are recognized across the world, that in NATO alliance an attack on 1 is an attack on all. But I don't think we're goin gto reignite Cold War here. It's a serious situation, but not a return to nuclear standoffs. I want to have dialogue w/ Russia, I want them to get out of Georgia ASAP. in 21st century, nations don't invade other nations. We will decide later who was right and wrong. But Russian intervention in Georgia was unjustifiable. We need to show solidariyty. Behavior of 21st cnetury is one of respect for sovereignty of nations. That's what I meant.

- 5Q) 1- Do you think Bush's declartion of actions today went far enough? 2- Would you consider using US military force in this situation?
    - MCCAIN: 2nd question--No. 1st question, I applaud Bush's comments this morning and I support the steps he called for. I think we have sent a clear msg. Again, the time is now for all Americans to join together and take necessary actions to bring quick end to this conflict. First step is actual ceasefire, then Russian withdrawal from Georgina territory.

- 6Q) [Peter Hamby] You immediately took aggressive stance toward Russia. Where did these feelings toward Russ come from?
    - MCCAIN: My position toward Putin has been very clear for long time. I've been very concerned about Russian behavior for long time, from forcibly removing businesses in Russia or reducing oil flow to Czech Republic for doing business w / us, Putin's rhetoric, brutality toward Chechnya. Long list. I've advocated Russian cooperation in areas vital to world security, e.g. Iranian continued path to acquisition of nuclear weapons. I've given speeches about this since Putin came to power. This isn't a new stmt on my part. This is a new reaction to clearly aggressive act. In 21st century world shouldn't stand for this behavior. We should work it out peacefully and without loss of life. I have a long record of experience and background and knoweldge vis-a-vis our relations with Russia. Although I was deeply disappointed with Russ behaviour, this is 1 in a series of actions taken by PM Putin that I've objected to for a long time.

- 7Q) Do you also consdier yourself a 'citizen of the world'? In these times of Russia and IRan do you think it's an asset or liability to be citizen of the wrold?
    - MCCAIN: I am a person who has had honor and privilege of serving my country for # of years. I've alwasy put my country first and advocated for close cooperation with our allies. I believe my experience and background leads me to conclusion that USA is still world's leader in many respects and we remain a beacon of hope and liberty for ppl throughout the world incl. ppl of Georgia.

- 8Q) [Voice of America] There is a proposed US-Russia nuclear agrmt hung up in Congress. Brownback says we should reject it. Are you supporting this?
    - MCCAIN: I think Bush did the right thing when we canceled exercises w/ Russia. WE ahve to act in USA's natl security interest. EVen in height of Cold War, we had agreemetns w/ then-USSR in interests of both countries. I'd have to examine this proposal in light of whether it's in USA's security interests going forward. I'm not advocating cutting off relations w/ Russia. I'm not advocating reigniting Cold War. I'm advocating actions that'll make it clear to Russia that there are consequences for violating of norms of internatl behavior. But I will still support proposals/ agrmts b/t our 2 countries and other countries that are in USA's national security interest.

- 9Q) [Moisha, Fox News] You equivocated a bit on Carl's question. Do you think Lieberman's comments last night politicizing the issue were out of line and whether you're calling upon your own surrogates to refrain from that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: This is no time for that. The time is for USA to act united on behalf of Georgian ppl and not do a lot of partisan sniping. When this crisis is resolved--and I hope w/in next 24 hours, Russian troops will be withdrawn and negotiations initiated so there is an agrmt. And I remain concerned on issue of Georgian territorial integrity. So this isn't the time for back-and-forht.

- 10Q) [Detroit News] Parochial question- Proposals in Congress for making loan guarantees - there are # of us who think they're crucial for keeping bankruptcy at bay. Cong. Upton is one working on it. Do you support those proposals?
  - MCCAIN: I have heard most of those proposals. But I've also had mtgs with the Big 3 and they are confident w the new hybrids, w/ flex fuels and other technological advances, which will help auto industry AND create jobs throughout heartland, that they will succeed. So i worry about us predicting failure for auto makers when they're striving mightily--having made agrmts b/t management and labor on health care and pensions -- that they're going toward success thru new tech. I'll consdier proposals to help auto industry, incl. investment in R&D and tax credits for hybrid or flex fuels cars. To predict doom for auto industry is not timely. And it might become a self-fulfilling prophecy

- 11Q) What's your positive message for people in Michigan w/r/t the econ?
  - MCCAIN: We need to give new loans on mortgages. We need nuclear power plants. There will be an enormous market for the new autos and we need to give tax incentives to buy them. We need to give hope and confidence we'll get gov't spending under control.
  - These are tough times in MI. Congress should go back into session.

- 11Q) What are you doing to get the Catholic vote? Do you distinguish between Catholics who practice from those who don't?
  - MCCAIN: We don't distinguish. We're reaching out to all Americans. I have made my position clear on whom I'd submit for the Supreme Court and I advocate for the rights of the unborn.

- 12Q) You said you'd like to reassure countries in the Balkan region. What steps would you take?
  - MCCAIN: They will pay attention to what happens in Georgia. So we should bring about a ceasefire and remove Russian troops. This kind of behavior in the 21st century is unacceptable. We want Russia to behave as a mature nation.

- 13Q) You bring Lieberman with you a lot. Is he a running mate choice?
  - MCCAIN: We don't discuss that nor individuals.

- 14Q) Do you know about Detroit's mayor's issues? Do you think it's an issue for your campaign?
  - MCCAIN: Not enough info.

- 15Q) What msg will you bring to Rick Warren's church?
  - MCCAIN: I look forward to going. I hope I can make my faith clear. It's a way for lots of Americans to make a judgment. I wish Obama would join me so we could answer together.

- 16Q) How'd Cindy hurt herself?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - CINDY MCCAIN: I'll be fine.

- 17Q) Will you accept the debate invitation?
    - MCCAIN: We're in discussions about that. I haven't gotten into much detail on it.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/13/2014 7:06:16 AM
Subject: News Update - August 13

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Wednesday, August 13

Headlines:

- Israel Won't Cooperate with UN Commission of Inquiry
- Lieberman: Israel Must Defeat Hamas
- Opposition to Netanyahu Strengthens After Gaza War
- After Month of Fighting, Gazans Questioning Hamas Decisions
- Hamas Official Says Group Preparing for 'Long Battle'
- IDF to Line Gaza Border with Tunnel Detection Systems
- Month of War Leaves Israel with Tricky Economic Outlook
- Islamic State Seizes More Territory in Syria

Commentary:

- New York Times: "Role in Gaza Talks Signals a Comeback for Abbas"
  - By Isabel Kershner
- Yedioth Ahronoth: "We've Seen This Bad Movie Before"
  - By Aviad Kleinberg

Israel Radio

Israel Won't Cooperate with UN Commission of Inquiry

Israel is expected to form an independent investigative committee for Operation Protective Edge, and will not cooperate with the Schabas commission. The political echelon in Jerusalem is drawing up a plan not to cooperate with the commission of inquiry formed by the UN Human Rights Council, but will form an Israeli investigative committee headed by a retired Supreme Court justice who is held in high regard by the international legal community. This committee will be given a mandate to investigate whether the use of force by IDF forces in the operation was proportional.
See also, "State comptroller to investigate whether Israel violated int'l law during Gaza op" (Ha'aretz)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'aretz

Lieberman: Israel Must Defeat Hamas

Israel must defeat Hamas even at the price of a further escalation of the conflict with Gaza, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said Wednesday, adding that no peace deal is possible until Hamas is vanquished. Speaking to local politicians in the south, Lieberman said Operation Protective Edge must not be halted until Hamas returns the bodies of Israeli soldiers killed in Gaza. He threatened that Israel would assassinate top Hamas leaders if Hamas did not return the bodies.

See also, "Peres tells BBC: World must reinstall Abbas, Palestinian Authority as ruler in Gaza" (Jerusalem Post)

Jerusalem Post

Opposition to Netanyahu Strengthens After Gaza War

Prime Minister Netanyahu was not honest with the people of Israel regarding the fate of the Gaza Strip, opposition leader Herzog said in a speech to residents of Netiv Ha'asara, a moshav on the Gaza border, on Tuesday. Herzog backed Netanyahu throughout Operation Protective Edge, but he has been increasingly critical since IDF troops pulled out last week. "The real victory will only come in a diplomatic agreement and not in any other way," Herzog said. Netanyahu also faced criticism from right-wing MKs inside the Likud ahead of a possible agreement with Hamas to extend ceasefire.

See also, "Opposition leader Isaac Herzog: We must start a political process to create a Palestinian state" (BICOM)

.

Ynet News

After Month of Fighting, Gazans Questioning Hamas Decisions

Gazans are starting to be vocal in their criticism of Hamas, the Washington Post reported Wednesday. Rafaat Shamiya, 40, a resident of Beit Lahiya in northern Gaza, condemned the rocket fire from residential areas, as it inevitably resulted in an IDF reaction. "When they fire from here, Israel repays us with an F-16 airstrike," Shamiya told the newspaper. "We don't have the power to fight the Israeli. While he is sitting in his office in Israel, he can destroy all of Gaza by remote control." Meanwhile, the paper said, other Gazans are criticizing Hamas for not accepting an Egyptian ceasefire proposal after the first week of the IDF operation. "All the people are whispering, 'Why didn't Hamas accept the Egyptian initiative in the beginning of the war when the casualties were still low?' " the Post quoted Palestinian journalist and political analyst Hani Habib as saying.

See also, "As ware with Israel shatters lives, more Gazans questions Hamas decisions" (Washington Post)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

Hamas Official Says Group Preparing for 'Long Battle'

The 72-hour cease-fire is to expire at midnight Wednesday, with Israeli officials unable or unwilling to predict whether it will be extended or the fighting will start anew. Finance Minister Yair Lapid, part of the eight-member security cabinet, said the gaps between Israel and Hamas in indirect talks in Cairo were "wide." Yehya Musa, a senior Hamas official in the Gaza Strip, said his movement was preparing for a "long battle" with Israel. The Palestinians "won't accept humiliation," Musa said, during a pro-Hamas rally in Khan Yunis.

See also, "Amidror: Reoccupation of Gaza 'only military way' to stop rockets" (Jerusalem Post)

Israel Hayom

IDF to Line Gaza Border with Tunnel Detection Systems

Israel is preparing to build a network of sensors to try to detect tunnel building by terrorists along the 68-kilometer (42-mile) Israel-Gaza Strip border, and also plans to place physical obstacles in some of the more sensitive places along the border, a senior military official said Monday. According to the official, the system in question has successfully graduated its initial testing stages and will now be deployed on the ground for an operational trial. Should the trial prove successful, the military would have to invest between 1.5 and 2.5 billion shekels ($430 million to $720 million) in deploying the system along the border. He noted that it could take up to a year for the system to be fully in place and operational. The past few years have seen the Israel Defense Forces test some 700 pilot programs as part of its effort to counter the threat posed by terror tunnels along the southern border.

Reuters

Month of War Leaves Israel with Tricky Economic Outlook

Israel's month-long war with Hamas in Gaza has added fuel to a Palestinian boycott movement and may damage investor sentiment towards Israel at the margins, even if the $250 billion hi-tech economy looks set to emerge largely unscathed. Analysts expect the war to have dented growth and cost several billion dollars - foreign tourism alone fell by 25 percent in July. But Israel has weathered such storms in the past and tends to rebound within a few months, with output expanding at around 3-4 percent a year in recent years. The additional concern this time is that unrest in the West Bank has become more frequent and intense, the threat of a resumption of war in Gaza - the fourth in eight years - is very real, and international criticism of Israel has been loud, particularly in Europe, fuelling those who support a boycott.

.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reuters

Islamic State Seizes More Territory in Syria

Islamic State insurgents have seized several towns and villages from rival Islamist groups in the Syrian province of Aleppo, opening the way for further westward advances. Islamic State's advance in Syria has accelerated since the group seized control of the Iraqi city of Mosul in June, declaring a caliphate in areas under its control in a bid to redraw the borders of the Middle East. Islamic State is tightening its grip over areas of Syria under its control, including the city of Raqqa on the Euphrates river. Raqqa has become Islamic State's Syrian power base.

New York Times – August, 12, 2014

Role in Gaza Talks Signals a Comeback for Abbas

By Isabel Kershner

For months Israel called on President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority to break with Hamas, the Islamic group that controls Gaza, and to dismantle the new government that resulted from the reconciliation agreement.

That April deal scuttled the American-backed Middle East negotiations as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu repeatedly declared, "Whoever chooses the terrorism of Hamas does not want peace."

But Mr. Abbas is making a comeback as a major player in the Egyptian-mediated talks in Cairo to end the latest war in Gaza, and he is emerging as a potential linchpin for Israel, Egypt and Hamas as they seek new and lasting arrangements for that Palestinian coastal enclave.·

Israel has no direct dealings with Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, and Egypt under President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi has turned hostile to the group. So Mr. Netanyahu told reporters here last week that cooperation with the West Bank-based Palestinian Authority was "important" for the reconstruction of Gaza and the flow of humanitarian aid. He praised the authority for helping coordinate the second 72-hour cease-fire, which held for another day on Tuesday. And he has dropped his public condemnations of the Palestinian government.

"Things have changed, don't you agree?" Yair Lapid, Israel's finance minister and the leader of the government's second-largest party, Yesh Atid, said in a telephone interview on Tuesday.

"One of the problems we had with what they called the technocratic government was that everyone felt Hamas was too strong and might take over," Mr. Lapid said. "Hamas has weakened since then, both militarily and policywise."

If Israel had worried before that the Palestinian reconciliation government supported by Hamas was "a tool for Hamas to go to the West Bank, now it can be a tool for bringing the West Bank to Gaza," he added.

Udi Dekel, a former lead Israeli negotiator with the Palestinians who is now a research fellow at the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv, said that most of the Israeli government supported this idea of "turning the reconciliation inside out."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The direction, without saying it loud and clear, is that Israel is reconciling itself to the reconciliation and trying to reap some benefits," Mr. Dekel said.

Evidence of a change in Israeli policy came with the arrival of Ziad Abu Amr, the deputy prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, in Gaza on Tuesday. Mr. Abu Amr said that the Israelis had repeatedly denied him a travel permit from the West Bank during the fighting, but that word came around 10 a.m. that he could enter Gaza through Israel's Erez crossing.

"I hope the Israelis are changing their mind and lifting the ban on the national reconciliation government," he said in an interview. "I think Cairo is having a sobering effect. It's going to bring everyone back to see reality and to be realistic."

Mr. Lapid and other centrist ministers have put forward their own plans in recent days for an ambitious new order, including the restoration of Palestinian Authority control in Gaza. That ended in 2007, when Hamas routed Mr. Abbas's forces, leading to a bitter seven-year schism between the Palestinian factions.

But Mr. Abbas remains politically weak among his people, and few of the Israeli ministers have an immediate prescription for restoring his rule in Gaza, beyond allowing the Palestinian Authority's forces to supervise the Rafah border crossing between Gaza and Egypt. In addition, the fractious Israeli government coalition remains divided on the broader issue of peace and, some critics said, appears to lack any unified vision. The fact that several ministers have put forward plans "means the government has no plan," Mr. Dekel said.

Hamas has demanded the lifting of the economic blockade of Gaza, an expansion of the permitted fishing zone in the Mediterranean, a new seaport, the reconstruction of Gaza's airport and the release of Palestinian prisoners, possibly in exchange for the remains of Israeli soldiers killed in the recent fighting.

Israel backs the idea of an internationally financed reconstruction package for Gaza funneled through Mr. Abbas, to enable supervision and bolster his influence and standing among the Palestinians. Israel also wants measures to prevent Hamas from rearming.

Mr. Lapid's diplomatic initiative calls for an international conference, hosted by Egypt, to include the United States, Europe, Russia, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority, Israel and "moderate Arab states including Saudi Arabia," to work for the demilitarization of Gaza and the return of the Palestinian Authority there.

Mr. Lapid said that the plan was being discussed in the Israeli government and that there had been "some very interesting reactions from the Arab world," though he refused to elaborate. "Everyone understands that the point is not to have some extended cease-fire for Gaza that will collapse in a few months or a year and a half at best. Something deeper needs to be achieved, and so there is a need to get the Arab world involved."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another senior member of Mr. Lapid's party, Yaakov Peri, the government's minister for science and technology, went further, telling The Washington Post this week that the scope of the talks could expand to include a permanent Israeli-Palestinian peace deal based on the Arab Peace Initiative, a plan first proposed in 2002 that offered Israel normalized relations throughout the Arab world.

Tzipi Livni, the justice minister and the government's chief negotiator with the Palestinians, last weekend presented her parameters for talks that include the restoration of the Palestinian Authority in Gaza. Issues like the seaport and airport should be discussed with Mr. Abbas's Palestine Liberation Organization, she said, "as part of a final status agreement." Asked if Mr. Netanyahu had adopted her proposal, she said cryptically, "The principles represent most of my friends in the government."

They presumably do not include Naftali Bennett, the leader of the right-wing Jewish Home party, who said in an interview on Israeli television on Monday that Mr. Abbas was "a partner for terror" and that the idea of a Palestinian state was over. "That line that Abu Mazen is some kind of Mama Teresa — we are deluding ourselves," he said, referring to Mr. Abbas by his popular name.

Avigdor Lieberman, Israel's foreign minister and the leader of the ultranationalist Yisrael Beiteinu party, has called for a "decisive victory over Hamas."

Prof. Efraim Inbar, the director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, said that Israel did not view Mr. Abbas as powerful enough to take over Gaza in practice but that Israel was reluctant to re-invade Gaza. "What Israel wants is quiet at a minimum price," Professor Inbar said. "For now the Egyptians say let him send a few soldiers to Gaza, and we are saying O.K. I don't think it will go beyond that."

Yedioth Ahronoth – August 13, 2014

We've Seen this Bad Movie Before

By Aviad Kleinberg

Ostensibly, the State of Israel's goal is the elimination of Hamas, and the means of obtaining this goal is the use of more and more force, until Hamas yields. But there seems to be confusion here between the means and the end. Israel's true end goal is not the elimination of Hamas—that is a means, at most—but rather to minimize the loss of lives and property damage to its citizens and to improve its standing in the geopolitical arena.

Once this goal has been defined, it appears that the idea of the takeover of Gaza—which is presented by some right wing spokespersons as a victory—becomes a questionable move. The takeover of Gaza and the ongoing control of Gaza will not give Israel greater security, and will certainly not strengthen its international standing. It will entail many losses for Israel and even greater losses for the Palestinians. These will give rise to much greater international opposition than was created by Operation Protective Edge.

But even after the takeover, the problems will not end. It is possible that no more rockets will be fired at Israel, but the number of fatalities among the IDF soldiers will rise dramatically, as shown by the Israeli experience in southern Lebanon. It is also not at all certain that our presence in the Gaza Strip will completely stop the terrorism. After all, we have already been through this story. We have already controlled Gaza, we have killed and have been killed. There is no place that Israel left with a greater sense of relief than Gaza.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The wise, so it is said, learn from others' experience. We should learn from the American experience in Iraq. The Americans did not make do with limited operations like Israel. They went for broke: They occupied all of Iraq and "chopped off the head of the snake" (Saddam Hussein and the Baath Party). The outcome was catastrophic by any measure.

Not only did the American rule lead to great bloodshed and an increase in terrorism in Iraq, but when the Americans left (since they did not want to rule Iraq, only to solve the problem of its "Hamas-like" regime), the entire region went up in flames.

I am aware, of course, of the differences between Iraq and Gaza, but they should not hide the commonalities from us: A military victory without policy (The US completely ignored any non-military aspect of its actions in Iraq, such as strengthening Iran by neutralizing its greatest enemy) is no guarantee of stability. When you enter a swamp, you have to take into account that you will have to stay there and take full responsibility for it for a long time. It is no surprise that the Egyptians do not want to control Gaza. Whoever controls Gaza gains little and pays a great deal.

Hamas is an organization that is fueled by the continuation of the "struggle." It is in Hamas's interest to drag us into using force. It is not deterred by losses. The language of violence and death is Hamas's language. It speaks it well. When we speak this language, it is not weakened, it gains strength. Again and again we are surprised by the fact that painful blows do not destabilize it. The opposite is true.

What can weaken Hamas is to take steps that will throw it off balance, create internal opposition to it or force it to change. The necessary step to take, therefore, is not military but rather diplomatic—to place on the table a serious Israeli offer for ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which will receive Arab and international support.

And why are we incapable of taking such a step? Naftali Bennett tells us that the reason is security. In the name of security they oppose any diplomatic initiative. The opposition is in the best case an expression of conceptual fixation and in the worst case, deception. The reason that Bennett and his friends are opposed to a diplomatic initiative is not Israel's security, but rather preserving the settlements, and specifically preserving the settlement outposts. The State of Israel is clinging to the settlement dream and paying a heavy security and political price. The time has come to wake up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2014 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
To: "Alice Cosgrove" <alice.e.cosgrove@gmail.com>
"Anne Hall" <Anne.Hall@APORTER.COM>
"Bill Antholis" <antholis@virginia.edu>
bill.danvers@gmail.com
"Brian Katulis \(American?? Progress\)" <bkatulis@americanprogress.org>
"Bruce Riedel" <briedel@brookings.edu>
"Carol Browner" <cmbrowner@me.com>
"Carole Hall" <chall@brookings.edu>
"Catherine Whitney" <Catherine.Whitney@skadden.com>
"Chris Roberts" <croberts@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Colin Kahl" <colin.h.kahl@gmail.com>
"Dan Benjamin" <dbenjam61@hotmail.com>
"Daniel?? Silverberg" <danielsilverberg@yahoo.com>
"Denis McDonough" <denis.mcdonough@gmail.com>
"Derek Chollet" <dhchollet@gmail.com>
"Don Gips?? \(don.gips@gmail.com\)" <don.gips@gmail.com>
"Don Kerrick" <donkerrick@gmail.com>
"Eryn Sanders" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
"Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Greg Craig" <gcraig@skadden.com>
"Jacob?? Freedman" <jfreedman@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jake Sullivan?? \(Jake.sullivan@gmail.com\)" <Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Jamie Rubin" <JamesPRubin1960@gmail.com>
"Jan Stewart" <jstewart@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jeff Smith" <jeffrey_smith@aporter.com>
"Jeremy Bash" <jeremybash@gmail.com>
"Jessica Lewis" <lewisje03@yahoo.com>
"Jim Miller - Department of Defense?? \(james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com \)" <james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com>
"Jim O'Brien" <jobrien@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Joanna Nicoletti?? \(info@forwardengagement.org\)" <info@forwardengagement.org>
"Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
"John Norris" <jnorris@americanprogress.org>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Julianne Smith" <julsmi@gmail.com>
"Ken Lieberthal" <klieberthal@brookings.edu>
"Kim Holloway" <kholloway@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Kurt Campbell" <kurtmcampbell@yahoo.com>
"Leon Fuerth" <hdpf@msn.com>
"Maida Stadtler" <mstadtler@apcoworldwide.com>
"Marcel Lettre" <marcel.lettre@gmail.com>
"Mariah Sixkiller?? \(mariah6@gmail.com\)" <mariah6@gmail.com>
"Martin Indyk" <mindyk@brookings.edu>
"Michele Flournoy" <micheleflournoy3@gmail.com>
"Mike?? Morell \(mmorell@beaconglobalstrategies.com\)" <mmorell@beaconglobalstrategies.com>
"Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
"Olivia Beavers" <olb4vt@virginia.edu>
"Pat?? Griffin" <pgriffin@pmj-dc.com>
"philip.gordon \(philip.gordon@verizon.net\)" <philip.gordon@verizon.net>
"Rob Malley" <rmalley555@gmail.com>
"Sharon Burke" <burkese@comcast.net>
"Steve Ricchetti" <sricchetti@cox.net>
"Strobe Talbott" <stalbott@brookings.edu>
"Susan Rice" <ricesusane@aol.com>
"Suzy George" <suzygeorge8@gmail.com>
"Tamara Wittes \(twittes@brookings.edu\)" <twittes@brookings.edu>
"Tara Sonenshine" <tsonenshine@earthlink.net>
"Tim?? Roemer" <tjroemer@gmail.com>
"Tom Daschle" <Tom@DaschleGroup.com>
"Tom Donilon" <tdonilon@gmail.com>
"Tommy Ross" <trossjr@gmail.com>
"Toni Verstandig" <tonigverstandig@gmail.com>
"Toni Verstandig \(tonigverstandig@aol.com\)" <tonigverstandig@aol.com>
"Tony Blinken" <ablinken@aol.com>
"Veronica Pollack" <veronica@daschlegroup.com>
"Vikram Singh" <vsingh@americanprogress.org>
"Wendy Sherman" <wendyrsherman@gmail.com>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Date: 1/19/2016 3:16:50 PM
Subject: Tara Sonenshine - "An American journalist finally comes home"

Contributors feed THEHILL.COM
January 18, 2016, 07:30 am
An American journalist finally comes home
By Tara Sonenshine, contributor

20

Getty Images

The release of American journalist Jason Rezaian and four other Americans from imprisonment in Iran caps a frantic week of U.S.-Iranian relations. The roller-coaster ride included the capture by Iran of 10 American sailors on the day of the State of the Union, a clearly staged confession and their quick release, followed by a prisoner swap with clemency for seven Iranians held in the United States and the transfer of Rezaian and the three others to American custody. (Left out of the deal is long-held hostage Robert Levinson.) All of this takes places against the backdrop of a monumental nuclear agreement between the United States and Iran, a historic achievement for the Obama administration. Implementation of the agreement is about to start.

For those of us dedicated to the profession of journalism, this is a huge day. Rezaian has paid a high price for bringing us information from Iran. Having been imprisoned in July 2014, Rezaian has suffered enormously, as have other Americans unfairly held. Unlike Western systems of jurisprudence, Iran's justice system remains shrouded in secrecy. Little information was made public about the charges against Rezaian, the conditions of his imprisonment or his ordeal.

Journalism is hard work. Despite a world of blogs, hashtags, tweets and texts, the real work remains that of honest, genuine, authentic, on-the-ground reporters who risk life and limb to bring us the news. When reporters go missing or die covering stories, we mourn. When reporters are imprisoned or held against their will, we must continue to demand their freedom. In the case of Washington Post correspondent Rezaian, our pleas have been heard.

Years ago, I worked on the campaign to free another American from Iran: Haleh Esfandiari, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars. In 2007, Haleh was interrogated for almost eight months, spending nearly four of them in the same notorious prison where Rezaian was held. Like Rezaian, Esfandiari had family roots in both Iran and the United States. Her release came about because of both public pressure and private pressure. The same is true for Rezaian.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is easy to take for granted the freedoms that we in the United States enjoy, and the risks that others take in leaving these shores — especially when the mission is to keep us educated and aware of life in other lands. The right to be informed is a fundamental right of all citizens and without credible, independent reporting, that right is denied to citizens. We must continue to fight for journalists and for open media, the building blocks of open societies.

For Rezaian's family, the next few days and weeks will be filled with joy at his release and sadness for the precious months of his life unnecessarily lost. The adjustment to regular life will be hard. For those of us who have benefitted from his work, and watched this sad saga, we say thank you, and welcome home.

Sonenshine is former under secretary of State for public diplomacy and public affairs. She is currently based at George Washington University's School of Media and Public Affairs

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Wilson Center" <wwics@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 9/23/2015 3:40:24 AM
Subject: Invitation: Georgian President Giorgi Margvelashvili to speak at the Wilson Center

To view this email as a web page, click here

Director's Forum

Wilson Center

A Conversation with the President of Georgia Giorgi Margvelashvili

Georgia is Europe's gateway between the East and the West. It lies at the heart of a region rapidly changing—Russia, Turkey, Iran, Central Asia. An aspirant to EU and NATO, Georgia's soldiers have fought in Iraq and Afghanistan as America's allies. Its democracy has developed against the odds in a neighborhood where power is often exercised without popular consent. How will the strategic realignments underway in Eurasia affect Georgia? Is Georgia's embrace of the West enduring, and what path links Georgia's future to Europe and America? How can the US benefit from Georgia's further Western integration?

His Excellency the President of Georgia Giorgi Margvelashvili will discuss these issues with the Honorable Jane Harman, Director, President, and CEO of the Wilson Center, and then take your questions, at the Wilson Center on Thursday, October 1 at 11:00am.

RSVP NOW » Forward to a Friend

RSVP NOW

Thursday, October 1, 2015
11:00am-12:00pm

6th floor Flom Auditorium

Directions

Wilson Center
Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza
1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW
Washington, D.C. 20004

Phone: 202.691.4000

wwics@wilsoncenter.org

Privacy Policy

© Copyright 2015, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Eleni Kounalakis" <kounalakiset@gmail.com>
"Laura Rosenberger" <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 3/10/2016 7:27:28 AM
Subject: Re: Today's Greek Community Call

I like the idea.

On Thursday, March 10, 2016, Eleni Kounalakis <kounalakiset@gmail.com > wrote:

> Laura -
>
> We had a terrific call today with John Podesta and Governor Dukakis and the Greek American community. Some participants are asking for a position paper/memo on where Secretary stands on some key issues.
>
> I've been leading the EU/Russia sub-group effort on the migration crisis, so I have a good idea of how you are formatting the framing memos. This would be a little different, but would you let me take a crack at a 1 pager on issues important to the community, that they can use with their networks?
>
> We would also like to let call participants know that something is coming, if that works for you.
>
> Thanks and hope to hear back soon. Eleni
>
> Ambassador Eleni Kounalakis
> 2500 Steiner Street #9
> San Francisco, CA 94115
> KounalakisET@gmail.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Evelyn Farkas" <efarkas@aol.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 2/21/2016 11:53:15 AM
Subject: Re: Following up from Tony's brunch - Ethnic surrogate work for HRC Sounds great. Thanks.

Sent from my iPhone

On Feb 21, 2016, at 6:27 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Thanks Evelyn. Good seeing you and we will follow up in the next few days.
>
> On Sunday, February 21, 2016, <efarkas@aol.com > wrote:
>
> > John,
> > As I mentioned, as a second-generation (parents came here in '56) Hungarian-American, I'd love to do surrogate work for HRC with the ethnic Eastern European communities, in addition to the foreign policy work with Jake and Laura.
> >
> > Let me know what I need to do to get it going. As of now I have trips planned to give lectures in the spring in Newport, RI and Seattle and London next week (I did participate in a Munich fundraiser with Melanne V. the week before last and could do something like that again.) I also do a lot of media, mainly right now on Russia and the Middle East -- Amanpour probably next Monday, BBC radio tomorrow am.
> >
> > Attached is more info about me than you could ever need! - Evelyn

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/6/2015 5:26:26 PM
Subject: New News! (11/06/2015)

---

de·moc·ra·cy
di-ˈmä-krə-sē

noun - a system of government by the whole population or all the eligible members of a state, typically through elected representatives.

Week ending November 6, 2015

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

---

- Flight recorders point to bomb attack; Russia suspends Egypt flights
- Obama rejects Keystone XL pipeline
- Rubio gains in the polls, donations, becomes a target for rivals
- Yellen suggests December Fed rate hike more likely
- Turkey's Erdogan holds onto power amid regional crises

Polls

Bush free falling in new Quinnipiac national poll: Trump 24%, Carson 23%, Rubio 14%, Cruz 13%, Bush 4%. "In... September,... Bush earned 10%... [This week] in terms of favorability, no one polled lower than Bush. Just 25%... said they had a positive opinion of him, while 58% said they had a negative one." Nick Gass, Politico [More] Quinnipiac [Poll]

New Hampshire: Hillary Clinton leads 48% to 45% over Bernie Sanders: Sanders retains his sizable advantage among registered independents and new voters, men, and younger voters. Clinton has made significant gains in the past two months with registered Democrats, women, and older voters." Monmouth University [Poll]

2016 Campaign

Rubio rises, becomes a target for GOP rivals: Sensing a threat, Trump and Bush sense attack Rubio's finances and missed votes. Jenna Johnson and Sean Sullivan, Washington Post [More]

Red States getting redder? Off-year elections reveal a 2016 map with sharper borders: "As the parties head into a new presidential year, the country's partisan divide has deepened. Republicans walked away from Tuesday with the big wins. Democrats walked away with fresh confidence that their map can win a third presidential election in a row." David Weigel, Washington Post [More]

Paul Singer declares his support for Marco Rubio:.Singer raised more than $3 million in hard money for Romney in 2012 (primary and general) and plans to do much more for Rubio. Mike Allen, Politico [More]

Backlash to culture wars? Houston voters reject anti-discrimination ordinance: "A yearlong battle over gay and transgender rights that turned into a costly, ugly war of words between this city's lesbian mayor and social conservatives ended Tuesday as voters easily repealed an anti-discrimination ordinance...The measure failed by a vote of 61% to 39%." Manny Fernandez and Mitch Smith, New York Times [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP win in Kentucky sets up unprecedented Affordable Care Act fight: "In polls, Kentucky voters rejected Obamacare at roughly the rate they rejected the president, 2-1. But they were fond of KYnect, which [Governor] Beshear created by executive order, bypassing a gridlocked Kentucky legislature. Month by month, Kentuckians took advantage of the state's Medicaid expansion or the plans offered on the exchange, and the state's uninsured rate plummeted from 20.4 percent to 9 percent." David Weigel, Washington Post [More]

The decline of the swing voter: According to new research by political scientist Corwin Smidt, "The percentage of floating voters has declined from a high of 15% to 5 %. Meanwhile, the consistent partisans... have become more prevalent...One implication, is that American voters should be less responsive to election-year forces, like shifts in the economy or other important events. Another is that politicians have less incentive to appeal to swing voters and more incentive to appeal to their loyal supporters." John Sides, Washington Post [More]

The Economy

Fed's Yellen hints at raised interest rates in December: "The Fed expects that the economy will continue to grow at a pace sufficient to generate further improvements in the labor market and to return inflation to our 2% target over the medium term, and if the incoming information supports that expectation, then…'December would be a live possibility'," Janet Yellen, Chair of the Fed." Ben Leubsdorf, Wall Street Journal [More]

Kenneth Rogoff (TCG Speaker) argues for waiting on Fed hike: "Personally, I would probably err on the side of waiting longer and accept the very high risk that, when inflation does rise, it will do so briskly, requiring a steeper path of interest-rate hikes later. The case for waiting is that we really have no idea of what the equilibrium real (inflation-adjusted) policy interest rate is right now, and as such, need a clear signal on price growth before moving." Kenneth Rogoff, Op-Ed, Project Syndicate [More]

Stronger-than-expected jobs report: The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that nonfarm payrolls rose by a seasonally adjusted 271,000 jobs in October. It was well ahead of expectations of 183,000 jobs added. Wall Street Journal [More]

"How's the economy doing?" is not the right question: "We've got two economic problems: slack and distribution...If the private sector won't generate the economic activity we need, the public sector must pick up the slack, as it were. Infrastructure investment in our deteriorating stock of public goods, direct job creation in places where jobs are nowhere to be seen even at low unemployment, quality pre-K for all 3-4 year-olds— all are great investment targets that I suspect would lower slack, raise the speed limit and improve distributional outcomes...None will happen because of political constraints." Jared Bernstein, Op-Ed, Washington Post [More]

Foreign Affairs/National Security

Russian plane crash result of a bomb; Putin suspends flights to Egypt: "President Vladimir Putin made the announcement after UK investigators said they believed a bomb was put in the plane's hold prior to take-off, killing all 224 people on board... Militants linked to the Islamic State group say they downed the plane." BBC News [More]

John Kerry seeks to check Russia's influence in Central Asia: "Secretary of State John Kerry, (TCG Speaker) is seeking to boost trade and security ties with countries at risk of falling further under the sway of the Kremlin. Russian President Vladimir Putin has increasingly sought to rally the former Soviet states of the region behind a Moscow push to fight the Islamic State and other Islamist militant groups that are spreading their influence across the Middle East and Central Asia. Mr. Kerry stressed that these countries didn't need to fall into a Russian bloc in order to fight the shared threat of the Islamic State." Jay Solomon, Wall Street Journal [More]

Despite new impetus, differences thwart Israeli-Palestinian peace effort: "[Recent]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

violence...has created a new impetus to revive a political process between the two sides...but there is no international agreement on what approach to adopt...New Zealand is circulating a draft resolution that backs having a period of confidence-building efforts to improve the situation but also seeks more politically challenging moves such as an Israeli settlement freeze and a Palestinian commitment to steer clear of new cases at the International Criminal Court. Rory Jones and Laurence Norman, Wall Street Journal [More]

Erdogan wins election in Turkey: The victory will ensure his continued dominance of Turkish politics after months of political turmoil and violence. "The result will permit Mr. Erdogan to remain the country's pre-eminent political figure while pushing the boundaries of the constitutional limits of the presidency, a largely ceremonial role." Tim Arango and Ceylan Yeginsun, New York Times [More]

Obama finalizing plan to close Guantanamo: "A political impasse over the Guantánamo prison appears increasingly likely to force [President Obama] to choose between two politically unsavory options: Invoke executive power to relocate the remaining detainees in defiance of a statute, or allow history to say he never fulfilled his promise to shutter the prison." Charlie Savage, New York Times [More]

World's mass migration crisis may get worse: "There are more displaced people and refugees now than at any other time in recorded history — 60 million in all...The most striking thing about the current migration crisis, however, is how much bigger it could still get." Rod Nordland, New York Times [More]

Transitional leadership and political solution needed for Syria: "What Syria needs is a broad-based transitional coalition government which maintains institutions - learning from missteps in Iraq- and takes more measured, gradual steps towards democratic change - learning from missteps in Egypt. Stability and security in Syria are in the United States' national interest...Removing Bashar al-Assad and installing Rifaat al-Assad (TCG Speaker) as interim president...provides the best circumstances for achieving this outcome." David Avital (TCG Member) and Marc Engberg, Op-Ed, American Diplomacy [More]

How the Syrian conflict could get even bigger and bloodier: Is Syria turning into a proxy war? "President Obama is sending fewer than 50 Special Operations forces to Syria, but make no mistake, this is a significant commitment. The U.S. troops will need air support — not just to bomb the Islamic State, but for resupply, rescue if they get in trouble, and perhaps to enable the cycle of intelligence-driven "night raids " that was so devastating in Iraq. David Ignatius, Op-Ed, Washington Post [More]

American airstrikes targeted what was "probably the largest" al-Qaeda training camp found in the 14-year Afghan war: The multi-day operation in southern Afghanistan involved 200 Special Operations forces and scores of airstrikes...Some 160 al-Qaeda fighters were reported killed." Dan Lamothe, Washington Post [More]

New data shows China burns more coal than reported, complicating climate talks: "China, the world's leading emitter of greenhouse gases from coal, has been burning up to 17% more coal a year than the government previously disclosed... Even for a country of China's size, the scale of the correction is immense." Chris Buckley, New York Times [More]

Leaders of China and Taiwan scheduled to meet for the first time: The formulation reflects China's insistence that Taiwan and the mainland are part of a single Chinese nation, but it also affords both leaders equal status, possibly an attempt to blunt criticism in Taiwan that Ma Ying-jeou is pandering to China." Simon Denyer, Washington Post [More]

Domestic Affairs

Obama rejects Keystone XL pipeline: "'Keystone has had an "over-inflated role in our political discourse' and the project's potential to create jobs and the potential environmental threats were exaggerated. Secretary of State John Kerry concluded the controversial project is not in the country's national security interest." Elise Labott and Dan Berman, CNN [More]

Ryan says he won't work with Obama on immigration reform: The new Speaker of the House's statement effectively pushed the issue off until at least 2017. Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary, described the speaker's stance as "a source of deep disappointment." Nicholas Fando, New York Times [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The House passes $325 billion transportation bill: The debate tested new Speaker Paul Ryan's promise for a more egalitarian and participatory legislative process in the House. "The bill calls for spending $261 billion on highways and $55 billion on transit over six years." Keith Lang, The Hill [More]

Bill Gates on the private sector's role in combatting climate change: Gates expressed his willingness to pledge $2 billion to further climate change efforts, and encouraged other figures of wealth to do the same. Gates said: "Yes, the government will be somewhat inept… But the private sector is in general inept. How many companies do venture capitalists invest in that go poorly? By far most of them." James Bennet, The Atlantic [More]

Books & Film

Ben Bernanke: The Courage to Act: A Memoir of a Crisis and its Aftermath: Bernanke's memoir of the crisis and Great Recession is "essential reading" according to the New York Times

Jon Meacham (TCG speaker): "Destiny and Power: The American Odyssey of George Herbert Walker Bush." "Bush has finally broken his public silence ... issuing scathing critiques of Vice President Dick Cheney (TCG Speaker) and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld" Peter Baker, New York Times [More]

Truth*: The doc depicts the 60 Minutes' 2004 investigation into President George W. Bush's service record in the Texas Air National Guard during the Vietnam War. Jeff Labrecque, Entertainment Weekly [More]

In Memoriam - Fred Thompson: A former U.S. senator, actor and Republican presidential candidate, died on Sunday in Nashville. He was 73.

UPCOMING EVENTS:

Congressman Joseph P. Kennedy III

Monday, November 9, 2015

Lunch & remarks: 12:00-1:30pm

Executive Members only.

Limited seating available. Please register by Monday, November 2nd, 2015.

RSVP

Ambassador Melanne Verveer
Empowering Half the World

Wednesday, December 9, 2015

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

The Rt. Honorable David Miliband
Fallout: Ramifications of the Great Refugee Crisis

Wednesday, January 27, 2016

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff: Isabelle Lehner, Isaac Getlan, and our interns, Tracey Pennito, Justin Vacura, and Samar Nadi.

Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 2/13/2015 2:48:05 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday February 13, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Monday February 13, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

New York Times opinion: Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bill Frist: "Save the Children's Insurance"

"No child in America should be denied the chance to see a doctor when he or she needs one — but if Congress doesn't act soon, that's exactly what might happen."

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Hillary calls for extending CHIP funding"

"The op-ed also marks the second time in as many weeks that Clinton has jumped into a healthcare debate."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton Consults Experts to Chart Foreign-Policy Agenda"

"The major takeaway from these private talks is that she wants a strategy more suited to shaping conditions overseas, as opposed to reacting to events as they arise, people familiar with the meetings said."

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton's Play for Pennsylvania"

"Pennsylvania is a geographically and demographically diverse state—and how Clinton fares there among the state's electorate will be an indication of her ability to shape a winning national coalition."

Politico: "Who's going to win Iowa and N.H.? Introducing The POLITICO Caucus"

"The consensus across this group is that Hillary Clinton is almost guaranteed to become the Democratic nominee. Only four of 70 who answered guessed that a Democrat other than Clinton will ultimately win their state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Daily Beast: "Progressives: Between Hillary and a Hard Place"

"Without a candidate to get behind, some liberal and labor groups are focusing instead on changing the complexion of the electorate, hoping that Clinton can be pulled to the left by forces on the ground."

BuzzFeed: "Top Latino Donors Warn Clinton: Do Better With Latinos Than Dems Did In Florida, Colorado"

"Unlike the highly competitive Republican landscape, Clinton is expected to be the Democratic nominee — the question for Democratic donors then is less whether they'll support her, and instead, with how much money and what their priorities are. And when it comes to the growing base of Latino donors looking to make their mark, the answer is incorporating Latinos into a campaign in a real way, from the vice presidential selection to the on-the-ground outreach to voters."

Business Insider: "Iowa Republicans are embracing Joe Biden to troll Hillary Clinton"

"Republicans are mocking Hillary Clinton's absence from the 2016 campaign trail by rolling out the red carpet for Vice President Joe Biden."

Articles:

New York Times opinion: Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bill Frist: "Save the Children's Insurance"

By Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bill Frist

February 12, 2015

No child in America should be denied the chance to see a doctor when he or she needs one — but if Congress doesn't act soon, that's exactly what might happen.

For the past 18 years, the Children's Health Insurance Program has provided much-needed coverage to millions of American children. And yet, despite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program. As parents, grandparents and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care.

We may be from different political parties, but both of us have dedicated our careers to supporting the health of children and their families. This shared commitment inspired us to work together in the late 1990s to help create CHIP to address the needs of the two million children whose families make too much money to be covered by Medicaid, but cannot afford private insurance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The resulting program, a compromise between Republicans and Democrats, disburses money to the states but gives them flexibility to tailor how they provide coverage to meet the needs of their own children and families. Some expanded Medicaid; others created separate programs. As a result, the number of uninsured children in America has dropped by half. Children miss less school because of illness or injury, and we've seen a significant decline in childhood mortality.

Today, state governments continue to rely on the program to meet crucial health and budget priorities. It's not surprising that every single governor who responded to a 2014 survey — 39 in all — supported saving CHIP.

Of course, the American health care landscape has changed significantly since CHIP started. Under the Affordable Care Act, many families with children are now receiving financial help to enroll in private health coverage through the new health insurance marketplace. But while it is possible that private, family-wide policies offered by employers and marketplaces may one day render CHIP unnecessary, for now substantial gaps still exist — and too many children can still fall through them.

One specific provision of the Affordable Care Act, often called the "family glitch," has been interpreted to prevent many families from receiving subsidized health coverage in the new marketplace if one parent is offered "affordable coverage" through his or her job. In this case, "affordable" is defined as less than roughly 9.5 percent of household income for that parent to sign up alone — even though the actual cost of available family coverage is far higher. For families affected by this glitch, CHIP may be the only affordable option for making sure their children are covered.

We already know what happens when CHIP is no longer an option for families. According to a recent report from the Georgetown University Health Policy Institute, as many as 14,000 children in Arizona lost their health insurance after 2010, when it became the only state to drop CHIP.

We don't want to see the same thing happen across the country. If CHIP is not reauthorized, more families will be hit with higher costs. As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and much higher out-of-pocket costs, threatening access to needed health services. And because families without adequate insurance often miss out on preventive care and instead receive more expensive treatment in hospital emergency rooms, all of us will be likely to end up paying part of the bill.

While reauthorization is not due until the end of September, Congress needs to act now. With more than four-fifths of state legislatures adjourning by the end of June, lack of action and clarity from Washington by then will make budgeting and planning virtually impossible.

Reauthorizing CHIP for the next four years would cost about $10 billion — an investment in our children that will pay off for decades to come. This is an opportunity to send a message that Washington is still capable of making common-sense progress for American families.

As 2015 unfolds, we know Congress will continue to debate the future of health care reform. We most likely won't see eye to eye about some of the more contentious questions. But one thing everyone should be able to agree on is that our most vulnerable children shouldn't be caught in the crossfire.

This isn't about politics. It's about our kids and our nation's future. What could be more important than that?

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Hillary calls for extending CHIP funding"

By Jesse Byrnes

February 12, 2015, 9:29 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is pushing for Congress to reauthorize the federal government's child healthcare program, lending her support to congressional Democrats looking to keep the program around.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"[D]espite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program," Clinton and former GOP Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) wrote in an op-ed in The New York Times on Thursday.

"As parents, grandparents and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care," the pair added.

Clinton, the presumed 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner, is calling on Congress to extend the Children's Health Insurance Program's (CHIP) funding for the next four years, labeling the approximately $10 billion expense "an investment in our children that will pay off for decades to come."

Senate Democrats have launched their own push to reauthorize the program, signing on as co-sponsors of a bill that would extend funding through 2019. Currently, the program's funding runs out at the end of September. A companion bill was also introduced in the House on Thursday.

The program, which has been around for the better part of two decades, covers about 10 million children. Some Republicans have cast CHIP as duplicative given benefits under ObamaCare, and say additional subsidies and eligibility under Medicaid make the program as unnecessary.

"If CHIP is not reauthorized, more families will be hit with higher costs. As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and much higher out-of-pocket costs, threatening access to needed health services," Clinton and Frist wrote.

"And because families without adequate insurance often miss out on preventive care and instead receive more expensive treatment in hospital emergency rooms, all of us will be likely to end up paying part of the bill," they added.

The op-ed also marks the second time in as many weeks that Clinton has jumped into a healthcare debate. Last week she tweeted that "#vaccineswork" after two possible 2016 Republican contenders, Gov. Chris Christie (N.J.) and Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) suggested that parents should have some choice on whether to immunize their children.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton Consults Experts to Chart Foreign-Policy Agenda"

By Peter Nicholas

February 13, 2015, 6:59 a.m. EST

Voters aren't seeing much of Hillary Clinton these days, leading some Democrats to wonder when their front-runner will enter the 2016 contest. Behind the scenes, she is prepping carefully for the race of her life.

Private meetings that she's held with various foreign-policy experts offer some hints as to how she might part ways with President Barack Obama when it comes to crises in Ukraine, Syria and other global trouble spots. The major takeaway from these private talks is that she wants a strategy more suited to shaping conditions overseas, as opposed to reacting to events as they arise, people familiar with the meetings said.

In these meetings, Mrs. Clinton's habit is to go a round the room, asking questions and taking notes with pad and pen in hand. She has been looking for an analysis of current conditions and possible solutions – but also a more proactive posture, some familiar with the meetings say.

Mr. Obama has seemed flat-footed at times in response to the Islamic State's advances in Syria and Russian President Vladimir Putin's aggressive moves to gain territory in Ukraine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There's a degree of concern that what we're doing oftentimes looks to be reactive in response to what the problem of the moment is — as opposed to what is the strategic approach and what might we be doing differently," said one person familiar with her thinking who requested anonymity.

As Secretary of State during Mr. Obama's first term, Mrs. Clinton played the role of loyal adviser in a foreign-policy apparatus that was run out of the White House; Mr. Obama was the one making the decisions.

It seems clear that if Mrs. Clinton wins the White House she would chart a different path than the one charted during the Obama administration.

In her 2014 book, "Hard Choices," and in various speeches, Mrs. Clinton suggested she would have been more interventionist in Syria in 2012–more willing than the president to arm moderate rebels in hopes of stopping the civil war. She has been unsparing in her criticism of Mr. Putin, likening territorial grabs in Ukraine to Adolph Hitler's aggression before World War II.

"She's much less risk-averse" than Mr. Obama, said Aaron David Miller, vice president of the Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars who has taken part in Mrs. Clinton's foreign-policy briefings.

If she becomes president, Mrs. Clinton might have some latitude to pursue a more activist foreign policy. Context is everything.

Mr. Obama took office at a time when the nation was weary of the Iraq war. His caution suited an electorate that was skeptical of new military engagements. But after eight years of Mr. Obama, the public might be ready for a president who favors a more muscular approach, Mr. Miller said.

A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll last month showed that 56% disapproved of the president's handling of foreign policy, compared to just 37% who favored the job he's doing.

"If she becomes president, her political space on foreign policy will be a reaction to what has been criticized by many as an over-course correction [by Mr. Obama]," Mr. Miller said. "She'll have an easier time of it, I think, than Obama had in this direction."

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton's Play for Pennsylvania"

By Emily Schultheis

February 12, 2015

Democrats face two major demographic challenges in the 2016 presidential campaign. First, can Hillary Clinton, assuming she's the party's nominee, win back the white working-class voters who have drifted toward Republicans in recent years? And second, will she be able to maintain the Democratic coalition that twice elected Barack Obama president—including the sky-high turnout among African-American voters his campaign spurred?

Those questions will be partly answered in Pennsylvania, where Democrats have just announced they're holding their 2016 convention.

As Philadelphia's selection for the 2016 Democratic convention spurs headlines about the symbolism of Independence Hall and the Liberty Bell, the importance of the state goes far beyond that. It's a microcosm of the challenges Democrats face in putting together a winning coalition.

Pennsylvania is the GOP's perennial white whale: Every four years, Republicans puts money and time into a last-minute effort to mine the state's electoral votes—and every time since 1988, they've been unsuccessful. Though it's still early, Democrats and observers in the state say that with Democrats' presidential-year electoral advantages there, there's little chance that dynamic will change this time around.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's a state that has become solidly blue in presidential politics and now, in many ways, is a cornerstone of the Democratic electoral coalition, along with other big states—along with New York, Illinois, and California," said Chris Borick, a veteran Pennsylvania pollster at Muhlenberg College, adding that winning Pennsylvania is "almost a given for Democrats."

A February Quinnipiac poll found Clinton starting out strong in Pennsylvania with high favorability ratings and double-digit leads over all her would-be GOP challengers. Fifty-five percent of the state's voters viewed her favorably, compared with 38 percent who viewed her unfavorably—far better than any of the GOP hopefuls fared. In hypothetical head-to-head matchups, Clinton bested New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie by 11 points (50-39), former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush by 15 points (50-35), Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky by 19 points (53-34), and both former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania by 20 points (54-34).

But Pennsylvania is a geographically and demographically diverse state—and how Clinton fares there among the state's electorate will be an indication of her ability to shape a winning national coalition. Victory for Democrats now largely hinges on the southeastern part of the state, where they need to draw a strong turnout in Philadelphia proper and to win a majority in the four suburban counties (Montgomery, Bucks, Chester, and Delaware) that surround it. At the same time, a significant chunk of the state—the southwestern part near Pittsburgh and the northeastern part surrounding Scranton—is full of white, working-class voters whom Democrats have struggled with in recent years.

Pennsylvania Democratic operatives and observers say Clinton has a track record of connecting better with the state's working-class electorate than Obama did in 2008 and 2012—but that African-American turnout drop-off is certainly a concern. In an interview with BuzzFeed, Obama said he didn't "think any president inherits a coalition," adding that "any candidate has to win over people based on what they stand for, what their message is, what their vision is for the future."

Back in the 2008 Democratic primary, when Clinton defeated Obama by just under 10 points, the former secretary of State did well among exactly those kinds of voters. Exit polls found Clinton ahead of Obama among Pennsylvania's white voters, low- and middle-income voters, and those without a college degree.

"Her father came from Scranton, so she's always had a strong base there in the same way that Joe Biden has," said Charlie Lyons, a veteran Democratic strategist in the state. "And I think she comes out of that area strong, and in the southwest I think she has the potential to come out perhaps even stronger than the president did."

As a surrogate for now-Gov. Tom Wolf in Philadelphia last fall, Clinton came out swinging with what observers say is the closest indication she's given of the kind of message her campaign could have—one heavy on economic fairness, equal pay, and education funding. These are the kinds of issues that play well among both minority voters and working-class whites.

As for African-American voters in Philadelphia, observers in the state say it would be tough for Clinton to match the kind of turnout Obama drew among that demographic—but that the drop-off wouldn't be enough to affect her chances in the state. In 2008, exit polling data showed Obama winning 95 percent of African-American voters in Pennsylvania, compared with just 5 percent for Republican nominee John McCain; even if turnout among that demographic decreases, the margins will likely be similar.

"She clearly has room to build on voters that Obama didn't have—while being challenged to make sure she has the same or close levels of turnout in the Democrat-rich Philadelphia city limits," Borick said.

Even if Pennsylvania seems unlikely to top 2016's list of presidential swing states, it will undoubtedly be home to one of the most competitive Senate campaigns on the map this cycle: the race to unseat GOP Sen. Pat Toomey, who rode into office on the Republican wave of 2010.

And while party conventions rarely have an effect on the presidential electoral outcome in a state, they're known for energizing the party base and drawing attention to in-state candidates—which, for Philadelphia, could have a positive effect on turning the city's African-American voters out to the polls that fall for both Clinton and Toomey's Democratic challenger.

"Pat Toomey is going to be seriously challenged," said Dan Fee, a veteran of both of former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell's gubernatorial campaigns. "This is a year, and this is a race, in which there will be significant turnout in areas that will never vote for Pat Toomey."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "Who's going to win Iowa and N.H.? Introducing The POLITICO Caucus"

By James Hohmann

February 13, 2015, 5:58 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The Walker surge in Iowa, Hillary's Obama problem and other news from Week One of our yearlong insiders' survey from the ground in 2016's first-in-the-nation races.

Most Iowa insiders believe Scott Walker would win their state's caucuses if they were this week.

But they're not this week, and virtually none of the most influential thought leaders in the Hawkeye State believe that the Wisconsin governor will sustain his recent bounce in polls.

This is one of several intriguing findings in the debut survey of The POLITICO Caucus. More than 100 of the most plugged-in activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire have agreed to answer a weekly survey over the next year, which will be published here every Friday. It's a diverse mix of powerful figures from across the political spectrum, including party chairmen, members of Congress, radio hosts and rising stars who command loyal followings.

The insiders are immersed in the nomination battles and their views could be a leading indicator of where the polls are heading. The vast majority of those who are participating are not committed to a candidate yet, though some are playing key roles on the burgeoning campaigns.

The consensus across this group is that Hillary Clinton is almost guaranteed to become the Democratic nominee. Only four of 70 who answered guessed that a Democrat other than Clinton will ultimately win their state.

But there's widespread agreement that the GOP field really is wide open. In New Hampshire, the feeling is that Jeb Bush would win the first-in-the-nation primary if it was this week but that it's premature to call him a frontrunner.

Six in 10 Iowa insiders surveyed believe Walker would win the caucuses if they were this week. But only two of the 32 Iowans who returned questionnaires believe the Wisconsin governor will ultimately prevail. "He will now go through a scrutiny that will determine how prepared he is to sustain this frontrunner status," one Iowa Republican remarked.

Here are the key takeaways from our first weekly survey:

Jeb Bush and Scott Walker are fighting for frontrunner status. But neither has it.

Most Republican insiders answered "no" when asked if there's a GOP frontrunner. The field is stronger than in 2012, and any one from a handful of candidates could emerge as the nominee, they believe.

Walker got a big boost from his breakout speech at an event put on last month by Iowa Rep. Steve King in Des Moines. But the insiders are keenly aware he remains untested outside Wisconsin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush is a bigger media draw, enjoys higher name ID and has access to more money than any other GOP candidate. For these reasons, one New Hampshire Republican said he is the frontrunner “simply by default.”

Others on the right argued that none of these advantages is enough to make Bush a “real” frontrunner the way that Mitt Romney was at this stage in 2012. “It’s too early,” said one of the GOP respondents from New Hampshire. “There’s a lot of kicking of tires yet to happen.”

An Iowa Republican remarked, “This is the most wide open contest I have ever seen.”

The world matters. At least, a surprisingly high number of insiders think 2016 will be a national security election.

Roughly half of those interviewed identified the economy – from stagnant wages to income inequality – as the defining issue of 2016. The next-most cited issue was foreign policy and/or national security, with about a quarter of those surveyed predicting it will drive the debate.

Several insiders mentioned specifically the Islamic State and the Levant, or ISIL.

A nonpartisan academic from Iowa said the use of force directive introduced to Congress by President Barack Obama “automatically moves foreign affairs up on this list for 2016.”

Clinton, as the former Secretary of State, will likely position herself as the candidate with unrivaled foreign policy chops. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who looks increasingly serious about running, is playing up his roles on the Senate intelligence and foreign relations committees.

Rand Paul is winning the GOP ground war. So far.

Hillary Clinton has a built-in, years-in-the-making campaign organization that insiders from both parties agreed is unrivaled. Her 2008 supporters are still with her, and many Obama hands are ready to get on board.

On the Republican side, the majority surveyed in both states said Rand Paul has the most robust organization. His father, Ron, finished third in Iowa and second in New Hampshire in 2012, giving the Kentucky senator a network to build from.

“Paul probably has the best organization at this point, with good management and strong grass roots,” said a New Hampshire Republican. “Others will catch up and level this out though.”

Others in Iowa mentioned retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, who has benefited from an aggressive movement to draft him into the race, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who has been spending a lot of time in the state.

Does being a Bush help or hurt Jeb? Insiders are split.

Most Democrats think George W. Bush would be a serious drag on Jeb in a general election. But Republicans are almost evenly divided about whether the Bush name is more of an asset or a liability for the former governor.

“It is a wash if Jeb gets out and shows he is his own person,” said an uncommitted Iowa Republican.

Another said anyone who doesn’t think it’s a net positive is “nuts” but added, “Bush fatigue is a real issue.”

A New Hampshire Republican called it a “two-edge sword” with the grass roots. Another described it as a “net asset in a primary” and a “net liability in the general."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Rand Paul benefits from his father's network, so does Jeb Bush, wrote another Republican respondent from the Hawkeye State. "On one hand both his Dad and Brother won here," this person said of Bush. "A lot of activists who were a part of those camps will be a great starting point for an organization. But the name brand isn't going to help with conservatives, tea party folks and the liberty crowd."

Clinton could be America's first woman president. And one of its oldest. The pols think age could be a bigger potential problem.

Asked whether the former First Lady's age or gender is more of a possible liability in the campaign, six in 10 picked her age. Only a handful said gender; the rest said neither.

"Mitt Romney and Hillary Clinton are the same age, but that won't stop someone like, say, Rand Paul, whose father ran for president in his mid-70s, from trying to make it a thing," said a New Hampshire Democrat.

An Iowa Democrat said that Clinton's gender will be the bigger issue, "but that won't manifest till the general election." Others called the question absurd.

Several Republicans worried that Clinton's potential to break the ultimate glass ceiling is a big asset and may draw independent women to her candidacy.

Yes, the inside line has Hillary Clinton walking away with the Democratic nod.

Almost no one in either party thinks Clinton won't wind up winning both early states. They may want her to spend time on the ground and insist that she'll have to earn it, but there are few who doubt that she'll win at the end of the day. Clinton finished third in Iowa last time and won an upset in New Hampshire.

"It seems very unlikely that anyone in the primary field as of now could come near her," said an Iowa Democrat. "Nobody sees that changing, and Iowa Democrats are equal parts bored and furious about it."

There are varying opinions about who, if anyone, will emerge as Clinton's main Democratic challenger. Most Democrats said no one. Warren was the most mentioned, followed by former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, ex-Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Just one Democrat mentioned Vice President Joe Biden.

Republicans see Ted Cruz as likeliest to emerge as the social conservative favorite.

Evangelicals picked the last two winners of the Iowa caucuses: Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum. Both are running again, but neither can count on the support they had in 2008 and 2012, respectively. An Iowa Republican predicted that "a firebrand" like the Texas senator is more likely to win over base voters.

Among GOP insiders, twice as many picked Cruz to become the leading social conservative candidate as anyone else. But the field is scattered, with nominations for Santorum, Huckabee, Carson, Walker, Rubio, Bobby Jindal and others.

"I think in the short term it will be Ted Cruz," said an Iowa Republican. "In the long-term I think a guy like Santorum will emerge again because of his ability to weave" his moral beliefs through an array of social and pocketbook issues.

A New Hampshire Republican warned against counting out Huckabee: "It depends on how well a campaign [he] runs."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Political chatter this week is all about Scott Walker not having graduated from college. Does it matter? Our insiders say no.

The question of Walker's lack of a college degree split respondents: A few more said it will hurt than help his prospects. Several of those who thought it would be a plus remarked it could enhance his "regular guy" image.

But very few believe Walker's scholastic deficit will move votes.

"A surprising number of people seem to know Harry Truman pulled it off and the Democratic Party Chair here is also without a college degree and the sky has not fallen," said one New Hampshire Democrat. "The precise circumstances of leaving college—not the fact of no degree—could be more problematic to New Hampshire voters if the circumstances are unsavory."

"I can't wait to see this play out," said an Iowa Democrat. "I will be terribly disappointed if one of his rivals, or a surrogate, does not put their foot in their mouth on this issue. … I think it will make him seem more populist."

Who's a bigger help to Hillary? Both Democrats and Republicans pick Bill Clinton over Obama.

The former president is viewed by both Democrats and Republicans as much more of an asset for Hillary than Obama. Only one of the Democrats surveyed think that he hurts her, although two other Democrats said there are sure to be some moments where he becomes unhelpful – just like in 2008.

All but a handful of Republicans think having Bill Clinton on the campaign trail helps her.

Among 31 Democrats who answered the question, 16 said Obama is an asset, while 7 said he is a liability. The rest said they're either unsure or it depends on what happens overseas and with the economy.

"The President is up and down in New Hampshire like a yo-yo," said a Democrat there.

"They should see him as an asset, but I am not sure that they do," added an Iowa Democrat. "He will win them caucus voters and help solidify her base."

The Daily Beast: "Progressives: Between Hillary and a Hard Place"

By David Freedlander

February 13, 2015

[Subtitle:] Between Hillary and a Hard Place

Elizabeth says she's a no. Bernie is a fighter, but he is also, you know, Bernie. O'Malley doesn't excite, Webb used to be a Republican, and Hillary is, well, a Clinton.

The 2016 presidential primaries are fast approaching. What is a good progressive to do?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a moment when a handful of issues that liberal activists have campaigned on for years, from raising the minimum wage to the growth of corporate power to climate change to criminal justice reform, are entering the mainstream debate—even within the Republican Party—progressives are facing the prospect of being rendered voiceless just as the nation is tuning in to the 2016 presidential primary.

"What progressives are saying is, how are we going to get people out of bed to vote if we don't stand up on the issues that people care about," said Ed Ott, a longtime New York labor leader and a professor of labor studies at the City University of New York. "There is a lot of anger at the Democratic Party. People want to know where they stand."

This strange moment for progressives was crystallized over the weekend when the liberal Working Families Party, which is based in Clinton's home state of New York and which backed her in both of her Senate runs, decided to join liberal groups such as Move On and Democracy for America in supporting a Draft Warren effort.

The move dismayed some progressives. Warren has consistently maintained she isn't running, and fantasies that she will change her mind distract from some more achievable goals, some liberals maintain.

"The whole Warren thing is kind of silly," said Howie Klein, a progressive activist who blogs at the website Down with Tyranny. "If I could pick anybody to run for president it would be her, but she is not going to do it. It started out as a not-bad idea but I think it has gone on long enough."

Without a candidate to get behind, some liberal and labor groups are focusing instead on changing the complexion of the electorate, hoping that Clinton can be pulled to the left by forces on the ground. After a summit on the issue of raising wages (headlined, it should be noted, by Elizabeth Warren) the AFL-CIO announced that they would barnstorm the first four primary states to rally voters around the issue.

The Progressive Change Campaign Committee, meanwhile, is trying to persuade progressive leaders in Iowa and New Hampshire to hold off announcing that they are ready for Hillary until she publicly announces where she stands on key liberal issues such as expanding Social Security and breaking up big banks.

"We really have a one of a kind role at this point, which is being a grassroots force that is working to incentivize all of the Democratic presidential candidates to sound more like Elizabeth Warren," said Adam Green, the group's executive director. "It's a different strategy, but we want Warren's positions to be the mainstream Democratic position."

Although PCCC did not sign on to the Draft Warren effort, Green said that the organizing around it is helping to pull Clinton to the left even without Warren.

"In many ways the prospect of Elizabeth Warren running might be more powerful than the actual candidacy of Elizabeth Warren," Green added. "If she makes no comment about running for president for the next six months there is every incentive in the world for Hillary Clinton to co-opt her message so that Warren doesn't jump in. If Hillary said, 'We should cut Social Security, we don't need to regulate the banks,' I think you would see not just Warren but a lot of people jump in."

A dozen progressive activists, donors and operatives from around the country said much the same thing: their first choice was Warren, and despite her denials, they believe there is still time for her to get into the race, and that she would meet a groundswell of grassroots and fundraising support if she did.

"We are in a conditional situation—if Hillary runs strong [Warren] won't run," said Bob Fertik, a progressive activist and political consultant. "But Hillary could decide not to run, or she could flame out on any given day for any reason—it could be about Bill, it could be a thousand reasons. If that happens then the entire progressive movement would rise up behind Elizabeth Warren."

Most progressives interviewed for this story did not sound particularly enthusiastic about the other Democratic challengers.

On Martin O'Malley, the two-term governor of Maryland who is running cautiously to the left of Clinton, Fertik said, "Nobody has heard of him."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He seems like someone who is running really hard to be vice president. I have no feel for the guy one way or the other,” said Klein.

“I can’t imagine he is going to get traction,” said Robert Borosage, the head of the liberal Campaign for America’s Future.

Bernie Sanders should be the progressive choice. The socialist senator from Vermont rails against the billionaire class, and unlike Warren, has never been wrapped up in the political money game. Which is precisely the problem.

“Unlike Elizabeth, Bernie is actually running for president. What do you think it says about him that we are all trying to get Elizabeth in,” said one person involved in the Draft Warren effort.

“Sanders is extremely progressive,” said Douglas Kahn, who has given more than $100,000 to liberal candidates over the last couple of election cycles. “I would love his ideas and principles to be the platform of the…Party. That is not likely to happen.”

Klein has been raising money for Sanders, but now he thinks the Draft Warren effort has sucked up all of the progressive energy, and he is not certain Sanders will run.

“I think the whole Elizabeth thing has been very disappointing for Bernie.”

Some progressives say they remain curious about the prospect of Webb.

“I think he is going to be stronger than a lot of people think,” said Borosage. “Hillary wants to be to the right of Obama on foreign policy, and that opens up space for [Virginia’s Jim] Webb, especially if we get ensnared in the Ukraine or the Middle East and things go south. There remains a huge anti-war sentiment out there.”

“People have short memories,” responded Klein. “Webb is no lefty. He was to the right of Hillary Clinton on practically every vote.”

Which raises the question: What about Hillary? She after all supports Dodd-Frank, favors a higher minimum wage and has long history of fighting for working families. And all the activists spoken to for this article said they would support her in a general election.

But they also said that at last the public seemed interested in income inequality, and they doubted that Hillary Clinton could carry the torch, especially if she coasted in the primary.

“What this election should be about is the very structure of the economy,” said Borosage. “And where is Hillary when it comes to shackling Wall Street, when it comes to CEO pay, when it comes to unions. She needs a challenge so we can hear these things out.”

Zephyr Teachout, who ran a left-leaning charge against New York Governor Andrew Cuomo in 2014 and who was a key organizer on Howard Dean’s 2004 campaign, said there was plenty of time for someone to emerge, someone perhaps who isn’t being yet discussed in the corridors of Washington D.C.

“The big fear about Hillary Clinton is that she might be a very weak candidate, and that she doesn’t reflect the best interests of a lot of traditional and populists Democrats. I certainly share those fears, but there is plenty of time for a true populist to jump into the race.”

So don’t despair then?

“No! Despair is the ultimate strategy of the neo-liberals, and it doesn’t accomplish anything.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BuzzFeed: "Top Latino Donors Warn Clinton: Do Better With Latinos Than Dems Did In Florida, Colorado"

By Adrian Carrasquillo

February 12, 2015, 3:57 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The donors and fundraisers tell BuzzFeed News Hillary Clinton must set up a real and meaningful operation to reach Latino voters. Other wishes? A Latino vice presidential nominee.

A network of top Latino Democratic donors is warning early that Hillary Clinton must correct one of the big mistakes Democrats made in 2014: taking Latino voter turnout for granted.

Unlike the highly competitive Republican landscape, Clinton is expected to be the Democratic nominee — the question for Democratic donors then is less whether they'll support her, and instead, with how much money and what their priorities are. And when it comes to the growing base of Latino donors looking to make their mark, the answer is incorporating Latinos into a campaign in a real way, from the vice presidential selection to the on-the-ground outreach to voters.

"Hillary just needs to look at Colorado and Florida," said Andrés W. López, a lawyer from Puerto Rico and co-founder of the Futuro Fund, referencing the losses of Charlie Crist and former Sen. Mark Udall. "They're prime examples of how you don't succeed. It's essentially squandering opportunity and neglecting the Latino community, doing the same basic things you did before, which is an endless source of frustration for us."

The Futuro Fund was one of the major Democratic fundraising success stories of 2012; led prominently by Eva Longoria and Henry Muñoz, the group raised $32 million for Barack Obama's reelection effort. López, one of the first major Latino donors to join Obama in 2007, individually raised millions which was folded into the Futuro Fund. That effort then begat the Latino Victory Project, a fundraising effort to increase Latino candidates in politics. (The group says they are nonpartisan and are looking for Republicans, but have only supported Democrats.) Muñoz, meanwhile, became the DNC's finance chairman.

The mistakes of last year for Democrats are clear, the donors say, and there were plenty of missed opportunities.

Ralph Patino, a Latino Victory Project board member from Miami, met then-Senator Obama in 2007 at a Marriott in Orlando. Enthralled by Obama, he immediately cut a $35,000 check. He later found out that donation put him in the top 1% of Latino donors in the country. In 2012, he bundled $1 million at his home one night for Obama.

Having worked closely with the Crist campaign, Patino said its inadequate Hispanic voter operation is a reason they lost a race that was decided by a razor-thin 60,000 votes.

"Charlie is a good friend," Patino told BuzzFeed News. "I told them we need to concentrate on the I-4 corridor, from the east to the west, from Orlando all the way across to Tampa. Let's get Eva Longoria involved, let's have rallies. Let's connect to Latinos."

He says the mistake was a common one: having a Latino outreach "appendage" rather than making it a fundamental part of the campaign.

"The guy they put in as the Latino outreach director was very lightweight, extremely lightweight," he said. "You have to have, from the ground up, a Latino organization within your election committee."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sources close to the Latino Victory Project said that as the organization lays out its plans looking ahead to 2016, one major priority has emerged: pushing for a Latino vice presidential nominee.

The president of the Latino Victory Project, Cristóbal Alex, declined to comment.

Julián Castro, the former San Antonio mayor who Obama picked as his current Housing and Urban Development Secretary, is the one most often mentioned as someone Clinton might look at for the position after his keynote speech at the 2012 Democratic National Convention. It was Muñoz who pushed for Castro — whom he called the "future of the Democratic Party, the future of this country" — to give the speech.

But top Latino donors say it's about more than pushing Clinton to choose a Latino running mate.

"You want to always keep your eye on what will essentially be the most high-profile position in the land," López said. "My concern is sometimes we lose sight of the larger issue. We should spend time building a robust pipeline of people for other positions."

He said many like former Treasury Secretary Tim Geithner, who have real power to effect change in the country, joined Obama's administration after spending time in Bill Clinton's administration.

Frank Sánchez, who served in the Clinton and Obama administrations, and bundled $500,000 in 2008 but did not fundraise in 2012 because he was part of the administration, said a Latino running mate would be great but it's not something he's personally pushing for.

"My sense is that if your interest is in having someone win, you don't impose those kinds of demands," he said. "We should give her latitude to pick who makes the most sense for the country and the ticket. Latino candidates should be in the mix though, a few should be on any shortlist."

The donors BuzzFeed News spoke with all echoed López in insisting that Clinton needs to have Latinos on staff, in her inner circle — and were she to win — in appointments and cabinet positions.

"It can't be one of these situations we've seen time and time again where everything is a general market strategy until some genius inside the war room figures out they should reach out to Latino voters and everybody is scurrying to translate haphazardly," said media strategist Freddy Balsera, an early Obama supporter and 2012 bundler who raised $500,000. "It has to be part of the conversation from day one."

Balsera was named in a December New York Times report after the Obama administration overturned a ban on a politically-connected Ecuadorian national entering the country. Her family donated to Democratic campaigns and Balsera employed her and sponsored her visa. The ban was overturned by the State Department, which was under Clinton at the time.

Manuel Sanchez, a Chicago lawyer, who helped raise $8 million for Obama in 2008 and was part of the Futuro Fund in 2012, said he was at the National Council of La Raza event in Obama's first term when he promised to focus on "immigration reform in his first 100 days." Despite Obama's executive actions to protect millions from deportation, he said Clinton can't make the same mistake of not making an immigration overhaul a priority.

"People don't forget that," he said.

"She needs to continue to push for some action on immigration, to say that it's been a disappointment is a gross understatement," Frank Sánchez added.

Balsera said "for a lot of Hispanics the immigration debate is about how accepting you are of this new community."

The donors didn't stop there, imagining a suite of positions Clinton could take along with immigration, including support for Obama's move to normalize relations with Cuba and Puerto Rican statehood, an issue close to the heart of López, who is from the island and frames it as "equality" for Puerto Ricans, which to him, means citizenship.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I don’t want to live in a place where an American can raise millions of dollars and I can’t vote,” he said, noting that the 2020 Census may surprise many who think they know Florida’s demographics.

“People are going to be in shock in about four years when it turns out Puerto Ricans outnumber Cubans in Florida,” he said.

Gone are the days of 2004, Frank Sánchez says, when John Kerry and George W. Bush combined to spend only around $7 million on outreach to Hispanic voters.

“In 2008, Obama spent $22 million by himself,” he said.

And López pointed to the big Clinton-world news this week, when infighting between Priorities USA and other pro-Clinton groups broke out in the public eye.

“There are no top-level Latino names. That’s what we notice, not what everyone else is noticing,” he said. “For the newer folks among us, it’s about how do you change this? It’s about getting inside the room with them and saying, ‘What are you doing to reach Latinos?’ That’s the adult conversation that needs to happen with Hillary’s folks, and it can’t just be all white guys.”

Manuel Sanchez broke down the importance of real-live Latinos having Clinton’s ear.

“At minimum they bring the issue to the fore,” he said, “it doesn’t mean its going to carry the day but if you don’t have the person in the room with the decision makers, in a tight inner circle, then it’s very likely the issue will be ignored.”

Business Insider: “Iowa Republicans are embracing Joe Biden to troll Hillary Clinton”

By Colin Campbell

February 12, 2015

Republicans are mocking Hillary Clinton's absence from the 2016 campaign trail by rolling out the red carpet for Vice President Joe Biden.

Biden, who hasn't ruled out running for president next year, visited Iowa on Thursday for two events on college campuses. The state's GOP reacted to the news by gleefully noting it's been some time since Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, dropped by the key presidential primary state.

"We welcome Vice President Biden to Iowa and are glad he is here to give Iowa voters the time and consideration they deserve," the party's chairman, Jeff Kaufmann, said in a statement.

Meanwhile, co-chair Cody Hoefert accused Clinton of expecting a "coronation" despite coming in third place in Iowa when she last ran for president in 2008.

"Say what you will about Vice President Biden, but at least he’s here," Hoefert said. "While the Republican Party prepares for one of the most vibrant nomination contests in memory, the Democrats are frozen in place waiting for Hillary Clinton’s coronation. Hillary has never had a warm relationship with Iowa voters, and it's clear she doesn't care much to fix it now. I'm confident Iowa voters will remember this in 2016."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's team insists she will fight hard for the state's votes if she launches a bid for the White House. Her campaign is widely viewed as all but certain and polls show she is well ahead of any potential rivals.

"If she runs, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote," Clinton's spokesman Nick Merrill told The Des Moines Register. "Anyone who thinks otherwise should think again."

However, Clinton has had almost no public appearances or media interviews so far this year. In January, she notably held two events but they were paid speaking engagements in Canada. (Clinton has been fiercely criticized for taking sums as high as $300,000 in speaking fees.)

The national Republican Party also recently mocked Clinton for her lack of public events. The party bought a "Hillary's Hiding" billboard in Iowa on Wednesday and even released a fake movie trailer the next day noting she launched her 2008 campaign much earlier:

[VIDEO]

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 3 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton honored by EMILY's List (AP)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to keynote Irish American Hall of Fame (NYT)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/11/2016 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: An Expensive Fight for Russia and Turkey

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | GMFUS.org

An Expensive Fight for Russia and Turkey

Chris Miller — January 12, 2016

WASHINGTON—It was “a stab in the back,” Russian President Vladimir Putin declared. Turkey’s shooting down of the Russian jet over Turkish airspace in late November sparked angry denunciations from Moscow. But rather than “stab in the back,” the more relevant bodily metaphor is “shot in the foot.” For both Russia and Turkey, the spat over the downed plane — and about Syria more generally — is imposing painful economic costs...

FULL ARTICLE

Chris Miller is a Fellow at the Transatlantic Academy, an initiative of the German Marshall Fund of the United States in Washington, DC.

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Markos Kounalakis - Hoover Institution" <kounalakis@gmail.com>
To: John <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 11/19/2015 4:05:04 PM
Subject: New Foreign Affairs Columns War, Peace & Revolution

Markos Kounalakis

Foreign Affairs Columns

Gloria Steinem and the CIA; how sex can save Japan; wildfires and terrorism; the Greek financial crisis; recruiting kids for war...the last six months have been a busy time in the world. Here's my most recent column on giving refugees a fighting chance in the Middle East.

Read my latest columns

Markos Kounalakis, Visiting Fellow, Hoover Institution

Chinese spy games in the USA, virtual reality revives Palmyra, and a rogues' list of global leaders...my columns deal with some of the latest developments in global affairs. The columns appear in The Sacramento Bee and nationwide via the McClatchy-Tribune news service.

I remain a Visiting Fellow at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford University and a Senior Fellow with Central European University in Budapest, Hungary.

Links below to my latest columns:

- Give Middle East refugees a fighting chance
- Adding to America's rogues' list of unsavory but friendly leaders
- The feminist was a spook
- U.N., underwater gas reserves help solve Cyprus split
- Crying lone wolf? Fires used in warfare, terrorism
- Disrupting Islamic State, saving ancient civilization and employing virtual reality
- From living in Loomis to hiding from Chinese agents
- Tunnels here, there, bad and good
- Greece's high-stakes gamble
- Greece's Economy Hangs in Balance After 'Greferendum'
- Filling Greece's ATMs with promises
- Greece today feels like old Soviet Union
- European confederacy slowly dies
- The perverse act of recruiting kids for war
- How sex could save Japan

..and many more columns from 2014 & 2015 at my Hoover Institution homepage .

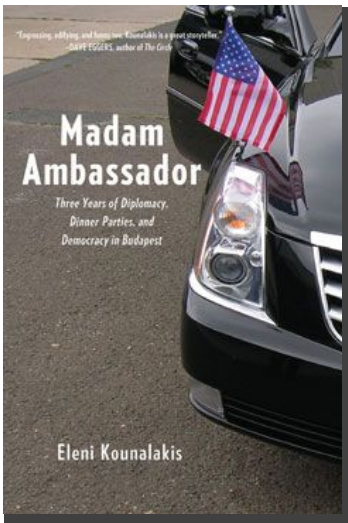
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monument Park, Tallinn, Estonia. Summer 2015.

Thanks for taking the time to read my latest writings. I'll send updates with new columns every so often.

Let me know what you think about these opinion pieces or if you have any thoughts about columns I should pursue in the future.

Thanks again,



Read my wife's book, "Madam Ambassador" , also available in Hungarian .

Read The Washington Post review. Here's an excerpt:

"In her memoir, 'Madam Ambassador,' Kounalakis recounts Hungary's slide into what Orban himself has described as an 'illiberal democracy' inspired by Vladimir Putin's Russia. To her credit, it's a far more forthcoming book — personally and analytically — than one would expect from a diplomat, and it offers further evidence, if anyone still needs it, that the European Union now faces the possibility of an autocracy taking shape within its borders."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PS, Most of you receiving this email have asked to be put on my mailing list. If you want to be taken off, just go to the "unsubscribe" link at the bottom of this email.

Oh, and Happy Thanksgiving!

MEDIA: For media inquiries, please contact Jennifer Mayfield , Director of Media Relations at the Hoover Institution at +1 650-847-7250 .

I also invite you to join me on Facebook , LinkedIn and Google+ , watch my YouTube videos and follow me on Twitter .

Facebook

Twitter

Email

LinkedIn

Copyright © 2015 Markos Kounalakis, All rights reserved.
Mailing address: 916 Kearny Street, San Francisco, CA 94133

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
Hoover Institution · Stanford University · Stanford, CA 94305 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 10/1/2014 12:45:58 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday October 1, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday October 1, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Politico: "Hillary Clinton to appear at Jeanne Shaheen fundraiser"

"Hillary Clinton will headline a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen in New York City on Wednesday, an event being hosted by longtime Clinton friends Ron and Beth Dozoretz, according to an invitation sent to donors."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Clinton to speak at medical device conference"

"Clinton will hold a moderated Q&A with the president of Advanced Medical Technology Association, Stephen Ubl, after her speech, according to a media advisory released Tuesday. "

Bloomberg: "No Hard Feelings as Bill Clinton Subs for Wife at Event"

"Hillary Clinton, who is considering a 2016 Democratic bid for the presidency, has nixed several fundraisers for her party's candidates since her daughter, Chelsea Clinton, gave birth Sept. 26. Political operatives in both parties say that, like Kelly, most donors understand when a politician cancels an appearance at the last minute for exceptional personal or family reasons."

NPR: "Transcript: Sen. Warren's Full NPR Interview On Financial Regulation"

"Should Hillary Clinton address this issue [bank regulation] forcefully? You know, I'd like to see everybody address this issue forcefully. I think it is a very important question, and I'm — I wanna see everybody in on it. Both parties — I think we all should be there."

The Hill blog: In The Know: "ElectHillary.com? RandPaul.com? Betting on 2016's hottest Web address"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Election-year website squatters have dollar signs in their eyes, scooping up 2016-related domain names with the aim of cashing in on six-figure payouts — before any candidate has even thrown his or her hat into the ring."

SouthFlorida.com: "More 'Hard Choices' for Hillary"

"The 3:30 p.m. [Books and Books] signing is expected to draw at least 1,000 visitors…."

Des Moines Register: "Late-night comics joke about Iowa and Hillary"

"The steady stream of potential 2016 presidential candidates visiting the state in recent weeks has caught the attention of comedians and made the state literally a punchline."

Time: "Meet the Clinton Baby's Other Grandparents"

"Even before Charlotte Clinton Mevzinsky headed home from the hospital on Monday, we had seen the first photos of her with her "over the moon" new grandparents, Bill and Hillary Clinton. But where were the machatonim?"

Washington Post blog: The Switch: "Meet Share America, the U.S. State Department's Upworthy clone"

"American diplomats have long tried to win the information game. And under both previous Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and current Secretary John Kerry, the State Department has attempted to identify and even amplify the nuances of an increasingly horizontal world…"

The Daily Beast: "This Is How Eva Longoria Is Trying to Win the Midterms"

Eva Longoria: "I love and adore Hillary [Clinton]…"

Articles:

Politico: "Hillary Clinton to appear at Jeanne Shaheen fundraiser"

By Maggie Haberman

September 30, 2014, 8:10 p.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton will headline a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen in New York City on Wednesday, an event being hosted by longtime Clinton friends Ron and Beth Dozoretz, according to an invitation sent to donors.

The invitation, obtained by POLITICO, shows the event taking place late in the afternoon at the Dozoretz home.

A Clinton spokesman did not respond to an email. A Shaheen spokesman declined to comment. Shaheen (D-N.H.) is battling former Massachusetts Sen. Scott Brown for reelection.

Ron and Beth Dozoretz are old friends of the Clintons, as is Shaheen.

Clinton has canceled a number of appearances this week, following the birth of her granddaughter last Friday. She has primarily kept appearances that are in New York, where her daughter, Chelsea, lives.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Clinton to speak at medical device conference"

By Peter Sullivan

September 30, 2014, 3:08 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton will speak at a medical technology industry conference in Chicago the same day that she campaigns for Illinois Gov. Pat Quinn (D).

The Chicago Sun-Times reported that Clinton will campaign for Quinn on Oct. 8. That is the same day that she has a previously scheduled appearance at the AdvaMed 2014 conference.

The medical decive tax under ObamaCare has been controversial, and Republicans have made repealing it a central part of their platform for next year.

The former secretary of State is often compensated for appearances at conferences such as these and has faced criticism for her speaking fees.

Details of Clinton's campaign appearance for Quinn have not been made public. Quinn is also slated to speak at the medical technology conference.

Clinton will hold a moderated Q&A with the president of Advanced Medical Technology Association, Stephen Ubl, after her speech, according to a media advisory released Tuesday.

"More than 2,500 attendees will network, conduct business, gain access to capital and share insights in Chicago, Ill.,fromOctober 6-8" the advisory says of the conference. "The conference also features world-class plenary speakers, networking and business development opportunities."

Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel is also slated to speak at the conference.

On the campaign side, Quinn is locked in a tight battle with Republican businessman Bruce Rauner in his reelection race this year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bloomberg: "No Hard Feelings as Bill Clinton Subs for Wife at Event"

By Jonathan Allen

October 1, 2014, 12:00 a.m. EDT

Maeve Sanford-Kelly, 10, lost out to Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky, four-days-old.

Sanford-Kelly had been planning for nearly two weeks to see Hillary Clinton last night at a fundraiser for Anthony Brown, Maryland's Democratic lieutenant governor who is seeking the state's top job in November's election. But Clinton, whose granddaughter was born Sept. 26, canceled and sent her husband, former President Bill Clinton, in her place.

"My 10-year-old daughter, who got a $1,000 ticket, is crushed," Sanford-Kelly's mom, Ariana Kelly, a member of the Maryland House of Delegates, said earlier yesterday of the former secretary of state's absence. "But for what it's worth, I'm glad she's with the baby instead of with us. It says something good about her soul."

Hillary Clinton, who is considering a 2016 Democratic bid for the presidency, has nixed several fundraisers for her party's candidates since her daughter, Chelsea Clinton, gave birth Sept. 26. Political operatives in both parties say that, like Kelly, most donors understand when a politician cancels an appearance at the last minute for exceptional personal or family reasons.

And sometimes, the reserve called off the bench to stand in is good enough to satisfy even skeptics in a crowd.

"Just like middle school, it depends on who the substitute is," Matt Canter, deputy executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said, referring to the star power of the former president who stood in at the Brown fundraiser.

'Frustrates People'

Rob Jesmer, former executive director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said that some big names in politics develop a bad reputation for last-minute cancellations for less-than-pressing matters.

"That frustrates people," he said. In this case, though, "Hillary Clinton can get away with it."

The former first lady has been one of this year's most sought-after surrogates for Democratic candidates across the nation, Canter said.

"For the vast majority of our campaigns, there's a tremendous demand for her to be involved in various aspects of the campaign," he said.

At last night's fundraiser, held at the Potomac, Maryland, home of David Trone, co-owner of Total Wine & More retail company, Bill Clinton echoed recent remarks by President Barack Obama about the U.S. economy, saying it has been growing stronger, according to a person who attended and requested anonymity to discuss a private event.

Foster Children

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In praising Brown for his work with foster children, Clinton said that his wife, a former U.S. senator from New York, had worked with former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican, on issues affecting such children when they were both in Congress, the person said.

Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, who picked Brown as his running mate eight years ago and is considering his own bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, also attended the fundraiser.

Hillary Clinton appeared at a pair of fundraisers for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee on Sept. 29 in New York, where her daughter lives. She is scheduled to headline an event for Senator Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire, a Democrat up for re-election, today in New York.

NPR: "Transcript: Sen. Warren's Full NPR Interview On Financial Regulation"

[Transcript]

October 1, 2014, 5:03 a.m. EDT

STEVE INSKEEP: You described what you learned from this report as disturbing. What's disturbing about it?

ELIZABETH WARREN: Well ultimately, this report tells us exactly what we already knew — that the relationship between regulators and the financial institutions they oversee is too cozy to provide the kind of tough oversight that's really needed.

How is it too cozy? Because of course, we hear the regulators on these tapes saying: "There's a reason that we're trying to have good relationships with banks like Goldman Sachs — we want to know what's going on, we want to get information."

Oh golly. So look — listen, though, to those tapes. For me, there were two things that jumped out. The first was just a basic lack of truthful reporting: Supervisors are actually telling examiners not to report accurately the damning things they heard from bank executives during meetings. I mean, wow. If there's not even an accurate record of what's going on, then the regulators can't hope to do their jobs.

And the second thing: Look at how the Fed emphasized talk instead of action. You know, the regulators seemed to think that it was a victory just to raise an issue, even if they took absolutely no action to address the issue. And that's the kind of approach that allowed banks to take on massive risks before the financial crisis.

You know, think about that: The regulators seemed to think that fussing at banks behind closed doors was their toughest sanction. Does anyone believe that Goldman Sachs is gonna give up a deal that would yield millions of dollars because someone fussed at them behind closed doors?

The regulators described this particular deal — that was reported on in great detail on the tapes — as a transaction that was legal, but shady. Uh, it did seem to be within in the rules. Does that call for a proper — does that suggest a problem with regulators or the rules?

You know, for me it starts as a problem with the regulators — and let me describe it this way: You know, the cultural problem isn't just some secondary concern. It's the whole ball game.

We can keep making the rules tougher and tougher, but it won't make an ounce of difference if the regulators won't enforce the rules that are there. If the regulators back down or back off whenever the banks tell them to? Then it's the banks — and not the regulators — who are running the show-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now you mention-

-and I think — yeah, go ahead.

Now you mentioned a cultural problem, Sen. Warren. Of course way back in 2009, five years ago now, there was a report commissioned by the Fed that identified this cultural problem: a reluctance to speak up and a suggestion of a too-close relationship with the banks.

But what can you really do about that, given that you need to have regulators who, perhaps, have experience in the financial industry, and are going to get to know the financial industry and the people in it really well?

Well you know, the first thing we can do is expose it. I mean, that's where this really starts — that's the first step. And that's why it is I want to see oversight hearings — I want to get a complete picture of what's happened here...

But we need to move on this and move quickly, because the big banks are just getting bigger, and they're taking on new kinds of risks. We need regulators who understand that they work for the American people, not for the big banks.

Carmen Segarra, the woman who made these tapes — and who was fired from the Fed — sued, and her lawsuit was thrown out. One way to describe the reason it was thrown is simply that the whistleblower statutes did not apply to her — she had not exposed a violation of regulations, she had exposed something short of that that was troubling to her.

Do you think the whistleblower statutes should be expanded in some way?

Yeah, I think that's one of things that ought to be on the table. I mean, look — we need to look at whether or not we've got the right tools to protect the kind of people who will speak up. But, but what we've got to start with is we've got to expose what happened here, we've got to look at what the available tools are, but we've got to give the message loud and clear to the Fed: Um, this isn't gonna work — you work for the American people, you don't for the big banks.

I should mention that these allegations have been around for a while — Carmen Segarra's story has been known for a while — what is new here is the tapes. Was there something, just from the tone — from listening to the tapes — that you learned that you did not know before?

You know, there is something about listening to those tapes, and hearing someone say "no, no!" you know, "back up!" almost — almost a whiny tone about the, the fact that she feels pretty strongly that Goldman is not in compliance with the requirements of the law. And I'm...

That's the part, when you hear the tape, there's no more "he said, she said," one person describes it this way and another says no. It's that you really do, for a moment, get to be the fly on the wall that watches all of it, and there it is to be exposed to everyone: the cozy relationship, the fact that the Fed is more concerned about its relationship with a too-big-to-fail bank than it is with protecting the American public.

I suppose if a Goldman official was sitting here, they might point out Goldman was complying with the law — at least according to some of the regulators — and the problem was whether they were doing something that was around the edges of the law, so to speak.

Yeah, but this is partly the role of a regulator. A regulator doesn't say to a big financial institution: "Hey! Step right up here. Get your toes on the line, and so long as you can make a legal argument that you have not crossed the line then, hey, we're — we're all cool here."

That's not the way regulation of large financial institutions is supposed to work — they're supposed to be using judgment. And remember, part of this judgment is about whether or not there has been compliance with the law. The fact that Goldman could mount a legal defense here is not really the point of these tapes. The point of these tapes is that the regulators are backing off long before anyone's in court making a legal argument about whether or not they came right up to the line or they crossed over the line.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Do you think regulators in a situation like that could say, "listen, this may be legal, but I don't like it — don't do it"?

You know, I think what regulators can do, is they can remind these large financial institutions that there's a lot of room in there for the large financial institutions to get themselves into trouble and to get the entire economy into trouble.

I mean look, that's what happened in 2008 — the regulators stood by as the big financial institutions kept loading up on more and more and more risk. The regulators had the tools to say to the big financial institutions, "hey guys, you gotta back off — you're putting the whole system at risk when you do this." And yet the regulators didn't do that. They were willfully blind to what went on.

And what we're seeing here is that same kind of cozy relationship, as the big financial institutions continue to run their operations, taking on more risk, doing what they want to do and brushing their regulators aside.

Sen. Warren, this is, uh, something that you're clearly passionate about, but it's a complicated issue — bank regulation. What would have to happen for it to be a major campaign issue this fall or in 2016?

You know, I think it already is a campaign issue. The way I see this, for everybody who's running right now in 2014, there's a fundamental question of whose side you stand on.

You know, the game out there is rigged, and people across this country really get it. And the Goldman Sachs tapes just show it one more time. Little banks have to follow the rules, regular families have to follow the rules, but big financial institutions? Somehow they can manage just to push their regulators aside and go forward.

There's a — there's a fundamental question about who this country works for. It can't just work for those who already have lots of money and lots of power. We've got to have a country that works for everybody else.

Should Hillary Clinton address this issue forcefully?

You know, I'd like to see everybody address this issue forcefully. I think it is a very important question, and I'm — I wanna see everybody in on it. Both parties — I think we all should be there.

Do you think that — do you think that your party is going to be able to make an issue of this in the general election coming up in a couple of years?

You know, I'm gonna keep talking about it, and I think there are a lot of people in the Democratic Party who will do the same.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, thanks very much.

Thank you.

The Hill blog: In The Know: "ElectHillary.com? RandPaul.com? Betting on 2016's hottest Web address"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Judy Kurtz

October 1, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Election-year website squatters have dollar signs in their eyes, scooping up 2016-related domain names with the aim of cashing in on six-figure payouts — before any candidate has even thrown his or her hat into the ring.

The starting bid to buy either ElectHillary.com or ReelectHillary.com at GoDaddy's domain name auction site: $275,000. RandPaul.com is being offered for $125,000.

By comparison, the price of other names based on possible presidential hopefuls might be considered a steal: ChrisChristiePresident2016.com is up for grabs for $49,000, while TedCruzForCommanderinChief.com is $20,000, and ElizabethWarren2016.com goes for a mere $3,300.

Jeremy Peter Green shelled out thousands of dollars to amass his collection of 180 domain names. The 26-year-old recent law school graduate says proudly, "As far as I know, I have a better 2016 collection than anyone else out there."

Green's bipartisan, eclectic and sometimes long-shot list pairs former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton with a slew of possible Democratic vice presidential picks in domain names such as ClintonNapolitano.com, ClintonOMalley.com, and ClintonWarner.com, referring to former Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, and Sen. Mark Warner (Va.). And Green is gambling on former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) running with Sen. Kelly Ayotte (R-N.H.) for BushAyotte.com.

The Maryland native started focusing on 2016 well before the previous presidential showdown was decided, buying up domains shortly after finishing college in 2010. The domain name guessing game seemed like a natural fit for the self-professed political junkie, who worked as an autograph dealer in college to earn extra spending money.

“The only political autographs that were really worth money were people that buyers thought might become president soon, or people that already were president, so I had to speculate on who was going to be president and then get things signed by them before they got big,” Green tells ITK.

He’s banking on his Clinton names, saying the former first lady is “the single most likely candidate to be the first name” on the Democrats’ ticket. Indeed, more than 50 domains based on variations on Clinton’s name (including HillaryForPres2016.com for $8,300, HillaryNotPresident.com for $295,000, and YesHillaryCan.com for $49,995) are for sale on GoDaddy.com.

But Green, like many other Internet entrepreneurs, also attempts to think outside the box when he’s buying up domains. He purchased a domain with the name of former Puerto Rico Gov. Luis Fortuño (R), saying, “I just think he’d be a cool ticket add-on for a Republican nominee, even though nobody will ever pick him.”

He’s also placing his bets on Vice President Biden making a run again in 2016, but not for commander in chief: “I also like ClintonBiden[.com], even though nobody talks about Biden running for vice president again. I still think he’s more likely than any other individual candidate to be picked for that.”

Since he buys his online acquisitions in bulk, Green pays about $8 a year per domain in his cache. Although he has yet to make a profit, he’s eyeing a big payout ahead of the presidential election.

“Definitely if you happen to have the right two last names that end up on one of the two tickets, that is worth a lot of money. I think it’s worth low six-figures if you happen to have one of those.”

Green says his goal is to sell all his domain names as a bundle to make money sooner rather than later.

“I would only sell the bundle for tens of thousands, so it would still be a pretty good amount,” he says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Bill Sweetman, president of the domain name consulting firm Name Ninja, says dreams of a big payday are likely pie in the political sky.

“I am aware of hundreds of different examples of people registering these names in the hopes of somebody coming along and buying it from them,” Sweetman tells ITK. “I’m not aware of a single instance where a candidate or a group bought ‘Somebody’s name for president.com.’ ”

While “technically not illegal,” according to Sweetman, snagging domain names in the hopes of selling them to a candidate or campaign “just doesn’t pass the sniff test.”

Green, who works at a labor law firm, says he knows not everyone approves of his domain name buying spree.

“It’s sort of a kind of bottom-feeding to a lot of people, I think … I mean I don’t think there’s anything to look down on about it, but I guess it’s just the idea of buying something that you don’t plan to use and then sitting on it until you can exploit it — that rubs people the wrong way,” he says.

Sweetman says he appreciates the “predicting the future” aspect of 2016 domain name sellers, but contends as a general rule: “I still don’t think you should do that with political candidates or with people.”

“It’s a gamble, and there are better ways. If you’re serious about making money and buying and selling domain names, you don’t play that game.”

Instead, the domain name expert suggests researching things, not people, that might be all the buzz in a few years.

“If you think the world is moving towards solar power, or some new thing you’re learning about … and you buy a bunch of those names and hope to sell them down the road, I think that’s fantastic," Sweetman says.

Green says he has a game plan if his domain names prove to be a tough sell: “I will use them. I’ll make fun of the politicians if I’m unable to sell them.” That’s what Green, a Democrat, did in 2012, turning a domain name based on Rick Santorum into a blog poking fun of the former GOP presidential candidate.

Asked if it ever pains him to plunk down money on domain names involving potential nominees on the opposing party’s ticket, Green replies, “No, the Republican ones are the easy ones for me to buy because if I can grab one of those domains before somebody else does and then charge as much as I can to Republican candidates, then I feel good about that.”

Green pauses before adding, “It’s the Democrat ones I feel a little more ambivalent about. But I also don’t think it’s a big deal. Somebody’s going to grab them. It might as well be me.”

SouthFlorida.com: “More 'Hard Choices' for Hillary”

By Phillip Valys

October 1, 2014

Hillary Clinton's political memoir published in the spring, "Hard Choices," ends on a cliffhanger. In an acknowledgement of the will-she-or-won't-she question that has dogged her life since leaving the post of Secretary of State in 2013, she writes, "Over the past year, as I've traveled around the country once again, the one question I'm asked more than any other is: Will I run for President in 2016?"

Her answer, naturally: "I haven't decided yet."

So the presidential frontrunner may have some explaining to do when she appears Thursday at Books and Books in Coral Gables to sign copies of "Hard Choices." The 3:30 p.m. signing is expected to draw at least 1,000 visitors, or to say it more optimistically, 1,000 opportunities to coax a clear answer from the former first lady.

Here's what to know before queuing up to visit Clinton:

Expect to find now-Grandma Clinton in a more buoyant mood this week, as the book signing is her first since the birth of her granddaughter, Charlotte, last Friday.

Another possible sign Clinton is warming up for a 2016 presidential run is her scheduled stop later that night in Miami, for a campaign dinner for Florida's Republican-turned-Democratic candidate for governor, Charlie Crist.

Admission is the $35 book purchase, available at the bookstore (265 Aragon Ave.) or at BooksandBooks.com. Clinton's security detail will check visitors' bags, as well, so leave totes and purses in the car.

Des Moines Register: "Late-night comics joke about Iowa and Hillary"

By Jason Noble

September 30, 2014, 5:40 p.m. CDT

Late-night comics have rediscovered Iowa.

The steady stream of potential 2016 presidential candidates visiting the state in recent weeks has caught the attention of comedians and made the state literally a punchline.

On Saturday Night Live over the weekend, faux-news anchors Colin Jost and Michael Che noted Hillary Clinton's recent visit to the Harkin Steak Fry and her "Hello, Iowa, I'm back!" quip.

"If I remember 2008 correctly," Che said, as a photo of '08 caucus winner and current President Barack Obama flashed on the screen, "that's not as effective as saying, 'Hello, Iowa, I'm black.'"

Tonight Show Host Jimmy Fallon offered a string of jokes on Monday night on the birth of Bill and Hillary Clinton's first grandchild, including one with an allusion to Iowa's first in the nation caucuses.

"Chelsea Clinton gave birth to a baby girl named Charlotte, she's already said her first word: 'Iowa!'" he said. "It's so cute. It's really adorable."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Time: "Meet the Clinton Baby's Other Grandparents"

By Landon Jones

September 30, 2014

[Subtitle:] Or, as they're called in Yiddish, the 'machatonim'

Even before Charlotte Clinton Mevzinsky headed home from the hospital on Monday, we had seen the first photos of her with her "over the moon" new grandparents, Bill and Hillary Clinton. But where were the machatonim?

In case you're wondering, machatonim is a Yiddish word that describes a relationship for which there is no equivalent word in English: the parents of your child's spouse. And in the case of the Clintons, the machatonim are two longtime friends and allies: Marjorie Margolies and Edward Mevzinsky.

Marjorie is a women's rights activist and former Congresswoman from Pennsylvania who served a momentous single term in 1993-95 after her deciding vote for the Clinton budget cost her her seat. She ran but lost in the Democratic primary this spring, despite vigorous support from both Clintons. Her former husband, Edward Mevzinsky, served two terms in Congress from Iowa — but also served fived years in prison after being convicted of fraud in 2001. They were divorced in 2007. So maybe their low profile is understandable.

"We are totally delighted," Marjorie told TIME What matters this week, anyway, is the relationship of the Clintons and the Margolies-Mevzinskys as machatonim — surely a more efficient way to put it than fumbling around awkwardly with phrases like "my daughter's in-laws." If Bill and Hillary are newcomers to their heightened status as grandparents, Marjorie and Ed are black-belt machatonim. Between their combined eleven children, they already have 18 grandchildren, thus presenting Charlotte with 18 cousins "who can't wait to be part of Charlotte's life," Margolies says.

It's often pointed out that the machatonim often become uncommonly close for two reasons: (1) their shared love for the same grandchildren, and (2) because they and the grandchildren are united by a common enemy: the parents.

So now begin the sensitive negotiations that are more than familiar to many grandparents. Which family will Charlotte (and, oh, her parents) visit for Thanksgiving? Or will they split the difference, Solomonically bolting after turkey dinner to commute to the Other Grandparents' House for dessert? Who gives her the coolest presents? And, most terrifying, which grandparents does she says she loves the MOST? She will say she loves them all, of course. After all, at least genetically, all machatonim are created equal.

Washington Post blog: The Switch: "Meet Share America, the U.S. State Department's Upworthy clone"

By Nancy Scola

September 30, 2014, 4:31 p.m. EDT

The public diplomacy game is going viral, as Russia has been demonstrating of late with its remarkable agility in getting its message out about the Ukraine conflict in today's networked information environment. Eager to compete in what might be called social warfare, the United States has just soft-launched Share America, a new site that looks much like another enormously successful vendor of social media fodder, Upworthy.

And what Share America is serving up is bite-sized nuggets of video, photos and text, all optimized to be as shareable as possible on the Web.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The goal is to feed content aligned with stated American values -- "democracy, freedom of expression, innovation, entrepreneurship, education, and the role of civil society," reads the site -- in the ever-hungry maw of Facebook, Twitter, Instagram and other social networks.

"Share America is an effort to take the issues that the United States cares about, and present them in ways that people will find interesting and in turn share through their networks," said Macon Phillips, who leads the Bureau of International Information Programs at the State Department. "As I've traveled around to posts all over the world, one thing is clear: We use our social presences as the main way we publish information for audiences in those countries. And so we want to create and publish information that we can provide to our colleagues in the field through their own social network and to allies around the world who share our interests."

State Department officials are taking a liberal view of what constitutes reflections of American interests. Leading the home page Tuesday was a video of Steve Jobs's 2005 commencement address at Stanford. But other posts are more straightforward, such as a White House photo that reveals the Martin Luther King, Jr. quote decorating the Oval Office's rug. Each Share America story comes equipped with prominent "Share This" and "Tweet This" buttons. And there's little hiding the source -- the .gov address is baked into each shared link, even in shortened form.

American diplomats have long tried to win the information game. And under both previous Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and current Secretary John Kerry, the State Department has attempted to identify and even amplify the nuances of an increasingly horizontal world; the 21st Century Statecraft push centered on the idea that there is growing power in peer-to-peer communications. But now that formal outreach channels like Voice of America are competing with thousands, if not millions, of less formal channels, it can be difficult for governments to find traction.

Tom Cochran, the former chief technology officer at Atlantic Media, joined the State Department in March, bringing his knowledge of how the modern, data-driven media environment works. Cochran is helping to drive the creation of Share America. Each post on the site is produced by State Department staff.

Cochran will be among the first to know whether the world is, indeed, eager to share Share America's vision of America. But just as the Internet has revealed the world's common love of cat photos, officials are hoping that it will also reveal its love of American-style freedom.

The Daily Beast: "This Is How Eva Longoria Is Trying to Win the Midterms"

By Asawin Suebsaeng

October 1, 2014

[Subtitle:] From working behind the scenes in the midterms to making a new farm labor documentary, the former Desperate Housewife has emerged as a force to be reckoned with in liberal politics.

These days, if you're a rising star in Democratic politics, it is downright weird if you don't have Eva Longoria in your corner.

The 39-year-old actress starred on the long-running ABC satire Desperate Housewives and in more lackluster theatrical fare such as Harsh Times and Over Her Dead Body. She's done commercials for L'Oréal, and hosted Saturday Night Live. But her work as an entertainer isn't what's earning her the biggest headlines these days—it's her role as a serious political activist and powerhouse in Democratic politics.

"Eva is so much more than a celebrity who occasionally lends her name to causes," Sen. Cory Booker (D-NJ)—with whom Longoria enthusiastically campaigned during his Senate run last year—told The Daily Beast. "Eva immerses herself in the pursuit of social and political justice. She knows the issues, is a great strategist, and is willing to sacrifice popularity for her larger sense of purpose. When I first met her, I was impressed and inspired by the fact that her activism is at the center of her being, and it is that authenticity that I believe makes her such a potent force for progressive change."

During the 2012 presidential election, Longoria was an Obama campaign co-chair and one of the president's top bundlers, and she delivered one of the more memorable speeches at the 2012 Democratic National Convention. "[Mitt Romney] would raise taxes on middle-class families to cut his own—and mine," she said, building up to one of the convention's biggest applause lines. "That's not who we are as a nation, and let me tell you why: Because the Eva Longoria who worked at Wendy's flipping burgers—she needed a tax break. But the Eva Longoria who works on movie sets does not."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Longoria's impressive dive into politics and advocacy also includes working with first lady Michelle Obama on the anti-obesity Let's Move! campaign, traveling to Capitol Hill to drum up support for the Children's Act for Responsible Employment (CARE Act), and even trying her hand at endorsing student body presidents. And when the actress met with Obama in 2012 following Congress's failure to move on immigration reform, she pushed the president to get more productively "emotional" and to take swift executive action to protect undocumented kids. (Two months later, that's exactly what he did.)

"I've always been politically active," Longoria told The Daily Beast. "I've been involved since Clinton ran in '92, volunteering, going door-to-door, canvassing, phone-banking…And coming from the state of Texas—the country of Texas, I should say—I'm definitely at the forefront."

Her new role as a leading Latina power broker has brought her glowing coverage:

"Eva Longoria Is Obama's Newest Hispanic Political Power Chip"

"The year of the political Latino celebrity, starring Eva Longoria"

"Can Eva Longoria start a Latino political movement?"

"Eva Longoria Moves From Desperate Housewife to Political Power Player"

Longoria has been instrumental in building an operation and network dedicated to encouraging more Latino and Latina political participation, and to getting more Latinos elected to local, state, and federal offices—and she isn't slowing down for the 2014 midterms, or at any point in the foreseeable future.

"We had this amazing turnout in 2012…yet in the midterms, nobody shows up!" Longoria said. "It's across the board. You can't elect the president, then sit and stay home and not elect the people he has to work with…I love and adore Hillary [Clinton], but I'm definitely not going to be speaking about 2016 until we can continue to fix what's on our agenda…We need to show our disappointment in the midterm elections; [at] this lame-duck Congress that won't get anything done."

During this election season, the actress/activist has been working mostly as a behind-the-scenes operator: voter registration efforts, fundraising, getting out the vote, campaign events, and—not so behind-the-scenes—social media. (She told The Daily Beast that she is supporting "many people" this November but declined to name a few, so as not to appear to be publicly playing favorites.)

She's been an active supporter of Voto Latino, an organization geared toward Latino Millennials, since its inception in 2008. When the group launched its Latinos 2014 project, Longoria was standing by.

"Eva and her organization the Latino Victory Project kindly jumped on board immediately," Maria Teresa Kumar, president of Voto Latino, told The Daily Beast. "Not just reaching out to their networks, but also reaching out to other celebrity voices to help us during the [midterms]." This outreach includes a soon-to-launch photo campaign that will showcase celebrities holding up handwritten signs reading, "I'm asking you: Register to vote."

"In 2010, Eva was one of the biggest advocates for United We Win, which went up against the SB 1070 law in Arizona," Kumar said, referring to the state's immigration law. "Eva lent her voice to make sure that didn't happen [in other states]. She would be up at 5 in the morning hitting different radio stations across the country to remind folks to register to vote."

And her work with the Latino Victory Project—which includes the Latino Victory PAC—runs even deeper. Founded by Longoria and DNC finance chairman Henry Muñoz, the project focuses on building Latino political power nationwide in order to "institutionalize what happened in 2012,", as Longoria has previously described it. (The Republican National Committee has called the project out as a "Democrat[ic] front group.") As co-founder, she does everything from approving press releases to sending voter information to the project's databases.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have never had a Latina elected to the U.S. Senate. Eva wants to change that," Cristóbal Alex, president of the Latino Victory Project, told The Daily Beast. "She is one of the only people in the country who can spearhead an effort, build an organization from scratch, who can do that…She has been creating a leadership pipeline."

Longoria and Muñoz also co-founded the Futuro Fund, which hauled in more than $32 million from more than 100,000 donors for Obama's reelection. "The two of them really figured out how to get Latinos to flex their muscle with their pocketbook, too—not just at the ballot box," Alex said. "She was certainly one of the primary drivers for the fund, one of the key spokespeople."

Alex recounted one of the first times he met Longoria, when the two attended a meeting at The Atlantic Philanthropies in New York City at the end of 2011. "This was the first time I had ever sat in a room with her to have a high-level conversation about strategy and politics, and about how to advance immigration reform, and she absolutely ran that conversation…Everyone in the room looked to her on her thoughts on strategy and guidance."

Longoria has discussed with Alex the possibility of headlining events to engage voters in Texas, her home state and "the state with one of the largest numbers of unregistered Latino voters," Alex noted. The Latino Victory Project has a number of these activities planned for late October but is still hashing out the details.

And though Longoria dreams of one day seeing a Latino or Latina commander in chief sworn in, she has shot down any talk about running for public office herself. "Would I ever run for something?" she wrote in The Hollywood Reporter in 2012. "God, no. I have more power as a citizen. Once you become a politician, your hands are tied. I'd rather have a voice."

There's at least one colleague who hopes she's changed her mind since then. "I'm sure if she weren't so busy being a movie star, she could be in the White House," Alex said. "Or governor of the state of Texas, or certainly in the Senate. Maybe she'll be the first Latina senator…I don't say that jokingly. She's brilliant."

For the time being, it looks like Longoria doesn't have time to consider a running for office, even if she wanted to. "Ninety-nine percent of my time right now is devoted to helping Latinas through educational programs," she said, referring to the Eva Longoria Foundation. She also has her hands full with Eva's Heroes—a nonprofit she co-founded to help people with special needs—and promoting Food Chains, a Human Rights Watch-endorsed documentary that she executive-produced. The film examines labor in the U.S. agriculture sector and the "immoral practices" that affect thousands of farm workers. (Longoria calls agriculture the "backbone of America.")

"There are still so many labor laws that are broken daily, and there are so many labor laws that exclude agriculture that we have not changed or updated," she said.

Going forward, Longoria and her political allies are, of course, going to renew their campaign for comprehensive immigration reform, a stalled ambition of the Obama presidency. Longoria says she has not spoken with the Obama since news broke that he had delayed further executive action on immigration until after the November election. (That political calculation naturally pissed off a lot of Latino activists.) However, Longoria says she is not angered by the president's delay; she's forming another game plan. "We were extremely disappointed that we couldn't get immigration reform done," she said. "But we're still pushing and working on something."

And it's this optimism that drives so much of her advocacy and action.

"We can't dismiss the growing population, the changing demographics of our country," Longoria noted. "And with that comes exciting times for everybody in America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· October 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton fundraises for NH Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (Politico)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the real estate CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 2 – Miami, FL: Sec. Clinton signs "Hard Choices" at Books and Books (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· October 2 – Miami, FL: Sec. Clinton fundraises for Charlie Crist (Politico)

· October 6 – Ottawa, Canada: Sec. Clinton speaks at Canada 2020 event (Ottawa Citizen)

· October 8 – (Chicago, IL): Sec. Clinton stumps for Illinois Gov. Quinn (Chicago Sun-Times)

· October 8 – (Chicago, IL): Sec. Clinton keynotes AdvaMed 2014 conference (AdvaMed)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton and Sen. Reid fundraise for the Reid Nevada Fund (Ralston Reports)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· October 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (Politico)

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Kristina Schake" <kristinakschake@gmail.com>
"Karen Finney" <finneyk8@yahoo.com>
"Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com>
"Jesse Ferguson" <jesse@jesseferguson.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
"Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@gpg.com>
"Adrienne Elrod" <adrienne.elrod@gmail.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>
"Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Amanda Renteria" <amandarenteria@gmail.com>
"Marlon Marshall" <marlondmarshall@gmail.com>
"Katie Dowd" <katie.w.dowd@gmail.com>
"Teddy Goff" <teddy.goff@gmail.com>
"Lona Valmoro" <lvalmoro@hrcoffice.com>
"Harrell Kirstein" <hkirstein@hillaryclinton.com>
"Tyrone Gayle" <tgayle@hillaryclinton.com>
"Mike Vlacich" <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com>
"Alex Hornbrook" <ahornbrook@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/21/2015 7:04:58 AM
Subject: Re: NH | Day 2

Message event this morning went well.

She started with a tour of one of the robotics classrooms and met with an ex-marine who did avionics while stationed in Japan who is now about to graduate with an associates degree from the community college. He was joined by the Chancellor and a professor, who showed them how the machines worked, and she asked lots of questions about where the machines come from, how they do their training, etc.

The pool was there, Andrea shouted a trade question at her, which she ignored and then later addressed in the course of her conversation with the student and professor.

She said "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security, we have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive. So it's got to be a partnership between our business, our government, our workforce, the intellectual property that comes out of our universities. We have to get back to a much more focused effort in me opinion, to try and produce those capacities here at home."

The round table itself was very good. A lot of talk about the opportunities a community college and vocational training creates, cost issues, need to pushing people into engineering careers, etc. Will have a transcript this afternoon.

We then stopped by Mary-Louise Hancock's house. Small print pool joined us so a little color and some nice photos should come out of that.

We're at the NDP now, where a small print pool joined us again. She did the four fights, really leaned into the rhetoric about campaign finance, talked about John Paul Stevens' proposal for a Constitutional amendment, and revisited the "Republicans came up here and only talked about me" line.

The pool report will likely note that her language was a little hotter, so let's see where that goes. Hopefully it will also note the incredible reception she got.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Good day so far.

Nick

On Apr 20, 2015, at 6:11 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

House party was good. She gave good remarks, people were murmuring about how good she was in such a scenario, and she stayed for 92 minutes, so had a lot of good conversation. Chozick of the NYT, James Pindell of the Boston Globe, and Nancy Cavanaugh of the Eagle Times (local paper) joined to listen to remarks.

All went well.

It was also a good reminder that wall paper is still very much a thing in parts of America.

Ert to Concord now. No more press with us today.

On Apr 20, 2015, at 3:34 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

Just departed the baby furniture factory. She did the tour, which will have lots of great images come out of it, and while press couldn't hear her on the tour itself, she referenced what she talked about in the round table a few times, including a comment about all the machines being from other countries at the top.

The round table itself was another natural, substantive conversation on a range of issues, from drug use among young people to the need for a return to vocational training to capital gains taxes and spurring small business growth. A note that she hit hedge fund managers again for not paying their fair share in taxes.

She did very well in the opening, did the four fights, talked about our need to make the middle class mean something again, and did it with little to no looking at her notes sounding very natural.

At the end she chatted with the participants and then walked over to shake hands with the guests there. After some brief conversations she doubled back to the center to take some questions. The first question was about Clinton Cash and she did quite well with it, used our line about Republicans being focused on her and her being focused on the issues.

WMUR asked her 2 questions, one about staged events which she handled well, said she was hear to talk to people and doing this how she wanted to do it. The other question was a redux of the Clinton Cash question.

Will send a transcript this afternoon. Headed to Claremont now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Apr 20, 2015, at 1:33 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

Departed Kristin's Bakery, headed to the message event. She ordered a black tea and worked the room. Sat for about 20 minutes at one of the tables.

On Apr 20, 2015, at 9:53 AM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

Road trip had commenced.

Will send event updates here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Democracy Corps" <dcorps@democracycorps.com>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 2/29/2016 9:40:29 AM
Subject: Explaining Trump: The GOP Civil War & Its Opportunities

DEMOCRACY CORPS
CARVILLE ◆ GREENBERG

Explaining Trump: The GOP Civil War & Its Opportunities

As the Republican Party grapples with a fateful decision about its nominee for president, this new Democracy Corps survey of Republican voters shows the GOP is headed towards a train-wreck that will change our politics. That may seem like hyperbole, but this one of kind survey is an eye opening glimpse into what is really happening inside one of our major national parties.

When you see the results of this survey you will believe that Donald Trump either has an amazing antenna for the mood of the party or a great pollster. It is clear from this study that there is an explosive civil war inside the GOP and it can move significant numbers of voters out of the Republican camp – and this poll begins to show how.

- Trump is poised to win because his intense opposition to Obama Democrats and anti-immigration views gives him a Tea Party and working class base, and because he competes among Evangelicals and Moderates. Cruz has faltered because Observant Catholics don't like him; Rubio is faltering because his hard pro-life stance blocks gains with Moderates, as it did for Jeb Bush.

- What unites and animates today's Republican Party are two things: the fight against Obama-Democratic governance and the insistence that the party get serious about fighting growing immigration:
    - They are fundamentally opposed to Clinton, Obama, Obamacare and the Democrats they believe are socialists that threaten the Constitution;
    - They are opposed to illegal immigration and the View Presentation

Read the memo
View on our Website

@DemCorps
Democracy Corps

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - growing foreign presence in a more racially diverse America. Thus, they deny facts and evidence about net-migration across the U.S.-Mexico border and demand their presidential candidate fight to get immigration under control;
    - They also favor a strong military and oppose regulation, but those preferences are not what is motivating today's Republicans.

- The GOP's problems begin the Moderates who form 31 percent of the base. They are heavily college-educated and accept the sexual revolution. They believe most abortions should be legal and they dislike the pro-life groups. They want the Republican nominee to stop fighting gay marriage.
    - Their distinct attitudes are the reason why the GOP establishment has not been able to consolidate their votes behind any candidate.
    - Their attitudes create a vast opening for Democrats in the general election.

- The GOP is further endangered by a huge crack that runs right down the middle of the GOP separating the Tea Party and Evangelical voters (47 percent) from the Moderates and Observant Catholics (45 percent). These are the issues that fracture the party:
    - The Moderate/Observant Catholic bloc believes government should help with health care and the free market needs regulation. Not the Tea Party/Evangelical bloc.
    - The Moderate led bloc believes the facts and scientific consensus about climate change. Not the Tea Party led bloc.
    - The Moderate led bloc is anti-NRA, not the Tea Party led bloc.

- The Trump race in particular already pushes 20 of Republicans to say they are uncertain what they will do in the general election against Hillary Clinton, including one quarter of the Catholics and one third of the moderates. The party is poised to shed voters. After attacks and messages, the Trump vote drops 14 points among the Catholics and among the Moderates, the Trump margin against Clinton drops 9 points.

- The strongest attacks on Trump are that he is an ego-maniac that is for himself, not the country; he is disrespectful of women; he can't be trusted with nuclear weapons; he is intolerant towards immigrants; and he denies America a clean energy future.

- The strongest Democratic messages that shift the Tea Party, Observant Catholics and Moderate voters away from Trump make the case for long-term investment in modernizing America; for reforming corporate governance so CEOs and corporations focus on investing in their companies and employees, not stock prices; and for an end to fighting to turn back the clock on social issues so we can address the country's problems.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GOP civil war has consequences and this poll gives people the tools they need to plan their strategy and campaigns.

READ THE FULL MEMO

Democracy Corps is an independent, non-profit organization dedicated to making the government of the United States more responsive to the American people. It was founded in 1999 by James Carville and Stanley Greenberg. Democracy Corps provides public opinion research and strategic advice to those dedicated to a more responsive Congress and Presidency. Learn more at www.democracycorps.com

Contribute to Democracy Corps | Follow on Twitter | Friend on Facebook

unsubscribe from this list | update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jorge A. Vilches" <jorgevilches@fibertel.com.ar>
To: rfeinberg@ucsd.edu podesta@georgetown.edu bkotschwar@georgetown.edu albright@georgetown.edu mfeldstein@harvard.edu
Martin_Feldstein@hks.harvard.edu
Date: 1/24/2015 6:21:52 PM
Subject: Fw: EPW - < Did Argentina 'default' ? > Jan. 24, 2015 - Economic & Political Weekly (India)

Did Argentina default ?

by T. Sabri Öncü * and Jorge Vilches

Economic&PoliticalWEEKLY

Vol.- L No. 4., January 24, 2015

http://www.epw.in/commentary/did-argentina-default.html

A US court ruling has warped the otherwise precise meanings of three key words republic, sovereign, and default leading to absurdities like a New York district court holding the Republic of Argentina in contempt of court! The entire understanding of sovereign debt and its restructuring is being read through private contract law that cannot address the complex questions that are inherently public in nature, à la questions around restructuring Argentinas debt. It appeared that a misreading of key words could benefit some vulture funds, but so far no one has seen as much as a penny! Maybe they never will. www.epw.in

The Setting

As lawyers know all too well, semantics does matter, and Argentinas case is no exception. Accordingly, terms such as republic, sovereign, and default take centre stage. Ever since the mess the United States (US) Judge Thomas Griesa created (Öncü 2014b), the word default has been misused hundreds of times regarding Argentinas 2014 sovereign debt payments. So, let us start with default. Financial default means failure to meet financial obligations. So, did Argentina default?

This should be of the utmost legal, financial, and political interest worldwide, in view of recent headlines think Europe, think Greece, think PIIGS (Pope 2014).

The Mess

Due to the glaring lack of (and badly needed) international framework for sovereign debt restructuring, Argentinas New York Law bonds today are basically in the hands of (a) the US judiciary with its non-performing default rulings, and (b) the International Swaps and Derivatives Association (ISDA), under direct oversight of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, for credit default swap (CDS) settlement purposes where (beyond belief!) Elliot Management Corporation the parent company of plaintiff NML Capital is a voting member (Hayakawa 2014). Logically and geographically, (a) and (b) should not be applicable to Argentine bonds issued under other jurisdictions such as London or Tokyo.

Unfortunately, in this case, logic is rarely the rule. Judge Griesa leads the lot, including his sophomoric judgments declaring the sovereign Republic of Argentina in contempt of court or that its payments are illegal. After six turbulent months, neither Argentinas legitimately restructured bond holders nor the Cayman Islands vulture funds have collected a penny. Possibly they never will, unless Judge Griesas rulings are revoked or something to that extent, as was proposed in a piece in The New York Times (Norris 2014b).

The US judiciary, including its Supreme Court of Justice (SCOTUS), has been clearly ineffective regarding the Argentine case (Vilches 2014). Indeed, US Supreme Court Justice Ruth B Ginsburg has openly dissented with the exorbitant 16 June 2014 decision taken by her SCOTUS colleagues whereby financial service providers clearinghouses, banks, trustees, fiscal agents worldwide are now sovereign debt enforcement agents.

Default Check

The US judiciary authorities have ruled that despite timely and proper disbursement of restructured due payments, Argentina has supposedly defaulted by failing to meet an unprecedented interpretation of its financial obligations towards 1% of its restructured bond exchange holdouts (Öncü 2014a). Furthermore, terms such as technical default and/or selective default and/or partial default have been artificially and hurriedly coined by third parties in their attempt to capture the essence of the resulting confusion. Insisting again on proper semantics, we doubt the value of this widely-used ex-post-facto terminology. Being in default somewhat is like being somewhat pregnant.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Be it as it may, not so fast. For example, the ISDA is the only authority entitled and empowered to enforce the settlement of Argentinas CDS obligations.

Interestingly, the ISDA does not even attempt to invoke the term default or any of its respective flavoured variations in the case of Argentina. Instead, the ISDA declared that Argentina has incurred in a failure to pay credit event. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York was actively involved in establishing timelines for dispute resolution and auction hardwiring of CDSs, while supporting the permanent incorporation of the auction-based mechanism in order to increase the certainty, transparency and orderliness of settling CDS transactions following a credit event (FRBNY 2009: 6). Once again, interestingly, the New York Fed also does not deal with any type, shape or form of defaults (Duffie, Li and Lubke 2010).

The Good, the Bad and the Ugly

We argue that the inconsistency of terminology used throughout the financial community and the lack of common definitions may not be all that innocent.

One explanation is that the entire financial world has not been able to get its act together on some fundamental matters, thus making the whole system inconsistent and, thus, ineffective.

Another possibility is that the above confusion was allowed and perpetuated on purpose so as to have all possible options open, as with Argentinas case today, making it fully discretionary rather than certain, transparent and orderly as the New York Fed and ISDA say it is supposed to be.

Or maybe it is just another glaring case of international financial incompetence.

Jurisdiction and Applicable Legislation

True enough, the Republic of Argentina did issue New York Law restructured bonds. But such bonds are not within the legal scope of parochial contract law. Semantics again. The Latin etymology of the term Republic is res publica meaning public thing, matter or affair. So public law rules here, not private law.

Georgetown University academic Adam Levitin has described Argentinas case as a high-stakes game of chicken with a sovereign state...that US courts cannot and should not win... abstention would have been the right approach (Levitin 2014).

This case involves a sovereign state with 45 million people and their futures are at stake. This is not a family gourmet restaurant in Upper Manhattan under a run-of-the-mill Chapter 11 bankruptcy process whereby creditors jockey for anything up for grabs, refrigerators included. Sovereign means supreme independent authority not subject to any other power or state. It is not called sovereign debt for nothing. In the case of a sovereign state such as the Republic of Argentina, local legislation is an acknowledged part of its bonds wherever they are issued, New York or elsewhere. The Republic of Argentina has specific legislation regarding its sovereign debt payments, which it necessarily has to abide by. Otherwise, Argentina would be violating its own laws while simultaneously ceasing to be a sovereign republic.

In case of a disagreement with what was accepted by 92.4% of the original creditors, the 1% of the remaining creditors should sue before Argentine Courts of Law, not before the Wall Street tribunals.

In turn, the US judiciary should abstain from getting involved in a case completely outside its scope as it will not solve, nor help to solve, sovereign debt restructuring processes such as the many that are threatening to hard land upon the worlds economy these days.

Effective Payment

The trustee banks Trust Indenture and Prospectuses of Argentine restructured exchange bonds foresaw two different payment mechanisms. The first one was through intermediary trustee banks. The second one was direct payment to bondholders who wished to get paid without intermediation. In the first case Argentinas responsibility ended as soon as trustee banks received the funds. In the latter case, it was Argentinas specific responsibility to ensure that bondholders received the payment. Argentina has regularly paid 92.4% of the original creditors who agreed to the restructuring through its intermediary trustee banks as allowed by the Trust Indenture and Prospectuses, thus making trustee banks responsible for delivering payment to bondholders, not the Republic of Argentina.

But then Judge Griesa surprised the whole jurisprudential world yet again by deciding to freeze Argentine payments as an additional unprecedented nuclear option of an exorbitant US court system. Accordingly, bondholders (including George Soros and Kyle Bass) have already sued trustee banks thus contributing to the relentless confusion and nonperformance. Adding insult to injury, the above freeze includes the British and Japanese Law bonds also, not only the New York Law bonds.

Top-tier sovereign debt international authority Anna Gelpern is on record saying, Its scary (Norris 2014b); The world of sovereign debt is deeply dysfunctional (Gelpern 2014).

The jurisprudential impact of this transnational overreach is unfathomable. Let us just imagine a Chinese judge saying: If you dont pay us you are violating the Chinese law. Argentina continues to insist on paying the remaining holdouts including the vulture funds exactly the same it has always paid the other 92.4% of creditors at a 300% profit for vulture funds (Herman 2014). Common sense indicates that this should be good enough for any bankruptcy situation. Otherwise a 99.99% creditors agreement would also mean default (sorry, credit event). Think Detroit (Davey and Walsh 2014).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Quick Quiz

Q: Did Argentina default?

A: No, because it did not fail to meet its financial obligations as Argentina did pay 100% of its restructured bondholders duly and fully through its trustee banks as foreseen in the restructured bond Trust Indentures and Prospectuses.

Q: Did Argentina incur in a failure to pay credit event?

A: No, because Argentinas officially registered trustee banks duly received 100% of the restructured sovereign debt payments in full compliance with the bond Prospectuses.

Q: Did Argentina fail to comply with the pari passu clause specified in its bond Prospectuses?

A: No, because Argentina has repeatedly and emphatically proposed to pay every single original sovereign debt creditor exactly the same that was agreed with 92.4% of its creditors.

Q: Has Argentina been victim of judicial extortion?

A: Yes, among other things, because the US judiciary has (a) illegally frozen Argentine payments that belong to their rightful owners, namely, the restructured bondholders, and (b) because it has allowed vulture funds direct access to US listings of Argentinas seizable assets worldwide.

Q: Should the restructured bond holders make any claims on Argentina?

A: No, because Argentina opted to pay them through the officially registered trustee banks, not directly. It is Judge Griesa and the trustee banks they should go after.

* T. Sabri Öncü (sabri.oncu@gmail.com) is a financial economist based in Istanbul, Turkey.

 Jorge Vilches (jorgevilches@fibertel.com.ar) is a financial op-ed columnist based in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

References

Davey, M and M W Walsh (2014) Plan to Exit Bankruptcy Is Approved for Detroit, The New York Times, 7 November.

Duffie, D, Ada Li, Theo Lubke (2010): Policy Perspectives on OTC Derivatives Market Infrastructure, Federal Reserve Bank of New York Staff Reports, No 424, January (Revised March).

Gelpern, A (2014): A Sensible Step to Mitigate Sove reign Bond Dysfunction, Real Time Economics Watch, Peterson Institute for International Economics, 29 August.

Hayakawa, P (2014): Do the Holdout Hedge Funds Hold Argentine Credit Default Swaps?, The Americas Blogs, Center for Economic and Policy Research, 13 August.

Herman, B (2014): Country Bankruptcies and the Shackles of US Law: Argentina and Beyond Is There an Effective Global Solution for Country Bankruptcies?, EconoMatters, The Globalist, 5 August.

Levitin, A J (2014): The Examiners: Adam Levitin on Argentina and Distressed Investors, Bankruptcy Beat, The Wall Street Journal Blog, 29 July.

Norris, F (2014a): The Muddled Case of Argentine Bonds, The New York Times, 24 July. (2014b): Argentinas Case Has No Victors, Many Losers, The New York Times, 20 November.

Öncü, T S (2014a): A Sovereign Debt Story: Republic of Argentina vs NML Capital, Economic & Political Weekly, Vol 49, No 20, pp 10-11. (2014b): Cry for Me Argentina, Economic & Political Weekly, Vol 49, No 42, pp 10-11.

FRBNY (2009): New York Fed Welcomes CDS Auction Hardwiring, Federal Reserve Bank of New York, 12 March.

Pope, S (2014): Eurozone Chaos and Contagion Are Coming, Forbes, 30 December.

Vilches, J (2014): Argentinas Griesamess Made in USA: No Vulture Left Behind, Counterpunch, 7 October.

Economic&PoliticalWEEKLY

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "DC Hoyas" <dchoyas@dchoyas.org>
To: "Georgetown Club of DC" <podesta@georgetown.edu>
Date: 9/1/2014 9:08:25 PM
Subject: Georgetown Alumni Club News - Fall Winery Tour, Book Events, Welcome to the Neighborhood & more

DC Hoyas banner

Labor Day signals both the end of the summer and the start of a new school year. The Alumni Club started the weekend by volunteering at DC Prep School in Northeast with Georgetown University students to help prepare the school for the 425 pre-school to 3rd graders who will be starting a new school year on Tuesday. Below are some of our volunteers sorting books in the newly renovated library.

UPDATE: Last newsletter, we asked you if you'd like to participate in a Georgetown kickball game against American University. Because of a great response, we want to officially let you know that this event will happen on October 26 at Glover Archibald Park. Learn more or RSVP at http://dchoyas.org/event-1748238.

Club Events and News

Fall Winery Trip to Chrysalis Winery

September 13 - Bus Leaves from McDonough Gym

Our annual Fall Winery Tour has long been a popular event. This year, we will visit Chrysalis in southern Loudoun County.

After a bus trip from the Georgetown campus to the winery near Middleburg, VA, Chrysalis will provide a tasting of its wines, led by a dedicated wine educator, and then provide box lunches so that we can enjoy the view while enjoying wine and food. We can buy wine to accompany our meal.

Then we can recover from our lunch while we ride the bus back to Georgetown.

This event is limited, so register early! Box lunch orders must be submitted a week in advance, so if you register after 9/5 you?ll get turkey and gruyere sandwich.

Meet bus at McDonough Gym parking lot on main campus. Bus leaves promptly at 10am, please arrive by 9:45am.

RSVP Online

Featured Events and News

Club Events and News

Sept 7 - Alumni Book Club

Sept 8 - Cardinal Sean O'Malley

Sept 13 - Fall Wine Tour

Sept 24 - Author Talk/Signing

Sept 30 - Welcome to the Neighborhood

University and Other Events

Sept 6 - Six Flags America

Sept 12-13 - GEMA ROCKS

Sept 18 - Student-Alumni Networking

Oct 18 - Lombardi Gala

Connect

DC Alumni Club
Facebook
Twitter
YouTube
Contact Us

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pope Francis and the New Evangelization: a Lecture by Cardinal Sean O'Malley, Archbishop of Boston

September 8 @ The Newseum

The John Carroll Society & the Georgetown Alumni Club of DC invite you to a special lecture by Cardinal Sean O'Malley, Archbishop of Boston.

Cardinal O'Malley will draw from his rich background including founding the Spanish Catholic Center in DC and most recently serving on the Council of 9 Cardinals who advises Pope Francis on governance of the Church.

Admission to the lecture is free, but seating is on a first-come first-served basis. Doors open at 6:00 p.m.

All are welcome!

Cost: No cost to attend, but seating will be first-come, first-served

---

Georgetown Alumni Club September Bookclub Meeting

September 7 @ Atrium of the National Portrait Gallery

Interested in discussing books with other Georgetown graduates?

Come to the next meeting of the Georgetown Alumni Book Club to discuss "A Constellation of Vital Phenomenon" by Anthony Marra. This novel - set in the background of the Chechen wars - begins when 8-year old, Havaa, is saved by her doctor neighbor Akmed, after her father disappears from her tiny village of Eldar, Russia. After rescuing Havaa, Akmed takes her to the nearest hospital and puts her under the care of the skilled and resourceful doctor, Sonja. As the five days during which Sonja cares for Havaa unfold, the pasts of these three characters - Akmed, Havaa and Sonja - are woven together, and the fate of them is ultimately determined. A "New York Times" best seller deemed to be a powerful story about "the transcendent power of love in wartime," this novel should excite readers and bring about thought-provoking conversation for our meeting!

We certainly hope you can join the group for this discussion at our September meeting!

If you plan on attending one of the sessions, please email the group?s organizer at hoya2007@gmail.com to let her know.

Meet the Author of Meet me at the Bar, I'm Hungry, Mike Soper

September 24 @ The City Tavern Club

The Georgetown Alumni Club and City Tavern Club are pleased to welcome Mike Soper to speak about his latest book, Meet me at the Bar, I'm Hungry.

Local chef Michael Soper (C '75) will be joining the alumni club on September 24 to discuss and sign copies of his cookbook-memoir entitled "Meet Me At The Bar - I'm Hungry." He has already received enthusiastic endorsements from esteemed Washington Post restaurant critic Phyllis Richman and Washington Capitals and Wizards owner Ted Leonsis (C '77).

This book features stories and recipes from a local restaurant career spanning four decades. Many of the tales celebrate Georgetown's golden saloon age, when Mike was introduced to the enjoyment of dining at the bar. The book proceeds like a great menu, starting with appetizer recipes and ending with some of his signature dishes.

RSVP Online

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Welcome to the Neighborhood

September 30 @ BlackFinn

Whether you're new to the area or returning to your hometown, you are invited to meet and network with Hoyas in your neighborhood at our upcoming "Welcome to the Neighborhood" events!

Join recent undergraduate and professional school alumni from the Class of 2014, as well as members of your local alumni club, to learn more about the Georgetown alumni community in your corner of the world.

Come join us at our basketball game watch location as we welcome our newest Hoyas to Washington, D.C. We'll have appetizer and drink specials, including a signature Georgetown cocktail!

RSVP Online

University and Other Events

Georgetown University Welcome Week Discount at Six Flags

You are invited to attend Georgetown's Special Day at Six Flags America, on Saturday, September 6th 2014!

This event is brought to you by Georgetown University Welcome Week.

The park will be open from 10:00 am - 8:00 pm.

More Information: Enjoy your Saturday at the biggest amusement park on the continent! For ONLY $26 you, your family and friends can enjoy admission to both Six Flags Amusement Park and Hurricane Harbor with a performance by the GU Pep Band!

Visit sixflags.com/america and enter the promo code GUWELCOME to receive your discounted ticket.

Don't miss out on this great deal! Get your ticket now!

Save the Date: GEMA ROCKS - Sept 12 & 13 @ Gonda Theatre, Georgetown University

Tickets are on sale now for GEMA ROCKS. Please get your tickets now at: http://gema-hoyas.org/gema_rocks_2014b.cfm

RSVP on the GEMA Facebook page and see who else is coming: https://www.facebook.com/events/333298713486548/

Get into the groove for GEMA ROCKS by checking out the event trailer online: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KzNABU5jzLY .

Don't miss the opportunity to rock to the music of established alumni musicians and entertainers from across the country including:

- Michael Zakarin (C '05, MBA '13) of The Bravery;
- International Trance/Dance artist Jeza, aka Jessica Bennett (C '09);
- Kiran Ghandi (C'11), percussionist for award winning British-Sri Lankan recording artist M.I.A.;
- Michael Pearsall (B '06) and Evan Field (C '98) of the critically-acclaimed band Honor by August (Last Chance);
- Teddy Zambetti (C '80) (Sirius XM In-House Composer/Producer and Co-Founder GU's Cabaret);
- Johnny Zambetti (B '09) (Guitarist/Songwriter of Terraplane Sun & guitarist from top-selling artist Schwayze);
- The Georgetown Improv Association.

And a special tribute to Bill Danoff (I '68) (Take Me Home Country Roads, Afternoon Delight) where he will receive the very first GEMA Lifetime Achievement Award.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You?re Invited to the 5th Annual Ready, Set, Connect Student-Alumni Speed-Networking Event

Thursday, September 18th, 2014
7:00 ? 9:00 PM
Georgetown University Hotel & Conference Center
Washington, DC

We invite you to share your professional expertise, career advice and industry knowledge at the most celebrated Alumni Career Services? event of the year! Ready, Set, Connect provides undergraduate juniors and seniors the opportunity to network and connect with fellow Hoyas in various industries and careers. This event is done in a speed networking format where you will have the opportunity to make 1:1 connections with approximately 6 individual students over a 60 minute time frame.

Register here or e-mail Whitney Pezza, Associate Director, Alumni Career Services at wcp9@georgetown.edu

Please note that the 1:1 ratio is imperative for this event to be effective for all attendees. Please do not register until you know that you are able to 100% attend the event. If you must cancel after you register, please use the Cancel Registration button or email wcp9@georgetown.edu. If you do not cancel in advance, you will leave students without a conversation partner.

A Special Invite from President DeGioia

On the occasion of the 75th Anniversary of the Archdiocese of Washington John J. DeGioia President of Georgetown University requests the pleasure of your company for the conferral of an honorary degree upon HIS EMINENCE DONALD CARDINAL WUERL ARCHBISHOP OF WASHINGTON on Monday, September 22, 2014.

CEREMONY
5:00 pm - Gaston Hall, 3rd floor Healy Hall

RECEPTION
6:00 pm - The Quadrangle

Georgetown University
37th & O Streets, NW
Washington, DC

Please Register HERE

Save the Date! The 28th Annual Lombardi Gala

Saturday, October 18, 2014

Join us for the opportunity to volunteer or attend the 28th Annual Lombardi Gala, benefiting Georgetown Lombardi Comprehensive Cancer Center!

Interested in volunteering? In order for this event to be a success, we are still in need of 35+ volunteers to assist with our large silent auction and registration. It is a fun and rewarding experience, so please consider lending your time. If you are interested, contact Patton Carrington at spc58@georgetown.edu or 202.687.1019. Training sessions will be held on Tuesday, October 7 at noon and 6pm. If you have a friend that we can count on who would be interested in volunteering, please pass this information along!

Interested in attending? Young Professionals (35 and under) tickets are available for $200 each and regular individual tickets are available for $500 each. The purchase of a ticket includes entry to the cocktail reception/silent auction, a seated dinner and dancing with the band Marquise after!

Each year, the Gala draws roughly 1,000 guests to support research and clinical care at Georgetown Lombardi Comprehensive Cancer Center. Like us on Facebook for further information or register HERE .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Georgetown University Office of Advancement | PO Box 571253 | Washington, DC 20057

Please contact us at dchoyas@dchoyas.org with any questions or comments.

Unsubscribe/Manage Office of Advancement email preferences | Privacy Policy

This Club email was sent to podesta@georgetown.edu.
To ensure you continue receiving our emails, please add us to your address book or safe list.

Need your NetID, please click here . | Make a gift

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 7/23/2008 1:45:51 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 7/23

08 Election Daily News Clips
July 23rd, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time
TBA McCain: Meets with Gov. Jindal in New Orleans, LA - New Orleans, LA

10am McCain: Town Hall and Media Availability in Wilkes-Barre, PA
- Tracking scheduled for this event
10:45am BUSH: Signs H.R. 3403, the New and Emerging Technologies 911 Improvement Act of 2008

12pm McCain: Finance Luncheon in Wilkes-Barre, PA

1:10pm BUSH: Attends a defense department briefing with Secretary Gates and the Joint Chiefs at the Pentago n

3:25pm BUSH: Photo-op with the 2008 Boys and Girls Nation delegates at the White House

3:45pm BUSH: Signs a proclamation in honor of the 60th anniversary of Armed Forces integration at the White House

4:30pm McCain: HQ tour in Harrisburg,PA - Harrisburg,PA

8pm Pawlenty: Finance Dinner in Grand Rapids, MI

9pm McCain: Interview on FNC - "Hannity and Colmes"

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

Big GOP Donor Faced Trouble Back Home (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Matthew Mosk; A01
...For two years, venture capitalist Craig Berkman battled angry investment partners after lending himself $5 million of their money; a jury awarded them $28 million in civil damages. All the while, he was contributing to Republican committees and candidates, including Sen. John McCain, whose campaign later donated the money to charity.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072202693.html

Bush Bundlers Raise Nearly $26 Million for McCain (Washington Post blog 7/22/08)
By Matthew Mosk
The group Campaign Money Watch has reviewed the latest campaign filings by Sen. John McCain's campaign and found that while the presumptive GOP nominee is not spending much time with President Bush, he is spending plenty of time with Bush's bundlers.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/07/22/bush_bundlers_raise_26_million.html

Is McCain's Age Showing? Tongues Wag Over Flubs (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Howard Kurtz; C01
We interrupt the nonstop coverage of Barack Obama's overseas trip to bring you some breaking whispers about John McCain. He has been making a series of verbal slips -- invariably described as "gaffes" -- that are starting to ricochet from liberal blogs to the mainstream media. And fairly or not, some critics are suggesting the 71-year-old Republican candidate is showing his age.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072203201.html

Obama Shifts the Foreign Policy Debate (Washington Post 7/23/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Karen DeYoung and Jonathan Weisman; A08
Sen. Barack Obama, on his first and likely only overseas trip as the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee, has remade the campaign's foreign policy playing field, neatly sidestepping Republican charges that he has been naive and wrong on Iraq and moving to a broader, post-Iraq focus on Afghanistan and Pakistan.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072202942.html?hpid=topnews

With the Mideast a Priority for Both Campaigns, McCain Intensifies His Attack (NYT 7/23/08)
By ELISABETH BUMILLER
Senator John McCain and his campaign sharply stepped up criticism of Senator Barack Obama on Tuesday as a craven and naïve traveler to the Middle East who, as Mr. McCain put it at a raucous town-hall-style meeting here, "would rather lose a war in order to win a political campaign."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/us/politics/23mccain.html?ref=politics

Obama Overseas! In Presidential Mode! Back Home, It's McCain in a Golf Cart. (NYT 7/23/08)
By ALESSANDRA STANLEY
It wasn't a television blackout of John McCain; it was worse: split-screen contrasts that at times made it seem as if Barack Obama was on a state visit while back home his opponent chafed at the perks and privileges of an incumbent commander in chief.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/us/politics/23watch.html

McCain pushes offshore-drilling plan (USA Today 7/23/08)
By David Jackson
Republican presidential candidate John McCain said Tuesday that the nation faces an "energy crisis" with both economic and national security implications, requiring more offshore oil drilling to lower gas prices and offset imports from hostile countries.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-07-22-mccain-energy_N.htm

McCain's Message Gets Makeover (WSJ 7/23/08)
By Laura Meckler and Elizabeth Holmes
As his campaign bus rolled through northern Wisconsin recently, John McCain interrupted a conversation to take a cell-phone call. It was "Sgt. Schmidt," he reported -- his nickname for Steve Schmidt, the sharp-tongued strategist he recently drafted to take over the campaign.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121676261654474987.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

McCain And The Economy (Forbes 7/23/08)
While the presidential candidates are crossing the U.S. to sell their visions for a post-Bush America, their advisers are scrambling to help them navigate the economic turbulence. Earlier this week, Douglas Holtz-Eakin, senior policy adviser to Arizona Sen. John McCain, spoke at length with Forbes.com and Forbes magazine about how the presumptive Republican nominee might handle the situation.
http://www.forbes.com/businessinthebeltway/2008/07/22/mccain-economy-holtzeakin-biz-wash-cx_0723adviser.html

Press coverage of Obama puts envy in the air at McCain headquarters (LA Times 7/23/08)
By Maeve Reston
'The media is in LOVE with Barack,' McCain's camp says in a video that mocks the reporting on the Democrat.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-mccain23-2008jul23,0,4463372.story
See WSJ's "News Coverage Of Obama Irks McCain Team": http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121677550831675803.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox
See WaPo blog's "McCain Celebrates His 'JV' Press Pack": http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/07/22/mccain_celebrates_his_jv_press.html

McCain: "Obama Love" Web Video (RealClearPolitics 7/22/08)
The John McCain campaign released this web video accusing the media of being in love with Barack Obama. Chris Matthews figures prominently.
http://www.realclearpolitics.com/video_log/2008/07/mccain_obama_love_web_video.html
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FC-yMUQ8KzI

McCain Falsely Claims The Surge 'Began The Anbar Awakening,' But CBS Doesn't Air It (ThinkProgress 7/22/08)
During an interview with Sen. John McCain (R-AZ), CBS Evening News host Katie Couric noted that Sen. Barack Obama (D-IL) said recently that "there might have been improved security [in Iraq] even without the surge" and asked McCain, "What's your response to that?" After first calling Obama's claim "a false depiction of what actually happened," McCain proceeded to falsely claim that the surge "began the Anbar awakening": http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/22/mccain-anbar-history/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama Campaign: McCain Flubs on Iraq Timeline (AP 7/22/08)
McCain says Obama is wrong on Iraq, but Obama camp says McCain errs in discussing war timeline ...Obama's campaign says McCain was wrong about the war's timeline during a nationally televised interview Tuesday.
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/wireStory?id=5430118

Not a Gaffe: A Fundamental Misunderstanding of Iraq (Democracy Arsenal 7/22/08)
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg
John McCain made a mistake this evening, which as far as I'm concerned disqualifies him from being President. It is so appalling and so factually wrong that I'm actually sitting here wondering who McCain's advisers are. This isn't some gaffe where he talks about the Iraq-Pakistan border. It's a real misunderstanding of what has happened in Iraq over the past year. It is even more disturbing because according to John McCain, Iraq is the central front in the "war on terror." If we are going to have an Iraq-centric policy, he should at least understand what he is talking about. But anyway, what happened.
http://www.democracyarsenal.org/2008/07/not-a-gaffe-a-f.html

McCain: "We Will Come Home In Victory" (CBS 7/22/08)
Exclusive: Ariz. Senator Tells Katie Couric Obama Does Not Understand Challenges The U.S. Faces In Iraq ...What follows is a full transcript of the interview.
http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/07/22/eveningnews/main4283813.shtml
Link to video: http://www.cbsnews.com/sections/i_video/main500251.shtml?id=4284432n

McCain Meltdown (TIME blog 7/22/08)
by Joe Klein
This John McCain said this today in Rochester, New Hampshire: This is a clear choice that the American people have. I had the courage and the judgment to say I would rather lose a political campaign than lose a war. It seems to me that Obama would rather lose a war in order to win a political campaign.
http://www.time-blog.com/swampland/2008/07/mccain_meltdown.html

McCain Explains Czechoslovakia Gaffe ... And Explains ... And Explains (TPM 7/22/08)
By Greg Sargent
As you all know, McCain has repeatedly referred to "Czechoslovakia" in recent days, even though that country hasn't existed since the beginning of the Clinton administration. Well, at a town hall meeting in New Hampshire today, McCain again made the same slip-up. But this time, he caught himself, and proceeded to deliver a rather extensive mea culpa of sorts for his serial mistake.
http://tpmelectioncentral.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/07/mccain_explains_czechoslovakia.php
See HuffPo's "McCain Explains His Repeated Czechoslovakia Gaffes (VIDEO): http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/22/watch-mccain-explains-his_n_114368.html

Energy plan: McCain would open 45 nuclear reactors across country (Union-Leader 7/23/08)
By JOHN DISTASO
On his third visit to New Hampshire in four months, John McCain yesterday defended his energy and tax cut plans, his votes on home heating assistance and said the United States is clearly winning the war in Iraq.
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Energy+plan%3a+McCain+would+open+45+nuclear+reactors+across+country&articleId=3cbeaafc-d7e2-4b68-aefb-1f84c61369f4
See Union-Leader's "McCain slams Obama on energy, war in Iraq": http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=McCain+slams+Obama+on+energy%2c+war+in+Iraq&articleId=cdb8edc9-5566-46c8-8a3f-207a54852067

No arrest after McCain incident (Foster's Daily Democrat 7/23/08)
ROCHESTER — The scuffle across the street from City Hall which police broke up at around 9:50 a.m. has not resulted in any arrests. Foster's reported Tuesday morning, a man who was protesting before the rally for Sen. John McCain had been assaulted before the Republican presidential nominee was scheduled to speak at the Rochester Opera House.
http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080723/GJNEWS_01/470222812/-1/rss1&source=RSS

Wilkes-Barre prepares for McCain visit (Scranton Times-Tribune 7/22/08)
BY COULTER JONES
Hand-painted signs supporting Sen. John McCain air dried on the floor as a half-dozen volunteers called local supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.scrantontimes.com/articles/2008/07/22/news/sc_times_trib.20080722.a.pg8.tt22mccain_s1.1827181_loc.txt

Obama Abroad, McCain Looks to Change the Subject (Newsweek blog 7/22/08)
By Suzanne Smalley
John McCain may not be the shoot from the hip maverick of old, but he hasn't lost his sense of humor. After a long day of loading on and off buses and planes, a press wrangler tonight told reporters the campaign had a "surprise" gift, adding that it is one that campaign officials, at least, consider "pretty funny." With that, the staffer walked down the aisle and handed out laminated press ID cards emblazoned with the words "McCain Press Corps JV Squad" underneath a photo of the Statue of Liberty. The caption? "Left behind to report in America." The reverse side of the ID offered a French translation of the same text along with a picture of a beret wearing pseudo-Frenchman pouring a glass of wine. Mon Dieu!
http://blog.newsweek.com/blogs/stumper/archive/2008/07/22/obama-abroad-mccain-looks-to-change-the-subject.aspx
See CNN's "With spotlight on Obama, McCain steps up attacks": http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/07/22/mccain/index.html
See NYT blog's "McCain Camp Talks of Speedier Iraq Withdrawal — Or Not": http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/07/22/mccain-camp-talks-of-speedier-iraq-withdrawal-or-not/

McCain adviser paid by controversial businessman (AP 7/22/08)
Sen. John McCain's campaign on Tuesday distanced its foreign policy adviser from a longtime Republican fundraiser who paid the adviser $130,000 when he was a lobbyist. The payments by Texas businessman Stephen Payne to McCain adviser Randy Scheunemann, ending in 2006, were largely for lobbying Congress and executive branch agencies on energy issues, according to records filed with the Senate.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/M/MCCAIN_ADVISER?SITE=ORAST&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Vice president buzz swirls around McCain (CNN 7/22/08)
* McCain on Tuesday: Will "announce when we are ready to announce"
* Bobby Jindal-McCain meeting planned for Wednesday fuels speculation
* Reports: McCain camp may announce this week to coincide with Obama trip http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/07/22/veep.talk/index.html

McCain Adviser Scowcroft Says He'd Tell Israel To "Calm Down" On Iran Strike (Huffington Post 7/22/08)
By Seth Colter Walls
Brent Scowcroft doesn't think the biggest problem with Iran getting a nuclear weapon is, well, Iran getting a nuclear weapon. "To me, whether or not Iran itself has [nuclear weapons] is a less important question than what it will do to proliferation around the world," the former national security adviser to President George H.W. Bush said at a Tuesday event in Washington D.C., adding: "I think we're standing on the brink of another forward surge in nuclear proliferation. ... Don't talk about 'do we bomb them now or after they get to weapons.' That's not the point. The point is how can we dissuade Tehran from its current course of action."
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/22/mccain-adviser-scowcroft_n_114379.html

McCain's Free-Trade Tough Love Is Tough Sell in Ohio, Michigan (Bloomberg 7/22/08)
By Indira A.R. Lakshmanan
At General Electric Co.'s sprawling jet-engine plant outside Cincinnati, 80 percent of orders come from overseas, up from just over half in 2003, and employment has risen for five consecutive years. It's the kind of trade success John McCain loves to talk about.
http://bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601070&sid=asaJxzIEmGQY&refer=politics

McCain's Unhappy Warrior (Slate 7/22/08)
By John Dickerson
John McCain attacked Barack Obama both at home and abroad this week. One attack was smart. One wasn't. On Iraq, McCain pressed Obama over his opposition to the troop surge—the strategy that has reduced violence in Iraq and led to modest political gains for the al-Maliki government. This was smart. The topic is on McCain's issue turf, potentially puts his opponent at odds with the American generals who executed the surge, and makes Obama look like a hidebound pol who won't absorb new facts that contradict his predetermined conclusions. McCain's dumb attack came in a television ad that blamed Barack Obama for high oil prices. You might have thought the cause of the oil-price hike was war, SUVs, OPEC, speculation, and global demand for oil. Nope—it's Obama. By this standard, he should also answer for the Starbucks closings and the dent in my Honda.
http://www.slate.com/id/2195762/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John McCain's Neverending War (JedReport 7/22/08)
My newest video features John McCain talking about the Iraq war from 2002 through the present, exposing -- in his own words -- the lie behind his claim that he was the war's "greatest critic." It demonstrates his chilling commitment to fighting this war no matter what the people of America -- or Iraq -- want.
http://www.jedreport.com/2008/07/john-mccains--1.html
Link to video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8ieHwOm4IjA

McCain Becomes Latest To Feel Chalabi's Burn (Huffington Post 7/22/08)
By Sam Stein
By now, Americans are accustomed to getting burned by Ahmad Chalabi. The Iraqi exile turned political official was instrumental in greasing the wheels for George W. Bush's war efforts only to be disavowed for leaking sensitive information to Iran. Numerous journalists, meanwhile, worked with Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress for stories on weapons of mass destruction (see: Miller, Judith) only to discover that the information they were being fed was monumentally bogus.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/22/mccain-becomes-latest-to_n_114268.html

Live Blogging A McCain Town Hall, Part III: Angry At McCain's Staff (Atlantic Online 7/22/08)
By Marc Ambinder
McCain calls on a woman wearing a McCain button. She pulls out a piece of paper. "You are, without a doubt, a true American hero, and we all thank you for that." She begins to give a speech. "I'm going to do a little straight talk," she says. "Mine is not really a question. It's a statement about a lot of your campaign staff members. I can tell you right now that Iam going to be right on top of their shit list." McCain: "Sssh!"
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/live_blogging_a_mccain_town_ha_2.php

McCain gets more than he bargained for (MSNBC blog 7/22/08)
By Adam Aigner-Treworgy
ROCHESTER, NH -- During a return trip to the state that he won in the 2000 primaries and that launched him on the road to this year's GOP nomination, McCain got more than he bargained for from the independent-minded voters he is so complimentary of on the campaign trail. Before opening up to questions from the audience of several hundred that crowded into the Opera House downtown here, McCain picked up on his campaign's message of the day: Obama and Iraq.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/07/22/1215039.aspx
Link to video: http://www.wmur.com/video/16955400/index.html

Lieberman Appearance at Hagee Conference Sparks Objections (Washington Post blog 7/22/08)
By Michelle Boorstein
A close adviser and advocate of Sen. John McCain is set to make an appearance tonight in Washington, D.C., with Texas megapreacher Pastor John Hagee -- a man McCain disavowed in the wake of controversy over inflammatory comments Hagee had made about Jews and Catholics.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/07/22/lieberman_appearance_at_hagee.html#more

McCain's Iraq Dilemma (Atlantic 7/21/08)
...Where Iraq is concerned, McCain is suddenly in the odd position of playing Winston Churchill in 1945, or George H.W. Bush in 1992 - a leader whose successes in crafting wartime policy don't translate into electoral victory - without having ever been elected President in the first place.
http://thecurrent.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/mccains-iraq-dilemma.php

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

On Iraq, Obama emulates Bush's worst mistake (NH Union-Leader 7/23/08)
By SEN. JOHN MCCAIN
IN JANUARY 2007, when Gen. David Petraeus took command in Iraq, he called the situation "hard" but not "hopeless." Today, 18 months later, violence has fallen by up to 80 percent to the lowest levels in four years, and Sunni and Shiite terrorists are reeling from a string of defeats. The situation now is full of hope, but considerable hard work remains to consolidate our fragile gains.
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Sen.+John+McCain%3a+On+Iraq%2c+Obama+emulates+Bush%27s+worst+mistake&articleId=5d46ff8b-f018-4083-8137-260ae16a3e78

All Hail 'McBama' (NYT 7/23/08)
By THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN
The right position on Iraq today is probably "McBama" — stick to a clear withdrawal timetable, but leave yourself some wiggle room.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/opinion/23friedman.html?_r=1&ref=opinion&oref=slogin

Obama's Strategic Vision (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Harold Meyerson
... it was Frederick the Great ... who once advised his generals, "He who would defend everything ends up defending nothing." You can't deploy everywhere in strength, Frederick was saying, and that's a lesson Obama seems to understand a lot better than John McCain does.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072202170.html

A new low in the high life (LA Times 7/23/08)
By Tim Rutten
As Candy Spelling's condo deal illustrates, so much wealth in the U.S. is concentrated in so few hands. Will Obama or McCain address this issue?
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-rutten23-2008jul23,0,2962955.column

V-day in Iraq? (LA Times 7/22/08)
It doesn't matter who's right. If all sides agree on an Iraq drawdown, then claim victory and get out.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-ed-iraq22-2008jul22,0,4239079.story

McCain Campaign: Obama is "Frighteningly Inexperienced" (The Nation 7/22/08)
Barack Obama is in the midst of one of the more successful global tours by an American political leader in recent history. ... So what is the response of the campaign of Republican John McCain? ...The McCain camp is warning that Obama is "frighteningly inexperienced" and "the antithesis of what we should expect from the president of the United States."
http://news.yahoo.com/s/thenation/20080722/cm_thenation/45338370

A Quiet Humanitarian (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Michael Gerson; A15
Cindy McCain's generosity would be a credit to her husband's administration.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072202114.html

McCain in Rochester - But where is Obama? (NH Union-Leader 7/22/08)
SEN. JOHN MCCAIN speaks at a town hall meeting in Rochester today. There, citizens can question a man who might be the next President of the United States. And if you've ever seen McCain at a town hall meeting, you know that anyone with a hostile question usually gets called on first.
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=McCain+in+Rochester+-+But+where+is+Obama%3f&articleId=39e1ddf6-3850-45d6-a838-0323cf91cc1a

BUSH NEWS

A Private, Blunter Bush Declares, 'Wall Street Got Drunk' (NYT 7/23/08)
By SHERYL GAY STOLBERG
When he talks about why the economy is ailing, President Bush often turns to euphemism, citing "challenges in the housing and financial markets." But Mr. Bush offered a far blunter assessment last week at a closed Republican fund-raiser in Houston: "Wall Street got drunk."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/washington/23bush.html?ref=business
See ABC blog's "Bush Says Wall Street's 'Got a Hangover'": http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/07/bush-says-wall.html

Ex-Advisers Warn Against Threatening to Attack Iran (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Walter Pincus; A11
The Bush administration should stop talking about a military attack as an option if negotiations do not immediately halt Iran's uranium reprocessing program, two former national security advisers said yesterday.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072202698.html?hpid=moreheadlines

Bush urges Congress to OK Colombia trade pact (AP 7/22/08)
By DEB RIECHMANN
President Bush on Tuesday seasoned his call to Congress to pass a free trade pact with Colombia with a little Latino music.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5iOfjBoHq88ylU7Txf6wCP4FfTNUwD9235NE80

Bush drops in for fund-raiser (The Atlanta Journal-Constitution 7/22/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By JIM GALLOWAY
In what was more like a brief layover than a proper visit, President Bush made a rush-hour dash into and out of Atlanta on Tuesday to boost the Republican congressional campaign of Rick Goddard. Close to 200 people — including Gov. Sonny Perdue — attended the event at the home of Harrison Merrill, a local developer, just off West Paces Ferry Road.
http://www.ajc.com/metro/content/metro/atlanta/stories/2008/07/22/bush_visit_brief.html

Bush Cronies Tried To Redefine 'Carbon Dioxide' To Save Power Plants From Emissions Regulations (ThinkProgress 7/22/08)
Earlier this month, former EPA official Jason Burnett wrote to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-CA) with explosive revelations on how the White House has neutered climate change science to protect corporate interests. For example, OMB general counsel Jeffrey Rosen asked for multiple memos on whether carbon dioxide (CO2) from cars and plants could be regulated differently.
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/22/bush-cronies-tried-to-redefine-carbon-dioxide-to-save-power-plants-from-emissions-regulations/

OTHER TOP NEWS

US, NKorea meet at nuclear talksamid tough tone (AFP 7/23/08)
The United States and North Korea sat down Wednesday for their highest level meeting in four years at six-country talks on North Korean nuclear disarmament.
http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5isP5LKAhrIk2cTttPqjF8WyvGGjQ

Spending on vets exceeds 1947 high (USA Today 7/23/08)
By Gregg Zoroya
The federal government is spending more money on veterans than at any time in modern history, surpassing the tidal wave of spending following World War II and the demilitarizing of millions of troops.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/washington/2008-07-22-vabudget_N.htm

Bank Investors Expect Less as Losses Mount (NYT 7/23/08)
By ERIC DASH
Can the bad news for banks get any worse? After the last week brought another round of woeful quarterly results from the industry, capped by news on Tuesday of multibillion-dollar losses at the Wachovia Corporation and Washington Mutual, that question is nagging banking executives and their investors.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/business/23bank.html?ref=todayspaper

Hill Budget Chief Weighs Odds, Cost Of Rescue Plan (Washington Post 7/23/08)
By Lori Montgomery and David S. Hilzenrath; D01
The Bush administration's plan to prop up troubled mortgage-finance giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac is likely to cost taxpayers less than $25 billion, Capitol Hill's chief budget analyst said yesterday. But there is an outside chance that a further collapse in the housing market could require an infusion of $100 billion or more.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/22/AR2008072200907.html?hpid=moreheadlines

Civilian Risks Curbing Strikes in Afghan War (NYT 7/23/08)
By THOM SHANKER
Dawn was breaking over Afghanistan one day this month as Air Force surveillance planes locked in on a top-ranking insurgent commander as he traveled in secret around Kandahar, the spiritual home of the Taliban.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/23/world/asia/23military.html?hp

Obama promises focus on Middle East peace (USA Today 7/23/08)
By Kathy Kiely
Barack Obama arrived here Tuesday night emphasizing his solidarity with Israel and vowing as president to bring "sustained energy and focus" on ending the intractable Arab-Israeli conflict — the solution to which could hold the key to peace throughout the Middle East.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/2008-07-22-obama_N.htm

Maliki's Endorsement: Not Lost in Translation (New Republic blog 7/22/08)
German magazine Der Spiegel caused quite a commotion this week by printing an interview with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Al-Maliki in which he endorsed Obama's Iraq plan by name. Some tried to downplay the significance of this endorsement by saying that Maliki had been misquoted by the magazine. But it turns out that Maliki actually got a copy of the interview before it was printed and had the option to make any changes.
http://blogs.tnr.com/tnr/blogs/the_plank/archive/2008/07/22/maliki-s-endorsement-not-lost-in-translation.aspx

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring
Progressive Accountability Office
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: GIDEON <mond1967@zahav.net.il>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/13/2015 5:47:03 AM
Subject: November 10 2012 Debbie Wasserman

Ben Ammi May 3 2013
Fax--775-513--454
mond1967@015.net.il
Israel

Dear Mr. Weigel,
My personal congratulations for President Obama re-election for a second tenure
A serious encumbering problem for the US is evidently the War in Afghanistan Objectively, any prolongation of belligerency there won't achieve anything but unnecessary casualties
The situation has recently been aggravated by the murder of US military guiders by Afghan soldiers
Under such severe circumstances, evacuation of troops has become most urgent as early as possible On the other hand, a Super Power like the US cannot afford being Defeated humiliated by Third World Country Terror Organizations Unilateral withdrawal from Afghanistan after 11 years of fighting means actually encouragement of Terror Activation against the Free World everywhere in Future
Analytically, the Winner of the Afghan War is nobody but King Opium who produces
90% of World yield of the Drug
It well known that Terror Organizations feed on Drug Merchandise as their main financial source having Iranian Intermediaries and Russian Blood Speculation as Accomplices
Hence is the Inevitable Conclusion King Opium has to pay the price for his Crimes against Humanity Culminated by Nine Eleven Horrendousness
The Opportunity for Bringing the King to Justice has been engendered currently with the Unmanned Aircraft Invention
I think to have thought about those Aircraft as an efficacious carrier of Herbicides equipped with special Dispersal accessories in order to achieve Desertification of the Narcotic Vegetation mainly Poppy and Coca for Heroine and Cocaine Production prevention.
It is quite plausible that Devastation of Narcotic Vegetation in Asia and in Central America will indicate US Victory instead of an Ignominious Defeat predictable in current reality.
I suggest letting this letter be transferred to the White House in favor of US, Israel and Entire Mankind Affluence Please contact me in order to get full specifications for Unmanned Aircraft Transformation becoming Narcotic Vegetations Eliminators letting small bombers be decisive finally Sincerely,

Gideon Rodeh

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To: H <hdr29@hrcoffice.com>
"Huma Abedin" <ha16@hillaryclinton.com>
"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Podesta" <jp66@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 4/22/2015 6:10:37 PM
Subject: Fwd: Formal response from me

The memo we sent to NYT follows.

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

> From: Brian Fallon <brianefallon@gmail.com >
> Date: April 23, 2015 at 12:50:45 AM EDT
> To: jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com , bfallon@hillaryclinton.com
> Subject: Fwd: Formal response from me
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: Brian Fallon <brianefallon@gmail.com >
> Date: Wed, Apr 22, 2015 at 9:15 PM
> Subject: Formal response from me
> To: Jo Becker <jbecker@nytimes.com >, "McIntire, Mike" <mcintire@nytimes.com >
>
> Below is the campaign's official response to your inquiry.
>
> MEMORANDUM
>
> TO: Jo Becker and Mike McIntyre, New York Times
>
> FROM: Brian Fallon, Hillary for America
>
> DATE: April 22, 2015
> RE: Response to story based on "Clinton Cash"
>
> ---
>
> The below memorandum presents our response to the questions you have posed in the course of your reporting on Peter Schweizer's book, Clinton Cash.
>
> At the outset, it is important to note that no one – neither Mr. Schweizer, nor the Times, nor anyone else -- has ever produced a shred of evidence supporting the theory that Hillary Clinton ever took action as Secretary of State to support the interests of donors to the Clinton Foundation. Therefore, we are extremely disappointed that the New York Times intends to rely on research culled from a biased author like Mr. Schweizer. During our conversations with the Times, it has been unclear to what extent, if at all, the Times' reporting goes beyond the allegations made in Clinton Cash. This is troubling because, as has been well documented already, the book's author is a known Republican operative whose organization has links to the Koch brothers and a major donor to Ted Cruz. Moreover, the book's rollout has been coordinated with another Republican presidential candidate, Rand Paul. It is worrisome that the Times would repeat the claims from such a questionable source.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As we understand it, the crux of your story revolves around the allegations contained in the book's third chapter, entitled "Hillary's Reset." This chapter attempts to trace a connection between Frank Giustra, a known philanthropist who has long partnered with the Clinton Foundation, and the U.S. government's review of the proposed sale of a majority stake in Uranium One to a Russian-based company in 2010.

To suggest the State Department, under then-Secretary Clinton, exerted undue influence in the U.S. government's review of the sale of Uranium One is utterly baseless. It mischaracterizes the nature of the State Department's participation in such reviews, and also ignores the range of other regulatory agencies that ultimately supported this sale. It is impossible to view this allegation as anything other than just another in the many partisan conspiracy theories advanced in the Clinton Cash book.

To begin with, the fact of Mr. Giustra's contributions to the Clinton Foundation is not new. In fact, the only reason his contributions are known to the book's author is because the Foundation goes above and beyond what the law requires of nonprofit foundations in terms of disclosing its donors.

With respect to the State Department, it is but one of nine agencies involved in the CFIUS process. While the details of CFIUS deliberations are classified, it is widely known that it is the Treasury Department that serves as the lead agency in the body's reviews, and that the State Department very seldom serves in the role of "co-lead." Moreover, decisions by CFIUS are made on the basis of consensus. This means that to the extent anyone were to claim that the Uranium One sale might have raised national security questions, agencies such as the Department of Homeland Security and Defense Department would have been party to the approval and could have elevated any concerns to the President if they had them. In light of these facts, it is completely misleading to suggest that the State Department was in a position to steer the approval of this deal.

Apart from the fact that the State Department was one of just nine agencies involved in CFIUS, it is also true that within the State Department, the CFIUS approval process historically does not trigger the personal involvement of the Secretary of State. The State Department's principal representative to CFIUS was the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic, Energy and Business Affairs. During the time period in question, that position was held by Jose Fernandez. As you are aware, Mr. Fernandez has personally attested that "Secretary Clinton never intervened with me on any CFIUS matter."

In addition, the deal in question was approved by a range of regulatory bodies beyond CFIUS. This includes the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Utah Department of Radiation. On account of the target company being Canadian, that country's regulators would also have had to approve the deal. They indeed did so.

The widespread nature of the approval of this transaction stemmed in part from the concessions that Russia made in the course of the review process. Indeed, one of the conditions imposed by the U.S. regulators is that U.S. uranium assets could not be exported and had to be sold in the United States. Senator John Barrasso (R-WY) verified this arrangement and said it satisfied him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In our conversations, you have raised a possible contradiction in the fact that while CFIUS approved this particular transaction, it blocked a separate deal involving U.S. uranium assets sought by the Chinese government. This comparison is inaccurate. According to many press reports, the FirstGold investment was blocked because it was proximate to the Fallon Air Force Base, not because it involved uranium.

The bottom line is that the State Department was but one in a multitude of agencies that participated in the review of this widely supported transaction, and there is no evidence that the Department deviated in any way from its normal process involving CFIUS reviews. In fact, as noted above, the Department's principal representative to CFIUS at the time has confirmed that the Secretary never intervened with him in any CFIUS matter during his tenure there. Any allegations to the contrary are wholly unsubstantiated.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 4/30/2010 7:30:16 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Conservative Myths On Obama Administration's National Security Policies http://www.huffingtonpost.com/patrick-barry/conservatives-peddle-myth_b_558878.html

Conservatives Peddle Myths On Obama Administration's National Security Policies

Conservative commentary on President Obama's national security agenda is in a sorry state these days. Lacking policy alternatives, the right has resorted to peddling distortions in an attempt to sabotage the Administration. But the facts say the opposite. Policies that have weakened terrorist organizations dramatically and restored momentum to global nonproliferation efforts in fact have earned the support of U.S. military leaders and the national security establishment, American citizens at home and global publics abroad. The right's strategy, which may have worked in the past, is clear evidence that the conservative movement is out of touch when it comes to today's national security challenges.

Myth: Administration's nonproliferation policies have failed to advance American security and undermine American standing abroad. A recent Politico article describes Victor Davis Hanson complaining in the National Review that the Administration "has developed a bad habit of talking tough and bullying friendly constitutional states while reaching out to hostile and bad-acting dictatorships. In general, that is unwise foreign policy. In terms of nuclear politics, it is dangerous beyond belief." [Victor Davis Hanson, via Politico, 4/29/10]

Fact: The Obama administration is taking unprecedented action to protect America and its allies from the dual threats of nuclear terrorism and nuclear proliferation - and gaining traction.

- The Obama administration is taking successful steps to increase American security, as demonstrated through meaningful actions taken this spring. After years in which Washington opted to work alone, the US is getting global control of nuclear materials back on track by: signing a New START agreement that challenges other states to follow us in reducing nuclear weapons; clarifying our nuclear posture to support our security and heighten the consequences for proliferator states; bring effective pressure to bear on Iran and North Korea the bring them into compliance; and taking initiatives to curb the threat of nuclear terrorism and lock down all vulnerable nuclear materials worldwide. Additionally, the U.S. will participate in the Nonproliferation Treaty Review Conference next month in New York, allowing the U.S. and the international community to sharpen its response to Iran and North Korea.

- National security experts agree that, by putting nonproliferation issues on the international agenda at a level never seen before, the Obama administration has reasserted U.S. global leadership. As George Schultz, Secretary of State for the Reagan administration stated, "[President Obama] is doing an excellent job. He has put the vision out there and keeps it out there. The nuclear posture review shows he is being careful about American national security at every step. The conference of world leaders on securing fissile material is the right thing to do. Who is going to disagree with that? So you get the whole world working on something and solving a problem. That is always a good step." Administration efforts to reassert U.S. leadership have had an impact. The U.S. - Global Leadership Project sponsored by Gallup and the Meridian International Center found that while approval for the U.S. remained low from 2005 to 2008, in 2009, a majority "approves of the job performance of U.S. leadership (51%) -- a first since Gallup began asking the question worldwide." [George Schultz, 4/14/10 . Gallup, 2/14/10]

Conservative Myth: Obama's counterterrorism policies are naïve and dangerous.

Marco Rubio, the conservative Senatorial candidate in Florida, recently discussed President Obama's counterterrorism policy saying: "It's naive, short-sighted, quite frankly, misguided in terms of what he thinks he's going to accomplish." [Marco Rubio, via Red State, 4/20/10]

Fact: The results speak for themselves: Obama administration has stepped up counterterrorism efforts and the strategy has proven successful.

- The Administration has taken the fight to extremists overseas. Andy Johnson of Third Way writes that, "Since the day President Obama took office, the United States has stepped up the fight against terrorists, and it's working." Johnson points out that, under President Obama's leadership, the U.S. has killed and captured al Qaeda and Taliban Leaders Baitullah Mehsud: Leader of the Pakistani Taliban... Sadam Hussein Al Hussami: A top al Qaeda official, involved in planning the suicide attack against the CIA in Afghanistan...Saleh al Somali: al Qaeda's senior operations planner... Mullah Abdul Ghani Baradar: Taliban Leader Mullah Omar's Deputy, he was believed to be in de facto control of the Taliban in recent years." As well as, "Taliban regional 'shadow governors.'" [Andy Johnson, 3/23/10]
- Vigilance has thwarted terrorist attacks at home, including the most serious plot since 9/11. In addition, the administration has disrupted plots at home including the Bryant Neal Vinas case and the Najibullah Zazi, which the New York Times called "one of the most serious terrorism plots on American soil since Sept. 11, 2001." The U.S. has received actionable intelligence from these cases -without using torture -and others that have lead to further arrests of al Qaeda connected militants. [New York Daily News, 4/12/10 . Michael Isikoff, Newsweek, 2/22/10]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservative Myth: Obama's policies convey weakness to countries like Iran. In an op-ed published in the Wall Street Journal, Harvard Law Progressor Alan Dershowitz accused the President of appeasing Iran.

Reality: The Obama administration's diplomatic efforts have placed intense pressure on Iran. After Iran engagement with Iran, a policy that significantly bolstered the international standing of the United States, failed to bear fruit, the Administration shifted in January to a more assertive pressure track. The President's methodical diplomatic approach, unlike the previous administration's, has won critical international support. As detailed by the Washington Independent, President Obama will soon be the one who "shepherds an economic sanctions package on the Iranian regime's key organs through the United Nations Security Council. After winning China's acquiescence; spending almost a year and a half rebuilding relations with Russia; and leveraging new and less patient leadership at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the administration has pieces in position to unite the international community against Iran's uranium enrichment." Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns observed that Iran's international isolation has increased because of Obama's engagement: "He [Obama] had to build up political capital...The reality is that Iran is more isolated today because of this strategy, and because of their own behavior, than they were a year ago." Even Iran hawk John McCain recognized the benefits of the administration's approach, saying, "I never thought a policy of engagement with Iran's rulers would succeed, but I understand why the president pursued it." [Washington Independent, 4/19/10 . John McCain, via the NY Times, 4/15/10. R. Nicholas Burns, via NY Times, 2/11/10]

Myth: Obama administration policies have hurt America's military. The Obama administration is facing off against military leadership, weakening the armed forces, and, in William Kristol's words, cutting the defense budget "to a level at which maintaining the dominant military we have become accustomed to since the end of the Cold War will almost certainly be a thing of the past." [Weekly Standard, 5/3/10]

Reality: Military leadership and bipartisan national security leaders say they have the resources to complete their missions and prepare for future threats. There is wide support amongst experts that the Obama administration has taken principled and pragmatic position on a host of issues in order to keep America secure.

- Budget. Despite Kristol's fuzzy math, defense spending remains at historically high levels. This year alone, between the "baseline" budget and the spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Defense Department will shell out741.2 billion. The Center for a New American Security notes that: "in inflation-adjusted dollars and including war costs, the fiscal year 2011 Pentagon budget request is 13 percent higher than the Korea War peak; 33 percent higher than the Vietnam War peak; 23 percent higher than the Reagan-era 1980s peak; 64 percent higher than the Cold War average; and 15 percent higher than the post-9/11 average." [CNAS, February 2010 . Slate, 3/1/10]
- Afghanistan-Pakistan. When testifying to Congress after President Obama announced his strategy for the war in Afghanistan, ISAF Commander Gen. Stanley McChrystal told Congress that he had the resources and support he needed to carry out the mission there: "I agree with the president's decision. And I believe that it provides me the resources that we need to execute the strategy to accomplish the mission as outlined for us." [NPR, 12/8/2009]
- Iran. Military leaders have lined up to support the Administration's policy on Iran. Chairman of the Joints Chiefs Adm. Michael Mullen said President Obama "has made it very clear that we certainly seek to ensure that Iran does not obtain that capability, and that's the policy... Clearly the priority right now is the engagement, dialogue, sanctions piece, which I fully support." [Admiral Michael Mullen via Bloomberg, 4/30/10]
- "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." One day after Adm. Mullen expressed his "personal belief" that the discriminatory policy to ban gays in the military be repealed, Retired General Colin Powell expressed his support the President's policy. "If the chiefs and commanders are comfortable with moving to change the policy," Powell said, "then I support it." [Washington Post, 2/4/10]
- Energy and climate. Navy Secretary Ray Mabus said of the military's efforts on this subject that "The stakes could not be higher... energy reform will make us better fighters. In the end, it is a matter of energy independence and it is a matter of national security. Our dependence on foreign sources of petroleum makes us vulnerable in too many ways. The stakes are clear and the stakes are high. Our response has to be equal to that challenge." [Pew Project on National Security, Energy and Climate, 4/20/10 . Navy Secretary Ray Mabus, 4/20/10]

Conservative Myth: American public deeply concerned with President's national security policies. Conservatives have continually sought to suggest public disapproval for the Obama administration's national security policies.

Reality: Americans have expressed strong confidence in the President's handling of the country's top national security issues.

- Poll after poll finds the American people strongly supportive of the President's handling of national security issues. An ABC\Washington Post Poll released this week found the public approving of Obama's handling of the war in Afghanistan 56% to 36%. The same poll shows Americans approving of his nonproliferation agenda 49% to 37%. A Democracy Corps survey done in February, and released in March had even more impressive numbers. On issues ranging from America's wars to leadership of the military to fighting terrorism, clear majorities of the American people approve of the President.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Support for Obama administration's national security policies also runs deep. As broadly as Americans support the Obama administration's foreign policy actions, there is growing evidence that such support has deep roots. Additionally, public anxiety over U.S. foreign policy has also eased since Obama took office. According to Public Agenda's Confidence in U.S. Foreign Policy Index, the foreign policy anxiety indicator has dropped 10-points to 122, the lowest level recorded since Public Agenda introduced the indicator in 2006. [Washington Post\ABC, 4/28/10 . Democracy Corps, March 2010 . Public Agenda, Spring 2010]

Adam Blickstein
Communications Director
National Security Network
202-289-7113 (office)
617-335-0859 (mobile)
ablickstein@nsnetwork.org

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Cammie Croft" <cammie@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/8/2008 6:15:42 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech to LULAC Washington, DC 07/08/09

Hello All,

Just off the phone with our tracker Kelli who made it into today's event. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- McCain addresses struggling economy, highlights his job growth plan
- Newest health care plan sound byte: ' I intend to make health care more available to more Americans by making it more affordable and portable.'
- Highlights support for free trade: 'A little straight-talk, the global economy is here to stay.'
- Characterizes the problems/inequities in education for Hispanic and African-American families as the biggest 'civil rights challenge of our time'
- Highlights the key points of his Lexington Project plan
- Talks about comprehensive immigration reform and our 'humanitarian responsibilities'
- Works in a story about his experience as a POW: 'When I was in prison in Vietnam, I like other of my fellow POWs, was offered early release by my captors. Most of us refused because we were bound to our code of conduct, which said those who had been captured the earliest had to be released the soonest. My friend, Everett Alvarez, a brave American of Mexican descent, had been shot down years before I was, and had suffered for his country much more and much longer than I had. To leave him behind would have shamed us.'

Washington, DC: McCain Speech to the League of United Latin American Citizens 07/08/09

Background Details:
- Audience 600-700 in size, predominately Hispanic, middle-age crowd
- Audience was noticeably more supportive of McCain in applause and campaign chum than previous speech to NALEO
- Press included all major networks, traveling press and local networks as well as Spanish speaking stations
- Tracker had no trouble getting in
- No noticeable demonstrators/protesters

FULL Remarks
LINK: http://thepage.time.com/mccains-address-to-lulac/
REMARKS BY JOHN MCCAIN TO THE 79th ANNUAL LULAC CONVENTION

Thank you. I'm very pleased to be here to discuss with you some of the issues in this campaign that most concern Americans, particularly the issue that worries us the most — the American economy.

All of us know what is happening to the economy. It is slowing. Over 400,000 people have lost their jobs since December, and the rate of new job creation has fallen sharply. Some economists have noted that companies seem to be on a "hiring strike." Americans are worried about the security of their current job, and they're worried that they, their kids and their neighbors may not find good jobs and new opportunities in the future. To make matters worse, gas is over $4 a gallon and the price of oil has nearly doubled in the last year. The cost of everything from energy to food is rising.

I have a plan to grow the economy, create more and better jobs, and get America moving again. I have a plan to reform government, achieve energy security, and ensure that healthcare and a quality education are affordable and available for all. I believe the role of government is to unleash the creativity, ingenuity and hard work of the American people, and make it easier to create jobs.

At its core, the economy isn't the sum of an array of bewildering statistics. It's about where Americans work, how theylive, how the pay their bills today and save for tomorrow. It's about small businesses opening their doors, hiring employees and growing. It's about giving workers the education and training to find a good job and prosper in it. It's about the aspirations of the American people to build a better life for their families; dreams that begin with a job.

So how are we going to create good jobs? Let's start with small businesses, which create the majority of all jobs. A recent report says small businesses have created 233,000 jobs so far this year while other sectors are losing jobs. Small businesses are the job engine of America, and I will make it easier for them to grow and create more jobs. There are two million Latino owned businesses in America, a number that is growing very rapidly. The first consideration we should have when debating tax policy is how we can help those companies grow and increase the prosperity of the millions of American families whose economic security depends on their success.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is a terrible mistake to raise taxes during an economic downturn. Increasing the tax burden on Americans impedes job growth, discourages innovation and makes us less competitive. Small businesses are the biggest job creators in our economy. Keeping individual rates low isn't intended as a favor to wealthy Americans. 23 million small business owners pay those rates, and taking more money from them deprives them of the capital they need to invest and grow and hire. If you believe you should pay more taxes, I am the wrong candidate for you. Jobs are the most important thing our economy creates. When you raise taxes in a bad economy you eliminate jobs. I'm not going to let that happen. I will keep current rates low and cut them where I can. For those of you with children, I will double the child deduction from $3500 to $7000 for every dependent, in every family in America. I will reduce the estate tax to fifteen percent, so parents who have spent long years working hard to build a business, and provide a decent living to their employees, can leave the product of a lifetime of labor and love to their children.

My health care plan is careful not to impose greater burdens on small business. A "pay or play" health mandate on small business would add a crushing $12,000 to the cost of employing anyone with a family. That would not only prevent them from creating new jobs, but will force them to cut jobs, and reduce the wages of current employees to pay for it. I intend to make health care more available to more Americans by making it more affordable and portable. The answer is to get health care costs under control by creating real competition among insurance companies, reforming the way medical treatment is billed, and helping American families make their own health care decisions with a $5000 tax credit.

Our current business tax rate, the second highest in the world, will postpone our recovery from this downturn and make us increasingly less competitive in the world economy. When a corporation plans to expand and hire more workers, they face a choice between building a new plant here at home or building it in a country where they will pay a third or a half the tax rate they pay in America. Employers can hire more people, or they can pay more taxes. They can rarely do both. We can no longer afford the luxury of nostalgia for past times when American business faced little serious competition in the world. I propose to reduce the business tax rate from 35 percent to 25 percent.

The global economy is here to stay. We cannot build walls to foreign competition, and we shouldn't want to. When have Americans ever been afraid of competition? America is the biggest exporter, importer, producer, manufacturer, and innovator in the world. That's why I reject the false virtues of economic isolationism. Any confident, competent country and its government should embrace competition - it makes us stronger - not hide from our competitors and cheat our consumers and workers. We can compete and win, as we always have, or we can be left behind. Lowering barriers to trade creates more and better jobs, and higher wages. It keeps inflation under control. It makes goods more affordable for low and middle income consumers. Ninety-five percent of the world's consumers live outside the U.S. Our future prosperity depends on opening more of these markets, not closing them.

For Americans who have lost their job to foreign competition, I have proposed a comprehensive reform of our unemployment insurance and worker retraining programs. We will use our community colleges to help train workers for specific opportunities in their communities. And for workers of a certain age who have lost a job that won't come back, we'll help make up the difference in wages between their old job and a temporary, lower paid one until they've completed retraining and found secure new employment at a decent wage.

In the global economy what you learn is what you earn. Today, studies show that half of Hispanics and half of AfricanAmericans entering high school do not graduate with their class. By the 12th grade, U.S. students in math and science score near the bottom of all industrialized nations. Many parents fear their children won't have the same opportunities they had. That is unacceptable in a country as great as ours. In many schools, particularly where people are struggling the hardest, the situation is dire, and I believe poses the civil rights challenge of our time. We need to shake up failed school bureaucracies with competition; hold schools accountable for results; strengthen math, science, technology and engineering curriculums; empower parents with choice; remove barriers to qualified instructors, attract and reward superior teachers, and have a fair but sure process to weed out incompetents.

Few problems hurt Americans more than our dangerous dependence on foreign oil, and the rapid and dramatic increase in the price of gasoline it has caused. Obviously, the crisis hurts lower income Americans, who often drive the furthest to work and own the oldest cars. But because the cost of almost everything is affected directly by the cost of oil, the quality of life for many millions of Americans and the growth and hiring plans of millions of small businesses are suffering. Our dependence on foreign oil has been thirty years in the making, and was caused by the failure of politicians in Washington to think long term about the future of the country. If we don't act now to achieve energy security, we are putting our national security, our economy and our environment at grave risk. By 2030, America's demand for energy will rise by nearly twenty percent. Our jobs and our very way of life depend on the next President beginnin g to solve this challenge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two weeks ago, I announced the Lexington Project to secure our energy future, named for the place where Americans first fought for their independence. We will begin by producing more of our own oil and gas. Increasing our own supply will send a message to the market and result in lower prices for oil and gas.

We will develop more clean energy. Nuclear power is the most dependable source of zero-emission energy we have. We will build at least 45 new nuclear plants that will create over 700,000 good jobs to construct and operate them.

The development of clean coal technology will create jobs in some of America's most economically disadvantaged areas. Our coal reserves are larger than Saudi Arabia's supply of oil. Clean coal demonstration projects alone will employ over 30,000 Americans.

My proposal to help automakers design and sell new generations of cars that don't depend on gasoline will re-invigorate that struggling industry. My plan to develop wind and solar power and renewable technologies will drive innovation and create high tech jobs. The Lexington Project will create millions of jobs, help protect our environment, improve our security, and solve the nation's energy problems. It is an ambitious plan, but I am confident our American workers, industry and entrepreneurs are up to this next great challenge in our history. The genius, hard work and courage of Americans have never failed us, and will not fail us now.

Let me close by talking briefly about my respect and gratitude for the contributions of Hispanic-Americans to the culture, economy and security of the country I have served all my adult life. I represent Arizona where Spanish was spoken before English was, and where the character and prosperity of our state owes a great deal to the many Arizonans of Hispanic descent who live there. And I know this country, which I love more than almost anything, would be the poorer were we deprived of the patriotism, industry and decency of those millions of Americans whose families came here from other countries in our hemisphere. I will honor their contributions to America for as long as I live.

I and many other colleagues twice attempted to pass comprehensive immigration legislation to fix our broken borders; ensure respect for the laws of this country; recognize the important economic necessity of immigrant laborers; apprehend those who came here illegally to commit crimes; and deal practically and humanely with those who came here, as my distant ancestors did, to build a better, safer life for their families, without excusing the fact they came here illegally or granting them privileges before those who have been waiting their turn outside the country. Many Americans, with good cause, did not believe us when we said we would secure our borders, and so we failed in our efforts. We must prove to them that we can and will secure our borders first, while respecting the dignity and rights of citizens and legal residents of the United States. But we must not make the mistake of thinking that our responsibility to meet this challenge will end with that accomplishment. We have economic and humanitarian responsibilities as well, and they require no less dedication from us in meeting them.

When I was in prison in Vietnam, I like other of my fellow POWs, was offered early release by my captors. Most of us refused because we were bound to our code of conduct, which said those who had been captured the earliest had to be released the soonest. My friend, Everett Alvarez, a brave American of Mexican descent, had been shot down years before I was, and had suffered for his country much more and much longer than I had. To leave him behind would have shamed us. When you take the solemn stroll along that wall of black granite on the national Mall, it is hard not to notice the many names such as Rodriguez, Hernandez, and Lopez that so sadly adorn it. When you visit Iraq and Afghanistan you will meet some of the thousands of Hispanic-Americans who serve there, and many of those who risk their lives to protect the rest of us do not yet possess the rights and privileges of full citizenship in the country they love so well. To love your country, as I discovered in Vietnam, is to love your countrymen. Those men and women are my brothers and sisters, my fellow Americans, an association that means more to me than any other. As a private citizen or as your President, I will never, never do anything to dishonor our obligations to them and their families or to forget what they and their ancestors have done to make this country the beautiful, bountiful, blessed place we love.

Thank you.

--
Cammie L. Croft
Tracking/Media Monitoring Director
Progressive Accountability Office
cammie@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7679 (office)
206-999-3064 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: theSkimm <dailyskimm@morning7.theskimm.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/19/2015 9:24:06 PM
Subject: Daily Skimm: Carpe diem

Is this email not displaying correctly? View it in your browser.

theSkimm

Skimm for August 20th

Skimm'd with late-night sushi.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Embarrassing now, but you'll get over it" – An encouraging message from the group that hacked Ashley Madison, a website for people who want to cheat. Yesterday, as many as 37 million of their names were leaked online. And divorce lawyers everywhere rejoiced.

SKIMM THIS

SOMETIMES IRAN, SOMETIMES I HIDE

THE STORY

The Iran nuclear deal is facing a big vote soon. And now there's a twist.

BACK UP.

For years, Iran's been accused of trying to develop nuclear weapons. The country has always responded 'nope, not us.' Earlier this summer, Iran and six world powers (including the US) signed a deal to end the nuke drama by lifting sanctions in exchange for limits to Iran's program. Congress now has to approve that deal.

SO WHAT'S THE TWIST?

Yesterday, the AP reported that there's a side agreement attached to the deal. It allows Iran to use its own inspectors (instead of UN inspectors) at a site that's allegedly been used to develop nuclear weapons. This news makes the deal even more controversial, with critics saying it puts too much trust in Iran to police itself. b

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Haim Saban" <kussa@saban.com>
To: "Hspeumpottsa Abedin (Huma@clintonemail.com)" <Huma@clintonemail.com>
Date: 3/30/2015 6:26:05 AM
Subject: RE: Hillary Clinton Tells Malcolm Hoenlein Wants to Improve Relations With Israel

Also pls be aware that these articles will be mailed to thousands of people who are interested in the subject matter and who have been asking themselves ,,,,and me ,many times "Where is Hillary on this"
Well ,,,,,now they will know.
Adding John .

From: Haim Saban
Sent: Monday, March 30, 2015 5:56 AM
To: Hspeumpottsa Abedin (Huma@clintonemail.com)
Cc: Laura Hartigan; Alex De Ocampo
Subject: FW: Hillary Clinton Tells Malcolm Hoenlein Wants to Improve Relations With Israel

Hey Huma.
A very good statement ,,,,,w/o saying anything that would show even a sign of criticism of the administration.
Very smart and politically correct.
Pls say thanks to the lady.

Below: NYT & Algemeiner

Clinton Wants to Improve Ties With Israel

By MAGGIE HABERMANMARCH 29, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton told a representative of a group of prominent Jewish leaders on Sunday that she wanted to put the relationship between the United States and Israel back on "constructive footing," the representative said.

Mrs. Clinton's comments, made in a phone call to Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, contrasted in tone from recent remarks by members of the Obama administration, who have publicly criticized Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel amid tensions over a nuclear deal with Iran and comments Mr. Netanyahu made in the final days of his re-election campaign this month.

"Secretary Clinton thinks we need to all work together to return the special U.S.-Israel relationship to constructive footing, to get back to basic shared concerns and interests, including a two-state solution pursued through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians," Mr. Hoenlein said in a statement issued by his organization on Sunday evening. "We must ensure that Israel never becomes a partisan issue," he quoted her as saying. Mrs. Clinton knows Mr. Hoenlein from her time in the Senate.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton confirmed that she had spoken to Mr. Hoenlein, but would not elaborate on what they had discussed or say if he had quoted her accurately.

Mrs. Clinton's comments are her first on the United States- Israeli relationship to be made public since Mr. Netanyahu's re-election on March 17, when the strains between the two countries reached their height in the days surrounding the election. Mr. Netanyahu urged supporters to counter Israeli Arabs who he said were voting in "droves," comments widely criticized as racist , and asserted that no Palestinian state would be established on his watch, a statement that President Obama 's chief of staff, Denis McDonough, called "very troubling."

After his victory, Mr. Netanyahu backed off both statements. Obama administration officials have left open the possibility of changing the United States' stance on Israel at the United Nations since the election. Historically, the United States has acted as a shield for resolutions that Israel found troublesome.

A senior White House official was quoted by The Wall Street Journal recently suggesting that some in the Obama administration felt "personally sold out," after accusations that Israel had spied on negotiations for an Iran nuclear deal and that those aides could be around for the "next administration," a clear reference to a potential Clinton White House.

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/03/30/us/politics/hillary-clinton-wants-to-improve-relations-with-israel.html?_r=0

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Algemeiner

Hillary Clinton Breaks Silence on US-Israel Tensions Under Obama, Calls for Return of 'Constructive' Relationship

March 29, 2015 7:50 pm 65 comments

After weeks of escalating criticism of Israel by the Obama Administration, Hillary Clinton, former Secretary of State and the leading 2016 Democratic presidential contender, on Sunday called for the renewal of the "special" relationship between the US and the Jewish state.

In a telephone conversation with Malcolm Hoenlein, Executive Vice Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Clinton said that she "thinks we need to all work together to return the special US-Israel relationship to constructive footing, to get back to basic shared concerns and interests."

The Secretary said this includes "a two-state solution pursued through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians." She further noted that, "we must ensure that Israel never becomes a partisan issue."

Mr. Hoenlein, who initiated the conversation, said that, "Secretary Clinton's views are of special importance and timeliness given recent issues in the US-Israel relationship. We note her call for direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, which, we believe, is the only possible route to a true peace."

Clinton's comments follow weeks of escalating criticisms from the Obama Administration mainly addressing comments made by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu days before his reelection earlier this month. The latest attacks follow a pattern of aggressive language directed towards Israel's leaders throughout the Obama presidency which has been marked by a number of stark policy differences between the Israelis and the White House.

A number of major Jewish leaders have spoken out in recent days, calling on the White House to tone down its rhetoric and to respect the historic bipartisan nature of US-Israel relations.

Explaining the significance of Clinton's comments Hoenlein told The Algemeiner, "As the leading candidate for the Democratic nomination, her words are especially significant and impactful."

"We believe that it is particularly important, given the challenges Israel and the region are facing, that the US and Israel stand together to advance their shared concerns and interests," Hoenlein added. "There is too much at stake to do otherwise."

http://www.algemeiner.com/2015/03/29/hillary-clinton-breaks-silence-on-us-israel-tensions-under-obama-calls-for-return-of-special-relationship/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 9/20/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: E urope's Next Problem: U.S. Sanctions Agains t China

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | Support GMF

Europe's Next Problem: U.S. Sanctions Against China

Hans Kundnani — September 21, 2015

BERLIN—During the last two weeks, it has been widely reported that the U.S. government has been developing a package of unprecedented economic sanctions against Chinese companies and individuals it alleges have benefited from cybertheft by their government. There seems to be a consensus in the United States behind a tougher response to Chinese hackers — five of whom were already indicted in May 2014. But, according to several reports, there were differences within the administration about whether or not to announce the sanctions before Chinese President Xi Jinping's visit to Washington, which begins on September 22. While the State Department wanted to delay the announcement — one official quoted in the Financial Times said it would "crater" the visit and there has even been speculation that China could cancel the visit if sanctions were imposed beforehand — law enforcement officials want to send a message that the United States was serious.

If the United States does go ahead with this tough new approach, it may create a dilemma for Europeans analogous to the one they faced after the United States imposed economic sanctions in response to the Russian annexation of Crimea last year...

FULL ARTICLE

Hans Kundnani is a senior transatlantic fellow with GMF's Europe program, based in Berlin. Follow him @hanskundnani .

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tara McGuinness" <tmcguinness@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/17/2008 2:04:33 AM
Subject: [big campaign] don't miss this NYT piece - NYT: How Close McCain Is to Bush Depends on the Issue

NYT: How Close McCain Is to Bush Depends on the Issue

By ELISABETH BUMILLER
Published: June 17, 2008

WASHINGTON — The Democrats like to say that electing Senator John McCain would usher in the third term of George W. Bush, and they do not mean it as a compliment. The Republicans counter that calling the senator "McBush" is political spin and that Mr. McCain is his own man.

A look at Mr. McCain's 25-year record in the House and Senate, his 2008 campaign positions and his major speeches over the last three months indicates that on big-ticket issues — the economy, support for continuing the Iraq war, health care — his stances are indeed similar to Mr. Bush's brand of conservatism. Mr. McCain's positions are nearly identical to the president's on abortion and the types of judges he says he would appoint to the courts. On the environment, American diplomacy and nuclear proliferation, Mr. McCain has strikingly different views from Mr. Bush, and while he shares the president's goals in Iraq, he was at times an outspoken critic of the way the war was managed.

The disparities between the two are murkier on other issues. On immigration, Mr. McCain started out with Mr. Bush — at odds with the Republican mainstream — by favoring a path to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants, then backed off and emphasized the border-security-first approach favored by a majority of his party.

When it comes to dealing with terrorism suspects, Mr. McCain has supported imposing tighter rules than favored by the administration on the use of harsh interrogation techniques, but has consistently been with the president on limiting the legal rights of Guantánamo detainees. In one indicator that his view of executive power is moving closer to that of Mr. Bush, his campaign has recently signaled that he believes it was constitutional for the president to authorize wiretaps without warrants to monitor Americans' international phone calls and e-mail.

Mr. McCain has reversed himself on some issues — most notably, embracing the Bush tax cuts now after deriding them initially as fiscally risky and excessively skewed to the wealthy — and continues to adjust his positions on others. On Monday, he said he continued to oppose opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, leaving him at odds with the White House and most of his party, but said he favored giving states more flexibility to decide whether to explore for oil off their coasts.

On balance, the McCain campaign has sought to emphasize the differences between Mr. McCain and the unpopular Mr. Bush rather than the similarities.

"In the last 10 years, he's been an independent voice for what he thinks is in his country's best interest," said Mark Salter, one of Mr. McCain's closest advisers. "Sometimes it's brought him into conflict with members of his party and with the president. The Democrats know that."

Yet while it would be hard to categorize him as a doctrinaire Republican or conservative, Mr. McCain appears to have ceded some of his carefully cultivated reputation as a maverick.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a CBS News poll two weeks ago, 43 percent of registered voters said they believed he would continue Mr. Bush's policies, and 21 percent said he would be more conservative in his policies than Mr. Bush. Twenty-eight percent said he would be less conservative than Mr. Bush.

Presidencies are about more than policies, of course, and Mr. McCain would bring a different style, background and world view to the White House should he be elected in November.

Although he once held very different views, Mr. McCain's biggest similarity to Mr. Bush now is on the economy. Not only does the senator now support making permanent the large Bush tax cuts he once opposed — the $1.35 trillion tax reduction of 2001 and the $320 billion tax cut of 2003 — but he has proposed four major new tax cuts of his own.

Democrats say that those four proposed cuts — a reduction in the corporate tax rate to 25 percent from 35 percent, immediate tax breaks for corporate investment, a repeal of the alternative minimum tax and doubling the value of exemptions for dependents to $7,000 from $3,500 — are more regressive than Mr. Bush's tax cuts because they favor the rich more disproportionately than the president's reductions did. Mr. McCain's advisers said his plan would help stimulate job creation by reducing taxes on small businesses, especially those that pay taxes at the personal income tax rate, and would be part of a fiscal plan that would also emphasize reining in the growth of government spending far more than Mr. Bush did.

On health care, Mr. McCain has a market-oriented model similar to the one that Mr. Bush proposed to little effect in 2007. Like Mr. Bush, Mr. McCain would shift the emphasis from insurance provided by employers to insurance bought by individuals, and would offer a tax benefit for families to do so.

"In general, they're much more similar than different," said Drew Altman, the president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a health research group. "In terms of their goals, they're more focused on making the market more efficient than in expanding coverage."

Mr. McCain's proposal, however, is more progressive in that it offers a refundable credit of $5,000 to families to buy their own insurance, whether or not they pay taxes — in effect, cash. Although experts have questioned whether the $5,000 tax credit would cover the cost of private insurance, they generally say that Mr. Bush's plan, which offered a $15,000 tax deduction for families buying their own insurance, was more valuable to higher-income people.

On the Iraq war, Mr. McCain has been one of the president's biggest defenders of its stated rationale: saving the world from Saddam Hussein. Yet he was also an early advocate of increasing troop levels at a time when Mr. Bush was resistant, and was withering, from 2004 on, about Donald H. Rumsfeld, then defense secretary, and what Mr. McCain called Mr. Rumsfeld's "whack a mole" strategy of moving American troops from one violence-plagued part of Iraq to another.

Like Mr. Bush, Mr. McCain has steadfastly refused to set dates for withdrawals of troops and envisions a long-term American presence in the country. But last month, in the general election battleground state of Ohio, Mr. McCain did a semantic dance and said he expected that most American troops would be home from Iraq by 2013.

On abortion, Mr. McCain has long been opposed, and is in fact more explicit than the president in his opposition to Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that established a constitutional right to abortion. Although Mr. Bush has spoken about changing American "hearts and minds" to build a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"culture of life," Mr. McCain has said directly, in South Carolina in 2007, that Roe v. Wade "should be overturned."

On judges, Mr. McCain has strongly embraced the judicial philosophy of Mr. Bush and vowed to appoint conservative judges in the mold of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

On gay rights, Mr. McCain voted against a proposed constitutional amendment backed by Mr. Bush banning same-sex marriage , saying that it should be up to the states. Then in 2006, he made it clear how he thought his home state, Arizona, should decide: Mr. McCain appeared in a television commercial in support of a state amendment, which ultimately failed, to ban same-sex marriages.

Perhaps Mr. McCain's biggest departure from the president is on climate change . Mr. McCain has called for mandatory limits on greenhouse gas emissions, unlike Mr. Bush, who says such limits would be bad for the economy. Mr. McCain also supports a "cap and trade" system in which power plants and other polluters could meet limits on heat-trapping gases like carbon dioxide by either reducing emissions on their own or by buying credits from more efficient producers.

Mr. McCain, who has a mixed record on the environment in the Senate — he has missed votes on toughening fuel economy standards and has opposed tax breaks meant to encourage alternative energy — has nonetheless tried to highlight what he considers his stark environmental divide with Mr. Bush.

"There is a longstanding, significant, deep, strong difference on this issue between myself and the administration," Mr. McCain said last month.

On diplomacy, Mr. McCain has regularly distanced himself from the go-it-alone unilateralism of the Bush administration.

"We cannot build an enduring peace based on freedom by ourselves, and we do not want to," Mr. McCain said in a major foreign policy address in Los Angeles in late March. "We have to strengthen our global alliances as the core of a new compact."

In the same vein, Mr. McCain has significantly broken with Mr. Bush on nuclear security policy. Unlike the president, he supports a legally binding accord between the United States and Russia on limiting nuclear weapons, the elimination of tactical nuclear weapons in Europe, a strengthening of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, increased financing for the International Atomic Energy Agency and nuclear talks with China.

On Iran and North Korea, the two nations whose nuclear programs will present the next president with a tough set of options, Mr. McCain has allied himself with the Bush administration. He would refuse to engage in unconditional diplomacy with Iran and would continue to maintain contact with North Korea, primarily through multilateral talks. He has insisted, however, that the United States be able to verify effectively any agreement in which North Korea promises to abandon its nuclear weapons.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/17/us/politics/17policy.html?_r=1&hp=&oref=slogin&pagewanted=all

And don't miss the chart of policies and smiley photo of Bush and McCain:

http://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2008/06/17/us/politics/20080617_POLICY_GRAPHIC.html

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/12/2014 2:07:03 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Tuesday August 12, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday August 12, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

New York Times: "Attacking Obama Policy, Hillary Clinton Exposes Different Worldviews"

"As Mrs. Clinton stakes out her own foreign policy positions in advance of a possible campaign for the White House, there are likely to be other cases where her statements do not seem entirely in sync with her record as secretary of state."

Washington Post: "Hillary Clinton criticizes President Obama's foreign policy in interview with the Atlantic"

"Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton has not yet said whether she will pursue the presidency. But for a candidate-in-waiting, she is clearly carving out a foreign policy distinct from the man she used to serve."

Politico Magazine: "Saving Syria Is No 'Fantasy'"

[Subtitle:] "Hillary Clinton's former adviser says Obama stood alone against calls to arm the rebels."

New York Times column: David Brooks: "Clinton, Obama and Iraq"

"If you don't take steady, aggressive preventive action, of the sort that Clinton leans toward, then you end up compelled to take the sort of large risky action that Obama abhors."

Politico: "Jeffrey Goldberg: Hillary Clinton line seemed like 'shot' at President Obama"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"'Hillary hedged in this interview,' Goldberg told Andrea Mitchell. 'And she's not attacking the president, but I think she felt like, 'You know what, I thought this, and I think events are bearing out the truth of what I advocated for.'"

Talking Points Memo blog: TPM Editor's Blog: "Hillary's Delicate, Dangerous Game"

"Quite apart from the pros and cons of particular foreign policy strategies, I believe the great majority of partisan Democrats feel protective of the President. So it's a delicate, perilous thing to criticize him so publicly, particularly at a politically vulnerable moment, especially when the nature of the criticism mirrors that of many of the President's most dogged and aggrieved foes."

The Hill: "Hillary shows her hawkish side"

"Clinton's foreign policy differs from Obama's in that it is "a little more muscular, a little more deliberate and less deliberative," he added."

The Daily Beast: "Exclusive: Obama Told Lawmakers Criticism of His Syria Policy is 'Horsesh*t'"

"The argument that America should have done more in Syria, made for years by foreign policy leaders in both parties and several members of Obama's senior national security team, was brought back to the fore this past weekend."

Capital New York: "Schumer: Hillary would be 'so happy' with D.N.C. in Brooklyn"

"Among the reasons New York's senior senator sees that Brooklyn should get the 2016 Democratic National Convention: The location would suit the party's most likely nominee."

CBS News: "As Hillary Clinton criticizes Obama, conservatives balk"

"Criticism of Clinton's remarks was more muted on the left, though some anti-interventionist liberals took issue with her statements."

Politico: "Karl Rove: Clinton tries to be 'Goldilocks'"

"Karl Rove on Monday characterized Hillary Clinton's split with the president on foreign affairs as the former secretary of state painting herself as 'Goldilocks.'"

Articles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times: "Attacking Obama Policy, Hillary Clinton Exposes Different Worldviews"

By Mark Landler

August 11, 2014

For the 19 months since Hillary Rodham Clinton departed as President Obama's secretary of state, she and Mr. Obama, and their respective aides, have labored to preserve a veneer of unity over how they worked together and how they view the world.

On Sunday, that veneer shattered — the victim of Mrs. Clinton's remarkably blunt interview with the Atlantic correspondent, Jeffrey Goldberg, in which she criticized not just Mr. Obama's refusal to aid the rebels in Syria but his shorthand description of his entire foreign policy.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," Mrs. Clinton said, referring to the line that Mr. Obama has used with aides and reporters to describe his reluctance to inject the United States into messy foreign conflicts.

Mrs. Clinton said she assumed the line was more a "political message" for a war-weary American public than his actual worldview — an interpretation that makes her words even more stinging, since "don't do stupid stuff" was in fact the animating principle for the new foreign policy blueprint that Mr. Obama laid out at West Point in May.

That Mrs. Clinton is more hawkish than Mr. Obama is no surprise to anyone who watched a Democratic primary debate in 2008. Her policy differences with the president are well-documented: She favored supplying arms to moderate Syrian rebels, leaving behind a larger residual force in Iraq, and waiting longer before pulling American support for Egypt's former President Hosni Mubarak during the historic protests in Cairo.

What has changed is her readiness to surface those differences and put them in the context of a different worldview. Even her memoir, "Hard Choices," which she was promoting in her interview with Mr. Goldberg, soft-pedaled the gaps and painted a portrait of her and Mr. Obama in lock step in rebuilding America's tattered image abroad.

Now, though, Mrs. Clinton is suggesting that she and the president hold fundamentally different views of American power: his view cautious, inward-looking, suffused with a sense of limits; hers muscular, optimistic, unabashedly old-fashioned.

"You know, when you're down on yourself, and when you are hunkering down and pulling back, you're not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward," Mrs. Clinton said to Mr. Goldberg. "One issue is that we don't even tell our own story very well these days."

Much of the interview's resonance is in its timing, coming two days after Mr. Obama authorized airstrikes against Sunni militants in Iraq. Mrs. Clinton's aides say this was a coincidence; the session was scheduled long before anyone knew about military action.

Still, when Mrs. Clinton says "the failure to help build up a credible fighting force" against President Bashar al-Assad in Syria "left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," it suggests Mr. Obama's refusal to arm the rebels might end up being a singular misjudgment.

At the time of the Obama administration's internal debate over that decision, several officials said, Mrs. Clinton's advocacy was far less thunderous: the United States had tried every diplomatic channel with Syria, she said, and nothing else had worked, so why not try funneling weapons to the moderate rebels.

As Mrs. Clinton stakes out her own foreign policy positions in advance of a possible campaign for the White House, there are likely to be other cases where her statements do not seem entirely in sync with her record as secretary of state.

At the end of her tenure, for example, Mrs. Clinton wrote a memo to Mr. Obama recommending that the United States lift its half-century-old trade embargo against Cuba. It was not a position that she seriously advocated while at the State Department, officials said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton also dashed off an exit memo warning about President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, which White House aides said was redundant, since his behavior was already clear by then. At the beginning of the administration, she was an enthusiastic proponent of the administration's attempt to reset relations with Russia.

In the interview with The Atlantic, Mrs. Clinton said she had always been in the camp of those who believed that Iran had no right to enrich uranium. Yet in December 2010, she was one of the first American officials to acknowledge publicly, in an interview with the BBC, that Iran could emerge from nuclear negotiations with the right to enrich.

Mrs. Clinton is not the only former cabinet member to part company with Mr. Obama on foreign policy. Robert M. Gates, the former defense secretary, wrote a memoir laced with scathing criticism of the administration's approach to Afghanistan and other crises.

In a New York Times article in April about Mrs. Clinton, Leon E. Panetta, the former defense secretary and C.I.A. director, said, "The president has made some tough decisions. But it's been a mixed record, and the concern is, the president defining what America's role in the world is in the 21st century hasn't happened."

But because of their long history and Mrs. Clinton's political future, advisers to her and Mr. Obama have worked especially hard to head off any discord. Her staff gave parts of her memoir to Benjamin J. Rhodes, a deputy national security adviser, for vetting before publication.

And interlocking staffs has been a big factor in that effort. Jake Sullivan, Mrs. Clinton's top policy adviser at the State Department, went to work as national security adviser to Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr., a post that allowed him to convey the White House's sensitivities to her aides.

Mrs. Clinton hired Tommy Vietor, a longtime Obama aide who was the spokesman for the National Security Council, to help with the rollout of her book. Mrs. Clinton's aides worried that some in the news media might use the book to try to drive a wedge between her and the president; Mr. Vietor's job was to push back on that effort.

While Mr. Obama still speaks periodically with Mrs. Clinton, their staffs communicate more regularly. During the Crimea crisis, the White House chief of staff, Denis R. McDonough, invited in several Clinton aides, including Philippe Reines and Huma Abedin, for consultations. Mrs. Clinton also checks in by email with senior aides like Mr. Rhodes on issues like Myanmar, in which both have a special interest.

Whether that communication will weather Mrs. Clinton's latest statements remains to be seen.

Washington Post: "Hillary Clinton criticizes President Obama's foreign policy in interview with the Atlantic"

By Juliet Eilperin

August 11, 2014, 8:44 p.m. EDT

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton has not yet said whether she will pursue the presidency. But for a candidate-in-waiting, she is clearly carving out a foreign policy distinct from the man she used to serve.

In the spring, President Obama articulated a philosophy for avoiding dangerous entanglements overseas that was modest in its ambitions and focused on avoiding mistakes. Don't do stupid things, he said.

Now Clinton is offering a blunt retort to that approach, telling an interviewer, "Great nations need organizing principles — and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The surprisingly direct critique, coming in an interview with the Atlantic, represents Clinton's most forceful effort yet to distance herself from an unpopular administration ahead of her expected 2016 campaign. It also foreshadows the unusual political challenges facing Clinton as she accentuates her foreign policy credentials while trying to avoid blame for the nation's defensive posture in an increasingly unstable world.

The White House declined to comment on Clinton's remarks, which came as Iraq has plunged into political turmoil and the United States has launched airstrikes to aid Kurdish forces under siege by the Islamic State militant group.

The administration is now grappling with multiple armed conflicts in the Middle East and Ukraine, making Clinton's record as the nation's top diplomat more fraught.

Clinton, who has already used her recent memoir, "Hard Choices ," to apologize for her decision to support the invasion of Iraq in 2002 and to draw some careful distinctions between herself and the administration, provided a more direct assessment in the interview published Sunday.

She drew special attention to Obama's determination to sidestep costly foreign interventions. The president and his aides have referred privately to that strategy in recent months as, "Don't do stupid s---." That approach has come under fire from some now that Islamist militants have gained ground overseas.

Clinton said the phrase was "a political message" rather than Obama's "worldview."

Even so, she argued that the United States has to strike a better balance between overreaching in foreign affairs and being so restrained that conflicts can spiral out of hand.

"You know, when you're down on yourself, and when you are hunkering down and pulling back, you're not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward," Clinton said.

Differences on Syria

As secretary of state, Clinton backed arming the rebels in Syria's ongoing civil war. In the new interview, she said, "The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against [Bashar al-Assad] — there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle — the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled."

Clinton added that she couldn't be sure whether her preferred course of action would have changed the direction of the war. "I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what [former U.S. ambassador to Syria] Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place," she said.

While Clinton and Obama have taken steps since her departure from the administration to present themselves as friends, the two engaged over the weekend in a sort of indirect foreign policy debate — with each sitting for separate interviews with journalists known for their Middle East expertise.

Clinton made her comments to the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg. Obama, speaking with New York Times columnist Thomas L. Friedman, dismissed the idea that arming the Syrian rebels would have made a difference, saying it has "always been a fantasy."

"This idea that we could provide some light arms or even more sophisticated arms to what was essentially an opposition made up of former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth, and that they were going to be able to battle not only a well-armed state but also a well-armed state backed by Russia, backed by Iran, a battle-hardened Hezbollah, that was never in the cards," he added.

Benefits in distance

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an e-mail Monday, an aide to Clinton wrote that the interview was "intended to promote her memoir, and Goldberg was a long-planned-for target on a list of interviews around the book — and not part of an overarching political strategy related to 2016."

Several experts said there is little precedent for a secretary of state preparing a presidential campaign in part by criticizing the foreign policy being carried out by the administration she helped lead. Yet the benefits to Clinton are clear.

"It's in her political interest to begin to distance herself from an unpopular president and to drive home the fact that she's risk-ready while Obama's risk-averse," said Aaron David Miller, vice president for new initiatives at the Wilson Center.

Clinton's comments cheered some Democrats who have become anxious about the threat Islamist militants pose to both stability in the Middle East and U.S. national security.

Josh Block, president of the Israel Project, said it is "important" to see a Democratic leader laying out a worldview "that recognizes the role of our values and very real threats and trends facing the U.S. and our allies today."

"It struck me as the reemergence of common sense in Democratic foreign policy after a period of drift and indecision," Block added.

Republican National Committee press secretary Kirsten Kukowski seized on Clinton's remarks Monday, e-mailing reporters, "good luck to you, Hillary" as she tries to refashion her record.

"She's going to try, because that's what the ever-calculating, ever-political Clintons do best, but let's be real, she was the Obama foreign policy for four years," Kukowski wrote.

Shawn Brimley, who served as the National Security Council's director for strategic planning during Obama's first term, said he did not see "much of a chasm between where Secretary Clinton is and where the president's been at some time."

Brimley said it is always easier for those who have left the administration to reflect upon world affairs and articulate an overarching vision than those who are "running on a treadmill at 20 to 30 miles an hour."

Still, Clinton's remarks appear to be carefully calibrated, the latest example of a deliberate distancing from her former colleagues.

Syria, for example, was not the only issue in which Clinton had a more interventionist view than Obama. Along with then-Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, she advocated sending more troops to Afghanistan. Clinton also wrote in the book that when it came to the Arab Spring, she and other senior advisers — including Gates and Vice President Biden — were not "swept up in the drama and idealism of the moment" like other, younger White House aides when it came to ousting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Politico Magazine: "Saving Syria Is No 'Fantasy'"

By Frederic Hof, former special advisor for transition in Syria at the U.S. Department of State

August 11, 2014

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton's former adviser says Obama stood alone against calls to arm the rebels.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In June 2014, the Obama administration asked Congress for $500 million to train and equip nationalist Syrian rebels battling both the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) and the Assad regime. Questions were posed then about the genuineness of the gesture: The request was emailed to Capitol Hill rather than made in person; it was unaccompanied by visits or telephone calls; there were no follow-up consultations; there was no order to the Department of Defense to reprogram funds to initiate activity quickly; and there was no evidence of an existing plan or overall strategy. Two months later, those questions seem to have been answered by the president of the United States. He says that arming nationalist Syrian rebels was never going to work anyway.

In an interview with the New York Times on Aug. 8, President Obama said the notion that ISIL's rise could have been stopped or hindered if he had armed the secular, more Western-friendly Syrian rebels at the start of the civil war—a view recently endorsed by his former secretary of state, Hillary Clinton—"has always been a fantasy. This idea that we could provide some light arms or even more sophisticated arms to what was essentially an opposition made up of former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth, and that they were going to be able to battle not only a well-armed state but also a well-armed state backed by Russia, backed by Iran, a battle-hardened Hezbollah, that was never in the cards.'"

Ironically, in the same interview the president also defended the U.S.-supported NATO military intervention in Libya on the grounds that without it, "it's likely that Libya would be Syria." One wonders if Syria itself would "be Syria" had its armed nationalists been adequately supported since 2012 and had the Assad regime's mass terror-delivery systems been neutralized in the summer of 2013 following the chemical-weapons atrocity, when more than 1,400 people were killed in an attack outside Damascus.

No doubt the president is sensitive to the charge that his rejection of the 2012 recommendation by his national security team to arm and equip nationalist Syrian rebels robustly has contributed significantly, if inadvertently, to ISIL's growth in both Syria and Iraq. His comments to Friedman implicitly dismiss the 2012 recommendation itself as a fantasy, but as Secretary Clinton's Syria adviser I was a member of the administration at that time. The recommendation, in one form or another, was offered not only by Clinton, but by Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta, CIA Director David Petraeus and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Gen. Martin Dempsey. Yet the president, ignoring decades of universal conscription and mandatory military service in Syria, persists in characterizing the Assad regime's armed opponents as a hopeless collection of former butchers, bakers and candlestick makers.

What is truly curious, however, is the request to Congress for $500 million to finance what the president deems a fantasy. Indeed, if press reports are true that the United States is already involved in some low-level arming, equipping and training of Syrian rebels, one wonders how many taxpayer dollars have already been spent on something the commander-in-chief deems illusory. What is Congress now to make of this $500 million request? What are military planners at the U.S. Central Command to make of the midnight oil they have been burning trying to give shape to something they thought was real? What exactly was the purpose of whatever interagency process produced the $500 million initiative in the first place?

Perhaps the president misspoke or was inaccurately quoted. Perhaps he meant to argue that his 2012 decision was correct, but that the rise of ISIL has been a game-changer, and this is why he is seeking $500 million from Congress: to accelerate, despite all of the difficulties, the development of an alternative to Assad and the jihadis. Perhaps he really meant only to repeat his customary straw-man argument: Those who claim Assad would be gone today if only a different decision had been made in 2012 are wrong. One prays this is the case.

Congress, mercifully in recess, now has a choice: Take the president literally and summarily reject the $500 million request; or give the president the benefit of the doubt as to his choice of words and deliver the kind of serious consideration the request merits. It should choose the latter. When it returns to session it should invite senior administration officials to testify about the national security objectives and strategy motivating the request. Obama, for his part, should move quickly to clarify his remarks to convey that he is not asking Congress to throw money at a policy he doesn't believe in.

American pilots are now engaging ISIL targets in northern Iraq to support Kurdish peshmerga warriors. Syrian nationalists battling ISIL next door have long since given up on getting that kind of direct combat support from the United States. In the past, President Obama's words about a dictator who should step aside and red lines that are not to be crossed encouraged the Syrian opposition to believe that the United States would not permit Iranian and Russian support for mass homicide to go unanswered. They have grown deeply disappointed, disillusioned and embittered. Yet they have held out against steep odds.

Evidently, they never got the memo about successful resistance not being in the cards.

These people do not, in their dire straits, need a presidential back-of-the-hand, even one that may not have been meant as such. They need help in their two-way fight: help in downing regime helicopters bearing barrel bombs dropped indiscriminately on civilians, and help in repulsing and expelling the jihadis' terror squads. Had the requisite assistance started flowing two years ago, both Syria and Iraq would be in better places now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fantasy? Few in the administration—including at very senior levels—think so. But the president has the only vote that counts. And what he does now—not what he did or failed to do two years ago—is what truly matters.

New York Times column: David Brooks: "Clinton, Obama and Iraq"

By David Brooks

August 11, 2014

Last week, Hillary Clinton had a fascinating interview with Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic. The interview got immediate attention because of the way she discussed her differences with President Obama.

While admitting that no one will ever know who was right, Clinton argues that Obama might have done more to help the moderate opposition in Syria fight the regime of President Bashar al-Assad. "The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad ... left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," she told Goldberg.

While showing lavish respect for the president's intelligence and judgment, Clinton also made it clear that she'd be a more aggressive foreign policy leader. "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she said, citing Obama's famous phrase.

But the interview also illuminates the different flavors of Democratic thinking on foreign policy. We are now living in what we might as well admit is the Age of Iraq. The last four presidents have found themselves drawn into that nation because it epitomizes the core problem at the center of so many crises: the interaction between failing secular governance and radical Islam.

In her interview with Goldberg, Clinton likens the current moment to the Cold War. The U.S. confronts a diverse global movement, motivated by a hostile ideology: jihadism.

"Jihadist groups are governing territory. They will never stay there, though. They are driven to expand." This jihadism shows up in many contexts, but whether in Gaza or Syria or Iraq, she says, "it is all one big threat."

Clinton speaks as a Truman-Kennedy Democrat. She's obviously much, much more multilateral than Republicans, but there's a certain muscular tone, a certain assumption that there will be hostile ideologies that threaten America. There is also a grand strategic cast to her mind. The U.S. has to come up with an "overarching" strategy, she told Goldberg, to contain, deter and defeat anti-democratic foes.

She argues that harsh action is sometimes necessary. "I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the rockets, " she declared, embracing recent Israeli policy. "There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict. ... So the ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas."

This tone sometimes stands in tension with the approach President Obama articulated in his West Point speech in the spring, or in his interview with my colleague Thomas Friedman on Friday.

Obama has carefully not organized a large part of his foreign policy around a war against jihadism. The foreign policy vision he describes is, as you'd expect from a former law professor, built around reverence for certain procedures: compromise, inclusiveness, rules and norms. The threat he described in his West Point speech was a tactic, terrorism, not an ideology, jihadism. His main argument was against a means not an end: the efficacy of military action.

Obama is notably cautious, arguing that the U.S. errs when it tries to do too much. The cast of his mind is against intervention. Sometimes, when the situation demands it, he goes against his natural temperament (he told Friedman that he regrets not getting more involved in Libya), but it takes a mighty shove, and he is resistant all the way. In his West Point speech, he erected barriers to action. He argued, for example, that the U.S. could take direct action only when “there is near certainty of no civilian casualties.” (This is not a standard Franklin Roosevelt would have applied.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama and Clinton represent different Democratic tendencies. In their descriptions of the current situation in Iraq, Clinton emphasizes that there cannot be inclusive politics unless the caliphate is seriously pushed back, while Obama argues that we will be unable to push back the caliphate unless the Iraqis themselves create inclusive politics. The Clinton language points toward some sort of intervention. Obama’s points away from it, though he may be forced by events into being more involved.

It will be fascinating to see how Clinton’s approach plays in Democratic primaries. (I’d bet she is going to get a more serious challenge than people now expect.) In practice, the Clinton approach strikes me as more sound, for the same reason that early intervention against cancer is safer than late-term surgery. In the Middle East, malevolent groups like the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria grow unless checked. Even in situations where our “friends” are dysfunctional, the world has to somehow check them, using a multitude of levers. Having done so little in Syria and Iraq for the past year, we can end the caliphate or we can stay out of Iraq, but we can’t do both.

If you don’t take steady, aggressive preventive action, of the sort that Clinton leans toward, then you end up compelled to take the sort of large risky action that Obama abhors.

Politico: “Jeffrey Goldberg: Hillary Clinton line seemed like ‘shot’ at President Obama”

By Jonathan Topaz

August 11, 2014, 2:02 p.m. EDT

Jeffrey Goldberg on Monday dissected his interview with Hillary Clinton, saying she took “a bit of a shot” at President Barack Obama and his foreign policy.

Appearing on MSNBC, the Atlantic journalist who interviewed Clinton was asked about the former secretary of State’s comments that an Obama foreign policy quip — “Don’t do stupid stuff” — was not an adequate “organizing principle.”

“[W]hen she says, that’s not an organizing principle — and people understand that to be one of Barack Obama’s organizing principles — it does seem like a bit of a shot,” Goldberg said.

He added that her comments on the issue underscore a significant stylistic difference between Obama and Clinton, who served in the administration during the president’s first term.

“What she’s saying is that, ‘My organizing principle is, we defeated Communism and we’re going to defeat jihadism,’”

Goldberg said of Clinton. “Barack Obama, as you well know, is allergic to that kind of sweeping language.”

The interview, conducted last week and published over the weekend, was perhaps Clinton’s largest break from Obama, whom she has strongly supported since leaving the State Department. On Syria — in what Goldberg called the “single sharpest point of disagreement” between Clinton and Obama expressed in the interview — she suggested that the president’s failure to arm the Syrian rebels earlier in the conflict helped created a security “vacuum” now filled by jihadists. Goldberg said that Clinton, who advocated a more hawkish foreign policy on several issues during her time in the Cabinet, might feel “vindicated in her position” that the U.S. should have intervened in Syria earlier.

“Hillary hedged in this interview,” Goldberg told Andrea Mitchell. “And she’s not attacking the president, but I think she felt like, ‘You know what, I thought this, and I think events are bearing out the truth of what I advocated for.’”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mitchell asked Goldberg about Clinton and Obama's differences on Israel, noting that Clinton seemed to be more resolutely siding with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "Hillary doesn't think that differently [from Obama]," he said. "I think she's running for president and he's not and she knows that Israel remains, according to polls, a popular cause in America."

Goldberg added that Clinton's more unequivocal answer supporting Israel lacked some "nuance," adding that her message to the U.S. public and Netanyahu was: "[Obama] had a tough relationship with Israel; I'm going to have a smoother relationship with Israel."

Talking Points Memo blog: TPM Editor's Blog: "Hillary's Delicate, Dangerous Game"

By Josh Marshall

August 11, 2014, 10:56 p.m. EDT

Let's start by affirming a few points. After a bruising and devastating defeat to Barack Obama in 2008, Hillary Clinton went on to serve his administration ably, loyally and well for four years. It's also true that it's entirely natural for a future presidential aspirant to find ways to separate herself from the current president, especially one with flagging popularity. Indeed, it is incumbent on a would-be president to make clear what she would have done differently and what she would do if she were elected. As President Clinton has said many times, elections are always about the future.

But there's an element of Hillary's strategic distancing I've not seen widely mentioned. President Obama is not popular at the moment. His popularity is at best in the low 40s. But among the people who choose Democratic nominees - that is, partisan Democrats - he remains quite popular. And even for many Democrats who feel disappointed, let down or just worn out by the whole six year journey, President Obama represents something that transcends how they may feel about him at just this moment.

Quite apart from the pros and cons of particular foreign policy strategies, I believe the great majority of partisan Democrats feel protective of the President. So it's a delicate, perilous thing to criticize him so publicly, particularly at a politically vulnerable moment, especially when the nature of the criticism mirrors that of many of the President's most dogged and aggrieved foes.

The particular nature of the supposed disagreement adds to the equation.

Remember that Sen. Clinton's hawkishness - summed up by her Iraq War vote but expressed on various fronts during her six years in the Senate - was a significant reason she lost her primary fight against Obama in 2008. And that's matched by what seems to be an effort on Hillary's part today to position herself as the candidate of what might be termed the moderate wing of the neoconservative foreign policy intelligentsia.

Both the positioning and the substance of the positioning hearken back to what undid Hillary in 2007-08. Indeed, there's one more thread: the sense, critical in 2007-08, that Hillary had become a creature of Washington, its factions, its consultants, its conventional wisdoms so impervious to outside influence.

I don't pretend any of this is likely to derail her. She's phenomenally popular and for good reason among Democrats and beats all comers in the general. But it all threatens to crystallize a mix of traits many Democrats grew suspicious of in 2008 and could led to a catalyzing if not successful primary challenge to her in 2016.

Perhaps more than anything, as a political matter, once you loose these memes and mini-controversies, you don't necessarily control them. The Murdoch press, aggrieved frenemies, Fox News, MSNBC, the Sunday Show crowd do with them what they will. Which is half the point, of course. But not necessarily as you planned.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill: "Hillary shows her hawkish side"

By Peter Sullivan

August 12, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is staking out a more hawkish foreign policy stance than President Obama as she moves toward a run for the presidency in 2016.

From Syria to Israel to Iran, Clinton is beginning to draw contrasts with the man she served under as secretary of State.

"It's a decision on her part to remind people of where she's coming from and how that's different," said Jon Alterman, senior vice president at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Clinton's foreign policy differs from Obama's in that it is "a little more muscular, a little more deliberate and less deliberative," he added.

The strongest break came over the weekend, when in an interview Clinton criticized Obama's "failure to help build up a credible fighting force" in Syria while faulting his foreign policy approach in broad strokes.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she told The Atlantic.

Clinton aides said the interview was part of her book tour, and not about the 2016 campaign or any political strategy.

Nonetheless, the remark could be the start of a more aggressive effort by Clinton to distance herself from Obama's foreign policy, which scored an approval rating of just 36 percent in the most recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll.

But shaking off her association with the president could be a tall order, given that she helped shape major policy decisions from within his Cabinet.

Republicans eyeing a presidential run in 2016 have begun to make the link between Obama and Clinton a point of attack.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) over the weekend blamed the "failures of the Obama-Clinton foreign policies" for the rise of Sunni militants in Iraq.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), another rising GOP star, criticized Clinton for backing the U.S. intervention in Libya in 2011.

"There are some who call Libya 'Hillary's war.' She was all for it. . … And if you look objectively at Libya now, it's a jihadist wonderland there," he told The Washington Post earlier this month.

And Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) told CNBC that under the Obama administration there has been "chaos all over the world," with Clinton "at the State Department while all this was happening."

Clinton has stressed that she often disagreed with the president's policy moves, most notably on Syria, where she failed to persuade him of the need to arm rebel fighters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We pushed very hard," Clinton told CNN in June. "But as I say in my book, I believe that Harry Truman was right, the buck stops with the president. And the president had very legitimate concerns."

Obama, by contrast, told Thomas Friedman of The New York Times last week the idea that arming the Syrian rebels would have made a difference in the conflict is a "fantasy."

Clinton has also begun to diverge on the conflict in Gaza.

The administration has repeatedly criticized Israel for not doing enough to prevent civilian casualties, earlier this month stating that the United States was "appalled" by the shelling of a United Nations school in Gaza.

Clinton took a different tack. Asked by The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, "Do you think Israel did enough to limit civilian casualties?" Clinton responded, "It's unclear. I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the rockets."

She went on to criticize the international reaction against Israel, adding, "You can't ever discount anti-Semitism as an explanation."

The daylight on policy extends to Iran, where Clinton has aired doubts about the ongoing nuclear talks.

"President Obama has said that the odds of getting a comprehensive agreement are 50-50," Clinton said in May. "I personally am skeptical that the Iranians will follow through and deliver."

Clinton and Obama famously clashed on Iran during the 2008 campaign when Obama said he would be willing to meet with then-president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "without preconditions." Clinton at the time called the position "irresponsible and frankly naïve."

Clinton's criticism of Obama is not as sharp-edged now. While critiquing Obama's "Don't do stupid stuff" mantra, she cautioned that it doesn't encapsulate Obama's full policy approach.

"I think that that's a political message," she said. "It's not his worldview, if that makes sense to you."

Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, said Clinton was not diverging on policy, but instead making a point about how Obama's motto could leave U.S. foreign policy without a "clear voice."

"It's more disagreeing with the messaging," said O'Hanlon, who has co-authored a new book with James Steinberg, Clinton's deputy secretary of State.

Clinton told The Atlantic her organizing principle is "peace, progress and prosperity," and emphasized the role of ensuring domestic prosperity to win support for foreign policy.

"You've got to take care of your home first," she said.

The Daily Beast: "Exclusive: Obama Told Lawmakers Criticism of His Syria Policy is 'Horsesh*t'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Josh Rogin

August 11, 2014

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton and congressmen alike have called on Obama to arm Syria's rebels. But the president fumed at lawmakers in a private meeting for suggesting he should've done more.

President Obama got angry at lawmakers who suggested in a private meeting that he should have armed the Syrian rebels, calling the criticism "horseshit."

The argument that America should have done more in Syria, made for years by foreign policy leaders in both parties and several members of Obama's senior national security team, was brought back to the fore this past weekend. Obama and Hillary Clinton gave dueling interviews in which they publicly split on whether the security and humanitarian catastrophe in Syria could have been avoided if the United States had played a larger role. Obama's outburst on July 31, one week prior, reveals the criticism was already getting to him, even before the White House tried to deflect Clinton's remarks as pre-presidential political posturing.

Just before the Congressional recess, President Obama invited over a dozen Senate and House leaders from both parties to the White House to talk about foreign policy. According to two lawmakers inside the meeting, Obama became visibly agitated when confronted by bipartisan criticism of the White House's policy of slow-rolling moderate Syrian rebels' repeated requests for arms to fight the Assad regime and ISIS.

According to one of the lawmakers, Sen. Bob Corker asked the President a long question that included sharp criticisms of President Obama's handling of a number of foreign policy issues—including Syria, ISIS, Russia, and Ukraine. Obama answered Corker at length. Then, the president defended his administration's actions on Syria, saying that the notion that many have put forth regarding arming the rebels earlier would have led to better outcomes in Syria was "horseshit."

White House officials confirmed the charged exchange between Obama and Corker but declined to confirm that Obama used the expletive. The interaction between Obama and Corker was a tense moment in the otherwise uneventful meeting.

Corker's office declined to comment for this story. But days after the White House meeting, he wrote a blistering op-ed for the Washington Post criticizing Obama's handling of foreign policy. "Today, after three years of bold rhetoric divorced from reality, 170,000 Syrians are dead, and we are not innocent bystanders. The president encouraged the opposition to swallow deadly risks, then left them mostly hanging," the senator wrote. "Extremist groups from Syria have surged into Iraq, seizing key territory and resources, and are threatening to completely undo the progress of years of U.S. sacrifice."

Top Democratic lawmakers agreed with Corker and Clinton that doing more to support the moderate rebels would have at least had a chance of averting or mitigating the current crisis, which has now spread to large parts of Iraq as ISIS expands its newly declared Caliphate.

Rep. Elliot Engel, the ranking Democrat on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, arrived at the White House meeting after the Obama-Corker exchange. But the congressman also heard Obama defend his Syria policy, although using more polite language.

"The president still feels very strongly that we are deluding ourselves if we think American intervention in Syria early on by assisting these rebels would have made a difference," Engel told The Daily Beast in an interview. "He still believes that. I disagree, respectfully. They were not looking for U.S. troops, they were looking for help and the Syria civil war started with the most noblest of causes."

In a New York Times interview published Aug. 8, Obama said that the idea arming the rebels would have made a difference had "always been a fantasy."

"This idea that we could provide some light arms or even more sophisticated arms to what was essentially an opposition made up of former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth, and that they were going to be able to battle not only a well-armed state but also a well-armed state backed by Russia, backed by Iran, a battle-hardened Hezbollah, that was never in the cards," Obama said.

Clinton told The Atlantic in an interview published Aug. 10 that Obama's "failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2012, Clinton revealed that she and then-CIA Director David Petraeus had pushed a plan earlier that year to arm the Syrian rebels that was rejected by the White House. Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Martin Dempsey later said they supported the plan at that time. Many lawmakers, including Corker and Engel, still support that plan and they agree with Clinton that Obama's policy left a vacuum that ISIS rushed to fill.

"[ISIS's threat in Iraq] is definitely tied to Syria because when the uprising started against Bashar al Assad, it was a movement of people wanting freedom and democracy in Syria, it wasn't a war involving jihadism at all," Engel said. "They desperately needed our help, which we didn't supply, and as a result ISIS got the upper hand. We are now paying the price of that."

Not all lawmakers support arming the rebels; Sen. Rand Paul, for example, is on the record opposing the use of U.S. military resources to fight ISIS in Iraq or Syria. Also, Clinton and many lawmakers acknowledge that arming the rebels was risky and might not have worked. The weapons could've fallen into the extremists' hands, and Syria might have remained a jihadist free-for-all.

"Well, I did believe, which is why I advocated this, that if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would, number one, have some better insight into what was going on on the ground," Clinton said.

But experts say Obama still sees Syria as one place where more American action will not make things better. Despite an uptick in American action across the border in Iraq—and despite an announcement of a half-billion dollars in military aid for the rebels—it's unlikely Obama will drastically change his policy.

"We may never know for sure if ISIS's decisions were encouraged by Obama's choices in Syria. What we know for sure is that ISIS metastasized in Syria and was not deterred because of anything Obama said or did so far," said Andrew Tabler, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "Sometimes standing by and doing relatively nothing in the face of such a threat implicates you. The question now is, what do we do about it?"

Capital New York: "Schumer: Hillary would be 'so happy' with D.N.C. in Brooklyn"

By Azi Paybarah

August 11, 2014, 3:29 p.m. EDT

Among the reasons New York's senior senator sees that Brooklyn should get the 2016 Democratic National Convention: The location would suit the party's most likely nominee.

"Hillary Clinton, it's been in the newspaper, wants it in Brooklyn, and she walked the streets of Brooklyn with me when she first campaigned, and I think she would be so so happy if we had the convention in Brooklyn," said Senator Charles Schumer, standing outside the Barclays Center, where Democratic National Committee officials kicked off their 36-hour tour of the prospective host city.

Clinton did not attend Monday event but prefers the prospective Brooklyn site to other possible host cities, including Philadelphia and Columbus, Ohio, according to unnamed sources cited by the Times.

Asked how much his erstwhile junior colleague's preference should factor into the selection process, Schumer said, "You'll have to ask the delegates. We're just selling them on Brooklyn. They'll have to weigh everything else."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Clinton spokeswoman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

On Monday morning, D.N.C. officials traveled from midtown Manhattan to the Barclays Center in “under 14 minutes,” Peter Ragone, a top City Hall aide, told reporters.

That's important, because Brooklyn doesn't have enough hotel rooms to accommodate all the delegates who would come to town for the convention.

Ragone acknowledged that the short trip was made possible because committee members utilized "dedicated lanes" which, he said, are used “frequently in New York."

When NBC's Melissa Russo noted that most people traveling the same route have much longer commutes, Ragone replied, "We have world leaders visiting all the time, including the president, very frequently."

New York is bidding against Birmingham, Alabama, in addition to Phoenix and Philadelphia, which is considered early on to be the leading contender.

The tour continues Tuesday with breakfast at Rockefeller Center, featuring an array of elected officials, “to demonstrate consensus among the Democratic Party to have this here,” Ragone said.

Lunch will at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and “that will have all the cultural leaders of New York City there.”

Though it would billed as a “five-borough” convention, the heart of it would be in Brooklyn.

Borough President Eric Adams said Brooklyn is a micrcosm of the United States. City Council Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito, of Manhattan, said that "Brooklyn's story is America's story."

For Mayor Bill de Blasio, who managed Clinton’s 2000 Senate campaign in New York, hosting the 2016 convention helps underscore an economic message, Ragone said: “There is a concept here that goes beyond just the political convention, which is 54 or 55 million visitors here to New York City every year. ... But we want people to know it’s not just about Manhattan anymore."

CBS News: “As Hillary Clinton criticizes Obama, conservatives balk”

By Stephanie Condon

August 12, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's recent critique of the Obama administration's foreign policy, seemingly in preparation for a 2016 presidential run, has some pundits on the right crying foul.

By criticizing President Obama's handling of foreign affairs, Clinton is attempting to distinguish Mr. Obama's view of America's role in the world from her own. Conservatives, however, are questioning how much Mr. Obama's former top diplomat can truly distance herself from the administration. Some liberals, meanwhile, have revived the argument that Clinton may be too hawkish -- a judgment some on the left leveled against her in the 2008 campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's harshest criticisms targeted Mr. Obama's response to the crisis in Syria, telling the The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg that the administration's actions there amounted to a "failure."

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad--there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle--the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said.

Mr. Obama himself has called that line of argument a "fantasy."

"This idea that we could provide some light arms or even more sophisticated arms to what was essentially an opposition made up of former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth, and that they were going to be able to battle not only a well-armed state but also a well-armed state backed by Russia, backed by Iran, a battle-hardened Hezbollah, that was never in the cards," Mr. Obama said in an interview with the New York Times' Thomas Friedman that was published over the weekend.

Marc Thiessen, a senior White House staffer during the George W. Bush administration who is currently a fellow at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, called Mr. Obama's defense of his foreign policy "absurd."

At the same time, he noted that Clinton can't easily distance herself from Mr. Obama's policies.

"If she wants to achieve separation, she will have to answer some tough questions in the period ahead, such as: how hard did she really fight for arming and training the Free Syrian Army?" Thiessen wrote. "Did she threaten to resign? What specifically did she advocate doing to help the opposition? Did she advocate air strikes against ISIS? And - most importantly - did she oppose Obama's complete withdrawal from Iraq, which also 'left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled'?"

Jennifer Rubin, a conservative columnist for the Washington Post, called Clinton's remarks "the worst sort of political opportunism for which she is infamous."

"For a year and a half after leaving the administration, she has not spoken out against the president on Syria or much of anything else," Rubin wrote. "She did not have the nerve to resign out of principle on Syria, as did former ambassador Robert Ford. Only now, when the entire region has gone to seed she decides the Obama critics were right on some key aspects of foreign policy."

The Republican opposition research firm America Rising similarly called Clinton's statements amount to " naked political opportunism." The group pointed to a 2012 interview with CBS News in which shot down the idea of more robustly arming the Syrian rebels.

"What are we going to arm them with and against what?" Clinton said to CBS News' Wyatt Andrews. "We're not going to bring tanks over the borders of Turkey, Lebanon and Jordan... If you're a military planner or if you're a secretary of state and you're trying to figure out do you have the elements of an opposition that is actually viable, that we don't see."

Clinton's political interest in distancing herself from President Obama's foreign policy is evident: a CBS News poll released last week showed that while 52 percent of Americans have at least some confidence in Mr. Obama's ability to handle an international crisis, just 25 percent they have a lot of confidence -- down 14 points from last September.

Criticism of Clinton's remarks was more muted on the left, though some anti-interventionist liberals took issue with her statements.

Liberal Joan Walsh, the editor of Salon.com, wrote that as a 2008 Clinton supporter, she found the former secretary of state's comments "sobering." If Clinton were to run for president again, she "may think she can write off the anti-interventionist left - again."

However, Walsh said, "So far, my approach to 2016 is to say that Clinton may not be perfect, but she's the not-perfect candidate we know, very well."

Politico: "Karl Rove: Clinton tries to be 'Goldilocks'"

By Sarah Smith

August 11, 2014, 12:04 p.m. EDT

Karl Rove on Monday characterized Hillary Clinton's split with the president on foreign affairs as the former secretary of state painting herself as "Goldilocks."

"She's trying to position herself as sort of the Goldilocks of foreign policy," the Republican strategist said on Fox News' "Happening Now." "She's not gonna be as belligerent as Bush or as overly cautious as Obama."

Rove's comments were a response to Clinton's foreign policy interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, published Sunday, in which Clinton voiced her harshest criticism yet of her former boss. She painted herself as more hawkish than Obama, arguing that not arming Syrian rebels helped lead to the rise of ISIL and fiercely defending Israel. She also took a shot at Obama's colloquial "don't do stupid stuff" foreign policy principle telling Goldberg, "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Rove chalked up Clinton's motives to pure politics.

"I'm not certain that they're going to view this in the White House as anything other than Hillary Clinton covering her political posterior in order to get nominated in 2016," he said.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 13 – Martha's Vinyard, MA: Sec. Clinton signs books at Bunch of Grapes (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· August 13 – Martha's Vinyard, MA: Sec. Clinton attends Ann Dibble Jordan's 80th birthday party (Politico Playbook)

· August 16 – East Hampton, New York: Sec. Clinton signs books at Bookhampton East Hampton (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· ~ October 13-16 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Evan Whitbeck" <ewhitbeck@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 5/18/2008 7:11:46 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Sunday 5/18/08

Main Topics: McCain's SNL Appearance, McCain's Age & Health, Appeasement & Iran

Summary of Shift: The Democratic race took center stage in the news today as pundits speculated on the future of the race as the Oregon and Kentucky primaries approach. President Bush called for reform in the Middle East speaking to the World Economic Forum today. Ted Kennedy was rushed to the hospital yesterday after suffering seizure-like symptoms and is recovering in Boston. The death toll from the China quake and aftershocks has reached 32,500 but is expected to top 50,000.

Highlights:

1. Pfotenhauer on Inside Washington
   a. Claims that the media are giving Obama a pass, the reason McCain gets favorable coverage is because he deserves it
   b. Denies that 2013 is the mark of a real timeline for withdrawal
2. Biden calls Bush hypocritical on This Week
3. Republican strategist: No denying McCain is old
4. McCain is closer than ever to Bush
5. McCain gets a pass on his health
6. John McCain's SNL appearance
   a. Fox Summarizes
   b. Weekend Update sketch
   c. Address to the nation sketch

Clips w/ Labels and Transcriptions:

Highlight #1
Pfotenhauer: The Media are Giving Obama a Pass, McCain Gets Good Coverage Because He Deserves It
(ABC-WJLA-DC 05/18/08 9:42am)
LEON HARRIS: . . . this week we let Nancy Pfotenhauer of the McCain campaign to ask Politico's Jonathon Martin any question she likes . . .

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: . . . can you, with a straight face, looking at things like the Newsweek article that's come out, the Time magazine article that's come out, you know, days before John McCain's health records are going to be released, the comment that Obama made . . . calling a female reporter, "sweetie" . . . can you, with a straight face, say that there isn't kid gloving going on of this candidate?

JONATHON MARTIN: I can say this, that John McCain knows something about good media coverage . . . this is probably a Republican who's gotten the best coverage from the press than any other—

PFOTENHAUER: Maybe that's because he deserves it!

[. . .]

PFOTENHAUER: It's just pretty obvious, each week, there's kind of a new, this is amazing, how can they face themselves. I thought the Newsweek article should've been held up by journalism professors all over the country as an example of what not to do if you're going to call yourself a reporter.

HARRIS: Speaking of Newsweek, there was talk last week from Mark Salter . . . about maybe tossing the Newsweek reporters off of the Straight-Talk Express . . . is the Straight-Talk Express now about surprising freedom of the press?

PFOTENHAUER: Now that's a bit of a stretch don't you think? Considering that John McCain offers more access to the media than any candidate has in modern history . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pfotenhauer Dismisses Timetable Line on 2013, Calls Inexperience on Obama (ABC-WJLA-DC 05/18/08 9:33am)
JONATHAN MARTIN: . . .he mentioned that he would like to have American troops coming back home from Iraq at that point. How is that not setting some kind of time line at least for withdrawal?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, I think there's one that's implicit but non-specific and it's reflective of where he thinks we will be, but it doesn't prescribe specific troop withdrawals with a calendar because of course that's never been a very wise thing to do. You don't telegraph your strategy to your adversaries and most people understand that. Whether they're Republicans or Democrats . . . they understand that there are downside risks . . .

LEON HARRIS: By what standard then will people be able to judge him by this promise that he's making? There's gotta be some kind of standard . . .

PFOTENHAUER: Well, of course, and he has gone on the record more than any president that I can think of in recent history by describing clearly where he expects to be by the end of his first term. It's hard to get any more clear than he did. You're really sticking your neck out. Your political neck out when you say we're largely going to have the troops home by 2013 . . . he went through and really fleshed out where the goalposts are. And that puts him as on the record as you can be.

MARTIN: So what if conditions have not improved over there . . . does that mean that it's not worth the paper it's written on? That John McCain will keep the troops there . . .

PFOTENHAUER: John McCain will always put the national interest above his political self-interest . . .

MARTIN: So what he said Thursday was more his ideal for how he'd like the world to be in 2013 . . .

PFOTENHAUER: It's his best, honest estimate of where we will be. . .
[. . .]
PFOTENHAUER: . . . we cannot accept this double standard or this standard that is trying to be enforced by Barack Obama's campaign that says that any question of his judgment is somehow illegitimate or a low blow. Questions about his judgment are precisely the most important ones to ask as we go into this November election . . . there is not a lot to hang your hat in as far as what has he actually accomplished, what has he ever done to improve the lives of Americans. And John McCain, whether you agree or disagree with his decisions, has unapologetically gone after problems with both hands . . .

HARRIS: I find it hard to believe that your camp is not going to look at the race factor. We've seen that has been rippling below the surface in every single race now . . .you can see the potency of that tactic. . . are you saying here that race is not going to be an issue with John McCain?

PFOTENHAUER: Sen. McCain has been so clear about what he thinks is legitimate and not legitimate as far as a tactic goes . . . if I had a bone to pick with the Obama campaign, whenever Sen. McCain has thought that someone crossed a line he has spoken out immediately and in the strongest possible terms and I think what you get from Obama are kind of the mildest rebukes even to some of the nastiest things that have been said . . . you're going to hear it from Sen. McCain.

MARTIN: But hasn't McCain also said he's not going to play referee anymore and try and kind of dictate to outside parties what they're saying about Sen. Obama . . .

PFOTENHAUER: Try and stop Sen. McCain from speaking his mind . . . there is a pragmatism that comes in. There's no way you can control what other people are going to do . . .

Highlight #2
Biden: President Hypocritical on Obama Meeting with Iran (ABC 05/18/08 10:05am)
JOHN MCCAIN: . . . unconditional meetings with the man who calls Israel a stinking corpse . . . will not convince Iran to give up its nuclear program. It is reckless.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: Sen. Obama has said that his State Department . . . would engage in unconditional talks with the Iranians.

JOE BIDEN: Let's put this in perspective, the reason why it would be so much trouble if John McCain were president . . . is because of what you just heard. What's the alternative to talking with a country that's building a nuclear weapon . . . that is helping kill Americans . . . you either talk or you go to war or you maintain the status quo. Now let's talk about talking. President Bush . . . called me several years ago, told me Air Force 2 was waiting for me . . . would I go get in the plane and meet with Qaddaffi? A real known terrorist . . . personally responsible for killing kids at the school I went to . . . blowing up that Pan Am flight. The president of the United States asked me to go. He cut a deal with Qaddaffi. Directly. It was a smart thing to do. He gave up his nuclear weapons . . . the president of the United States of America, last time I was in Iraq was trying to set up, and recently asked for a third meeting with the Iranians . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOLOUS: It sounds like you're calling it hypocrisy.

BIDEN: Well, I'm trying to be more polite. But I shouldn't be.

Highlight #3
Tripp Baird, Republican Strategist: 'McCain Is Old…There's No Denying It' (MSNBC 05/18/08 10:30am)
(clip of McCain on SNL)
REPORTER: Is that how you handle the age question? To be self-deprecating?

TRIPP BAIRD: Sure, I mean, uh, John McCain is old. There's nothing, there's no denying it. Again, does it really matter? […] I think McCain is gonna be fine. Age is not gonna be the issue.

Highlight #4
Bob Shrum: John McCain Bush (NBC 05/18/08 10:54am)
BOB SHRUM: […] John McCain acquired a new last name, John McCain Bush. On the big issues, war, foreign policy, the economy, uh healthcare, he is George Bush. And if he's Bush III instead of the McCain who ran in 2000 when Murphy was running the campaign, he's in big trouble.

Highlight #5
McCain Gets a Pass on His Health (FNC 05/18/08 9:17am)
HOST: He's still got a lot of spark though, doesn't he? John McCain's health records due to come out soon, so will presidential health become an issue this fall?

ALISYN EARHARDT: Well, Ken Walsh is the chief White House correspondent for US News and World Report . . . now Ken, the medical records for McCain, at least the recent records haven't been released yet. Why's it taking so long?

KEN WALSH: Well the McCain campaign says it has a number of doctors, three, four maybe five physicians who need coordinating all the, all the—

EARHARDT: What, they need to fix the charts or something?

WALSH: Well they need to coordinate, do fresh examinations, that sort of thing. And they want to have them all out front for a press conference when everybody's ready.

EARHARDT: So it'll be just a generalization, it won't be like: these are his ailments.

WALSH: Well, what they've done before is they've released records and they've allow reporters to sit in a room with records and look through them. And that's probably what they'll do this time.

HOST: critics will certainly point out the fact that he had melanoma. That he gets a disability check. But he's not the first president to have medical concerns. And again let's point out that John McCain is going to hike rim to rim, the Grand Canyon . . .

EARHARDT: And his mom is 96.

Highlight #6
John McCain on SNL (FNC 05/18/08 9:10am)
CLAYTON MORRIS: John McCain making another funny appearance . . .on Saturday Night Live last night. Taking some swipes at his own old age. Take a look, pretty funny:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: It's about being able to look your children in the eye. Or in my case, my children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, great-great-grandchildren and great-great-great-grandchildren, the youngest of whom are nearing retirement. I've also opposed federal water projects, even when they benefited my state. That's why, thanks to me, fifteen percent of Arizona citizens must get their drinking water from cactus.

[laughter]

MORRIS: See, if he does more of that . . . Bob Doe . . . he went on Letterman . . . and Letterman even said to him, "If you were this funny when you were running for President, you might've won.

McCain on Saturday Night Live-Weekend Update (NBC 05/17/08 11:30am)
JOHN MCCAIN: I would like to begin tonight, by thanking Republican voters. We are gearing up for one of the most pivotal elections in this nation's history and I am honored to be part of it. But I also want to speak to Democrats. I know we don't see eye-to-eye on every issue but I also believe we respect one another. That's why I want to give you this piece of advice. Democrats, I have to urge you, do not, under any circumstances, pick a candidate too soon.
SETH MEYERS: So you don't think Hillary should drop out?
MCCAIN: Absolutely not.
AMY POEHLER: I told you.
MEYERS: Cool it.
POEHLER: You cool it.
MCCAIN: (to himself) That's right. Fight amongst yourselves.
MEYERS: What did you say?
MCCAIN: Nothing. But what I want to say to the Democrats is this:
You have two incredibly talented candidates, why not take every possible second to weigh each of their pros and cons? For all you know, there are a bunch of cons you don't even know about yet. Cons that won't reveal themselves should you choose a candidate too early.
MEYERS: But of course, the convention is in late August so I guess that would be the deadline.
MCCAIN: What's the rush, Seth? I'd urge Democrats not to get caught up in the idea that the candidate has to be decided by the time the convention ends. I've been to a lot of conventions and they are a lot of fun. But when they end, there is always that empty feeling of, 'Oh well, we've picked a nominee. I guess the party's over.' Imagine the excitement of leaving the convention and still not knowing who the nominee was? That would be crazy. Crazy exciting. And if, come November, you still haven't decided, I'd be willing to set aside my differences with your party and say 'Hey, lets put both of them on the ballot.' I will support you on that. It's the least I can do. In conclusion, I want to add that I also thought John Edwards had a lot of good ideas and you might want to kick the tires on him one more time. Thank you and God bless America.

McCain on Saturday Night Live-Address to the Nation (NBC 05/18/08 11:30pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: This November, I ask you what should we be looking for in our next President? Certainly, someone who is very, very, very old. But just as important, we will need a leader of courage and principle. Someone who's willing to do what is best for this country, even when doing so is unpopular.
McCain then criticized "runaway government spending" and listed numerous wasteful "pork-barrel" projects he voted down in his long career in government.
-$15 million to the U.S. Postal Service for a commemorative stamp honoring Tom Delay's Appellate lawyers.
-$160 million to the Department of Defense for developing a device to jam 'Gaydar,'
-I don't know if this is anti-gay or pro-gay, or if such a device would even work. But I do know this: jamming gaydar is not a federal responsibility. That's something best left to state and local government.

MCCAIN: I have not once sought to bring pork-barrel spending back to my state, not even highway funds. When I entered the Senate in 1987, Arizona had forty-seven thousand miles of paved roadway. Today, it's less than nine hundred. I've also opposed federal water projects, even when they benefited my state. That's why, thanks to me, fifteen percent of Arizona citizens must get their drinking water from cactus. In 25 years, I haven't even brought a post office to my state. And I'm proud of the fact that, because of my work, when residents of Flagstaff want to mail a letter, or pick up a package, they have to drive to New Mexico. Controlling government spending isn't about Republicans or Democrats. It's about being able to look your children in the eye — or in my case, my children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, great-great grandchildren and great-great-great-grandchildren, the youngest of whom are nearing retirement — and tell them, we have left you the same thing we were left: a future free from debt. As your President, I will guarantee it. I have the courage, the wisdom, the experience and most importantly the oldness necessary. The oldness it takes to protect America, to honor her, love her and tell her about what cute things the cat did.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nikki Budzinski" <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Pete Ogden" <progden@gmail.com>
Date: 8/23/2015 9:58:09 AM
Subject: Re: KXL

Hi guys
Ok, some feedback for your consideration regarding the Op Ed and fact sheet. Would you be willing to let me know if any of these suggestions you think are possible? I'd appreciate knowing where you finally land. I think with the trades one of the most important things is to provide them a heads up, even if we're going to be in different places. I'd like to be able to do that when appropriate.

Not surprising I know, but the trades are going to go nuclear (so to speak) on the Administration once this announcement comes out. They will likely attack around the argument that this decision will lead to increased energy prices for those on fixed incomes. They will also point out that if his rationale is increased CO2 exposure, HRC's State Department said there will negligible traces. Just a fyi.

1. Thank you Trevor for breaking it down, that was really helpful. I do think the grid piece and the pipeline infrastructure piece will be liked.
2. Could we include the terminology around "current baseload needs" in the current energy economy in both the fact sheet and Op Ed? This will at least tip the hat to where we are today with the acknowledgement that we are transitioning to green.
3. When we talk about infrastructure standards, could we please mention prevailing wage and project labor agreements as one good set of standards?
4. Could we beef up the mentioning jobs? O'Malley made the mistake with the trades of stating that energy jobs are temporary. They really bristle at that. Could we mention that these are "jobs and careers" for many workers and as we transition HRC wants to create more careers within the new energy economy? Careers is their buzz word.
5. As I mention above, the Trades will attack Obama on raising energy prices, could HRC's OpEd and Fact sheet mention that she wants to see protections for consumers for those potential rising prices?

The Op Ed will be read as very celebratory, and maybe that's it. But I think if we could incorporate a little of these suggestions above and tone, it could be helpful.

I'd love to hear what you think and if anything is possible. Thank you again for the heads up. I appreciate it.

Thanks
Nikki

On Sun, Aug 23, 2015 at 4:06 PM, Nikki Budzinski <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> Ideally to get passed the Sept 9 meeting with the Building trades would be a personal god-send.
>
> Will we move forward with the op Ed and fact sheet with or with Obama KXL action?
>
> Sent from my iPhone
>
> On Aug 23, 2015, at 3:52 PM, Pete Ogden <progden@gmail.com > wrote:
>
>> Good to know. Maybe they decided to push it until after the Canadian election on 10/19.
>>
>> On Aug 23, 2015, at 3:47 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>>
>> Now I am hearing it's back to late October. So this may again end up as just an HRC answer to a q. John, you hearing otherwise?
>>
>>
>>
>> On Aug 22, 2015, at 5:46 PM, Nikki Budzinski <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>>
>>> Got it. Will do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sent from my iPhone

On Aug 22, 2015, at 5:43 PM, Trevor Houser <tghouser.hrc@gmail.com > wrote:

That should work for us. Earlier in the evening is better if possible.

On Aug 22, 2015, at 2:42 PM, Nikki Budzinski <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Thank you Trevor. Very much appreciated. Is feedback by tomorrow evening ok for you? Or are you moving on a quicker timeline?

Sent from my iPhone

On Aug 22, 2015, at 5:37 PM, Trevor Houser <tghouser.hrc@gmail.com > wrote:

Amanda and Nikki,

Attached is the current draft of an op-ed on KXL and our overall energy infrastructure package and a detailed fact sheet on the latter. Remains to be seen whether the op-ed will be released before or after the President decides on the pipeline so it's been drafted both ways.

A few things to flag from the fact sheet that should help soften the blow to the Building Trades of the KXL decision:

1. National Infrastructure Bank – HRC mentioned this in her launch speech but it's called out more specifically here (positive for all the trades).

2. Modernizing our Pipeline System – A pledge to repair or replace thousands of miles of outdated pipeline by the end of her first term, through a new "Pipeline Partnership" that supports rate relief for states, cities and rural communities that accelerate replacement of outdated pipes (good for LiUNA and UA).

3. Increase Rail Safety – Accelerate the phase-out of outdated tank cars and repair track defects (will create jobs for affiliates with exposure on the tank car manufacturing and track repair fronts, though the Teamsters may be negative if they see it as slowing oil-by-rail volumes).

4. Enhance Grid Security - Provide new tools and resources to states, cities and rural communities to make the investments necessary to improve grid resilience to both cyber-attack and extreme weather events (positive for IBEW).

5. Expanding Consumer Choice: Offer financing tools for grid investments that support the integration of distributed energy resources and for gas pipeline investments that enable households and businesses to switch away from heating oil and other petroleum products (the trades won't love the distributed energy piece but the expanded natural gas pipeline network to enable replacement of old fuel oil furnaces with natural gas furnaces is positive for LiUNA, UA and the Boilermakers) .

6. Transmission Investment: Ensure the federal government is a partner in getting low-cost wind and other renewable energy to market through improved federal coordination and cooperation with local governments and power companies (positive for IBEW).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7. Transportation Funding: Work with Congress to close corporate tax loopholes and increase invest investment in transportation solutions that expand transit access and reduce congestion, commute times, oil consumption, and pollution (positive for IBEW, ironworkers and other public transit-exposed trades).

More broadly, we are calling for a North American Climate Compact that would provide a coordinate, continent-wide energy and climate framework so we don't have to keep battling it our pipeline-by-pipeline and can provides infrastructure investment certainty. That section of the factsheet includes the following line, which the trades should like:

Infrastructure Standards: Develop common, world-class standards for North American infrastructure that create good jobs and ensure energy transportation across the continent is clean, safe, reliable and affordable.

Happy to discuss this weekend if you'd like. I'm at 917-755-5446 .

Best,

Trevor

From: Amanda Renteria [mailto:arenteria@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Thursday, August 20, 2015 8:09 PM
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Maya Harris <mharris@hillaryclinton.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Nikki Budzinski <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com >; Trevor Houser <tghouser.hrc@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Re: KXL

Can we make sure that Nikki sees the statement before it goes out? Just want to make sure we don't catch anyone by surprise. We are so close to getting bldg trades and if we do this right, it will be ok even though they won't like it.

Sent from my iPhone

On Aug 20, 2015, at 6:02 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Your in trouble, girl. Seriously, doubt we'll say we "encouraged" but assume we'll support if it goes that way.
>
> On Thursday, August 20, 2015, Nikki Budzinski <nbudzinski@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> > Hi guys
> >
> > The Building Trades are flagging for me that they hear the Obama Administration will deny KXL on Monday. I just wanted to try to politically get ahead of this and where we are on the issue if this in fact happens. The trades are also hearing that HRC will put out a statement stating that she encouraged Obama to take this position. Politically with the building trades, this would be a very dangerous posture. Just curious what your thoughts will be if the situation goes this way on Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Appreciate it.

--

Nikki Budzinski

Labor Outreach Director

Hillary for America

646-854-1442 (direct)

<08.21 Modernizing infrastructure fact sheet - 3pm.docx>

<08.21 KXL oped draft - 3pm.docx>

--
Nikki Budzinski
Labor Outreach Director
Hillary for America
646-854-1442 (direct)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Cassandra Butts" <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com>
Date: 9/24/2008 8:17:52 AM
Subject: Re: Energy and EPA names

Gee, pershing are asst sec types not higher. Holstein maybe as deputy not top job. Jackson has a good rep, AA woman, should be considered. Immelt seems impossible to me. Maybe commerce but very unlikely at energy.
I'd add Tom Steyer, Farallon Capital, Tim Wirth, maybe mayor hickenlooper of denver.
At epa 3 more katie mcginty, just left pa enviro office, ian bowles, mass epa, dan esty at yale.

On 9/24/08, Cassandra Butts <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com> wrote:
> John, to follow are some of the names that have come us as we have consulted > on top candidates for Energy and EPA. We'd appreciate your thoughts and > additions. Needless to say, your name has come up repeatedly in our > consultations. Best, Cassandra
>
> Energy
>
> -Frampton, George
> -Gee, Robert W.: From 1997 to 2000 he served as Assistant Secretary for > Policy and International Affairs and as Assistant Secretary for Fossil > Energy of the U.S. Department of Energy; oversaw the operation of the > Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and the national research program to develop > and demonstrate advanced clean coal, natural gas, and petroleum > technologies.
> -Jackson, Shirley Ann: Former chair of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission;
> current president of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute
> -Holstein, Elgie
> -Immelt, Jeff
> -Pershing, Jonathan
> -Schwarzenegger, Arnold
> -Schweitzer, Brian
>
> EPA
>
> -Bloomberg, Michael
> -Gregoire, Christine
> -Grumet, Jason
> -Hayes, David
> -Learner, Howard: executive director of the Environmental Law and Policy > Center, a Chicago-based environmental legal advocacy group that has been a > key player in setting up the region's cap-and-trade program for global > warming.
> -Sebelius, Kathleen
> -Stern, Todd
>

--
Sent from Gmail for mobile | mobile.google.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 9/25/2015 7:45:04 AM
Subject: Re: TWEETS: US-China Announcement

Great will schedule.

On Fri, Sep 25, 2015 at 2:39 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Ok
>
> On Friday, September 25, 2015, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> > These with input from Kristina and the Climate guys.
> >
> > TWEETS:
> >
> > The US and China are following up their joint announcement last November with domestic policy action (1/3)
> >
> > The US has adopted the first-ever carbon pollution standards for power plants and new efficiency standards for trucks and appliances (2/3)
> >
> > China has added more than 55 GW of wind, solar & nuclear since last November = 800 wind turbines or 1 nuclear plant every week (3/3)
> >
> > Read my statement on US-China climate announcements on @TheBriefing2016: https://www.hillaryclinton.com/p/briefing/factsheets/2015/09/25/republicans-get-it-wrong-on-china-and-climate-change/
> >
> > --
> > Milia Fisher
> > Special Assistant to the Chair
> > Hillary for America
> > mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
> > c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Latham" <Sara.Latham@ptt.gov>
To: "Unruh-Cohen, Ana" <Ana.UnruhCohen@mail.house.gov>
john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 12/13/2008 7:41:49 AM
Subject: FW:

person John mentioned on the phone

From: Denis McDonough
Sent: Saturday, December 13, 2008 2:28 PM
To: Sara Latham
Subject: Re:

Adm John Nathman, 4*, excellent man. Want to take care of him. Was a navy pilot, bit is bif on nuclear power.

From: Sara Latham
To: Denis McDonough
Sent: Sat Dec 13 13:58:54 2008
Subject:

hi, John asked me to check with you - Nackman ? from the navy, 4 star general?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kelli Farr" <kfarr@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Kelli Farr" <KFarr@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/11/2008 6:01:39 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 06/11/08

Main Topics: McCain's Economic Plan, Energy, Gas prices

Summary of Shift:
Political coverage was still focused on the economy this morning with Barack Obama and John McCain squaring off on the gas tax holiday and tax reform. Democratic leaders engage in push back against McCain's economic plan. Comparisons between McCain and Bush as well as Obama and Carter continue to be made.
In other news, the chance of more flooding in the Midwest has many towns in a state of fear as they struggle to heighten levees. Grass fires claim homes in Northern California and continue to burn. Officials are still trying to find the source of the tainted tomatoes while many stores and restaurants remove them from circulation.

Highlights:
1) McCain: No idea when American forces can come home from Iraq but "That's not too important," discusses gas prices and Bush
2) McCain talks taxes and spending
3) McCain talks about housing and his economic experience
4) The Economy
a. McCain's challenge is to show economic credentials and push McDifferent
b. Fiorina on McCain's tax plan
c. McCain's tax plan is bad for the economy
d. Voter anger over rising fuel prices could be a "Big Problem" for McCain
5) McCain's position on energy hurting him with Republicans, fundraising

Clips:
Highlight #1
McCain: No Idea When American Forces Can Come Home From Iraq But "That's Not Too Important," Discusses Gas Prices and Bush (NBC 06/11/08 7:07am)
MATT LAUER: […] $4 a gallon for gas. Americans want to know that the next POTUS gets it, feels their pain […] When it comes to the price of gas, is there anything that you or senator Obama can do about it if elected president?

JOHN MCCAIN: […] We could give them a bit of a break for the summer. […] The real key to this, nuclear power, alternate energy.
[…]

LAUER: So enough about the debate of whether we drill in the wilderness areas? That's still oil, oil, oil. Your energy plan will take us away from oil?

MCCAIN: Oh it'll have to. […] We have to go to alternate energy

LAUER: February 28th, […] President Bush was asked by a reporter about the prospect of $4 a gallon for gasoline and he kind of scoffed at the question […] which makes it sound, Senator, as if he didn't have a real good handle on the scope of the problem. […] As Americans go to the polls in November to vote for the next president, what do you think we'll be paying for a gallon of gasoline?

MCCAIN: […] I think part of it depends on how it looks like we are making advances […] towards alternate energy. […] I can't predict to you, except to say to you, I don't think it's going much lower. And it could go higher.
[…]
LAUER: You are forgiving the oil companies subsidies to help defer cost of their exploration at a time of record oil prices and record profits. Shouldn't this be a two-way street? If the company is going to get something from the government, shouldn't they be able to give something back to the consumer?

MCCAIN: Absolutely. They should be investing in alternate energy and they should be giving back to the consumer and they should be embarking on research and development that will pay off in the forms of reducing our dependency on foreign oil.
[…]
LAUER: […] The Tax Policy Center […] says that your plan for tax cuts would -- 80% of the benefit would go to the top 10% of earners. Given the situation right now with the middle-class and working-class, gasoline, foreclosures, is that where those benefits should go?

MCCAIN: Of course not. And one of our proposals is doubling the tax exemption for children from $3,500 to $7,000. […] But we don't want to increase taxes. […] Raising the cap on social security earnings will affect millions and millions of Americans. I don't want to redistribute the wealth. I want lower-income Americans to […] better lives and that means reforming health care and […] restore America's economy.
[…]
LAUER: […] When the President […] came up with this surge at a time when everyone, it seemed, was thinking the contrary, you endorsed it with great conviction and courage. People say the surge is working. […] If it's now working, Senator, do you now have a better estimate of when American forces can come home to Iraq?

MCCAIN: No, but that's not too important. What's important is the casualties in Iraq. […] We will be able to withdraw. General Petraeus is going to tell us in July when he thinks we are.

Highlight #2
McCain Talks Taxes and Spending (CNBC 06/11/08 7.05am)
JOHN MCCAIN: I think if you raise taxes, and at the same time you abrogated free trade agreements, which is clearly what we said he wanted to do and it's, quote, "unilaterally renegotiate" the treaty which is 35% of our trade, I think you face very serious economic consequences and you don't have to look too far back to the Smoot-Holly Tariff Act, which was protectionist, which was isolationist and barriers that we raised to trade in the 1930, sent America from a recession into a depression. I'm not saying that's going to happen as a result of Senator Obama's wanting to raise taxes. It's just, I think that this kind of thing is very risky for America when we are hurting very badly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CARL QUINTANILLA: We asked Obama about that earlier in the week. And even he though admitted he's not willing to be dogmatic on taxes. He said depending on what the situation is on the ground at the time you take office, that's how presidents make decisions.

MCCAIN: He was pretty dogmatic during the primaries. He was pretty dogmatic when he went to Ohio and tragically, there's a lot of displaced workers and proudly proclaimed his commitment to unilaterally renegotiating one of the most important trade agreements in this country, signed into law by President Clinton.

QUINTANILLA: Can you excuse it? Can you throw it up to the primary? Can you blame it on the silly season that is winning the nomination? A process you know well and good all about.

MCCAIN: Carl, I went to Iowa and said I opposed ethanol subsidies and I lost in Iowa. But I still think ethanol subsidies are distorting the market. Don't you think that unless you're straight with the American people when you're campaigning that they will have a dramatic increase in their cynicism about you unless you tell them not only what you think they want to hear, but what you think they have to hear.

QUINTANILLA: One more question on taxes, something you said on the floor of the senate in 2003, "I cannot in good conscience vote in favor of tax cuts. No one can be expected to make an informed decision on a fiscal policy at this time with so many uncertain contingencies. Let us wait. It is far sounder statesmanship than cutting taxes in the dark." What would that John McCain say to the one sitting here right now?

MCCAIN: That John McCain also said, I have a proposal and I campaigned and lost with very large tax cuts but keeping spending under control. The reasons why I voted against the tax cut were several. I had my own plan to cut taxes and had no doubt in my own commitment to lower taxes but also to restrain spending. It wasn't revenues that caused us to have such huge deficits, it was spending. and I have opposed and fought against the pork barrel spending and wasteful spending. Senator Obama has become part of the earmark process.

QUINTANILLA: People are—

MCCAIN: I never asked for one.

QUINTANILLA: People are still waiting though for detailed spending cuts from you, beyond a one-year moratorium in discretionary spending and beyond earmarks.

MCCAIN: I've mentioned many, I'll be glad to give you a long list. Subsidies for ethanol to start with, we ought to eliminate. All o the tarriffs that we are imposing, certainly the overwhelming majority of them. There's many, many programs, marketing assistance program, we have got a very long list. Those that I outline in the farm bill, the farm bill is a $300 billion bill.

Highlight #3
McCain Talks About Housing and His Economic Experience (CNBC 06/11/08 8:01am)
JOHN MCCAIN: I'm eager to talk about the economy. I'm eager. And we all know there's going to be change, but there's right change and wrong change. Senator Obama seems to be dusting off the old policies of the '60s and '70s. You know he keeps saying it's going to be a Bush third term. I think it's possible we could have a Carter second term. Pretty good line, right?

CARL QUINTANILLA: That's a pretty good line. I've thought about that one.

MCCAIN: The point is we need to discuss the economy. That's a primary issue. When you're going to increase capital gains that will affect 100 million Americans, then you're taking money out of their pockets. So energy independence and the economy which is a good part of the economy and health care, should be primary issues and I'm looking forward to this debate. I know that -- I know that I can prevail on this debate.

QUINTANILLA: Quick question on housing. Your early comments in January showed some resistance to having government be a big part of the solution. Now you have a federal insurance program that some say could cost $10 billion. Did your view on housing pivot or get worse at some point?

MCCAIN: My view on housing is what it was in that we don't want to reward speculators. The person that bought houses in my home state and let them sit empty so they can flip them, there's no reason to reward them. We need to help people, and I said that at the time, who are primary residence owners need help and assistance. That, to me, would be the application by a homeowner for a 30-year, FHA, guaranteed loan at the new value of the house so they can make the payments, if they sell it one-third, one-third, one-third of the profits go to the homeowner, the lender and the federal government. It seems to me it puts the initiative into the homeowner's hands rather than the lender's hands. It seems to me that's someth-- of course we have to give Americans relief.

QUINTANILLA: The fed's been pretty aggressive on all this. But have they ridden the edge of the envelope in terms of where their responsibility should end and begin?

MCCAIN: Listen, in these difficult times, I think a lot of things are on the edge. As I stay, I have fundamental optimism about the ultimate future of our economy. But now we're seeing a weakened dollar, which then drives up the price of oil. I didn't mention that in our earlier part of our conversation. It's helped our exports, but inflation fears, I think as articulated by Bernanke, just I think yesterday or the day before, are very cogent and I really worry about a return to the '70s and so this is a very, very dicey proposition we're in and it's going to take all of us together, not divided up.

QUINTANILLA: Secretary Paulson this week, didn't rule out intervention on the dollar. I'm going to guess you don't have a problem with that statement?

MCCAIN: I would not rule it out. I wouldn't like to do it because those actions are always temporary, when the intervention ends, unless you solve the underlying cause, then it goes back to what it was before. But we are in a spiral right now, weak dollar, increase of the price of oil, passed on to the consumer and it's tough, It's really tough and the last thing I want to do -- and it's a small item. Why not give the guy they met that owns a couple or three, four trucks relief from diesel trucks that he pays 24 and a half cents per gallon tax on, give him a break.

QUINTANILLA: Why have you had such a hard time with that?

MCCAIN: I'm astonished. Because you know, when you think about it, it's the lowest income Americans that drive the farthest and the automobiles that consume the most gasoline and can afford it least. I don't know. It's remarkable.

QUINTANILLA: You have been dogged since December about a statement you made that suggested somehow that economics don't come naturally to you. Is that going to dog you all the way through or is all of this an attempt to wipe that out?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Listen, I am sure there are a lot of things, my comments about Iraq and how we have to remain there but the key-- we won't even go into that as we remain in South Korea and other places, but the point is, I know a lot about economics. I have a long period of experience as chairman of the commerce committee and the senate, for being involved in the early years of when we embarked on a period of incredible prosperity. I understand it very well. Do I understand national security issues very well? Of course, I spent 22 years in the military. And I have been on the armed services committee all these years. That's what that's about. I'm a big boy, i know that life isn't fair.

QUINTANILLA: It's politics.

MCCAIN: Exactly. But this campaign, the reason why I want the town hall meetings, as I said to you before, the reason why I want the town hall meetings, let's hear the complete statement by the candidates and then draw their own conclusions.

Highlight #4
McCain's Challenge is to Show Economic Credentials and Push McDifferent (NBC 06/11/08 7:05am)
ANDREA MITCHELL: John McCain and Barack Obama have been debating the economy all week as McCain tries to set himself apart from the economic policies of George Bush. Even while running for president, John McCain can't help joking about his lack of business experience.

[. . .]

MITCHELL: But now, with voters in a panic over how to pay for gas, McCain has to prove he's better than Barack Obama at handling an economy in crisis.

JOHN MCCAIN: Under Sen. Obama's tax plan, Americans of every background would see their taxes rise.

[. . .]

MITCHELL: McCain supports a summertime gas tax holiday . . . McCain with CNBC's Maria Bartiromo:

MCCAIN: I think you're out of touch with America when you don't support such a thing . . .

MITCHELL: But even some Republicans say suspending the gas tax for the summer won't work.

DICK ARMEY: It's just pure demagoguery. John McCain has shown some capacity to understand some economics.

MITCHELL: And Democrats are trying to portray McCain as out of touch on the economy and the war.

HARRY REID: We have as a Republican nominee a flawed candidate . . .

MITCHELL: McCain's challenge is to try to prove that he is right on the economy and distance himself from the president's record without appearing too disloyal.

Fiorina on McCain's Tax Plan (ABC 06/11/08 07:06am)
CARLY FIORINA: […] Senator McCain has proposed gas tax relief, Senator Obama has opposed it. […] Senator McCain understands that we must create jobs in this country. And small businesses do that. […] So it's vital that we lower the tax burden on small business. […]

WILLIAM DALEY: […] the gas policy that Carly mentioned, not one single economist has endorsed it. It was a gimmick when it was proposed by Senator McCain in April, and that was a relief of this 18 cents a gallon, and gas has gone up 64 cents since then. So it's a meaningless gimmick to try to get some attention to a policy, gas policy, that this administration has not had for the last 8 years.

[…]

FIORINA: Well the majority of American's support a gas tax holiday; the American Trucking association has endorsed a gas tax holiday. I don't think many economists actually understand what am American family is going through.

[…]

DALEY: We've got to go to alternative fuels, we've got to raise standards […] this is a serious problem that the American people are feeling. We've got to give more. Carly mentions the tax relief that McCain is proposing. It would be twice as large as any tax cut that President Bush has ever proposed. That's not what he American working families need right now. They need relief; they need relief across the board. And Senator Obama is going to bring that with a serious attempt to bring down spending and give relief to the American people. Without that we're just going to continue the policies of the last 8 years that have led us to a very serious situation.

[…]

McCain's Tax Plan is Bad for the Economy (FNC 06/11/08 08:00am)
ELLEN TAUSCHER: […] Gas prices in my district in California are approaching 4.50 a gallon. We've had this one president for the last 7 and a half years and until 18 months ago my colleagues were In charge of the congress for almost 14 years. So there was a lot they could have done, unfortunately they didn't. And keep in Mind that Senator McCain was there the entire time. […]

MARSHA BLACKBURN: Barack Obama […] voted for increased taxes hundreds of times. […]

TAUSCHER: […] My colleague apparently thinks that borrowing is the right way to drive the economy and it's driven it right into the ground. This President and my colleague have continued to borrow money from China and others to fund the war in Iraq and to pay for tax cuts that have not stimulated the economy.

Voter Anger Over Rising Fuel Prices Could Be a "Big Problem" for McCain (MSNBC 06/11/08 6:35am)
DAVID SHUSTER: […] The $4 mark for gasoline is another blow to the legacy of Pres Bush, a former oil man who just 5 months ago scoffed at predictions prices would reach this high. […] Energy policy was supposed to be Bush's strength. […] Gas prices are more twice what they were when Pres Bush and Vice Pres Cheney took office. […] Voter anger over rising fuel prices could be a big problem for John McCain. On top of being tied politically to Pres Bush, McCain is proposing tax breaks for energy corporations. [...] Obama meanwhile is hitting back at McCain[…]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[video clip]

BARACK OBAMA: When we're paying more than $4 a gallon for gas, the man who rails against government spending wants to spend $1.2 billion on a tax break for ExxonMobil. […]

[end video clip]

Highlight #5
McCain's Position on Energy Hurting him with Republicans, Fundraising (MSNBC 06/11/08 9:17am)
TAMRON HALL: There are a lot of Republicans who are not going along with some of Sen. McCain's positions on energy. How does he overcome that in a battle . . . ?

PAT BUCHANAN: Well, gasoline prices are going to hurt Republicans because they're in charge of the country. And Tamron, what I think McCain ought to do, and he hasn't done it, is he's not in favor of drilling in ANWR . . . and I think the Republican answer is, "Look, if we have a shortage of oil and prices are going up, let's drill for more oil in the United States of America rather than rely on Saudi Arabia. McCain's not for that, he ought to get behind it, it's the one thing that could help him.

HALL: But does that hurt him, with his own party?

BUCHANAN: It does hurt his own party. They're wondering why he's not for production. That's what we're for.

HALL: The New York Times has an article that basically says John McCain and Barack Obama . . . are toeing the party's line when it comes to the economy . . . they're seen as these independents but if it is perceived that they're following the company line, how does anything shake out?

KEITH BOYKIN: Well, because the economy is a sore point, it's a big weakness point for the Republicans right now, a big albatross that they're going to have to deal with in the fall, in the general election. John McCain is very closely associate with President Bush because of his enduring endorsement of President Bush's tax cuts, now those are two tax cuts that John McCain opposed in 2001 . . . in 2003 he said it was unwise to cut taxes in the middle of a war. But now that John McCain is running for president, John McCain has a different take on things . . .

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: Normapercy@aol.com
Date: 8/1/2015 2:51:42 AM
Subject: Re: Thank you from 'America in the Obama years': a 4-hour tv history for the BBC,etc

Look forward to seeing the new series.

On Friday, July 31, 2015, <Normapercy@aol.com > wrote:

Dear Mr Podesta,

I'm writing - with real apologies for taking so long - to thank you for the great interview you gave us a few weeks ago. You conveyed a marvelous sense of what it was like inside the Oval, the constraints that the President had to deal with, and particularly the careful work that went into 'getting the numbers as ambitious possible'.

Thanks also for taking the trouble to answer in a way that works best in our program. I hope that if you get the chance to watch some of the DVDs of our past series, you will see it has worked in the past - and hopefully it will repay your effort again.

We will keep you posted on our broadcast date in the spring.

Until then, all best wishes to you and to Hillary's campaign.

Best regards,

NormaPercy,
Mick Gold,
Delphine Jaudeau

norma percy series producer
AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS
www.brooklapping.com
View a sample of THE IRAQ WAR http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-22694542

Brook Lapping
Portland House
Bressenden Place Londond SW1

+44 207 428 3103
07802 420 083 mobile
when in US 1-301 801 0634

In a message dated 24/04/2015 17:56:16 GMT Daylight Time, john.podesta@gmail.com writes:

Let's see if we can work something out. Eryn handles my schedule.

On Apr 24, 2015 12:43 PM, "Lotte Murphy-Johnson" <lotte@brooklapping.com > wrote:

Brook Lapping

America in the Obama years

a 4-hour television history for the BBC

John Podesta

Founder, Center for American Progress

24 April 2015

Dear Mr Podesta,

I am writing to ask for a filmed interview for our four-hour TV history of US politics in the Obama years. The series will be broadcast early in 2016 on the BBC – and on partner broadcasters in America, Europe, Canada, Australia, Japan and the Middle East.

You probably have forgotten but we met long ago (in the first week of the Center for American Progress). You gave us an off-the-record briefing for our series ELUSIVEPEACE. We still remember a very funny story about President Clinton's bout of food poisoning after a delayed visit to Pakistan – or was it India?

What is unusual about our histories is that the story is told only by the decision-makers and their close advisors. No journalists or pundits tell the audience what to think. (To view some short excerpts, click on this link: Brook Lapping Documentaries .)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The London Times said of our most recent series, THE IRAQ WAR, for the BBC and the National Geographic Channel: "Television is rarely as gripping, informed and important as this."

Other series – such as IRAN AND THE WEST (2009) and PUTIN RUSSIA & THE WEST (2012) – have won top awards on both sides of the Atlantic, including five Peabody Awards, four duPonts, two British Academy Awards and a prime time Emmy. They are used to brief policy-makers and are part of university syllabuses. A note on our method and some reviews are attached.

Those we have interviewed for previous series include Bill Clinton (three times), Jimmy Carter, George H. W. Bush, Walter Mondale, Dick Cheney, Colin Powell, Condoleezza Rice, Madeleine Albright, Bill Burns, Mike McFaul, Jim Jones, as well as Tony Blair, Vladimir Putin, Jacques Chirac and Mikhail Gorbachev. That such people are willing to take part – and do so again, after they have seen the result – we hope speaks for itself.

For AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS we have interviewed or are arranging interviews with (among others): Robert Gates, Valerie Jarrett, Kathleen Sebelius, Cecilia Munoz, Jason Furman, Phil Schiliro, Jack Lew, Samantha Power, William Daley, David Axelrod, Jim Messina, Larry Summers, Ben Rhodes, Peter Orszag, Mona Sutphen, Dick Durbin, Joe Lieberman, Chris Dodd, Bill Burns, Wendy Sherman and Jake Sullivan.

We would like to talk to you about your time with President Obama – especially how you successfully pushed forward the President's climate change agenda through executive action and the historic deal you reached with China, dealing with the ISIS crisis, the immigration executive order and the decision to start normalising US relations with Cuba.

This is a serious history that will reach millions worldwide. Without your participation we can't get it right. We hope you can spare us an hour.

Best wishes,

Norma Percy, Series Producer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

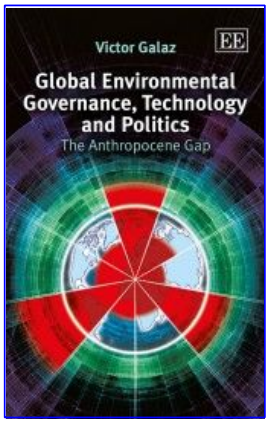
From: "Edward Elgar Publishing" <elgarsubscribe@e-elgar.com>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/27/2015 8:28:32 AM
Subject: New Titles on Climate Change Reference No. (134180)

Climate Change



Elgaronline

Click here to read the introduction for free. A full text download of this title is available for subscribing institutions only. Ask your librarian if your institution subscribes.

Global Environmental Governance, Technology and Politics

The Anthropocene Gap

Victor Galaz

Victor Galaz, Associate Professor in Political Science, Stockholm Resilience Centre, Stockholm University, Sweden

We live on an increasingly human-dominated planet. Our impact on the Earth has become so huge that researchers now suggest that it merits its own geological epoch - the 'Anthropocene' - the age of humans. Combining theory development and case studies of 'planetary boundaries', emerging infectious diseases, financial markets and geoengineering, this groundbreaking book explores the 'Anthropocene Gap' otherwise known as society's current failure to address the most profound environmental challenges of our times.

2014	November 2015
208 pp Hardback	208 pp Paperback
978 1 78195 554 3	978 1 78347 891 0
~~$110.00~~ Online price: $99.00	~~$29.95~~ Online price: $23.96

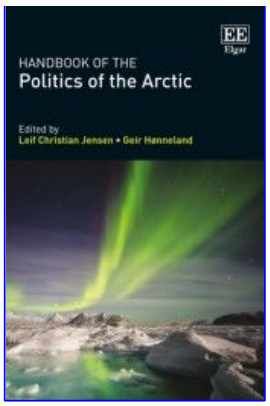
Ebooks from $15.37 for monographs and $48.00 for handbooks are available on Google and Ebooks.com. Prices vary due to retailer discount and local tax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Elgaronline

Click here to read the introduction for free. A full text download of this title is available for subscribing institutions only. Ask your librarian if your institution subscribes.

Handbook of the Politics of the Arctic

Leif Christian Jensen, Geir Hønneland

Edited by Leif Christian Jensen, Senior Research Fellow and Geir Hønneland, Research Professor and Director, Fridtjof Nansen Institute, Norway

The Arctic has again become one of the leading issues on the international foreign policy agenda, in a manner unseen since the Cold War. Drawing on the perspectives of geo-politics and international law, this Handbook offers fresh insights and perspectives on the most pressing issues, grouped under the headings of political ascendancy, climate and environmental issues, resources and energy, and the response and policies of affected countries.

November 2015
640 pp Hardback
978 0 85793 473 4
~~$335.00~~ Online price: $301.50

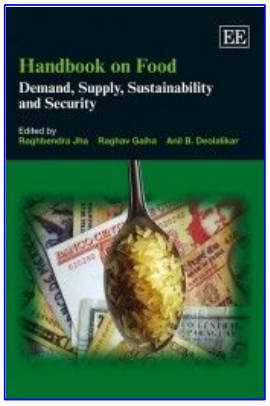
Ebooks from $15.37 for monographs and $48.00 for handbooks are available on Google and Ebooks.com. Prices vary due to retailer discount and local tax.



Elgaronline

Click here to read the introduction for free. A full text download of this title is available for subscribing institutions only. Ask your librarian if your institution subscribes.

Handbook on Food

Demand, Supply, Sustainability and Security

Raghbendra Jha, Raghav Gaiha, Anil B. Deolalikar

Edited by Raghbendra Jha, Rajiv Ghandi Professor of Economics, Head of the Arndt-Corden Department of Economics and Executive Director, the Australia South Asia Research Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, Australian National University, Australia, Raghav Gaiha, Visiting Scientist, Department of Global Health and Population, Harvard School of Public Health, US and Anil B. Deolalikar, University of California, Riverside, US

The global population is forecasted to reach 9.4 billion by 2050, with much of this increase concentrated in developing regions and cities. Ensuring adequate food and nourishment to this large population is a pressing economic, moral and even security challenge and requires research (and action) from a multi-disciplinary perspective. This book provides the first such integrated approach to tackling this problem by addressing the multiplicity of challenges posed by rising global population, diet diversification and urbanization in developing countries and climate change.

2014	November 2015
576 pp Hardback	576 pp Paperback
978 1 78100 428 9	978 1 78347 391 5
~~$255.00~~ Online price: $229.50	~~$65.00~~ Online price: $52.00

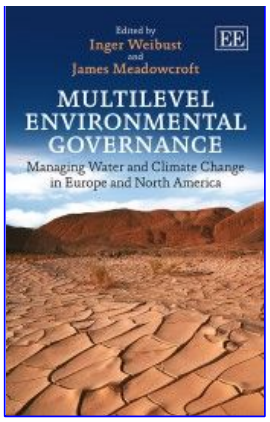
Ebooks from $15.37 for monographs and $48.00 for handbooks are available on Google and Ebooks.com. Prices vary due to retailer discount and local tax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Elgaronline

Click here to read the introduction for free. A full text download of this title is available for subscribing institutions only. Ask your librarian if your institution subscribes.

Multilevel Environmental Governance

Managing Water and Climate Change in Europe and North America

Inger Weibust, James Meadowcroft

Edited by Inger Weibust, Assistant Professor, Norman Paterson School of International Affairs, Carleton University and James Meadowcroft, Professor, School of Public Policy and Administration, Carleton University, Canada

The literature on Multi-level governance (MLG), an approach that explicitly looks at the system of the many interacting authority structures at work in the global political economy, has grown significantly over the last decade. The authors in this volume examine how multilevel governance (MLG) systems address climate change and water policy.

2014	November 2015
296 pp Hardback	296 pp Paperback
978 0 85793 924 1	978 1 78347 284 0
~~$125.00~~ Online price: $112.50	~~$45.00~~ Online price: $36.00

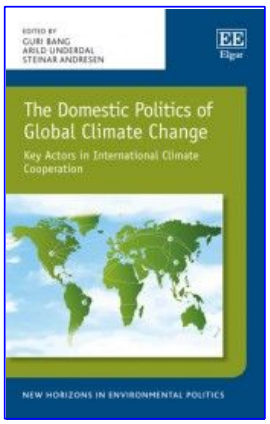
Ebooks from $15.37 for monographs and $48.00 for handbooks are available on Google and Ebooks.com. Prices vary due to retailer discount and local tax.



Elgaronline

Click here to read the introduction for free. A full text download of this title is available for subscribing institutions only. Ask your librarian if your institution subscribes.

The Domestic Politics of Global Climate Change

Key Actors in International Climate Cooperation

Series: New Horizons in Environmental Politics series

Guri Bang, Arild Underdal, Steinar Andresen

Edited by Guri Bang, Center for International Climate and Environmental Research – Oslo (CICERO), Arild Underdal, Department of Political Science, University of Oslo and Center for International Climate and Environmental Research – Oslo (CICERO) and Steinar Andresen, Fridtjof Nansen Institute, Norway

Why are some countries more willing and able than others to engage in climate change mitigation? The Domestic Politics of Global Climate Change compiles insights from experts in comparative politics and international relations to describe and explain climate policy trajectories of seven key actors: Brazil, China, the European Union, India, Japan, Russia, and the United States. Using a common conceptual framework, the authors find that ambitious climate policy change is limited by stable material parameters and that governmental supply of mitigation policies meet (or even exceed) societal demand in most cases. Given the important roles that the seven actors play in addressing global climate change, the book's in-depth comparative analysis will help readers assess the prospects for a new and more effective international climate agreement for 2020 and beyond.

November 2015
224 pp Hardback
978 1 78471 492 5
~~$110.00~~ Online price: $99.00

Ebooks from $15.37 for monographs and $48.00 for handbooks are available on Google and Ebooks.com. Prices vary due to retailer discount and local tax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Connect with us Read our blog

To unsubscribe from ALL New Book Alerts please email: elgarunsubscribe@e-elgar.com with the text ‘Unsubscribe from all’ in the subject line. To unsubscribe from New Book Alerts in the area of Climate Change please email: elgarunsubscribe@e-elgar.com with the text ‘Unsubscribe from Climate Change’.

Privacy policy Contact us Submit a proposal www.e-elgar.com www.elgaronline.com

Edward Elgar Publishing Ltd. is registered in the UK at: The Lypiatts, 15 Lansdown Road, Cheltenham, Glos GL50 2JA. Registered number: 2041703

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eryn Sepp" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 6/8/2015 10:03:27 AM
Subject: Bio: Amb. Arun Kumar Singh

His Excellency Shri. Arun Kumar Singh
Ambassador

Arun K. Singh joined the Indian Foreign Service in 1979 after completing his Masters Degree in Economics from Delhi University and teaching at the University for two years.

His first assignment abroad was at the Embassy of India, Moscow from 1981-1982, where he learnt Russian. Later, he served at the Indian Missions in Addis Ababa as Second Secretary from 1982-1985, and in Tokyo as First Secretary from 1985 - 1988. On returning to Delhi at the Headquarters of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, he served as Deputy Secretary / Director dealing with East Asia and Pakistan Divisions from 1988-1991. From 1991-1993, he headed the Offices of the Foreign Secretary and the External Affairs Minister of India.

Ambassador Singh served at the Permanent Mission of India to the United Nations Office, New York from 1993-1997 as Counsellor and handled multilateral social and economic negotiations. He served in the Indian Mission at Moscow again as Counsellor / Minister from 1997-2000. During his assignment in Delhi from 2000-2005, he served in the capacity of Joint Secretary dealing first with the United Nations Policy, and then Pakistan, Afghanistan and Iran Divisions at the Ministry of External Affairs.

Ambassador Singh served as Ambassador of India to Israel from April 2005 to September, 2008; and then as Deputy Chief of Mission at the Embassy of India, Washington D.C from October 2008 to April 2013. Ambassador Singh served as Ambassador of India to France from April, 2013 to April, 2015. He assumed his new assignment as Ambassador of India to United States on April 30, 2015.

Ambassador Singh speaks Russian and Japanese and has some knowledge of French and Hebrew. He is married to Dr. Maina Chawla Singh; they have one daughter.

--
Eryn M. Sepp
Cell: 818-456-2881

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Sandler, Herbert" <hms@sandlerfoundation.org>
To:	"Sandler, Susan" <ses@sandlerfoundation.org> "Sandler, Jim" <james@sandlerfoundation.org> "Daetz, Steve" <sdaetz@sandlerfoundation.org> "Knaebel, Sergio" <SKnaebel@sandlerfoundation.org>
Date:	4/14/2014 10:22:39 AM
Subject:	FW: Innovation: The Government Was Crucial After All by Jeff Madrick (New York Review of Books - Apr 24, 2014 issue)

Very much worth reading.

Innovation: The Government Was Crucial After All

By Jeff Madrick

"The great advances of civilization," wrote Milton Friedman in Capitalism and Freedom, his influential best seller published in 1962, "whether in architecture or painting, in science or literature, in industry or agriculture, have never come from centralized government." He did not say what he made of the state-sponsored art of Athens's Periclean Age or the Medici family, who, as Europe's dominant bankers but then as Florentine rulers, commissioned and financed so much Renaissance art. Or the Spanish court that gave us Velázquez. Or the many public universities that produced great scientists in our times. Or, even just before Friedman was writing, what could he have made of the Manhattan Project of the US government, which produced the atomic bomb? Or the National Institutes of Health, whose government-supported grants led to many of the most important pharmaceutical breakthroughs?

We could perhaps forgive Friedman's ill-informed remarks as a burst of ideological enthusiasm if so many economists and business executives didn't accept this myth as largely true. We hear time and again from those who should know better that government is a hindrance to the innovation that produces economic growth. Above all, the government should not try to pick "winners" by investing in what may be the next great companies. Many orthodox economists insist that the government should just get out of the way.

Lawrence Summers said something of the sort in a 2001 interview, shortly after the end of his tenure as Bill Clinton's treasury secretary:

> There is something about this epoch in history that really puts a premium on incentives, on decentralization, on allowing small economic energy to bubble up rather than a more top-down, more directed approach.

More recently, the respected Northwestern economist Robert Gordon reiterated the conventional view in a talk at the New School, saying that he was "extremely skeptical of government" as a source of innovation. "This is the role of individual entrepreneurs. Government had nothing to do with Bill Gates, Steve Jobs, Zuckerberg."

Fortunately, a new book, The Entrepreneurial State, by the Sussex University economist Mariana Mazzucato, forcefully documents just how wrong these assertions are. It is one of the most incisive economic books in years. Mazzucato's research goes well beyond the oft-told story about how the Internet was originally developed at the US Department of Defense. For example, she shows in detail that, while Steve Jobs brilliantly imagined and designed attractive new commercial products, almost all the scientific research on which the iPod, iPhone, and iPad were based was done by government-backed scientists and engineers in Europe and America. The touch-screen technology, specifically, now so common to Apple products, was based on research done at government-funded labs in Europe and the US in the 1960s and 1970s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Similarly, Gordon called the National Institutes of Health a useful government "backstop" to the apparently far more important work done by pharmaceutical companies. But Mazzucato cites research to show that the NIH was responsible for some 75 percent of the major original breakthroughs known as new molecular entities between 1993 and 2004.

Further, Marcia Angell, former editor of The New England Journal of Medicine, found that new molecular entities that were given priority as possibly leading to significant advances in medical treatment were often if not mostly created by government. As Angell notes in her book The Truth About the Drug Companies (2004), only three of the seven high-priority drugs in 2002 came from pharmaceutical companies: the drug Zelnorm was developed by Novartis to treat irritable bowel syndrome, Gilead Sciences created Hepsera to treat hepatitis B, and Eloxatin was created by Sanofi-Synthélabo to treat colon cancer. No one can doubt the benefits of these drugs, or the expense incurred to develop them, but this is a far cry from the common claim, such as Gordon's, that it is the private sector that does almost all the important innovation.

The rise of Silicon Valley, the high-technology center of the US based in and around Palo Alto, California, is supposedly the quintessential example of how entrepreneurial ideas succeeded without government direction. As Summers put it, new economic ideas were "born of the lessons of the experience of the success of decentralization in a place like Silicon Valley." In fact, military contracts for research gave initial rise to the Silicon Valley firms, and national defense policy strongly influenced their development. Two researchers cited by Mazzucato found that in 2006, the last year sampled, only twenty-seven of the hundred top inventions annually listed by R&D Magazine in the 2000s were created by a single firm as opposed to government alone or a collaboration with government-funded entities. Among those recently developed by government labs were a computer program to speed up data-mining significantly and Babel, a program that translates one computer-programming language into another.

For all the acclaim now given to venture capital, Mazzucato says, private firms often invest after innovations have already come a long way under government's much more daring basic research and patient investment of capital. The obvious case is the development of the technology for the Internet, but the process is much the same in the pharmaceutical industry.

Mazzucato observes that less and less basic research is being done by companies today. Rather, they focus on the commercial development of the research already done by the government. One shouldn't underestimate the degree of imagination and funding necessary to transform a major scientific idea into a product that can be used by millions of consumers. The money paid by investors for some young unproven companies can be astounding, even when they are only beginning to make profits.

Facebook had hardly turned a profit when it went public in 2012 at a share price that made it worth more than $100 billion. Earlier this year, Facebook in turn bought for $19 billion WhatsApp, a messaging service that reaches 450 million people and has only fifty-five employees. The possibility remains that competition could wipe out WhatApp's advantage, just as the once-popular Blackberry mobile communication service was made to seem archaic by Apple's iPhone. It's not yet even clear whether Facebook itself can maintain its newfound profitability. We can only imagine the possible benefits if such money were spent earlier in the basic research cycle.

Both government research and entrepreneurial capital are necessary conditions for the advance of commercial innovation. Neither is sufficient. But the consensus among many economists and politicians doesn't seem to acknowledge an equal role for government. Resistance to acknowledging government's fundamental contribution to American scientific and technical innovation became especially vigorous when the federal government's solar energy project, Solyndra, to which it had lent more than $500 million, went bankrupt. The investment was part of President Obama's 2009 stimulus package, which included a substantial program of loans for clean energy, run by a successful former hedge fund and venture capital manager. But the solar energy company was undermined when the high price of silicon, on which an alternative technology to Solyndra's was based, fell sharply, enabling competition, especially from China's solar companies, to underprice the American start-up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Solyndra's 2011 bankruptcy led to a Republican congressional investigation, and a bill to end the loan program altogether. Although venture capital funds, such as Argonaut Ventures, controlled by Obama fund-raiser George Kaiser, were among the major investors in Solyndra, critics saw the failure as proof that government couldn't and shouldn't invest in such new ventures at all. "Governments have always been lousy at picking winners, and they are likely to become more so, as legions of entrepreneurs and tinkerers swap designs online," wrote The Economist in 2012. But including Solyndra, only roughly 2 percent of the projects partly financed by the federal government have gone bankrupt.

In Mazzucato's account of the enormous success of federal scientific and technical research as the foundation of the most revolutionary of today's technologies, the most telling example is how dependent Steve Jobs's Apple was on government-funded breakthroughs. Apple's earliest innovations in computers were themselves dependent on government research. But by the 1990s, sales of its traditional laptops were flagging. The launch of the iPod in 2001, which displaced the once-popular but more limited Sony Walkman, and in 2007 of the touch-screen systems of the new iPhone and iPad, turned the company into the electronic powerhouse of our time. From that point, its global sales almost quintupled and its stock price rose from roughly $100 to more than $700 a share at its high.

These later breakthroughs were almost completely dependent on government-sponsored research. "While the products owe their beautiful design and slick integration to the genius of Jobs and his large team," writes Mazzucato, > nearly every state-of-the-art technology found in the iPod, iPhone and iPad is an often overlooked and ignored achievement of the research efforts and funding support of the government and military.

A major government-funded discovery known as giant magnetoresistance, which won its two European inventors a Nobel Prize in physics, is a telling example of such support. The process enlarges the storage capacity of computers and more recent electronic devices. In a speech at the Nobel ceremony, a member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Science explained that this breakthrough made the iPod possible. Other major developments by Apple also had their "roots" in federal research, among them, Mazzucato writes, the global positioning system of the iPhone and Siri, its voice-activated personal assistant.

Apple is only one of many such stories. In the early 1980s, the federal government formed the often-forgotten Sematech, the Semiconductor Manufacturing Technology consortium, a research partnership of US semiconductor companies designed to combat Japan's growing lead in chip technologies. The US provided $100 million a year to encourage private companies to join the effort, including the innovative giant Intel, whose pioneering work on microprocessors in the 1970s had been central to the electronics explosion.

Virtually all experts acknowledged that Sematech reestablished the US competitiveness in microprocessors and memory chips, leading to a sharp reduction in costs and radical miniaturization. The tiny integrated circuits with huge memories that resulted are the core of most electronic products today, long exploited by major companies like Microsoft and Apple. Their development was critically aided by military purchases in their early stages when commercial possibilities were still in their infancy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mazzucato claims not that business entrepreneurs and venture capitalists did not make crucial contributions, but that they were, on balance, more averse to risks than government researchers. One successful venture capitalist, William Janeway, fully acknowledges the fundamental contributions of government research in his book, Doing Capitalism in the Innovation Economy. He is concerned that the antigovernment attitudes of recent decades may prove dangerous. “The very success in ‘liberating’ the market economy from the encroachment of the state,” he writes, which defines today’s conventional economic wisdom, as the quote by Summers suggests, “has potentially dire consequences for the Innovation Economy.”

Janeway is a well-informed economist as well as a successful venture entrepreneur, and he argues for the importance of government in the nation’s economic growth. With the development of huge, highly profitable corporations in steel, oil, aluminum, chemicals, and communications by the late 1800s, he notes, crucial research was increasingly dominated by the private sector. Janeway cites the business historian Alfred Chandler to show that this is not an example of the free market at work. Rather, the huge, unchallenged profits of large oligopolistic companies enabled them to make long-term investments in research. Chandler called it the “visible hand.” Still, while Bell Labs and Xerox PARC, as well as research labs at General Electric, DuPont, and Alcoa, among others, made important, even legendary discoveries, they were also partly financed by Washington.

A major shift occurred after World War II. Federally funded science research became critical to commercial success. It may well have been the Manhattan Project that encouraged serious federal spending on research. Much of it was done in, or for, the Defense Department, but not all. The National Science Foundation was created by Congress and the National Institutes of Health were expanded. During the same period, the major private leaders in research, such as Bell Labs and Xerox PARC, were becoming less rich, and started closing down or reducing their commitments to their research labs by the 1980s and 1990s.

In response to the Soviet launch of Sputnik, the Defense Department created what became the progenitor of the Internet, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), in 1958. But, as Janeway points out, the DOD had already funded roughly twenty projects to help construct digital computers. “The IT sector, which scarcely existed in 1945,” write two economic historians cited by Janeway, > was a key focus of federal R&D and defense-related procurement spending for much of the postwar period. Moreover, the structure of these federal R&D and procurement programs exerted a powerful influence on the pace of development of the underlying technologies of defense and civilian applications.

Federal funding accounted for more than 50 percent of all US R&D from the early 1950s through 1978 and exceeded the total spent by all other OECD countries over this period. The conventional economic justification for government spending on basic research is that business won’t make sufficient investments because no single company will be able to benefit sufficiently from the potential financial returns.

Mazzucato argues that government research has been visionary. It not merely reduces risks in the market, but opens technology to entirely new ideas. She cites how government directed the development of major new technologies in completely new spheres like information technology, biotechnology, nuclear energy, and nanotechnology. She also argues that government funding even of later-stage research can be beneficial. Government subsidies in Denmark, Germany, and China have resulted in successful individual companies. The US has had a success with First Solar, a solar energy company whose existence depended on state support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Venture capital, according to Mazzucato, cuts and runs too rapidly to be trusted and also encourages short-term successes that may not be sustainable, the better to entice financial market investors. It would have been helpful had she provided more real-world examples for this argument.

Like Mazzucato, Janeway wants government to invest more; but as a firm believer in venture capital he has a more conventional view of the process of innovation. “The state can play a decisively catalytic, and more than merely constructive role,” he writes. “But to explore the new space for innovative applications thereby created remains the realm of entrepreneurial finance, the world of bubbles and crashes.”

Citing the history of the railroad boom of the 1800s, the electrification boom of the 1920s, and the high-technology boom of the 1990s, he says these speculative bubbles are the necessary fuel of productive innovation because the uncertainty of a profitable future for these companies is just too high for many other investors. Facing enormous uncertainty, business is only willing to invest as speculative fever mounts, knowing it may be able to sell out to investors—who, as Janeway admits, are greater fools—even if the company is not ultimately successful.

In one case, Janeway and his partners made a killing with an initial cash investment of some $6 million in an Internet company called Covad. Soon enough, Bear Stearns, the large investment house later sold to JPMorgan Chase, invested $300 million in the company, which at that point had only $26,000 of revenues. Before the crash, Janeway and his investors had a 20 percent stake in a company that went public in 1999 and had a market value of $5 billion. Janeway and his partners earned a $1 billion return. The company soon went bankrupt.

Janeway’s main point is that while there will be a lot of waste in such speculative bubbles, some of these investments will become giant successes. An example of the buying frenzy’s longer-term benefits was a company Janeway and his partners invested in called Neustar, which provided the technology to allow customers to keep their telephone numbers when they switched phone companies. It had a workable business plan, got its financing, and ultimately survived the 2000–2001 crash, earning Janeway and partners some $1 billion on a $77 million investment. “Financial bubbles have been the vehicle for mobilizing capital at the scale required in the face,” he writes, of such “fundamental, intractable uncertainty.”

For Janeway, as for the admired Austrian economist Joseph Schumpeter, who eventually taught at Harvard, this is healthy capitalism at work. Well before World War II, Schumpeter called it “creative destruction,” a phrase soon to be famous and arguably all too common now. Still, Janeway gives government basic research much if not most of the credit. Most investment of private venture capital was directed at IT or biotech, and not at other technologies, precisely because government led the way, he says.

Janeway favors bubbles, just the good kind, like the high-technology boom of the 1990s. The mortgage boom of the 2000s was a “bad” bubble, which left mostly destruction in its wake. But Janeway tells us little about how to distinguish among bubbles when they are underway. For years, defenders of the mortgage boom argued that it was justified by the sharp rise in home ownership, for example. My own preference would be to minimize bubbles by means of restraints on debt and on banker compensation, because the incentives too easily make investors rich while resulting in far too few useful products with lasting value. Such bubbles also give rise to large-scale fraud, such as the accounting fictions at Enron, or the deceptive sales practices of mortgage brokers. In short, the pay-off for cheating becomes too large.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The nation may well be in a new high-technology bubble right now, as evidenced by the price paid for the WhatsApp messaging service. The large venture capital firm Sequoia Capital invested $60 million in WhatsApp over the past couple of years. Since Facebook's offer, it now has a value of between $2 billion and $3 billion. But we won't know whether this is one of Janeway's "good" bubbles until it increases income or crashes. As it competes with other apps such as Skype and Google Hangouts, we don't know whether WhatsApp will survive.

Mazzucato may underestimate the risks that venture capitalists take, even if she is largely right that it is the government that takes the biggest risks of all. Besides DARPA and the National Institutes of Health, Mazzucato cites three other major examples of government research programs that worked well and are generally neglected in public discussions. The Small Business Innovation Research program—started, it may surprise some readers, by Ronald Reagan—provided research funding to small independent companies, such as the computer security company Symantec and the telecommunications company Qualcomm. The success of this little-known agency, which distributes $2 billion in funding directly, is almost a secret. Yet a survey and analysis of forty-four recipients of funding by several scholars showed a significant positive return on the government's investment. The Orphan Drug Act, also signed by Reagan, provides funding for drugs designed to treat rare diseases. Novartis drew on such funding in developing its leukemia drug Gleevec, which by 2010 had generated sales of $4.3 billion.

The National Nanotechnology Initiative may be most worth watching because it is the federal government's attempt to find "the next new thing." Many, including Mazzucato, think nanotechnology, which works with the tiniest bits of matter from single molecules to atoms themselves, will become the next general-purpose technology, spreading across medicine, electronics, and the creation of new materials. But commercial applications are still elusive. Mazzucato similarly thinks that green technology such as solar panels, if it is to succeed, requires committed, long-term investment by the government or extensions of government-directed investment, like state-funded banks.

A mutually accepted assumption of Mazzucato, Janeway, and also the critics of government interference in research is that scientific innovation will be a main source of rising productivity for the economy, and therefore of a rising standard of living. Such single-minded emphasis on something as amorphous as innovation can be misleading. Scholars are understandably influenced by the wonders of the IT revolution. But there are multiple sources of economic growth besides technical innovation. Military spending for the cold war created persistent Keynesian demand. An energy-dependent economy was aided by sharp drops in the price of oil as new sources were found in the Middle East and elsewhere, while cheaper American natural gas may well have similar effects in the future. The building of the national highway system led to the growth of the suburbs. And as the Nobel Prize–winning economist Edmund Phelps writes in his new book Mass Flourishing (2013), an entrepreneurial culture that begins at the grass-roots level is also probably crucial for the countless small improvements that go almost unnoticed but make possible innovation on the national level.

In the 1970s, when American companies were overrun by Japanese and European competition, it was not so much scientific—IT was in its infancy—but managerial innovation that led to foreign domination. Meanwhile, some technological wonders, like nuclear energy, did not have a deep effect on the US economy, despite advances in electricity-generating reactors and in medical procedures.

Moreover, during the last twenty years, productivity has grown while wages have largely stagnated. Basic economic theory suggests they should grow together. Are the new technologies failing to create jobs? Do they make it that much easier for jobs to be created offshore? Mazzucato acknowledges that the relationship between research, innovation, and economic growth is not predictable. But she and Janeway make the right assumption. Where would we be without it?

How do we fund what we need? The debate over the nation's budget deficit aside, government's contribution to innovation is not financially rewarded. The benefits to government, it has always been argued, would be increases in tax revenues as companies grow based on its research. The fact that Apple avoids almost all taxes by international avoidance strategies, as do many other high-technology companies, shows such hypotheses to be largely bogus.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mazzucato proposes that when its research is used commercially, the government collects royalties to be put in a federal innovation fund. Companies could be required to pay back grants if their products succeed financially. "A more direct tool," she says, are state investment banks. Such state banks in Germany, Brazil, and China earn billions of dollars, which they can reinvest. Government could also take equity stakes in companies that use the technologies developed.

"Many of the problems being faced today by the Obama administration," she writes, "are due to the fact that US taxpayers…do not realize that corporations are making money from innovation that has been supported by their taxes." That they are not aware of the benefits to competition seems to be a triumph of free-market ideology over good sense. How many Americans are aware that Google's basic algorithm was developed with a National Science Foundation grant?

Business failures do not provoke such generalized criticism. A few decades ago, the Detroit auto industry almost collapsed under poor management. US industry never exploited liquid crystal display technology for TV and computer screens, leaving the business to Japanese and other Asian manufacturers. Owing to government research, China leads the way in solar energy development.

Sitting on trillions of dollars of cash resulting from high profits these days, corporations buy back hundreds of billions of dollars of their own shares to boost stock prices, a systematic practice documented closely by the economist William Lazonick.* They often do so rather than invest in new ideas or research. The financial community fights financial reform with great ferocity, and banks are bigger than ever.

Both Mazzucato and Janeway fear that China's large investments in basic research will produce innovation that leaves the US behind. Under the limits set by sequestration, government research programs are now being cut back to the lowest level as a percent of GDP in forty years.

As government research spending falls, one relatively new development, with potential benefits but also dangers, is a rapid rise in funding for research—mostly in the sciences and mostly related to health and environment issues—by the nation's new high-technology and financial billionaires, including Bill Gates of Microsoft, Lawrence Ellison of Oracle, and Michael Bloomberg. Thus far, the donations do not nearly equal the amount spent by government agencies on research, but there have been notable successes, in particular treatment for cystic fibrosis. On the other hand, some scientists are critical of organizations in which research agendas are to a large extent influenced by the personal preferences of a fairly small number of philanthropists. Since contributions to such organizations are usually tax-deductible, the general public in effect subsidizes a major part of the research.

But Mazzucato's criticism of US innovation strategies goes deeper than the lack of adequate funding. She makes one of the most convincing cases I have seen for the value and competence of government itself, and for its ability to do what the private sector simply cannot. It is not only, as economists argue, a matter of reducing the risk of research and innovation for private enterprise. She argues that government efforts are the source of new technological visions for the future, and—very persuasively—she cites the innovations of the past sixty years to make her case.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/30/2008 1:43:28 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/30

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 30th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time
12:30pm McCain: Media availability in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania

3:30pm McCain: Town Hall in Pipersville, PA

3:30pm BUSH: Attends a White House tee ball game on the South Lawn

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Gets Praise, Not Backing, From Grahams (NYT 6/30/08)
By ROBERT D. McFADDEN
Senator John McCain, who has had trouble courting faith-based voters, went to the mountaintop on Sunday — Billy Graham's Blue Ridge mountaintop retreat in western North Carolina, that is — and met with the evangelist and his son the Rev. Franklin Graham for a private, 45-minute conversation.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/30/us/politics/30campaign.html?_r=1&ref=politics&oref=slogin

McCain Aims to Score Points Globally (WSJ 6/30/08)
By Laura Meckler
John McCain heads south this week -- all the way to South America, where there are no votes to win but perhaps a few points to score.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121478463379514553.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

In travels, McCain attempts to frame campaign issues (LA Times 6/30/08)
By Mark Z. Barabak
Itinerary at odds with his political needs, analysts say http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2008/06/30/
in_travels_mccain_attempts_to_frame_campaign_issues/

McCain's Delicate Immigration Dance (TIME 6/30/08)
By Michael Scherer
Back on the campaign trail late last year, amid snow drifts and ice storms, candidate Tom Tancredo spoke often about the possibility of defecting from the Republican Party if its eventual nominee failed to meet his benchmarks of conservatism, most importantly a zero-tolerance policy for undocumented immigrants.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1818697,00.html

Some on left target McCain's war record (Politico 6/30/08)
By: Ben Smith
The highest voltage third rail of this presidential campaign may not be race, sex, or age, but Senator John McCain's military service. McCain's campaign Sunday issued a pair of outraged statements after retired general and Barack Obama supporter Wesley Clark said he didn't think that McCain's service as a fighter pilot and prisoner of war was relevant to running the country.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/11429.html

McCain talks the party line (The Guardian 6/30/08)
By Michael Tomasky
For a change, it's the Republicans who are keeping their candidate on a short leash http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/2008/jun/30/johnmccain.barackobama

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain for education, training to check impact of outsourcing (The Economic Times 6/30/08)
US presidential hopeful John McCain has underlined the need to put in place new education and training programmes in the country to check the impact of outsourcing and enable displaced persons re-enter the workforce.
http://economictimes.indiatimes.com/PoliticsNation/McCain_for_education_training_to_check_impact_of_outsourcing/articleshow/3178108.cms

Obama trip abroad aims to aid image (Washington Times 6/30/08)
By Joseph Curl
Goal is to blunt McCain's edge http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/jun/30/obama-trip-abroad-aims-to-aid-image/

McCain To Press Obama on Iraq (Atlantic Online 6/30/08)
By Marc Ambinder
Look for the McCain camp this week to start predicting that Obama will change his position on Iraq and to press the case that Obama has flip-flopped on a half dozen issues within the space of a month. (McCain, in his remarks yesterday, previewed this line of attack).
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/06/look_for_the_mccain_camp.php

A Win by McCain Could Push a Split Court to Right (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By Robert Barnes; A01
For much of its term, the Supreme Court muted last year's noisy dissents, warmed to Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.'s vision of narrow, incremental decisions and continued a slow but hardly steady move to the right. But as justices finished their work last week, two overarching truths about the court remained unchanged: It is sharply divided ideologically on some of the most fundamental constitutional questions, and the coming presidential election will determine its future path.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/story/2008/06/29/ST2008062900126.html

Candidates Court Latino Leaders (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By Amy Goldstein; A09
Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) yesterday accused Republican Sen. John McCain of retreating from a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws that the senator from Arizona had championed in Congress, contending that his rival for the White House "walked away" from his own legislation to win the GOP presidential primary.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/28/AR2008062800994.html
See* LA Times's "Immigration policy reform has Obama, McCain in agreement": http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-campaign29-2008jun29,0,4764682.story
See* Politico's "McCain and Obama court Latino voters": http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/11418.html
Link to transcript of NALEO speech: http://www.johnmccain.com/informing/news/Speeches/0d163bbb-5384-43f8-b679-2dfbbc3de124.htm

Hecklers Butt In as McCain Addresses Latino Group (ABC blog 6/28/08)
By Bret Hovell and Jennifer Duck
Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., was interrupted repeatedly by hecklers as he and his likely Democratic presidential opponent, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., separately addressed the National Association of Latino Elected Officials Saturday, at the Renaissance Hotel in downtown Washington, D.C.
http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/06/hecklers-butt-i.html

McCain's unorthodox campaign (LA Times 6/29/08)
By Mark Z. Barabak
Such seemingly contrary tactics as focusing on national security and foreign affairs when voters are most concerned about the domestic economy have provoked consternation among fellow Republicans.
http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/politics/la-na-mccain29-2008jun29,0,3957628.story

For McCain, Airliner Interior as Campaign Motif (NYT 6/29/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
For several months, Senator John McCain has struggled, with mixed success, to preserve the feeling of the scrappy and sometimes irreverent primary campaign style that helped make him the presumptive Republican presidential nominee. ...But this week his campaign will try to restore a little of the old McCain style when it unveils his new campaign airplane, the flying Straight Talk Express.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/us/politics/29plane.html?ref=politics

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Eureka! Where Do I Cash the Check? (NYT 6/29/08)
By GEORGE JOHNSON
...last week... John McCain called for the government to offer a prize ... to the inventor of a battery so compact, powerful and inexpensive that it would supplement or even supplant the need for fossil fuels. Barack Obama quickly derided the proposal...On one level the rhetoric was a replay of the old standoff between Big Government and the virtues of entrepreneurship. But it also raised deeper questions, like how best can the government finance and direct basic research without stifling something as mercurial as the spirit of invention.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/weekinreview/29johnson.html

Defense hawk McCain also proves a tough military critic (Boston Globe 6/29/08)
By Bryan Bender
In more than two decades in Congress, Senator John McCain has earned a reputation as a leading defense hawk, using his perch on the powerful Armed Services Committee and his war-hero status to advocate for a stronger military. But in the plush office towers of some of America's leading defense companies, the recipients of billions of dollars of Pentagon contracts each year, the presumptive Republican nominee for president has another label: persona non grata.
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2008/06/29/defense_hawk_mccain_also_proves_a_tough_military_critic/

General Clark Says McCain Oversold Navy Experience (Bloomberg 6/29/08)
By Christopher Swann and William McQuillen
Retired U.S. Army General Wesley Clark, an adviser to Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, said Republican contender John McCain has oversold his military and national-security experience.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601087&sid=aXcOoughoRFQ&refer=home

Lieberman: U.S. May Be Attacked In 2009 (CBS 6/29/08)
McCain Supporter Says Terrorists Have Tested New Presidents By Launching Attacks In First Year Of Term http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/06/29/ftn/main4217516.shtml

Conservatives warm to McCain on law (Politico 6/29/08)
By: Ben Adler
Conservatives may not be enamored of John McCain, but on subjects that are near and dear to their hearts — legal philosophy and judicial appointments — they are finding a lot to like about the Arizona senator.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/11413.html

McCain prepares new economic rollout as Taylor Griffin comes aboard –What Clintonites are doing -- Could a terror attack help Obama? (Politico 6/29/08)
By: MIKE ALLEN
...Senator McCain plans to roll out a beefed-up ECONOMIC plan and message after July 4, with a mix of current and new policy.
http://www.politico.com/playbook/0608/playbook352.html

Roberta McCain steals reporter's heart, strikes fear in handlers' (LA Times 6/29/08)
By JAMES RAINEY
A formal interview with John McCain's mother proves elusive to arrange. But she picks up the phone on the first ring.
http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/politics/la-na-onthemedia29-2008jun29,0,5262599,full.story

McCain Offers `More of the Same' on Energy Policy, Corzine Says (Bloomberg 6/29/08)
By William McQuillen
John McCain, the presumed Republican nominee for president, offers ``more of the same'' energy policy as George W. Bush while gas prices rise to record levels, Jon Corzine, New Jersey's Democratic governor, said today.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601070&sid=aPtVirs.ubnw&refer=home

John McCain 'fails to pay taxes' (UK's Telegraph 6/29/08)
By Toby Harnden
John McCain and his wife failed to pay house taxes and owe more than $225,000 on credit cards, it has been revealed.
http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/newstopics/uselection2008/johnmccain/2218203/John-McCain-'fails-to-pay-taxes'.html

McCain hails Iraq progress as Obama visits war veterans (AP 6/29/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Republican presidential nominee-in-waiting John McCain said yesterday that significant progress is being made in Iraq, Democrat Barack Obama paid a visit to wounded war veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.
http://www.newsday.com/news/printedition/nation/ny-uscamp295745967jun29,0,6081221.story

McCain on the defensive about spending (AP 6/29/08)
By LIBBY QUAID
John McCain squinted in the midday sunshine as he crossed the meandering Alabama River aboard the Gee's Bend ferry, smiling at a dozen elderly black women who clasped his hands and crooned gospel hymns. The ferry began running in 2006 with $3 million in federal dollars — money the senator voted against — four decades after whites eliminated ferry service to stop black residents from crossing to the county seat to register to vote.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jg1jtHcVu3RXiT-fGUlEL-pqxE3AD91JSJ6O0

Workers reject McCain overture (Financial Times 6/29/08)
By Andrew Ward
Three hours after John McCain's campaign bus left General Motors' plant in Lordstown, Ohio, workers started streaming in and out of the factory's gates for the mid-afternoon shift change. ...His efforts appeared wasted on many. "We're a working-class factory," said 49-year-old Greg George. "McCain calls himself moderate, but his party has been a disaster for working people over the past eight years."
http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/993874b2-4614-11dd-9009-0000779fd2ac.html

Obama and McCain search for running mates (LA Times 6/29/08)
By Doyle McManus
The early lists of potential vice presidential nominees are long. But political strategists have ideas about how the winnowing will proceed.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-veepstakes30-2008jun30,0,7191880.story

Is Carly Fiorina the Answer to McCain's Prayers for a VP? (Rothenberg Political Report 6/30/08)
By Stuart Rothenberg
Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina may or may not be on Arizona Sen. John McCain's short list for vice president, but she already is taking a crucial role in the Republican presidential hopeful's campaign.
http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2008/06/is_carly_fiorina_the_answer_to.html

McCain, Obama Seek to Show Commander-in-Chief Potential (ABC 6/29/08)
By JOHN HENDREN
Candidates Aim to Demonstrate Leadership on Foreign Affairs
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/Vote2008/story?id=5272906&page=1

McCain makes the race personal, attacks Obama's integrity (Carpetbagger Report 6/29/08)
It was probably inevitable that John McCain would abandon his pledge to focus exclusively on the issues, and steer clear of personal attacks, I just didn't expect it as early as June. John McCain, in his sharpest attack yet against rival Barack Obama, said the Democratic presidential candidate's word "cannot be trusted."
http://www.thecarpetbaggerreport.com/archives/16040.html

FLASHBACK: McCain In 1999 — 'I Would Not Support Repeal Of Roe V. Wade' (ThinkProgress 6/29/08)
Today, CNN's Late Edition re-broadcasted an August 22, 1999 interview with Sen. John McCain (R-AZ), in which McCain expressed support for overturning Roe v. Wade, while also noting that the action "would condemn young women to dangerous and illegal operations":
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/29/mccain-on-choice-99/

McCain: Maverick, or more of same? (St. Petersburg Times 6/28/08)
By Wes Allison
...At a time when the Republican president's approval ratings are in the cellar, it's helpful for the Republican vying to replace him to have a certain reputation: maverick. But McCain's 21-year record in the U.S. Senate, as well as many of the positions he has taken as a candidate, shows he is a solid conservative who generally supports the Republican orthodoxy.
http://www.tampabay.com/news/politics/elections/article649723.ece#

Sen. Hagel won't endorse McCain (Bloomberg 6/28/08)
Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) declined to endorse his party's likely presidential nominee, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, and said he would consider serving in a Cabinet under Democrat Barack Obama.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-hagel28-2008jun28,0,1089970.story

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain, Iraqi president say progress being made (AP 6/28/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Appearing together in solidarity, Republican John McCain and Iraq's president said Saturday that the war-ravaged country is making significant but fragile progress.
http://apnews.myway.com/article/20080628/D91J5Q3O0.html
Link to Pool Report From McCain and President Talabani: http://thepage.time.com/pool-report-from-mccain-and-president-talabani/
Pool Report from McCain's Meeting With Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo: http://thepage.time.com/pool-report-from-mccains-meeting-with-gloria-macapagal-arroyo/

Can you hear me now? (LA Times 6/28/08)
By Bob Drogin
Bedeviled by a bad cellphone connection, John McCain gives a conference call speech to dead air. But he gets a do-over.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-trailmccain28-2008jun28,0,1179827.story

Mrs. McCain, San Diego County Would Like a Word (NEWSWEEK 6/28/08)
By Suzanne Smalley, Andrew Murr, Mark Hosenball and Nathan Dinsdale
When you're poor, it can be hard to pay the bills. When you're rich, it's hard to keep track of all the bills that need paying. It's a lesson Cindy McCain learned the hard way when NEWSWEEK raised questions about an overdue property-tax bill on a La Jolla, Calif., property owned by a trust that she oversees. Mrs. McCain is a beer heiress with an estimated $100 million fortune and, along with her husband, she owns at least seven properties, including condos in California and Arizona.
http://www.newsweek.com/id/143775/output/print

Phil Gramm: The Return of Dr. No (WSJ 6/28/08)
By STEPHEN MOORE; Page A9
...When he rode off into the political sunset in 2002 for a high-rolling investment banking job at UBS, there was joy among many of his liberal colleagues on Capitol Hill. For two decades the man who came to be called "Dr. No" had earned a reputation as a one-man wrecking crew of big-government legislative priorities. "I consider defeating Hillary health care as one of my greatest accomplishments," he says.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121460589609712025.html?mod=hps_us_inside_today

Obama, McCain spar over immigration (Reuters 6/28/08)
By John Whitesides and Jeff Mason
*Obama and McCain court Hispanic vote
*Fastest growing minority is now 9 percent of electorate
*Obama says McCain flip-flopped on immigration policy http://talkingpointsmemo.com/news/2008/06/wrapup_3obama_mccain_spar_over.php

DNC Releases New Web Video: 'McCain vs. McCain: Immigration Reform' (PRNewswire-USNewswire 6/28/08)
Following the debate on immigration reform that John McCain had with himself at today's meeting of the National Association of Latino Elected Officials, the Democratic National Committee released a new web video called "McCain vs. McCain: Immigration Reform." During this campaign, McCain has abandoned his support for comprehensive immigration reform to pander to the right wing of his Party. After adopting an enforcement-first approach that he previously said wouldn't work, McCain even promised to vote against the bipartisan bill that bears his name if came up for a vote.
http://www.reuters.com/article/pressRelease/idUS51365+28-Jun-2008+PRN20080628
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DUYTUbJy71k

Pool Report of McCain's Louisville, Kentucky Fundraiser (The Page 6/28/08)
Sen. John McCain flew from Washington D.C. to Kentucky on Saturday afternoon to headline a fundraiser in a cavernous banquet room in Louisville's International Convention Center. Proceeds, which McCain Victory Kentucky chairwoman Catherine Todd Bailey said amounted to $2 million, were to be split between McCain and the Kentucky Republican Party.
http://thepage.time.com/pool-report-of-mccains-louisville-kentucky-fundraiser/

Election 2008: Arizona Presidential Election (Rasmussen 6/29/08)
Since Hillary Clinton dropped out of the race for the White House, Barack Obama has enjoyed a bounce in the national polls and in many state polls. John McCain's home state of Arizona is no exception, though the presumptive Republican nominee still enjoys a decent lead in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.rasmussenreports.com/public_content/politics/election_20082/2008_presidential_election/arizona/election_2008_arizona_presidential_election

A Candidate Runs to a G.O.P. Chorus of 'Don't' (NYT 6/28/08)
By JULIE BOSMAN
He has been called a spoiler. A would-be Ralph Nader. A thorn in the side of Senator John McCain and the Republican establishment. None of it bothers Bob Barr http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/28/us/politics/28barr.html?pagewanted=1&ref=politics

Ad Watch: McCain energy ad short on specifics (AP 6/27/08)
...The ad blends patriotism and a can-do attitude to try to respond to people's anger over high gasoline prices. It promises to lower prices at the pump, but provides nothing that would, in fact, do that. It calls for reducing America's dependence on foreign oil, but studies project that even with increased domestic production and greater use of biofuels such as ethanol, the United States will continue to rely on imports for more than half of its motor fuels and be subject to global oil market pressures on the price.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/M/MCCAIN_AD_WATCH?SITE=TXHAR&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT
See* NYT's "McCain Pitches a 'Bipartisan' Plan for Achieving Energy Security": http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/28/us/politics/28madbox.html
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7O85jpuFKT4

McCain outspending Obama on TV ads in Missouri (St. Louis Post-Dispatch blog 6/27/08)
By Jo Mannies
Since his visit to southwest Missouri last week, presumptive Republican presidential nominee John McCain has aired more than three times as many campaign ads in the state as his Democratic rival, Barack Obama.
http://www.stltoday.com/blogzone/political-fix/political-fix/2008/06/mccain-outspending-obama-on-tv-ads-in-missouri/

McCain calls Carter a 'lousy president' (CNN 6/27/08)
By Alexander Mooney
John McCain directed his trademark straight talk toward a former president, flatly calling Jimmy Carter a "lousy" commander in chief.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/06/27/mccain-calls-carter-a-lousy-president/

McCain calls prospect of joint town halls "very, very unlikely" (FOX News 6/27/08)
by Mosheh Oinounou
During a nearly hour-long Q & A session with reporters aboard his bus Friday, McCain said he still has hope that Obama will take him up on his joint-town hall proposal but now calls the prospect that the appearances will take place "very, very unlikely."
http://embeds.blogs.foxnews.com/2008/06/27/mccain-calls-prospect-of-joint-townhalls-very-very-unlikely/

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Beyond Guantanamo (Washington Post 6/30/08)
THE SUPREME Court's recent decision to allow those held at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to challenge their detentions in federal court triggered the beginning of what could have been a welcome debate about terrorism policy between the presumptive presidential nominees. Too bad that the exchange quickly descended into name-calling and evasion, with surrogates for Republican John McCain calling Democrat Barack Obama "naive" for applauding the decision and Mr. Obama asserting that Republicans lacked the moral authority to criticize him because they had engineered the "distraction of the war in Iraq" instead of tracking down the culprits in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/29/AR2008062901610.html

If Terrorists Rock the Vote in 2008 (NYT 6/29/08)
By FRANK RICH
DON'T fault Charles Black, the John McCain adviser, for publicly stating his honest belief that a domestic terrorist attack would be "a big advantage" for their campaign and that Benazir Bhutto's assassination had "helped" Mr. McCain win the New Hampshire primary. His real sin is that he didn't come completely clean on his strategic thinking.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/opinion/29rich.html

Why Not A Debate In Dubai? (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By David Ignatius; B07

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's a crazy idea that's being discussed by the rulers of the Persian Gulf city-state of Dubai: What if they were to invite Barack Obama and John McCain to come to the desert oasis for a presidential debate?
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/27/AR2008062702769.html

Talking to Iran Is Our Best Option (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By Ivo Daalder and Philip Gordon; B07
When it comes to engaging Iran -- a signature theme of his foreign policy -- Barack Obama is taking his share of criticism. Republican rival John McCain predictably denounces Obama's call for direct talks with Iran, while his foreign policy aide Randy Scheunemann labels that approach nothing less than "unilateral cowboy summitry."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/27/AR2008062703099.html

I'm So Old, (Insert Punch Line) (NYT 6/28/08)
By CHARLES M. BLOW
John McCain, when I was born, you were nearly six years older than my mother. Now, seven years into her retirement, you want a new job: the hardest job in the world. Wow! Obviously, my mother isn't running for president, but her age gives me a context for considering yours. And within that context, your age gives me pause. Apparently, I'm not alone.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/28/opinion/28blow.html

On Language: Gaffe (NYT 6/29/08)
By WILLIAM SAFIRE
...Asked about Hillary Clinton's false memory of being under sniper fire at a Bosnian airport... John McCain said: "I have misspoken from time to time, and so I think she just misspoke. ... McCain's admission that economics was not his strong suit makes it into the gaffe tank because he was chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee for six years and such modesty now haunts him. Contrariwise, his statement that U.S. forces might be in Iraq for "100 years," seized upon as a gaffe by Obama supporters, lends itself to counterattack as a smear because the tape exists to show the phrase was taken out of context.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/magazine/29wwln-safire-t.html

BUSH NEWS
The Tragic End of Bush's North Korea Policy (WSJ 6/30/08)
By JOHN R. BOLTON
Maskirovka – the Soviet dark art of denial, deception and disguise – is alive and well in Pyongyang, years after the Soviet Union disappeared. Unfortunately, the Bush administration appears not to have gotten the word.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121478274355214441.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries

Preparing the Battlefield (New Yorker Magazine 7/7/08)
by Seymour M. Hersh
The Bush Administration steps up its secret moves against Iran.
http://www.newyorker.com/reporting/2008/07/07/080707fa_fact_hersh
See* LA Times's "Bush's covert game in Iran?": http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/presidentbush/2008/06/are-us-covert-f.html

Bush calls Zimbabwe election 'a sham' (LA Times 6/29/08)
President Robert Mugabe's party says it expects a massive victory in the one-candidate runoff. The U.S. threatens new sanctions.
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/asection/la-fg-zimbabwe29-2008jun29,0,7091886.story

Tainted Justice (LA Times 6/28/08)
By Bruce J. Einhorn
Alberto Gonzales and John Ashcroft illegally contaminated Department of Justice hiring by favoring conservative applicants.
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/opinion/la-oe-einhorn28-2008jun28,0,3849584.story

OTHER TOP NEWS

Oil surges on Mid East tension, dollar slide (Reuters 6/30/08)
By Mike Dolan
Crude oil prices spiralled higher again on Monday toward record highs set late last week as a weak on continuing tensions between Israel and Iran over Tehran's nuclear programme and on further U.S. dollar weakness.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/30/AR2008063000015.html?hpid=moreheadlines

Gas prices hit all-time high (CNNMoney 6/30/08)
By Ben Rooney,
The national average price for a gallon of gas rises to $4.086, with 33 states paying more than $4 a gallon.
http://money.cnn.com/2008/06/30/news/economy/gas/index.htm?cnn=yes

Pentagon Fights EPA On Pollution Cleanup (Washington Post 6/30/08)
By Lyndsey Layton; A01
The Defense Department, the nation's biggest polluter, is resisting orders from the Environmental Protection Agency to clean up Fort Meade and two other military bases where the EPA says dumped chemicals pose "imminent and substantial" dangers to public health and the environment.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/29/AR2008062901977.html?hpid=topnews

Amid Policy Disputes, Qaeda Grows in Pakistan (NYT 6/30/08)
By MARK MAZZETTI and DAVID ROHDE
Late last year, top Bush administration officials decided to take a step they had long resisted. They drafted a secret plan to make it easer for the Pentagon's Special Operations forces to launch missions into the snow-capped mountains of Pakistan to capture or kill top leaders of Al Qaeda.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/30/washington/30tribal.html?hp

Mandela council urges Africa not to recognize Zimbabwe vote (CNN 6/30/08)
* Newly sworn-in Zimbabwe president Mugabe attends Africa Union summit
* Ex-world leaders, led by Mandela, want African leaders to say vote "illegitimate"
* U.S., UK, France want international action against Zimbabwe government http://www.cnn.com/2008/WORLD/africa/06/30/zimbabwe.monday/index.html

Luck - A president's best jobs plan (CNNMoney 6/30/08)
By Chris Isidore
A year from now, economist say the economy will be stronger and unemployment lower - regardless of whether John McCain or Barack Obama wins.
http://money.cnn.com/2008/06/30/news/economy/president_jobs/index.htm?cnn=yes

Obama Plans Meetings With Leaders in Mideast, Europe (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By Dan Balz and Anne E. Kornblut; A07
Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama announced plans yesterday for a midsummer trip that will take him to the Middle East and Europe for firsthand observation and consultations with foreign leaders while providing him an opportunity to bolster his national security credentials for the fall election against Republican John McCain.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/28/AR2008062800985.html

A New Political Geography (Washington Post 6/29/08)
By Alec MacGillis; A01
Role Reversals in Virginias Reflect National Shifts
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/28/AR2008062802124.html

Political Freelancers Use Web to Join the Attack (NYT 6/29/08)
By JIM RUTENBERG
The video blasted across the Internet, drawing political blood from Senator John McCain within a matter of days. ... In previous elections, an attack like that would have come from party operatives, campaign researchers or the professional political hit men who orbit around them. But in the 2008 race, the first in which campaigns are feeling the full force of the changes wrought by the Web, the most attention-grabbing attacks are increasingly coming from people outside the political world.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/us/politics/29opposition.html?_r=1&oref=slogin

McAuliffe: Bill Clinton and Obama to talk within 48 hours (CNN 6/29/08)
By Jake Lansburgh
Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe assured CNN's Candy Crowley that former President Bill Clinton and presumptive Democratic nominee Barack Obama will be discussing Clinton's role in the campaign within the next two days.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/06/29/mcauliffe-bill-clinton-and-obama-to-talk-within-48-hours/

Pakistan forces attack Taliban near Peshawar (LA Times 6/29/08)
By Laura King

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With insurgents filtering into the city, troops move against their strongholds in the Khyber area. But there's an ambivalence about the offensive.
http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/world/la-fg-pakistan29-2008jun29,0,3190754.story

Occupation Plan for Iraq Faulted in Army History (NYT 6/29/08)
By MICHAEL R. GORDON
...The story of the American occupation of Iraq has been the subject of numerous books, studies and memoirs. But now the Army has waded into the highly charged debate with its own nearly 700-page account: "On Point II: Transition to the New Campaign." The unclassified study, the second volume in a continuing history of the Iraq conflict, is as noteworthy for who prepared it as for what it says. In essence, the study is an attempt by the Army to tell the story of one of the most contentious periods in its history to military experts — and to itself.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/29/washington/29army.html?
em&ex=1214884800&en=4d9636bb99326d75&ei=5087

Pentagon Report Anticipates Rising Violence in Afghanistan (Washington Post 6/28/08)
By Josh White; A09
Violence in Afghanistan will continue to rise this year, as Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters have proved resilient and aggressive foes against coalition forces, according to a new Pentagon report issued to Congress yesterday.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/27/AR2008062702202.html

Al-Qaida in Iraq says it was behind Anbar attack (AP 6/28/08)
Al-Qaida's affiliate in Iraq has released an Internet statement claiming responsibility for an attack that killed more than 20 people, including three U.S. Marines.
http://www.breitbart.com/article.php?id=D91J2HG00&show_article=1&catnum=0

Second al-Qaeda leader to be freed in Britain (The Times 6/28/08)
By Sean O'Neill
Secret negotiations have taken place to arrange the release from a British jail of one of al-Qaeda's most important operatives in Europe, The Times has learnt.
http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/politics/article4228331.ece

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Pete <progden@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 11/30/2014 6:19:35 AM
Subject: Re: global tech initiative

Yeah, Deutch didn't have any answers off the top of his head about how to operationalize something bigger but said that if you wanted him to spend time trying to work something like that up he'd want to talk to you directly first.

Let me know if you do want to do that -- I am going to see him Thur -- or if there's someone else you'd like me to approach. Arun Majumdar?

--Pete

On Nov 30, 2014, at 11:33 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> wrote:

Not sure what to do with this beyond ccs demo announced in Beijing.

JP
--Sent from my iPad--
john.podesta@gmail.com
For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com

> On Nov 29, 2014, at 2:07 PM, Pete Ogden <progden@gmail.com> wrote:
>
> Hi John -- Good seeing you the other day, and hope you had a good Thanksgiving.
>
> I asked John Deutch if he had any thoughts about what a global technology initiative might look like, and he sent the attached note for you to take a look at. He makes the case that the focus should be on CCS, and told me that nuclear he thought too expensive and solar was progressing on its own. If you are interested in him thinking about what exactly the shape of an initiative might be, he'll want to hear from you directly.
>
> Let me know if there's anyone else you think that I should solicit ideas on this from at at this stage.
>
>
> --Pete
> <CCS RD&D proposal.pdf>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
To: bfallon@hillaryclinton.com john@algpolling.com
Date: 10/4/2015 8:29:55 AM
Subject: Re: BS and guns

There have been a couple stories in the last few days about past HRC positions on gun control, like this one in Buzzfeed about HRC OPPOSING federal gun control standards and arguing (as on minimum wage now) that states had different needs.

http://www.buzzfeed.com/christophermassie/clinton-in-2008-it-doesnt-make-sense-for-federal-government#.nfQAQdNqz

I also saw something about her supporting a 25% tax on gun sales back in 1993.

I didn't see q and a on either of these in the briefing.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
To: John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com>
Cc: Kate Offerdahl <kofferdahl@hillaryclinton.com>; Amanda Renteria <arenteria@hillaryclinton.com>; caitlin <caitlin@grunwald-communications.com>; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; David Binder <david@db-research.com>; Ellen Esterhay <ellen.esterhay@gmmb.com>; Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com>; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; John Podesta <jp66@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Marlon Marshall <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com>; Maya Harris <mharris@hillaryclinton.com>; Mike Vlacich <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com>; Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>; Mona Thinavongsa <Mona@algpolling.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com>; Sawsan Bay <sbay@hillaryclinton.com>; Shannon Currie <scurrie@bsgco.com>; Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com>; Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>; Varun Anand <vanand@hillaryclinton.com>; Heather Stone <hstone@hillaryclinton.com>
Sent: Sun, Oct 4, 2015 3:24 pm
Subject: Re: BS and guns

Circling back around on guns as a follow up to the Friday morning discussion: the Today show has indicated they definitely plan to ask bout guns, and so to have the discussion be more of a news event than her previous times discussing guns, we are going to background reporters tonight on a few of the specific proposals she would support as President - universal background checks of course, but also closing the gun show loophole by executive order and imposing manufacturer liability.

On Friday, October 2, 2015, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com > wrote:

> Here is the BS interview last night on tragedy/guns last night I referenced on the call where he punts on gun manufacturer liability. He also keeps using the term “sensible” gun legislation
>
> MSNBC’s All in With Chris Hayes: Bernie Sanders on Gun Control and Oregon Shooting
>
> Link: http://mms.tveyes.com/PlaybackPortal.aspx?SavedEditID=5d507cd6-3074-4f06-aabe-41c26000012a
>
> Rough Transcript
> CHRIS HAYES: i just spoke with presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, vermont senator, and i asked him for his reaction to today's mass shooting.
> BERNIE SANDERS: you know, chris, i saw the president's statement. and i know him well enough to know that this was very personal for him, that he is disgusted, he is angry, he is sick and tired, as we all are, of sending our condolences to the families of people who have been murdered in cold blood. and the president is right. condolences are not enough. we've got to do something. we have to stop shooting at each other. we need sensible gun control legislation. and by the way, we need to significantly improve mental health services in the united states of america. and i pledge to do everything that i can in both of those areas.
> CHRIS HAYES: yeah, if you were elected president is this something that would be a priority for you? have you thought about how you go about putting in place the policies that could reduce the amount of mass shootings we see?
> BERNIE SANDERS: well, i don't think anyone has all the answers, but i think some of the components are first of all guns should not be in the hands of people who should not have them. people who have criminal records, people who are mentally ill. and that means we need a very strong instant background check system. number two, we have a huge loophole right now in gun legislation in that unlicensed gun dealers can sell guns at these gun shows. that's the gun show loophole, which has to be eliminated. and in my view, which is somewhat controversial, i don't think in this country we should be selling or distributing weapons of mass -- weapons that are designed just to kill people, automatic weapons, military type weapons. and that's what i voted for. but what we need, chris, as a nation is to get beyond the shouting. some people want to ban every gun in america and some people believe in nothing at all. i think the vast majority of the american people, as the president indicated, including gun owners, and i know that's true here in vermont, want sensible gun control legislation and they also believe that we should have more access to mental health facilities and counselors than we presently do. the bottom line is if somebody is suicidal, somebody is homicidal, you've got to make sure that person gets care and attention immediately, not two months from today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHRIS HAYES: you reference that your constituents in vermont, a state of course you represent, that's a state that it's my understanding of the statistics has relatively high levels of gun ownership, relatively low levels of gun violence. compared to some other states.
BERNIE SANDERS: yeah.
CHRIS HAYES: you also -- you voted for some gun safety legislation and against others. you voted for the brady bill, for instant background checks, against a bill that would have allowed lawsuits against gun companies. has your thinking on this evolved over time? have you been influenced in how you think about it in discussions with your constituents who are gun owners?
BERNIE SANDERS: well, i think we are all disgusted and horrified by these mass killings. and as the president indicated, we're tired of sending condolences and we know that it could happen tomorrow, it could happen again a month from now. i have voted as i said a moment ago for what i think is the most important provision, and that is strong instant background checks to make sure that people who should not have guns do not have guns. and i have voted to eliminate this gun show loophole, which is what we have got to do. and i think, chris --
CHRIS HAYES: but the fact --
BERNIE SANDERS: -- that at the end of the day --
CHRIS HAYES: if i could just say, senator --
BERNIE SANDERS: yes.
CHRIS HAYES: there's two things about this. one is it strikes me it may prove to be a more difficult policy problem than we're prepared to admit about keeping guns out of the hands of the wrong people. and it may be that that isn't enough. the sort of items that you've indicated, that if we need to take a more robust approach like, say, in australia or england, which the president mentioned today.
BERNIE SANDERS: well, i don't -- i don't know that anybody knows what the magic solution is. what we do know is the current situation is not tenable. it is clearly not working. and as the president indicated we can and must do a lot better. i believe -- i'll tell you what else i believe. you can sit there and say i think we should do this and do that states in this country where but you've got a whole lot of people want virtually no gun control at all. and if we are going to have some success we are going to have to start talking to each other. and here's what i think is the good news, that i think there is a consensus for serious gun control including among people who own guns. and i think that's what we have to bring about. and the fact we have folks in congress who don't even want us to get information about shootings in this country and fatalities, that's pretty crazy stuff. so i think the job is to bring people together and say yes, we've got to move forward, we've got to move forward aggressively, stop the shouting and let's work together to do something that's realistic.
CHRIS HAYES: senator Bernie Sanders.

John Anzalone
Partner
Anzalone Liszt Grove Research
(o) 334.387.3121
Website | Twitter | LinkedIn | Facebook

From: Kate Offerdahl <kofferdahl@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Friday, October 2, 2015 at 6:01 AM
To: Amanda Renteria <arenteria@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >, "caitlin@grunwald-communications.com" <caitlin@grunwald-communications.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, David Binder <david@db-research.com >, Ellen Esterhay <ellen.esterhay@gmmb.com >, Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com >, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, Joel Beneneson <Jbenenson@bsgco.com >, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >, John Podesta <jp66@hillaryclinton.com >, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Mindy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >, Marlon Marshall <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com >, Maya Harris <mharris@hillaryclinton.com >, Mike Vlacich <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com>, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com >, Mona Thinavongsa <Mona@algpolling.com >, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >, Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >, Sawsan Bay <sbay@hillaryclinton.com >, Shannon Currie <scurrie@bsgco.com >, Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com >, Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >, Varun Anand <vanand@hillaryclinton.com >, Heather Stone <hstone@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Accomplishments for 8AM

Dear all,

Please see the below foreign policy accomplishments, for discussion on today's 8am call.

Thanks!
Kate

She has a long list of accomplishments, but to name 3…:

- She built the toughest sanctions regime on Iran in history, twisting arms in China, Russia, and dozens of other countries, to force Iran to the negotiating table. And when pressure started working, she sent her closest aides to explore a deal that would cut off Iran's path to a nuclear weapon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- She personally negotiated an end to Hamas rockets raining down on Israel in 2012 and worked to build stronger defense programs for Israel, including upgrading the Iron Dome rocket defense system, which has saved the lives of so many Israelis.

- She fought to make women's rights a priority in international relations. She stood up against sex trafficking of women and children, intervened in Saudi Arabia to prevent child marriage, and led the fight for a UN Security Council resolution to combat sexual violence against women and children around the world that passed unanimously.

…And 3 more….

- She oversaw negotiation and worked to ensure ratification of the New START treaty, which will make the world safer by reducing U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals to their smallest size in 50 years.

- She helped build the unprecedented global effort to combat climate change, joining with President Obama to stand up to the Chinese in Copenhagen and get them to take responsibility for the first time, resulting in last year's major climate agreement.

- She stood up to Russia, China, and Iran on internet freedom and fought for the "freedom to connect" around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/28/2014 7:28:16 AM
Subject: Green Neocolonialism, Afro-Brazilian Rebellion in Brazil

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Sunday, 28 December 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Green Neocolonialism, Afro-Brazilian Rebellion in Brazil

Santiago Navarro F., Renata Bessi and Translated by Miriam Taylor, Truthout: The Afro-Brazilian Quilombola people were forced from their land in Brazil in order to make way for eucalyptus plantations, which produce toilet paper destined for Western markets. But they are resisting by replanting native trees and food crops, and working for a post-eucalyptus reality.

Read the Article

Killer Drones Are a Lethal Extension of American Exceptionalism

Marjorie Cohn, Olive Branch Press: "Like his predecessor, Obama defines virtually the entire world as a battlefield, ostensibly obviating the necessity to provide due process before execution," the author writes in this introduction to Drones and Targeted Killing.

Read the Excerpt

In Black Lives Matter Protest, Corporate Rights Trump Free Speech

Brendan Fischer, PR Watch: Minnesotans protesting police violence and institutional racism could face "staggering" fees and criminal charges for a protest at Mall of America, with the city of Bloomington announcing plans to force organizers to pay for the mall's lost revenue during the exercise of their free speech rights.

Read the Article

Truthout Interviews Joe Macaré on Keeping the Independence in Independent Journalism and Truthout

Ted Asregadoo, Truthout: What does it take to make sure that Truthout remains independent from corporate sponsorship and advertisements? Truthout publisher Joe Macaré talks about how Truthout is able to maintain its journalistic independence.

Watch the Video

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

After 13 Years, US-Led Afghanistan War Is Officially Over, but Nightmare Goes On

Read the Article at Common Dreams

AirAsia Indonesia Flight to Singapore Goes Missing With 162 on Board; Search for Jet Suspended

Read the Article at The Washington Post

At Least 24 Killed in Malaysia, Thailand Floods as 200,000 Evacuated

Read the Article at

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tiny House Living: How Two Families Made It Work

Liz Pleasant, YES! Magazine: How do you fit a full-sized family into a tiny house? The Morrisons and Kasls found that the benefits of life in 200 square feet outweigh the difficulties - teenagers, sleepovers, alone time and all.

Read the Article

Despite Enduring a Lifetime of Violence, Kelly Savage Emerges as an In-Prison Activist

Victoria Law, Waging Nonviolence: After enduring a lifetime of violence and abuse and then facing the rest of her life behind prison walls, it would be easy for a person to become bitter, disillusioned and self-destructive. But rather than sinking into despair, Kelly Savage has instead become an in-prison activist.

Read the Article

Feds Bar Companies' Long-Distance Lawsuits Against Soldiers

Paul Kiel, ProPublica: In the latest move against companies targeting military customers, federal regulators prohibit two Virginia-based lenders from suing out-of-state debtors in Virginia courts.

Read the Article

"Employee Engagement" Is No Substitute for a Union at Volkswagen

Alexandra Bradbury, Labor Notes: There's no bargaining in Volkswagen's new policy. On closer inspection, it looks more like something anti-union forces have been angling to try. In fact, it's suspiciously similar to what Tennessee legislators imposed on teachers.

Read the Article

Selma Portrays the True Martin Luther King Jr: A Radical Despised by the Political Establishment

Zaid Jilani, AlterNet: Selma has won nearly unanimous praise from film critics - partly for its unflinching look at King as a true radical who upset not just a fringe of racists in the South, but the entire political establishment. The film is particularly relevant right now, in light of recent protests against police brutality.

Read the Review

Top 10 Progressive Policies We'd Love to See Enacted in 2015 (but Probably Won't Be)

Robin Marty, Care2: The new year would be an amazing time to pass some real legislation that could decrease the gap between the rich and poor and the haves and the have-nots. Sadly, with a new, even more conservative Congress to be sworn in this January, the odds of that happening are pretty slim.

Read the Article

This week in Speakout:

The National Committee to Free the Cuban Five is overjoyed that the Cuban Five are home, forever free from the unjust imprisonment and cruel punishment that denied them their freedom for 16 long years, while Jack A. Smith applauds the overdue policy changes that led there; El Grito de Sunset Park and Bronxites for NYPD Accountability reflect on how the

Al Jazeera America

Malaria Is Killing Thousands More Than Ebola in West Africa

Read the Article at the Associated Press

The Mysterious Case of Prisoner 212

Read the Article at The Intercept

"I Can't Breathe" T-Shirts See High School Basketball Team Disinvited From Event

Read the Article at the Associated Press

How Canadian Oilmen Pinkwash the Keystone Pipeline

Read the Article at The Daily Beast

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

fight against police brutality is just and must continue; George Ygarza reports how hundreds of delegates from all corners of the globe descended upon Lima to be heard in regard to their struggles in confronting climate change in their respective regions; Ken Peeples reveals how the United States government actually really hates press freedom; Mike Miller describes the six pillars of effective anti-poverty policy; Jason Flores-Williams argues that a culture of torture is the very soundtrack of our lives; Walter Shapiro explains the crash course Americans got on the mischief that can transpire when Congress actually fulfills its duties; the Nuclear Age Peace Foundation notes that more than 5 million signatures have been garnered for a Nuclear Zero Campaign; Arnold Oliver says the break in hostilities in the trenches of Belgium and France on Christmas a century ago was actually a mutiny, not a truce; and more.

Read the Articles

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Reid Detchon" <RDetchon@unfoundation.org>
To: "Adele Morris" <amorris@brookings.edu>
"Andy Karsner" <akarsner@manifestenergy.com>
"Bob Nordhaus" <rrn@vnf.com>
"Bob Perciasepe" <bobperciasepe@c2es.org>
"Boyden Gray" <cbg@cboydengray.com>
"Charles Curtis" <curtis@nti.org>
"Dan Esty" <daniel.esty@yale.edu>
"David Orr" <dorr@oberlin.edu>
"Greg Dotson" <gdotson@americanprogress.org>
"Jerry Taylor" <jtaylor@niskanencenter.org>
"Larry Schweiger" <schweiger@pennfuture.org>
"Maggie Fox" <maggielfox@gmail.com>
"Mark Safty" <mark.safty@ucdenver.edu>
mikef@turnerfoundation.org
"Pete Rouse" <prouse@perkinscoie.com>
"Rhea Suh" <rsuh@nrdc.org>
"Richard Branson" <Helen.clarke@virgin.com>
"Richard Cizik" <rcizik@aol.com>
"Rush Holt" <rholt@aaas.org>
"Scott DeFife" <sdefife@outlook.com>
"Steve Symms" <ssymms@prdands.com>
"Susan Eisenhower" <susan@eisenhowergroup.com>
"Debbie?? Masterson" <debbie.masterson@tedturner.com>
"Thea Lee" <tlee@aflcio.org>
"Tim?? Wirth" <twirth@unfoundation.org>
"Tom Daschle" <Tom@DaschleGroup.com>
"Thomas?? Lovejoy" <tlovejoy@unfoundation.org>
"Vic Fazio" <vfazio@akingump.com>
Date: 1/13/2016 6:52:05 PM
Subject: Energy Future Coalition: Jan. 22
Attachments: 12-15-15 Meeting Notes cs rd.docx

As a reminder, the next meeting of the Steering Committee will be on Friday, January 22. We will meet as usual from 10 am to noon in the 12th floor board room at our offices, 1750 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

For our agenda, we thought it would be welcome to follow up on the discussion we had at our December meeting about nuclear energy, particularly in a carbon-constrained future. For example, small modular reactors have been discussed for years – what are their prospects? Is there a path to market for new technologies, or will the US market focus solely on life extension?

We are pleased to have two experts with us to frame our conversation:

John Kotek is the Acting Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy at DOE. His Office is responsible for conducting research on current and future nuclear energy systems, maintaining the government's nuclear energy research infrastructure, and establishing a path forward for the nation's spent nuclear fuel and high-level nuclear waste management program. From 2010-2012, John served as Staff Director to the Blue Ribbon Commission on America's Nuclear Future, which recommended a new strategy for managing nuclear waste in the United States. Before joining DOE in July 2003, he worked for Argonne National Laboratory as the Generation IV and Nuclear-Hydrogen Programs Manager, participating in an international effort to evaluate and develop the next generation of nuclear energy systems. In 2002, as the American Nuclear Society's Glenn T. Seaborg Congressional Fellow, John worked for Sen. Jeff Bingaman. He earned a Bachelor of Science in Nuclear Engineering from the University of Illinois and a Master of Business Administration from the University of Maryland.

Jeff Baran has served since October 2014 as a Commissioner of the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC); his term ends June 30, 2018. He came to the NRC after 11 years in the House, most recently as Democratic Staff Director for Energy and Environment on the Energy and Commerce Committee. Prior to his work on Capitol Hill, he served as a law clerk for Judge Lesley Wells of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio. Jeff earned a bachelor's degree and a master's degree in political science from Ohio University and holds a law degree from Harvard Law School.

For background on this topic, I recommend two items as a point-counterpoint: First, the letter written last month by four distinguished climate scientists (James Hansen, Kerry Emanuel, Ken Caldeira and Tom Wigley) – "Nuclear power paves the only viable path forward on climate change." It is posted here .
Second, Joe Romm, a Fellow at the Center for American Progress and Founding Editor of the blog Climate Progress, posted a rebuttal last week, "Why James Hansen Is Wrong About Nuclear Power." It is posted here . Joe has agreed to be with us and participate in our discussion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At our December meeting, Steering Committee members also suggested that we refresh our membership, as we have done before at this time of year. We are delighted to report that Jerry Taylor and Bob Perciasepe – familiar figures to us from past sessions – have agreed to join our ranks:

Jerry Taylor is the founder and president of the Niskanen Center , a libertarian think tank established in 2014 that works to change public policy through direct engagement in the policymaking process: developing and promoting proposals to legislative and executive branch policymakers, building coalitions to facilitate joint action, and marshaling the most convincing arguments in support of this agenda. Jerry has participated with us to discuss "The Conservative Case for a Carbon Tax." Previously, he spent 23 years at the Cato Institute, where he served as director of natural resource studies, assistant editor of Regulation magazine, senior fellow, and then vice president.

Bob Perciasepe is President of the Center for Climate and Energy Solutions (previously the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, now better known as C2ES), an independent, nonpartisan, nonprofit organization working to advance strong policy and action to address our climate and energy challenges. Bob has been an environmental policy leader in and outside government for more than 30 years, most recently as Deputy Administrator of EPA from 2009 to 2014. He is a respected expert on environmental stewardship, natural resource management, and public policy, and has built a reputation for bringing stakeholders together to solve issues.

Our December meeting featured a compelling presentation by Rich Thau of Presentation Testing on "What Liberals Should Say – and Not Say – to Conservatives about Climate," a look at what happened at COP 21 (the Paris climate talks), and a robust discussion about the Energy Future Coalition's agenda for 2016. Some notes are attached, if you were unable to attend. (As always, these notes are not verbatim and not for distribution or attribution, please.)

Our next two meetings of 2016 are as follows:

Tuesday, February 23
Tuesday, March 29

Again, we hope you can join us on Friday, Jan. 22 – from 10 am to noon in the 12th floor board room at our offices, 1750 Pennsylvania Ave., NW. As always, we welcome RSVPs to Caitlin Shubick at cshubick@energyfuturecoalition.org or by phone at (202) 778-1638.

With best regards,
Reid

* * * * *

Reid Detchon
Executive Director
Energy Future Coalition
1750 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 300
Washington, DC 20006
Phone: (202) 419-3220 (direct)
Or: (202) 463-8744
Fax: (202) 887-9021
www.energyfuturecoalition.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kristinakschake@gmail.com>
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Jen Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
"Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com>
"Cheryl Mills" <cheryl.mills@gmail.com>
"Robert Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 3/10/2015 3:39:40 AM
Subject: Iran

Language from Jake:

Let me say a word on Iran. As Secretary of State, I worked with Congress on a bipartisan basis to construct the most effective sanctions regime in history. Those sanctions, along with patient and determined diplomacy, brought Iran to the negotiating table. Now the President and his team are in the midst of intense negotiations. Their goal is a diplomatic solution that would close off all of Iran's pathways to a nuclear bomb and give us unprecedented access and insight into Iran's nuclear program. Reasonable people can disagree about what exactly it will take to accomplish this objective, and we all must judge any final agreement on its merits. But right now, there is an urgent need to restore a bipartisan commitment to the patriotic idea that politics stops at the water's edge. The recent letter from Republican senators was out of step with the best traditions of American leadership. One has to ask: what was the purpose of this letter? There appear to be two logical answers -- either these Senators were trying to be helpful to the Iranians, or hurtful to the commander-in-chief in the midst of high-stakes international diplomacy. Either answer does discredit to the letter's signatories. We can all agree that a diplomatic solution that prevents Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon is the right objective. Let's give the president the space and support he needs to achieve it. Let's choose statesmanship over politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/22/2016 5:16:45 PM
Subject: New News! (1/22/2016)

---

de·moc·ra·cy
di-ˈmä-krə-sē

noun - a system of government by the whole population or all the eligible members of a state, typically through elected representatives.

News as of January 22nd, 2016

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

---

- New anxiety as US stocks plunge
- Iran deal done: Iran frees 5 as sanctions are lifted
- Trump retakes Iowa lead, Sanders leading in Iowa and New Hampshire
- More terrorism around the globe

The Economy

Top CEOs worried about economy and political unrest: "Two of three corporate chiefs concerned over growth prospects of their companies...Only 16% of North American CEOs were optimistic, less than half of CEOs in the most optimistic regions - Western Europe (33%) and the Middle East (34%)." Kim Hjelmgaard, USA Today [More]

Fareed Zakaria at Davos: "There is more anxiety in the air than at any time since the global financial crisis. The worry is reflected in the world's stock markets...and in the anger, rebellion and unpredictability of the Presidential campaign when "we need grown ups in charge," according to some CEOs. Fareed Zakaria, Op-Ed, Washington Post [More]

The global slowdown hits the US: "The sanguine narrative argues that the U.S. is again the safest house in a volatile world.. 2016 forecasts for U.S. growth that begin with a 2 may have to be revised to begin with a 1. The global slowdown is coming here." Ruchir Sharma, Op-Ed, Wall Street Journal [More]

"Fiendishly" small shifts can signal huge changes in economies: Gillian Tett (TCG Speaker), Financial Times [More]

New anxiety as US stocks plunge: "What's changed is the level of uncertainty and...fears that [China] is slowing more than official statistics suggest. Oil prices...continue to get hammered...Investors also are concerned that international sanctions on Iran are close to being lifted, which would allow that nation to ship more oil." Jim Puzzanghera and Don Lee, LA Times [More]

This meltdown isn't a reprise of 2008: "While losses could continue, the U.S. appears ... to be in a better position to weather them... U.S. banks today are in far better position to absorb losses than during the financial crisis." Justin Lahart, Wall Street Journal [More]

Iran is open for business. What does this mean for the global economy?: Juan Cole, The Nation [More]

Polls

Iowa: Trump regains lead, with 37% support to Cruz's 26%. Sanders takes the lead at 51% to Clinton's 46%, after trailing her by 3 points last week. [Poll]

New Hampshire: Sanders increases his lead from 4 points to 9 points, leading Clinton 50% to 41%. Trump continues to dominate, leading by 20 points with 34% to Cruz's 14%. [Poll] [Poll]

"The single statistically significant variable that predicts whether a voter supports Trump—and it's not race, income or education levels: It's authoritarianism." Matthew McWilliams, Poll under University Of Massachusetts, Politico [More]

Latinos are rising, but so are Latino nonvoters: "27 million Latinos will be eligible to cast a ballot in November — an increase of 17% since 2012 — [but] the Latino population is becoming more distant from the American political process." Damien Cave, New York Times [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These voters could decide GOP race: Blue-collar cultural conservatives loom large as a pivotal voting block, especially across the South and Midwest. Ronald Brownstein, Op-Ed, National Journal [More]

2016 Campaign

With Trump-Cruz race upsetting establishment, time running out for a shift before Iowa: Phil Rucker and Bob Costa, Washington Post [More]

Clinton allies regret forgoing early attacks on Sanders: Patrick Healy, New York Times [More]

Sarah Palin's endorsement the latest prize as Trump & Cruz battle for conservatives: "Palin's endorsement came a day after Trump received the effusive praise of evangelical leader Jerry Falwell Jr…Other conservative voices…have rallied to Cruz's side" Robert Costa, Washington Post [More]

A Trump/Kasich Ticket?: Myra Adams, National Review [More]

Cruz offends New York donors: Isaac Arnsdorf, Politico [More]

Iowa Governor Branstad speaks out against Cruz: Branstad has instead gone on the attack against Cruz for his "Big Oil" ties and opposition to the Renewable Fuel Standard regulations." Donnelle Eller and Matthew Patane, Des Moines Register [More]

Foreign Affairs/National Security

Iran frees 5 as sanctions are lifted: New era of bilateral ties: "Post reporter Jason Rezaian released after 544 days in prison ...The coordinated moves cemented a major diplomatic victory for the Obama administration" Carol Morello, Karen DeYoung, William Branigin and Joby Warrick, Washington Post [More]; "The United States and European nations lifted oil and financial sanctions on Iran and released roughly $100 billion of its assets as Iran complies with nuclear deal. .'Iran has undertaken significant steps that many people - and I do mean many - doubted would ever come to pass,' Secretary of State John Kerry (TCG Speaker) said." David E. Sanger in Vienna, New York Times [More]

"Russian airstrikes are working in Syria tilting the battlefield in favor of President Bashar al-Assad to such an extent that the Obama administration's quest for a negotiated settlement to the war suddenly looks a lot less likely to succeed." Liz Sly, Washington Post [More]

Tsai Ing-wen elected President of Taiwan, 1st woman to hold office: Austin Ramzy, New York Times [More]

Helping the Syrians who want to return home: According to the 1951 Refugee Convention, the US and all other signatories to the convention have a legal obligation to protect refugees and their well-being, which can mean resettlement when necessary." Maureen White (TCG Speaker Member), Op-Ed, New York TImes [More]

UN quantifies suffering in an Iraq: Tim Arango and Falih Hassan, New York Times [More]

Burkina Faso hotel siege 'over' amid reports of new attack: BBC [More]

TERRORISM: Istanbul suicide bombing results in deadliest attack on Germans in over 13 years: Kaya Genc, Op-Ed, Huffington Post [More] ; Turkey, the US & Europe are all partly to blame for Syria War: Behlül Özkan, Op-Ed, Huffington Post [More] ; Gunmen storm university in Pakistan, killing at least 20 people: Taliban militants claimed responsibility for the Charsadda attack. Tim Craig, Washington Post [More]

Putin 'probably approved' murder of a former Russian spy: "The results of [a] public inquiry suggest that Putin and Nikolai Patrushev, then the head of FSB, signed off on the operation." Marina Koren, The Atlantic [More]

More European nations are barring their doors to migrants: "A domino effect is taking shape as nations in Europe suddenly moves to keep more migrants out." Anthony Faiola, Washington Post [More]

Domestic Affairs

Flint was an epicenter of America's lead problem as the auto industry grew there: Philip Bump, Washington Post [More]

Drug overdoses propel rise in mortality rates of young whites: Gina Kolata and Sarah Cohen, New York Times [More]

Clinton's server had classified material beyond 'top secret': "Intelligence Community Inspector General found messages … from an even more restricted subcategory of sensitive compartmented information…'" Rachael Bade and Josh Gerstein, Politico [More]

Supreme Court to review Obama's power on deportation policy: Robert Barnes and Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post [More]

Ending the filibuster would be a huge victory for progressives: Senator Ben Sasse (R-NE) Op-Ed, Wall Street Journal [More]

U.S. is ranked #4 according to U.S. News & World Report "Best Countries" ranking: Mortimer B. Zuckerman, (TCG Speaker & Member). Niraj Chokshi, Washington Post [More]

Books & Film

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ex-CIA chief in Benghazi disputes "13 Hours" film: The scene where highest-ranking CIA man orders his team to 'stand down' rather than rush off to rescue U.S. diplomat is untrue "according to the officer in charge of the CIA's Benghazi base that night..." Adam Goldman and Greg Miller, Washington Post [More]

Another Oscar year, another all-white ballot. Cara Buckley, New York Times [More]

Economic espionage sponsored by the Chinese government is costing US corporations billions of dollars and more than 2 million jobs, a Justice Dept official tells Lesley Stahl (TCG Speaker), 60 MINUTES [More]

Katie Couric: Yahoo series, "Cities Rising: Rebuilding America": Highlighting cities like Pittsburgh, Detroit and New Orleans. [More]

Showtime's "The Circus" - 1st real-time documentary series about a presidential campaign, from Mark Halperin (TCG Speaker), John Heilemann (TCG Speaker) and Mark McKinnon. [More]

Thank you!

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
To: "Stephanie Cutter" <scutter@barackobama.com>
"Dan Pfeiffer" <dpfeiffer@barackobama.com>
saramlatham@gmail.com
Date: 11/5/2008 4:07:34 PM
Subject: NYT story on ethics, lobbying

Stephanie and Dan - Dont know if you have seen this gem. Kirkpatrick has a story up about how ethics rules could limit hires. Notes that there could be some "questions" about Podesta, Daschle and Axelrod (Podesta was a registered lobbyist for CAP from 11/03 to 12/06). I have not heard from other reporters on this. If you want to dicsuss in the morning, let me know.

Jennifer

November 6, 2008

Campaign Pledge on Ethics Could Become Obstacle to Filling White House Jobs

By DAVID D. KIRKPATRICK
President-elect Barack Obama , now recruiting for his administration, is trying to fulfill campaign promises of sweeping ethics restrictions that could deter some potential appointees.

Vowing to combat the power of "lobbyists who kill good ideas and good plans with secret meetings and campaign checks," Mr. Obama has laid out more detailed and more onerous ethics rules than any previous president. He has pledged to bar appointees from working on matters involving their former employers for two years, prohibit departing officials from lobbying his administration for its duration, and require all political appointees to publicly disclose every meeting with registered lobbyists.

But in a city where policy experts typically work for private interests between stints in public service — and often have spouses or family members in the same business — such measures could hamper the new administration, scholars and ethics experts say.

"The problem for Obama is that he will be limiting himself in the expertise he can tap," said Martha Kumar, a Towson University professor who studies presidential transitions, noting that President Bill Clinton faced a similar difficulty with less sweeping rules.

Some Republicans see a trove of political ammunition in Mr. Obama's promises about public transparency. He has pledged to post online all of his appointees' employment histories and personal financial disclosures, along with regular updates of any meetings or conversations they hold with registered lobbyists.

"If they want to hold themselves to that standard of transparency, then they will be ridiculed continuously, in incessant attacks from the outside," said David Bossie, an operative who once specialized in unflattering research on the Clinton White House and now heads the conservative group Citizens United.

Others are already noting the potential gaps in the rules. Many people in Washington make money by consulting for private interests seeking to influence the government but without engaging in the specific activities that require registration as a lobbyist, thus sidestepping some of Mr. Obama's restrictions.

"There are so many people who don't have to register that it captures not so many," Ms. Kumar said.

Some of the challenges and potential ambiguities in Mr. Obama's lofty goals are already apparent in his presidential transition team, which will help select his administration's senior staff.

Mr. Obama has required everyone advising his transition team to remove themselves from matters involving a broad spectrum of potential conflicts of interest —issues in which the adviser has a financial interest, in which family or business associates have a financial interest, or on which the person lobbied over the previous year. In cases of an appearance of conflict, Christopher Lu, the transition team's executive director and a member of Mr. Obama's Senate staff, must referee.

But John D. Podesta , a former Clinton administration chief of staff and the leader of the transition team, presents several potential questions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Podesta is the chairman of the Center for American Progress, a liberal research group that solicits private donations and lobbies on a variety of issues. While he has not personally acted as a registered lobbyist in the last year, according to the disclosure filings for the center's political advocacy arm, he had earlier lobbied on issues including the war and reconstruction in Iraq, Defense Department spending, the treatment of military detainees, energy issues, bio-fuels and oil prices.

And his brother Tony is the chairman of a major lobbying firm, the Podesta Group, which the brothers founded together two decades ago.

In an interview, Tony Podesta said that he bought his brother out of his firm in 1996 and that the firm banned lobbying John Podesta while he was in the government, either in the Clinton White House or the Obama transition. To comply with the Obama ethics rules, Tony Podesta said jokingly, "I am taking my brother out of my will."

Former Senator Tom Daschle , a top Obama campaign adviser considered to be a candidate for a prominent White House job, does not engage in the specific activities that require him to register as a lobbyist. But he is a highly paid member of the law and lobbying firm Alston & Bird, where he sells strategic political advice about a variety of matters that have recently included the financial industry bailout. And his wife, Linda Daschle, is a registered lobbyist specializing in defense and aerospace clients. (The Daschles declined to comment.)

David Axelrod , Mr. Obama's top campaign strategist and another likely candidate for a White House job, is not a lobbyist either. But he is a partner in a public advocacy group that has helped corporate clients including the telecommunications companies AT&T, Cablevision and SBC Communications; Household Financial, a subprime mortgage lender; Wisconsin Energy, a coal-fired power company; the nuclear power giant Exelon; and a coalition that pushes deregulation of the electricity markets.

Still, several Republicans expressed admiration for Mr. Obama's effort. "It is impressive, very ambitious, with some very laudable objectives — minimizing conflicts of interest and self-dealing, slowing the revolving door, increasing transparency," said Jan Baran, a Republican political law expert who served on a commission on ethics rules for the first President Bush.

Joe Gaylord, a Republican consultant and former adviser to Newt Gingrich , the former House speaker, said: "It could be of value to opposition researchers. But I guess I would applaud it. It might not be terrific for the president-elect, but it would be great for America, huh?"

Mr. Clinton set the previous high bar for White House ethics rules, with mixed results. He required political appointees to pledge that for five years they would not lobby the government agencies where they had worked, and that for the rest of their careers they would not lobby on behalf of a foreign government.

But even those rules were widely criticized as too onerous for many in Washington. "Much too burdensome," said Paul Light, a public-ethics expert at New York University .

Whether in response to his appointees' complaints or his own political timetable, Mr. Clinton rescinded his rules in his last week in office.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/11/06/us/politics/06lobby.html?sq=david%20kirkpatrick%20november%206%202008&st=cse&scp=1&pagewanted=print

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Moira Whelan" <mwhelan@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/1/2008 3:43:38 AM
Subject: [big campaign] FW: NYDN: NORAD grounds Palin claim

-----Original Message-----
From: Meek, James [mailto:jmeek@nydailynews.com]
Sent: Wednesday, October 01, 2008 10:42 AM
To: Meek, James
Subject: NYDN: NORAD grounds Palin claim

NORAD: Sarah Palin has no role in guarding U.S. airspace despite claims in Katie Couric interview

BY JAMES GORDON MEEK
DAILY NEWS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Tuesday, September 30th 2008, 5:21 PM

WASHINGTON - When Russian bombers approach American airspace and U.S. Air Force fighters are scrambled, Sarah Palin's phone doesn't ring.
The Alaska governor has no command authority over the guardians of U.S. airspace despite her recent suggestion otherwise.
"She doesn't have any role in that process," Air Force Maj. Allen Herritage, spokesman for the Alaska North American Aerospace Defense Command, told the Daily News.
"The authority to launch and respond to a Russian incursion lies with the Alaska NORAD Region commander" - Air Force Lt. Gen. Dana Atkins, he said.
Palin said last week that her foreign policy experience includes facing the Russians.
"It's very important when you consider even national security issues with Russia, as Putin rears his head and comes into the airspace of the United States of America - where do they go? It's Alaska," Palin told CBS' Katie Couric.
"It is from Alaska that we send those out to make sure that an eye is being kept on this very powerful nation," she said.
Moscow's bombers have skirted Alaskan airspace 20 times, thugh they have not violated it, during Palin's governorship, officials said.
When F-15 and F-22 interceptors scrambled from Elmendorf Air Force Base in Anchorage in response, John McCain's running mate was not speed-dialed with the news.
"The commander does not call the governor," Herritage said.
Steven Biegun, a McCain foreign policy adviser, said Palin is informed of the fly-bys by her National Guard commander.
The Alaska Air Guard, which Palin oversees, performs airspace-watching missions only under NORAD command, and does not fly interception sorties.
Palin did get an annual Air Force briefing in February.
"She asked a lot of questions and seemed generally curious," recalled Herritage, who was there. "She was very interested in Russian long-range aviation."

jmeek@nydailynews.com

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/politics/2008/09/30/2008-09-30_norad_sarah_palin_has_no_role_in_guardin.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This transmission is intended only for the use of the addressee and may contain information that is confidential, privileged and/or exempt from disclosure under applicable law. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of the information contained herein is strictly unauthorized and prohibited. If you have received this communication in error, please notify the sender immediately and delete this message. Thank you.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Julie Cohen" <jec@law.georgetown.edu>
To: "Law Faculty and Visitors" <LawFacultyandVisitors@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 3/19/2015 1:53:46 PM
Subject: Beware of philosophical arguments?

---

www.independent.co.uk/news/world/europe/russian-man-shot-in-quarrel-over-immanuel-kants-philosophy-8820327.html

Julie E. Cohen
Professor of Law
Georgetown University Law Center
jec@law.georgetown.edu
http://www.juliecohen.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	7/20/2015 12:15:19 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 7.20.15
Attachments:	7.20.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

July 20, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton's fair growth gambit // LA Times // Doyle McManus – July 19, 2015..... 5

Hillary Clinton Draws Scrappy Determination From a Tough, Combativ e Father // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 19, 2015 6

Hillary Clinton Lambastes Republicans in Arkansas Homecoming // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 19, 2015 11

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 12

Hillary Clinton's political director brings key lessons from her own (losing) campaign // WaPo // Evan Halper – July 19, 2015..... 12

Clinton to Push Revamp of Capital-Gains Tax Rates // WSJ // Laura Meckler and John D. McKinnon – July 20, 2015 15

GOP Peddles Hard the 'Hillary Can't Be Trusted' Line // HuffPo // Earl Ofari Hutchinson – July 19, 2015 18

Same-Sex Couple Featured In Hillary Clinton Video Get Married // CBS // Dana Kozlov – July 19, 2015 19

Ghost of Hillary Clinton Haunts Liberal Convention // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 19, 2015..... 20

Jeb and Hillary: Flawed front-runners generating little excitement // Fox News // Howard Kurtz - July 20, 2015 22

6 Facts About Hillary Clinton & Her Dad That Totally Gave Us #FatherDaughterGoals // Bustle // Tonya Riley – July 19, 2015..... 24

Clinton insider faced IG probe for informal diplomacy // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 19, 2015 25

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 26

DECLARED..... 27

O'MALLEY..... 27

O'Malley sorry for saying 'all lives matter' // CNN // Chris Moody – July 19, 2015..... 27

Martin O'Malley's Presidential Strategy: Try, Try, Try Again // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – July 19, 2015 27

SANDERS..... 30

Liberal activists see Bernie Sanders as champion for causes failed by Obama // WaPo // David Weigel - July 20, 2015 30

Bernie Sanders' newest fan? Jesse Ventura. // WaPo // Hunter Schwarz – July 19, 2015..... 32

How the NRA helped put Bernie Sanders in Congress // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold – July 19, 2015 33

Sanders campaign claims highest turnout yet for Netroots Nation speech //Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 19, 2015 38

Bernie Sanders Continues to Draw the Biggest Crowds of Any 2016 Candidate // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – July 19, 2015 39

Can Bernie Sanders win black v oters? // CNN // Nia-Malika Henderson and Chris Moody – July 19, 2015 39

#BlackTwitter Turns On Bernie Sanders // The Daily Beast // Asawin Suebsaeng – July 19, 2015 44

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders draws largest crowds yet in Phoenix // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – Jully 19, 2015 45

Sanders vaults from fringe to the heart of the fray // Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – July 19, 2015 47

Bernie Sanders voices concerns about police brutality in Dallas campaign stop // Trailblazers Blog // Ryan J. Rusak – July 19, 2015..... 51

'Police must be held accountable': Bernie Sanders rips bad cops who attack young black men // RawStory // Tom Boggioni – July 19, 2015..... 52

Twitter users debate Bernie Sanders' civil rights credibility with #BernieSoBlack hashtag // RawStory // David Ferguson – July 19, 2015 52

UNDECLARED..... 53

BIDEN..... 53

Report: Joe Biden may still enter 2016 presidential race // MSNBC // Adam Howard – July 19, 2015 53

OTHER..... 54

How Clinton, Sanders, O'Malley answer union's questions about education // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – July 19, 2015 54

What the First Democratic Cattle Call Reveals About the State of the Presidential Race // Bloomberg // Arit John – July 19, 2015..... 91

Democrats lose control of presidential event // CNN // Chris Moody – July 19, 2015..... 94

O'Malley, Sanders heckled by protestors during presidential forum // USA Today // Dan Nowicki – July 19, 2015 96

Hall Of Fame Wrap Up: Who Stood Out, Who Missed Out // Iowa Starting Line // Pay Rynard and Angela Ufheil – July 19, 2015..... 98

GOP..... 106

DECLARED..... 106

BUSH..... 106

Poll: Bush has edge over Rubio among Miami Cuban voters // Politico // Marc Caputo – July 19, 2015 106

How Jeb Tackled the Cocaine Cartels // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff and Alexa Corse – July 19, 2015 108

Jeb Bush Wants to Share // Real Clear Politics // Debra Saunders – July 19, 2015..... 112

Jeb Bush consultant critiques Republican digital culture // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – July 19, 2015 113

Ralston Reports: Jeb Bush pandering to nativ ist wing // Reno Gazette-Journal // Jon Ralston – July 19, 2015 115

Leaner, meaner: Jeb Bush starts his climb // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – July 19, 2015 117

RUBIO..... 118

Marco Rubio: Trump insulted McCain and 'all POWs' // Politico // Kevin Robillard – July 19, 2015 118

Rubio: Trump's McCain attack a 'disqualifier' // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 19, 2015..... 120

Marco Rubio says Iran deal breaks 'any time, anywhere' inspection promise by Barack Obama // PolitiFact // Louis Jacobson – July 19, 2015..... 121

Rubio: Clinton's Uber Criticisms Show Someone 'Trapped In The Past' // Free Beacon // Andrew Kugle – July 19, 2015 125

PAUL..... 125

CRUZ..... 126

Ted Cruz drops off D.C. bestseller list // WaPo // Ron Charles – July 19, 2015..... 126

Ted Cruz Looks for His Iowa Moment // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 19, 2015 126

CHRISTIE..... 128

'I Wouldn't Let This Guy Buy a Car For Me': Chris Christie Slams Obama on Iran Deal // Vice // Gillian Mohney –

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 19, 2015..... 129

Chris Christie tries to trump Donald on immigration // NJ // Paul Mulshine – July 19, 2015... 130

PERRY..... 132

Rick Perry: Boy Scouts 'better off' without gay leaders // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 19, 2015 . 132

Rick Perry Slams GOP Rival: 'We're Seeing the Real Donald Trump Now' // NBC // Dan Cooney – July 19, 2015 133

Perry Still Opposes Gay Scout Leaders, While Walker Backtracks // TIME // Justin Worland – July 19, 2015 134

GRAHAM..... 134

Lindsey Graham Defends John McCain: 'Being Captured Doesn't Mean You're A Loser' // HuffPo // Samantha-Jo Roth – July 19, 2015..... 134

CARSON..... 135

Ben Carson: Walking away from paid speaking commitments would be 'unethical' // Washington Examiner // Ryan Lovelace – July 19, 2015..... 135

FIORINA..... 136

Carly Fiorina on the bubble // Politico // Eli Stokols – July 19, 2015..... 136

Reynolds: Carly Fiorina, the other woman // USA Today // Glenn Harlan Reynolds – July 19, 2015 138

JINDAL..... 140

Bobby Jindal calls for federal religious freedom order, draws big applause lines at Family Leadership Summit // NOLA // Kevin Litten – July 19, 2015 140

TRUMP..... 142

Trump Refuses to Apologize for Comments on McCain's Service // NYT // Maggie Haberman and Jonathan Martin – July 19, 2015..... 142

Bombast Trumps Organization for One Republican Candidate // NYT //Maggie Haberman and Michael Barbaro – July 19, 2015..... 144

Donald Trump didn't apologize to John McCain. Because, of course not. // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – July 19, 2015 147

Trump's attack on McCain marks a turning point for him — and the GOP // WaPo // Dan Balz – July 19, 2015 148

How to handle a bully like Trump // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – July 19, 2015..... 151

Donald Trump Not Sorry for Comments, Not Dropping Out // WSJ // Louise Radnofsky and Sarah Portlock – July 19, 2015 153

Trump Refuses to Back Down on McCain Criticism // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 19, 2015.. 154

What Donald Trump Has Said — About McCain, Obama, Immigrants, His Hair // WSJ – July 19, 2015 156

Trump and His Apologists // WSJ – July 19, 2015 157

Donald Trump: No apology to McCain, vows to stay the course // Politico // Kevin Robillard – July 19, 2015 159

Donald Trump evades specifics on his draft deferment // Politico // David Rogers – July 19, 2015 160

Donald Trump Digs in as More Pile On // Bloomberg // Ari Elkin – July 19, 2015 162

Trump Awakens Kerry's Vietnam Anger With Slam On McCain // The Daily Beast // Mike Barnicle – July 19, 2015 164

Trump offers no apologizes for McCain war record attack // MSNBC // Adam Howard – July 19, 2015 165

Donald Trump Says He Does Not Owe John McCain Apology // ABC // Benjamin Bell and Emily Shapiro – July 19, 2015 167

John Kerry, who knows something about having his war record attacked, savages Donald Trump // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 19, 2015 168

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump: I don't need to be lectured // USA Today // Donald Trump – July 19, 2015..... 169

Donald Trump Says He Doesn't Owe John McCain An Apology // TIME // Justin Worland – July 19, 2015 171

John McCain slam seen as new low for Donald Trump // Boston Herald // Lindsay Kalter – July 19, 2015 171

Has America gone nuts? Could Republican frontrunner Donald Trump really become president? // The Guardian // Tom McCarthy – July 19, 2015 172

Beat Trump, don't ban him from the debates // Washington Examiner // W. James Antle III – July 19, 2015 176

WALKER..... 177

Scott Walker on whether being gay is a choice: 'I don't know the answer to that question' // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 19, 2015..... 177

Scott Walker tells undocumented worker that immigrants must follow the law // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 19, 2015 178

Scott Walker Goes All In on Iowa // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 19, 2015..... 181

Scott Walker on the Boy Scouts' Ban on Gay Leaders // AP – July 19, 2015 182

Scott Walker in Iowa: Relentlessly on message // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 19, 2015 183

Scott Walker: 'I don't know' if being gay a choice // CNN // Dana Bash – July 19, 2015..... 184

Walker talks everything but Trump // Boston Herald // Chris Villani – July 19, 2015..... 186

Republican Scott Walker brushes up on U.S. foreign policy // Reuters // Steve Holland – July 19, 2015 187

Scott Walker calls for more militaristic America: US needs to 'put steel in the face of our enemies' // Reuters – July 19, 2015..... 190

Scott Walker Steers Clear Of Nuance On Foreign Policy // Reuters // Steve Holland – July 19, 2015 192

Walker says he supported path to citizenship, but not amnesty // Washington Examiner // Philip Klein – July 19, 2015 194

UNDECLARED..... 195

KASICH..... 195

John Kasich Group's Video All But Declares Him a 2016 Presidential Candidate // Bloomberg // Steven Yaccino – July 19, 2015..... 195

How John Kasich could win in 2016 // Cincinnati Enquirer // Chrissie Thompson – July 19, 2015 196

Kasich prepared for long run in presidential bid // Columbus Dispatch // Darrel Rowland and Jessica Wehrman – July 19, 2015..... 200

OTHER..... 203

Walker, Kasich and the GOP's Midwest bracket // WaPo // E. J. Dionne Jr. – July 19, 2015.... 204

GOP field chases Iowa evangelicals // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 19, 2015..... 205

GOP Candidates' Rosy 4 Percent Growth Goal // RealClearPolitics // Rebecca Berg - July 20, 2015 208

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 211

Some surprising winners and losers in the 2016 fundraising race // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – July 19, 2015 211

The Iowa Crisis the Candidates Aren't Talking About // Politico // Clay Masters – July 19, 2015 213

'Too big to fail' a flashpoint in 2016 race // The Hill // Kevin Cirilli – July 19, 2015..... 216

The Snapchat Elections Begin With Bernie, Hillary and Jeb // Recode // Mark Bergen – July 19, 2015 217

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 217

What US leaders have never understood about Iran // NY Post // Amir Taheri –July 19, 2015 218

Deal with the devil // The News-Gazette – July 19, 2015..... 221

TOP NEWS..... 223

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DOMESTIC..... 223

For G.O.P., Pope Francis's Visit to Congress Comes With Tensions // NYT // Jennifer Steinhauer – July 19, 2015 223

Inflation's Steady Tick Poses Headaches in Congress // WSJ // Josh Zumbrun – July 19, 2015 226

Same-Sex Couple Featured In Hillary Clinton Video Get Married // CBS Chicago // Dana Kozlov – July 19, 2015 228

INTERNATIONAL..... 229

U.N. Vote on Iran Nuclear Deal Irks Congress // NYT // Michael R. Gordon and David E. Sanger – July 19, 2015 229

War Crimes and Rwandan Realities // NYT // Stephen W. Smith – July 19, 2015..... 231

U.S. Seeks to Allay Concerns of Allies on Iran Nuclear Deal // WSJ // Carol E. Lee and Gordon Lubold – July 19, 2015 233

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton's fair growth gambit // LA Times // Doyle McManus – July 19, 2015

For most of a generation, Democrats have divided into two broad camps on economic policy. There are "growth Democrats," who argue that a rising tide will lift all boats; that was the reigning view during the Bill Clinton administration under Treasury Secretaries Robert Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers. And there are "fairness Democrats," who argue that the central problem is inequality. That's the view of the party's progressive wing, led today by Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont.

As she began spelling out her views for the 2016 presidential campaign, Hillary Rodham Clinton faced a choice: Which Democrat was she going to be?

Her answer: She wants to be both. "I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," she said last week. "You can't have one without the other."

Politically, that put Clinton exactly where she wants to be: to the left of her husband's long-ago administration, which progressives think was too solicitous toward Wall Street, but to the right of Sanders, who's running as the scourge of the billionaire class.

So her economic policy speech included a dose of the pro-worker Hillary, calling for stronger union bargaining power and demanding equal pay for equal work, but also the pro-business Hillary, extolling entrepreneurs and promising to be "the small-business president."

There was recycled Obama administration policy too: a higher minimum wage, an infrastructure bank, investment in education and renewable energy. In economic policy a Hillary Clinton presidency would look more like a third Obama term than a third Bill Clinton term.

But she offered some intriguing new elements as well — policies that could not only help her bridge the gaps between her party's wings but also make her pitch more than just a warmed-over version of the last eight years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She promised proposals to promote long-term investment by businesses instead of a chase for quarterly results — a problem she called "short-termism." (It may be the first time any presidential candidate has ever used that word.)

"Too many pressures in our economy push us toward short-termism," Clinton said. "Everything is focused on the next earnings report or the short-term share price, and the result is too little attention to the sources of long-term growth: research and development, physical capital and talent."

She promised proposals for "making sure stock buybacks aren't used only for an immediate boost in share prices," a practice economists fear is soaking up funds that might go to more productive investments. And she said she wants to make sure stock markets "work for everyday investors, not just high-frequency traders."

Clinton hasn't spelled out any details yet. But it sounded as though she may propose changing Securities and Exchange Commission rules to make it harder for companies to buy back their own stock, an idea Warren and other progressives have championed.

Aides said Clinton also plans to propose changes in the tax treatment of capital gains — income from investments — to reward long-term investors. Laurence Fink, chairman of the investment firm BlackRock, has proposed lengthening the holding period for long-term capital gains (which benefit from a low tax rate) from one year to three years, and perhaps making all gains tax-free after 10 years.

"U.S. tax policy, as it stands, incentivizes short-term behavior," Fink wrote. "Tax reform that promotes long-term investment will benefit both the companies who rely on capital markets and the hundreds of millions of people saving for retirement."

Finally, Clinton called for a broader shift in the way American businesses behave. "We need to get businesses back looking after their employees and their customers and their communities and our country, not just their executives and their shareholders," she said in New Hampshire on Thursday.

In effect, she was arguing for abandoning a principle many U.S. firms have followed since the 1970s: the idea that the sole duty of a corporation is to maximize shareholder value.

"There's increasing debate in the business community over a fundamental question: What's the purpose of a corporation?" Judith Samuelson, director of the Aspen Institute's Business and Society Program, told me. "We've been in thrall to a very simplistic idea — that the purpose is to maximize shareholder value. But that's not the only purpose, and it doesn't need to be."

Some of these ideas, intriguingly, appeal not only to Democratic business leaders but to some Republicans. too. Conservative writer James Pethokoukis of the American Enterprise Institute warned: "Arguing against short-termism should be a natural fit for Republicans.... Hillary Clinton just stole a potentially powerful theme right from under them."

The details will be important, of course. But Clinton has managed not only to find a sensible starting point in the middle of the Democratic Party; she's introduced some useful new ideas to the campaign and launched a debate that will force rivals in both parties to respond.

Hillary Clinton Draws Scrappy Determination From a Tough, Combative Father // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As a little girl, if Hillary Rodham forgot to screw the cap back on the toothpaste, her father would toss the tube out the bathroom window. She'd scurry around in the snow-covered evergreen bushes outside their suburban Chicago home to find it and return inside to brush her teeth, reminded, once again, of one of Hugh E. Rodham's many rules.

When she lagged behind in Miss Metzger's fourth-grade math class, Mr. Rodham would wake his daughter at dawn to grill her on multiplication tables. When she brought home an A, he would sneer: "You must go to a pretty easy school."

Mrs. Clinton has made the struggles of her mother, Dorothy Rodham, a central part of her 2016 campaign's message, and has repeatedly described Mrs. Rodham's life story to crowds around the country. But her father, whom Mrs. Clinton rarely talks about publicly, exerted an equally powerful, if sometimes bruising, influence on the woman who wants to become the first female president.

The brusque son of an English immigrant and a coal miner's daughter in Scranton, Pa., Mr. Rodham, for most of his life, harbored prejudices against blacks, Catholics and anyone else not like him. He hurled biting sarcasm at his wife and only daughter and spanked, at times excessively, his three children to keep them in line, according to interviews with friends and a review of documents, Mrs. Clinton's writings and former President Bill Clinton's memoir.

"By all accounts he was kind of a tough customer," said Lissa Muscatine, a longtime friend and adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "Hard working, believed in no free rides, believed you had to earn what you're going to get, believed his kids could always do better."

Presidential candidates often turn to hard-knocks family stories to help them connect to voters, but for years, Mrs. Clinton refrained from sharing a detailed portrait of her childhood. In her 2016 campaign, she has shown an increased willingness to talk about her mother, a warm and devoted parent who had been abandoned by her own parents and who worked as a housekeeper as a teenager before she met and married Mr. Rodham.

But Mrs. Clinton refers in only oblique ways to her father.

At a house party in Iowa this month, a supporter gave Mrs. Clinton garlic pills to help her fend off illness on the campaign trail. The unexpected gift brought about an olfactory, and impromptu, memory. "My late father was a huge believer in garlic," and not the odorless kind, Mrs. Clinton said. "I couldn't believe it when I saw him eating a garlic and peanut butter and jelly sandwich."

Even her Father's Day message this year, posted on Twitter, was, essentially, an ode to her mother.

"I wish she could have seen the America we are going to build together," she wrote of Mrs. Rodham, who died in 2011. "An America," Mrs. Clinton continued, "where a father can tell his daughter: Yes, you can be anything you want to be. Even President of the United States."

It is unclear what Mr. Rodham, an ardent conservative, would have thought about his only daughter's trying (again) to capture the Democratic nomination.

He died of a stroke at age 82 in 1993, not long after he watched his daughter hold the Bible as his son-in-law was sworn into office, but long before she began her own political career.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Mr. Clinton eulogized Mr. Rodham, he described him as “tough and gruff” and said he “thought Democrats were one step short of Communism — but that I might be O.K.”

If Mrs. Rodham, a homemaker who never attended college but who raised her daughter to be confident and caring, is forming the emotional core of Mrs. Clinton’s 2016 campaign, invoked as the inspiration behind her decades of public service, then Mrs. Clinton’s father quietly represents the candidate’s combative, determined and scrappy side. The inspiration, friends said, that toughened his daughter up to not just withstand but embrace yet another political battle.

“He was such a force in the family, and there’s a lot of him in Hillary,” said Lisa Caputo, a friend and former White House press aide who knew Mr. Rodham. “The discipline, the tenacity, the work ethic, a lot of that’s from him.”

When Mrs. Clinton does invoke her father on the campaign trail, she talks about him as a small-business owner who “just believed that you had to work hard to make your way and do whatever you had to do to be successful and provided a good living for our family.” (Mr. Rodham shut his drapery business in 1965.)

Or, Mrs. Clinton reminds people that her father was a Republican, an aside to show she can work with the other side. She did highlight her father’s geographic roots in her 2008 campaign, when she tried to win white working-class voters in the Democratic primaries against Barack Obama. Mr. Rodham was born to strict Methodists in working-class eastern Pennsylvania.

His father, Hugh Simpson Rodham, toiled in a Scranton lace mill, and his mother, Hannah Jones Rodham, came from a long line of coal miners. When she was a girl, Hillary and her two brothers spent summers at a cabin in the Pocono Mountains that had no indoor bath.

Mrs. Clinton tries to visit her father’s grave, in the Rodham plot at the Washburn Street Cemetery in Scranton, when she passes through. She will return to Scranton on July 29 to raise money, her first trip back since she began her 2016 campaign.

“My grandfather, like so many of his generation, came to this country as a young child, as an immigrant, went to work at age 11 in the lace mills in Scranton,” she says. “So when my dad was born in Scranton, he was born with that American dream.”

But unlike her mother’s struggles, the darker parts of her father’s biography rarely come up when Mrs. Clinton speaks.

Depression ran in the family. Mrs. Clinton’s father found his brother Russell hanging but alive in the attic of his parents’ home and had to cut him down. Russell came to live with the Rodhams in their one-bedroom Lincoln Park apartment in Chicago. (In 1950, when Hillary was a toddler, the family moved to a two-story brick house in the affluent suburb of Park Ridge, Ill. Russell rented an apartment nearby, but he died in 1962 when he left a cigarette burning, setting his home afire.)

Mr. Rodham, who was 230 pounds and 6-foot-2, with thick black hair and furrowed eyebrows, had played football at Pennsylvania State University and worked as a fitness instructor in the Navy during World War II.

He would hurl criticism at his wife around the kitchen table at 235 Wisner Street. When she encouraged Hillary to learn for learning’s sake, Mr. Rodham, who drove a Cadillac, would quip: “Learn for earning’s sake.” If his children asked for an allowance for their many household chores, he would reply bluntly: “I feed you, don’t I?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The family was isolated from its neighbors because of Mr. Rodham's sour, demeaning nature and his misanthropic tendencies, said Carl Bernstein, who wrote a 2007 biography of Hillary Clinton, "A Woman in Charge."

"It was anything but 'Father Knows Best,'" Mr. Bernstein said in an interview.

Mrs. Rodham was on blood thinners and unable to travel to see her daughter deliver the 1969 commencement speech at Wellesley. Hillary was devastated that her mother could not make it. Mr. Rodham attended instead.

Her relationship with her father had deteriorated as she drifted away from the party of Barry Goldwater and got swept up in the liberalism of the late 1960s. "In typical Hugh Rodham fashion, he flew to Boston late the night before, stayed out by the airport, took the MTA to campus, attended graduation" and, after lunch with some of Hillary's classmates, went right back to Chicago, Mrs. Clinton wrote in her 2003 memoir, "Living History."

But their relationship was not without warmth.

Mrs. Clinton and her father shared the same distinct laugh, a "big, rolling guffaw that can turn heads in a restaurant and send cats running from the room," as she described it in "Living History." They played heated games of pinochle (though Mr. Rodham was known to flip the table if he lost).

Mr. Rodham taught his only daughter that she could play sports and do anything the boys did. When she was racked with self-doubt at Wellesley and Yale, her father wrote her tough but tender letters telling her to buck up. "Even when he erupted at me, he admired my independence and accomplishments," she later wrote.

At his daughter's wedding in 1975, Mr. Rodham was hesitant to give the bride away to Mr. Clinton, a penniless Southern Baptist Democrat. "You can step back now, Mr. Rodham," the minister finally said.

In 1987, after Mr. Rodham had quadruple-bypass surgery, he and Dorothy moved to Little Rock, Ark., to be closer to their daughter and granddaughter, Chelsea. Mrs. Clinton arranged for them to live in a condominium in the city's leafy Hillcrest district. Chelsea Clinton called her grandfather Pop Pop. The Rodhams attended her softball games, cheering her on and taking her and her friends out for frozen yogurt afterward.

"Her father at that point was beginning to decline, so I think it was to be close to family, and obviously Hillary was close to her family, especially to her mom," said Skip Rutherford, a longtime friend in Little Rock.

After President Clinton's 1993 inauguration, when friends and family toasted the Clintons' arrival in Washington at a party, Mr. Rodham was spotted stewing in a corner and nursing a drink. "My daughter is a real special girl," he told a friend from Scranton, Manny Gelb, who relayed the story to The Associated Press.

When her father had a stroke in 1993, Mrs. Clinton, who was having difficulty adjusting to life in the White House, was deeply shaken.

After his life-support machines had been removed and Mr. Rodham lay in a coma at St. Vincent Infirmary in Little Rock, a scrum of news cameras and reporters waiting outside for any updates, Mrs. Clinton traveled to Austin, Tex., to deliver a speech she felt obligated to give.

It became one of the more unusual addresses ever delivered by a first lady. Ms. Caputo, who accompanied Mrs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton on the trip, described the stream-of-consciousness speech — about the meaning of life, death and the need to remake civil society, delivered without a script — as “cathartic.”

“When does life start? When does life end? Who makes those decisions? How do we dare to impinge upon these areas of such delicate, difficult questions?” Mrs. Clinton asked the crowd.

She never mentioned her father, but quoted Lee Atwater, the Republican strategist who wrote that America was suffering from a “spiritual vacuum,” caught up in its “ruthless ambitions and moral decay,” before he died of cancer at age 40 in 1991.

“You can acquire all you want and still feel empty,” Mrs. Clinton said. “What power wouldn’t I trade for a little more time with my family?”

Hugh Rodham died the next day.

Hillary Clinton Lambastes Republicans in Arkansas Homecoming // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 19, 2015

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — A Democrat is not likely to win this state in the 2016 presidential election, not even one with the last name Clinton.

But on Saturday, Hillary Rodham Clinton returned to Arkansas where she and her husband began their political ascent, delivering a fiery critique of Republican policies and a pep talk of sorts for Democrats who suffered dramatic losses in the midterm elections.

Mrs. Clinton lambasted Republicans as “the party of the past” and tried to portray the extreme comments of one candidate, the businessman and reality TV star, Donald Trump, as representative of the entire party.

“There’s nothing funny about the hate he is spewing at immigrants and their families,” Mrs. Clinton said of Mr. Trump who addressed Arkansas Republicans in Hot Springs, Ark. on Friday. But, she added, of the other Republican candidates, “The sad truth is if you look at many of their policies, it can be hard to tell the difference.”

Mrs. Clinton denounced comments made by Mr. Trump (who she referred to as the “Republican frontrunner”) about Senator John McCain’s war record and she said it was “shameful” how long it has taken other Republican candidates “to start standing up to him.”

(The night before, Mr. Trump, speaking at an Arkansas Republican Party convention said the Clintons had “deserted” the state.)

The visit to Arkansas whose six electoral votes will not likely up for grabs in 2016 was brief; Mrs. Clinton flew in from Iowa in the early afternoon and departed back to New York that night. But it was nevertheless a homecoming of sorts.

It was Mrs. Clinton first visit back to the place where Bill Clinton served as governor and she as first lady, since she made her 2016 campaign official. Earlier in the afternoon, Mrs. Clinton had stopped by the red brick home where she and Mr. Clinton lived and the apartment the Clintons stay at on the top floor of the William J. Clinton Presidential Center here. Before the Democratic Party Jefferson Jackson Day Dinner, which drew around 2,500 people paying as much as $200 a plate for a buffet dinner, Mrs. Clinton greeted donors and old friends at a backstage reception.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her visit comes in the midst of an existential crisis for Arkansas Democrats. The place that bred such centrist "yellow dog Democrats" as Mr. Clinton, and former governors Dale Bumpers, David Pryor and Mark Beebe, turned deep red in the midterm elections. The audience was sprinkled with prominent Democrats who lost their midterm races, including former Rep. Mike Ross who got his start as Mr. Clinton's driver and who lost his race for governor to Republican Asa Hutchinson.

For many Arkansans, no matter how many times Mrs. Clinton visits, the prospects of a Democrat winning the state in 2016 seemed slim, but having her name on the ticket could help lift down-ballot Democrats in local races. "There's no doubt she helps to energize the Arkansas Democratic base," said Will Bond, a former chairman of the state's Democratic Party who is running for state senate.

Mr. Beebe, the popular Democratic governor who left office last year due to term limits, called the 2014 midterm elections "a huge sea change" and said Mrs. Clinton's speech "revitalizes a lot of folks."

Despite the turn away from Democratic candidates in Arkansas, voters here have embraced some of the party's policies including a minimum wage increase and a private-option health insurance program.

"I am well aware that here in Arkansas last year was a hard one for Democrats," Mrs. Clinton said. "But don't forget, voters did come out and pass an increase in the minimum wage, Arkansas voters know pay checks need to grow."

She said she hoped the 2016 election could also help lift Democratic candidates "on school boards and county offices and, yes, the state legislator and hold onto the White House."

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton's political director brings key lessons from her own (losing) campaign // WaPo // Evan Halper – July 19, 2015

The most prized credential of Hillary Rodham Clinton's political director may not be her connections on Capitol Hill, her experience courting the crucial Latino vote or the diversity she brings as the child of a Mexican immigrant, but her run for office — which she lost.

Last year, Amanda Renteria returned home to California's Central Valley to run for Congress and got crushed. The race in the heavily Latino district exposed blind spots in Democratic strategy with Latino voters, who largely stayed home. The message for Clinton in her 2016 presidential run was clear: The gains Democrats had been making among Latinos could stall anytime.

Now, as Clinton's political director, Renteria is putting the campaign's vast resources to work avenging the 2014 midterms, when Democrats were unable to mobilize the coalition of minority voters that had helped elect President Obama twice.

"It is really time for Latinos to understand who is with them and who is not," Renteria said during a break from the National Council of La Raza conference in Kansas City, where she was working the hallways before Clinton addressed a packed ballroom. "One of the real opportunities in a presidential election is to truly have a message that can break through, even in the little towns where I grew up."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's massive Latino outreach machine is unprecedented for this stage in a primary. Most Latinos don't even know the name of Clinton's closest challenger for the Democratic nomination, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, according a new Univision poll.

Yet about 500 days before the general election, the outreach effort overseen by Renteria is running on all cylinders. Some of it is clearly visible, with the candidate's aggressive positioning on immigration, her much-talked-about Nevada round table with "Dreamers" — immigrants brought to the country illegally as children — and an economic agenda targeted at empowering minorities.

But in an election in which the Latino vote is likely to be decisive, it's the on-the-ground work that could pay the biggest dividends.

"You can't take it for granted," Clarissa Martinez de Castro, a deputy vice president at La Raza, warned attendees of a session at the conference. "Some people are like, 'Hey, I'm good, so they will vote for me even if I don't do anything.' No. You've got to get out there."

Renteria, who grew up in the hardscrabble town of Woodlake, near Visalia, went on to become the first chief of staff of Latino descent for a U.S. senator, when she worked for Michigan Democrat Debbie Stabenow. Under Renteria's direction, Clinton organizers are showing up in Latino and other minority communities in a variety of ways.

Often it's not even to talk much politics. Renteria, 40, recalls a recent networking event at a bar in Philadelphia where the millennials who showed up wanted to discuss career strategies, how to go about paying off student loans and what her family thinks of what she is doing with her life. So they did.

"It is not just about come vote for me, but ... how can I help?" said Renteria, who disarms with a rare mix of a candidate's charm and an operative's urgency. "We have the resources in this election to talk about it."

Renteria talks without the pretension common in the inner circle of presidential campaigns. She can carry on a conversation with the apolitical. Many in Washington can't.

Clinton's campaign is burning through an eye-popping $230,000 per day in this stage of the campaign, and much of it is going toward making contact with voters more aggressively than is the norm so early on, whether it be through hiring field organizers with community ties, investing in the newest microtargeting technology or holding events like the one in Philadelphia.

The Clinton team is scouting for consultants in every state with a large Latino presence to develop localized strategies for boosting turnout. Buzz-stirring events like the Dreamers gathering Clinton held in Nevada in early May are conceived with input from local activists.

They are all the campaigning tasks Renteria was unable to do when she ran for Congress.

"With the hand she was dealt, she did the best she could," said Mark Salavaggio, a Central Valley political analyst. "It did shock people that she lost by so much."

Her opponent, Rep. David Valadao (R-Hanford), relentlessly pounded Renteria, then a staffer on Capitol Hill, as a carpetbagging Washingtonian. "She is not one of us," several of his mailers shouted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Valadao, who was concluding his first term in Congress, benefited from a Latino-sounding last name, despite his Portuguese ancestry, which made his accusations that Renteria was the interloper in a district heavy with migrant farmworkers sting all the more to her.

She recalls how her family would sometimes not get served at Denny's until after the white customers, how she sat in a chair for hours at a Border Patrol station as agents grilled her parents, how she proudly danced as a child in the traveling Ballet Folklorico.

"It means a lot to us in the Latino community to have someone like Amanda at the table making decisions ... and making sure the community is at the table," Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.) said.

Rep. Xavier Becerra of Los Angeles, also a Democrat, said Clinton's appointments of Renteria to one the campaign's most senior jobs and of Lorella Praeli, a Dreamer, to be the director of Latino outreach, resonated deeply among Latino leaders. "Those are the decisions that make you feel like [Clinton] is one of us," he said.

GOP strategists say Renteria's race in California was not a fluke, but a reflection of a wall Democrats are about to hit nationally with Latino voters.

"The idea that if you just bring out more Latinos to the polls you will win is a big mistake, and one I hope Democrats continue to make," said Mike Madrid, a Republican consultant in California. "Amanda Renteria was running in an area where Latinos tend to be very conservative. They are similar to what the Latino voters will look like in Colorado, New Mexico, rural Virginia and a lot of battleground states."

Republicans are hopeful that 2016 will be the year they achieve what they last did in 2000, when George W. Bush, a Texan with a knack for Spanglish and a firm grasp of border culture, was able to slow the surge of Latino support toward Democrats. He also attracted strong Latino support in his 2004 reelection.

This year, Bush's brother Jeb, a former Florida governor, speaks even better Spanish and his wife is a native of Mexico. Another Floridian seeking the GOP nomination, Sen. Marco Rubio, is the child of Cuban immigrants.

Even so, the Univision poll and others show neither of those contenders is gaining the kind of traction among Latinos that George W. Bush did when he ran against Al Gore, whose patrician demeanor did not play well.

Hard as Republicans try to cast Clinton in the same mold, it is proving a tougher sell. When Clinton last ran for president, in 2008, two Latinos voted for her for every one who voted for Barack Obama in the Democratic primaries.

"Everyone has the abuela who ran the show when it came to dinner, giving you a hard time about school, or how you treated your parents," Renteria said, using the Spanish word for grandmother. "That strong woman you look up to in the Latino community.... There is a lot in the community we see in her."

Clinton to Push Revamp of Capital-Gains Tax Rates // WSJ // Laura Meckler and John D. McKinnon – July 20, 2015

WASHINGTON—Hillary Clinton will propose a revamp of capital-gains taxes that would hit some short-term investors with higher rates, part of a package of measures designed to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth, a campaign official said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The proposal, to be laid out in a speech later this week, is one of a number of ideas designed to tackle what Mrs. Clinton, some economists and some on Wall Street consider the overly short-term focus of corporate strategy. Other topics will include the risks and benefits of shareholder activism and the role of executive compensation.

At the center is Mrs. Clinton's proposal to change capital-gains tax rates, the details of which are being finalized. The Democratic presidential candidate's plan would create a sliding scale with at least three new rates that change depending on how long an investment is held, the official said.

Investments held for less than a year would continue to be taxed at regular income-tax rates, which can top out at 39.6% or more for the highest earners. For those held just a little longer—likely two or three years—the current capital-gains tax rate of 23.8% for top earners would rise. The Clinton rate, which hasn't been finalized, would be higher than the 28% President Barack Obama proposed earlier this year for the highest earners. The Clinton campaign hasn't ruled out taxing such investments at the regular income-tax rate.

The plan would include additional rates tied to the length that an investment is held, with the lowest rates for investments held the longest.

Under current law, the capital-gains rate for investments held for at least a year is 15% for middle-income investors, and people with the lowest incomes pay no tax on capital gains.

The former senator and secretary of state is diving into an area of significant debate about which policy steps could or should be taken to discourage what Mrs. Clinton calls "quarterly capitalism," meaning overly focused on the next earnings report.

Some economists and many Republicans argue there is little the government can do to change corporate behavior. GOP presidential contenders by and large want to go in the opposite direction by eliminating taxes on investment income or at least reducing them.

Activist investors, who generally take positions in stocks and then push for changes they believe would boost share prices, have in the past few years gained more influence and won more battles with larger companies. These investors, such as Nelson Peltz at Trian Fund Management LP and William Ackman at Pershing Square Capital Management LP, say they hold weak corporate managers accountable and help lift share prices for all holders.

Detractors, including Laurence Fink, chief executive at money manager BlackRock Inc., and Martin Lipton, a leading corporate-defense lawyer, say the typical activist wish list, including share buybacks, dividends and corporate breakups, diverts cash from long-term investments in plants or people to appease investors who want to sell out quickly.

Mrs. Clinton's speech represents part of her effort to distinguish herself on economic policy from GOP candidates, who focus largely on growth, and her Democratic primary challengers who focus on income inequality and are pushing ideas that are popular with the liberal base, such as breaking up large banks. Wall Street regulation and inequality are topics Mrs. Clinton plans to address separately in coming weeks.

Foreshadowing this week's announcement, Mrs. Clinton last week promised to propose "reforms to help CEOs and shareholders alike to focus on the next decade rather than just the next day." This week, Mrs. Clinton will expand on that theme, arguing that companies that invest in their workers and focus on long-term growth are better positioned to succeed, the campaign official said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton also plans to discuss the pros and cons of shareholder activism and call for steps to address “hit-and-run” activists she argues contribute to short-term planning. Still, the campaign official said, she believes that some activism is good in that in holds managers accountable.

Mrs. Clinton will also discuss the dramatic increase in companies’ repurchasing their shares, as well as ways to promote long-term considerations in setting executive compensations.

The campaign didn’t estimate how much in additional taxes the proposal would raise. The official said the primary goal is to change behavior, not increase revenue.

U.S. companies in the S&P 500 index spent a median 36% of operating cash flow in 2013 on their buybacks and dividends, moves designed to deliver gains to current shareholders, compared with 18% in 2003. Over that same period, those companies cut spending on plants and equipment to 29% of operating cash flow, from 33% in 2003, according to S&P Capital IQ. When the companies have an activist shareholder, the changes are even sharper, the data show.

Those who back the kinds of changes Mrs. Clinton will propose say current tax rules for investment income are a little-noticed part of the problem. Low tax rates on capital gains and dividends, along with a relatively short one-year holding period to qualify for capital-gains treatment, encourage companies to return more profits to shareholders as opposed to investing in long-term growth.

In a recent paper, Clinton adviser Neera Tanden wrote that activist investors are hurting some companies’ capital investments. Company spending on buybacks and dividends surges in the five years after shareholders start putting pressure on a company, and capital investments fall, she wrote in a paper for the Center for American Progress, where she is president, along with Blair Effron of Centerview Partners.

Ms. Tanden suggested a sliding scale for capital-gains tax rates, where the longer an investor holds the asset, the lower the rate. Mr. Fink of BlackRock has suggested a similar scale, with a three-year holding period for basic capital-gains treatment, among other changes. Mrs. Clinton appears to be adopting a version of their idea.

It is a matter of debate whether such changes would make much difference to how companies operate. In practice, many corporate shares are held by tax-exempt entities such as pension funds that are largely indifferent to tax changes.

Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a Republican economist, noted in an interview the tax code already requires investments to be held for a year and is skeptical increasing the time period would make much difference. Managers are more swayed by changes to taxes and regulations relating to their core business, not the tax rate paid by investors.

“My gut instinct is this is going to sound good but it’s not going to change very much. It’s just not that powerful,” he said.

U.S. tax law has had multiple holding periods and rates for capital gains in the past. President Bill Clinton signed a law in 1997 that would have created a special low rate for assets held at least five years. That system was eliminated as part of the tax breaks adopted under his successor, President George W. Bush.

Many Republicans running for president want to reduce or eliminate taxes held on investments. Among the arguments: They are a form of double taxation, where the income is taxed first at the company level and then again when it is returned to shareholders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP Peddles Hard the 'Hillary Can't Be Trusted' Line // HuffPo // Earl Ofari Hutchinson – July 19, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton is the runaway pick among voters when asked who among the presidential candidates is the most credible, honest and trustworthy, and even the most compassionate. Her rank on the voter trustworthy meter is far higher than that of Barack Obama and easily tops that of all other GOP presidential contenders. The problem with this is the AP-Ipsos poll that gave Hillary high marks on trustworthiness was taken in March, 2007.

The two big questions are: What happened in the eight years since that that poll was taken and today to change voter's attitudes on the trust issue toward Clinton? The other even bigger one is: Does this pose a real problem for Clinton's campaign?

The trust issue and Hillary has been the sole fixation of the pollsters and they seem to crank out a new poll monthly hitting that theme. If one believes the barrage of polls, one comes away with the notion that voters, especially Democrats, simply don't trust Hillary.

Playing up Clinton's supposed free fall in integrity has been the one constant in the run-up to the 2016 presidential campaign. The Republican National Committee early on put Hillary dead in its hit sights to do everything possible to render her candidacy stillborn even before it officially became a candidacy. It not so subtly recycled the old trumped up scandals of the past from Whitewater to the Lewinsky scandal. It then cranked out a sneering "poor Hillary" video that touted Hillary's quip that she and Bill were "dead broke" when they left the White House. It then intimated that she shook down poor cash strapped universities for her alleged outrageous speaking fees.

There was little doubt that the first chance the GOP got it would seize on a real or manufactured Obama foreign policy flub and make Clinton their hard target. The Benghazi debacle seemed to be just the right flub. In August 2013, the Republican National Committee rammed the attack home with a half-minute clip of her Senate Foreign Relations Committee testimony earlier that year on the Benghazi attack.

The aim as always was to embarrass and discredit her not because of her alleged missteps as Secretary of State, but as a 2016 presidential candidate. Republicans got what they wanted when their phony accusations against her of cover-up and incompetence got tons of media chatter and focus and raised the first shadow of public doubt. The GOP then tirelessly searched for something else that could ramp up more public doubt about Clinton's honesty. It didn't take long to find.

This time it got two for the price of one. Congressional Republicans jubilantly waved a fresh batch of Clinton emails to the media, claiming that it proved that she deliberately mislead Congressional investigators, and the public, on what she knew and how she handled or allegedly mishandled the Benghazi debacle. This ties in with the GOP's and the media's incessant flailing of Clinton for supposedly hiding, deleting or misusing her private emails for some sinister and nefarious reason during her stint as Secretary of State. There will be more to come on this rest assured.

Meanwhile, the GOP mockingly ridicules Clinton's attempt to reimage her campaign and herself as a hands, on in the trenches with the people, caring, feeling candidate as just more of the Clinton con, and an ineffectual one to boot. The supposed proof of that is to finger point her plunging favorability numbers in the polls. Of course, what's conveniently omitted from the Hillary smear is that every one of her GOP rivals is doing an even lousier job trying to convince voters that they are any more "trustworthy" than Clinton. In the case of Donald Trump, Ted Cruz, Chris Christie, and especially Jeb Bush, their integrity meter score with the public fall somewhere between Watergate Richard Nixon and that of a used car salesman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's more. A USA Poll and an ABC-Washington Post poll found that not only does Clinton have solid numbers in terms of approval with voters, but bags big time general favorability numbers from Democrats. This is even more impressive given the spirited, and populist issues run that Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders is making at Hillary.

It's certainly true that voters do want a president that they can trust to say and do the right thing both on the issues and in their dealing with the public. But they also want a president who is experienced, well-versed, thoughtful, and firm on dealing with the inevitable crises that will confront the country, here and abroad. There's absolutely no hint in the polls or anywhere else that the general public has shut down on Clinton in this vital area of public policy. But this won't stop the GOP and those in the media obsessed with depicting Hillary as two-faced from peddling that line.

Same-Sex Couple Featured In Hillary Clinton Video Get Married // CBS // Dana Kozlov – July 19, 2015

CHICAGO (CBS) — A few months after a Chicago couple that was in Hillary Clinton's campaign launch video invited the candidate to their wedding, they got married without her, reports CBS 2's Dana Kozlov.

Jared Milrad and Nathan Johnson appeared in Hillary Clinton's campaign launch video. They represented her support of gay marriage. On Sunday, they actually tied the knot.

They were surrounded by family and friends at Montrose Harbor this afternoon. Absent, though, was the presidential candidate. They sent her a Twitter invitation to their wedding today right after they publically appeared in her campaign announcement video. They say they were honored to be included in that and wanted to include her in their wedding day.

The couple says Clinton's staff immediately got back to them with a sort of 'we'll see.' In the end, she didn't make it.

"She rightfully pointed out that if she came to the wedding, it might distract from our special day so we understand she supports us," said Milrad.

Clinton did send them a congratulatory note.

Milrad and Johnson have been together for several years.

Being that they got married in a public space, Clinton's attendance would have likely caused quite a security nightmare on an already really busy beach day.

Ghost of Hillary Clinton Haunts Liberal Convention // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 19, 2015

The raucous Democratic base is skeptical of Hillary Clinton

For an eclectic snapshot of the Democratic left, look no further than a squat civic building in downtown Phoenix on Friday night. A loud punk band was packing up, men in uniforms were clearing away vats of orange-and-mint flavored ice water, and stragglers were tucking away thin cucumber slices topped with cheese and bacon bits. The last of the elaborately tattooed young folks were mixed in with the suits, as the party, hosted by a food workers union, wound to a close.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m a long, longtime admirer of Secretary Clinton,” Greg Stanton, the mayor of Phoenix was saying. He wore a jacket, sipped a can of Pabst Blue Ribbon beer and mingled. “I’m probably in the minority here, but mayors across the country are big Hillary fans.”

Surrounded by union organizers and progressive activists, Stanton was definitely the exception. Hillary Clinton may safely be the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, but at the largest gathering of the liberal grassroots in the country, enthusiasm for her campaign was as mushy as day-old oatmeal. The Netroots Nation conference was much more excited about Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, a self-described socialist and populist firebrand.

“It’s a pragmatist versus idealist race,” said Krissi Jimroglou, communications director for Working America, explaining the enthusiasm for Sanders as the union-hosted party cleared out. “This is a very idealist crowd.”

It didn’t help that Clinton was nowhere to be found. In fact, she was in Iowa and heading to Arkansas, even while her rivals for the Democratic nomination—Sanders and Martin O’Malley—were en route to Phoenix and preparing to court the progressives. The bloggers, unions, teachers, techies, activists, organizers, laborers, musicians and non-profit founders who come to Netroots are the vocal base of the Democratic Party. They’re key for Democrats seeking to winning national elections.

Clinton has sought to attract progressives like these her campaign, many of whom believe that she is too closely connected to Wall Street and corporate interests, and too similar to her centrist husband, President Bill Clinton. The folks at Netroots may well ultimately vote for her in a general election, but for now they’re not enthusiastic about the prospect.

Clinton has talked like a populist and laid out a liberal vision for the country, centering her economic policy around solving income inequality instead of some “arbitrary growth figure” like gross domestic product. She has already called for raising the minimum wage, requiring paid family leave, reducing the cost of college and reining in Wall Street, and she has a host of other progressive policies lined up for the coming months. And she is leading in the polls by large margins, with polls showing her favorability ratings on solid ground.

But the the Netroots attendees are thirsty for specifics. “She’s done a great job explaining the problem: that we have economy that works really well for the top 1% and not everyone else, and we need to fix it,” said Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, the grassroots organization founded by former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean. “Now she needs to detail the policy behind it that puts meat on the bone.”

And even then, they may not be sated. A lot of attendees spoke of a general feeling—a sort of populist touch—which they say they’re not sure Clinton has. Sanders, they say, has it. There was also a widely shared resentment at Netroots that Clinton hadn’t come to kiss the ring. “There’s something people have been looking for that they haven’t been seeing,” said a woman at the Phoenix Convention Center on Friday named Hillary Keyes. She was wearing a button that said “I’m a Hillary for Bernie.” Clinton not coming, Keyes said means for “the people here she loses credibility.”

“We’re disappointed the Democratic frontrunner could miss such a great opportunity,” said Arshad Hasan, chair of the board of directors of Netroots Nation. “The silence from her side makes Bernie shine all the brighter.”

With Clinton gone, the Sanders crowd had full rein. The morning he addressed the crowd, a group dressed as robber barons replete with top hats and bow-ties chanted ironically, “Capitalists for Bernie!” while holding signs saying “Long live the oligarchs!” Others carried huge cutouts of Sanders’ head with a Robin Hood hat.

Clinton’s campaign said their candidate could not attend because of scheduling conflicts—though the organizers set the date for the conference a year in advance. Netroots would have been an unwieldy and raucous stage for Clinton, who tends to favor controlled spaces. And this year was less controlled than usual, as Black Lives Matters protesters derailed the presidential town hall meetings featuring O'Malley and Sanders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite her absence, Clinton's ghost defined much of the proceedings here. Sen. Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts progressive who is beloved among the Netroots crowd, said in a speech on Friday that all the presidential candidates should move to stop the revolving door between Wall Street and the Cabinet, an applause line that was largely seen as aimed at Clinton. Many of the activists spoke about "moving Hillary to the left," a common refrain among Democrats.

And activists said at Netroots they could build a huge progressive network to support Clinton in her left-leaning positions. "It is up to everyone in this hall to actually draft a progressive agenda," said AFL-CIO executive vice president Tefere Gebre in an interview. "And give Hillary Clinton a backbone, or give Bernie Sanders a backbone, or give anyone else a background to govern on that agenda."

For Clinton, who is establishing her progressive credentials but has not yet managed to capture the imagination of the Netroots demographic, the key will be driving them out in heavy numbers to vote for in a general election. Sanders may know how to rile up the base. But if Netroots is a barometric reading of devotion, then Clinton may have some work to do.

"It's a degree-of-enthusiasm question," said Stephanie Taylor, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee. "Democratic activists here will probably go out and vote for her. But will they go out to canvass for her, mobilize for her and make calls for her? It really depends on her."

Meanwhile, on Saturday night, Sanders gave a speech in Phoenix's convention center, the final big event of the weekend. It was the largest rally of Sanders' campaign, and 11,300 people streamed through the sand-colored streets of Phoenix and down two long escalators into a cavernous auditorium with the feel of an ocean trench.

Sanders took the stage and delivered his blistering attack on billionaires and the multinational corporations. But first, some context. "When we were coming to Arizona, somebody said Arizona is a conservative state," thundered Sanders. "What were they talking about?!"

Jeb and Hillary: Flawed front-runners generating little excitement // Fox News // Howard Kurtz - July 20, 2015

America may well get another Bush-Clinton race once this whole presidential thing shakes out, with predictable groans about royal families and political retreads.

But in looking at the coverage this past week, I was struck by this thought: This is one weak pair of front-runners.

Jeb is losing to a guy who's never run for public office and is in hot water over comments about Mexican immigrants. In short, he's been Trumped. (Though maybe The Donald has trumped himself by making light of John McCain's Vietnam captivity, not that the media were in love with him before.)

Hillary is way ahead in her race, but a socialist senator is generating most of the excitement. A majority of voters have doubts about her honesty. And she's long been at odds with the press.

As the New York Times has noted, Hillary may have raised $47.5 million, but less than one-fifth has come in contributions of $200 or less. That means big-money donors, many of whom have maxed out at $2,700, are powering her campaign. Bernie Sanders, by contrast, has gotten four-fifths of his $15 million in small donations. (Hillary has also spent a chunk of her haul, stirring concerns about another bloated, consultant-heavy campaign.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Equally worrisome, the latest Fox News poll confirms the findings of several other surveys that Hillary has a trust problem. Some 58 percent of respondents say Clinton's natural instincts lean more toward "hiding the truth" than "telling the truth."

It's hardly shocking that Hillary isn't firing up the grass roots. She's been in public life for a quarter century, as first lady, senator, presidential candidate, secretary of State and global celebrity. She's a Democrat running to succeed another Democrat. And the lack of a major opponent is draining much of the drama from her race. That's why Elizabeth Warren, not HRC, is on the cover of Time.

At the same time, even Hillary's team is said to be concerned that Sanders, a 73-year-old who isn't even a Democrat and who's been a bit player in the Senate, could knock her off in Iowa. Or worse.

Yet in a New York Times Magazine piece that's in part about the press staff micromanaging Mark Leibovich (no tweeting from her headquarters!), campaign manager Robby Mook said: "I take issue with the excitement question."'

Jeb has problems that go beyond Donald Trump. He's at odds with conservative Republican voters over illegal immigration and Common Core education standards. He's raised $114 million, but he's had to talk repeatedly about his brother and why his last name isn't a liability.

And while Bush has been solid and substantive in his campaign, aside from his initial Iraq stumble, he has not been a dominating presence. He regularly talks to the press, in stark contrast to Hillary, but makes little news.

And Trump is looming as an obstacle for Bush, particularly with the Fox debate coming up next month.

"During one recent phone call with a political ally," Politico says, "Bush pointedly asked about the surging real estate mogul. What, the friend recalled the former governor wondering out loud, was behind Trump's antics, and what was he trying to accomplish?"

Jeb is trying to be the grownup in the room. He told the Los Angeles Times: "I think candidates ought to lay out proposals to solve problems rather than basically prey on legitimate fears and concerns."

The Donald, meanwhile, speaks of Jeb with open disdain. "He raises 100 million, so what does 100 million mean?" Trump asked. "100 million means he's doing favors for so many people, it means lobbyists, it means special interests, it means donors," said Trump. "Who knows it better than me?"

The eventual nominees often seem lackluster during the preseason. I remember lots of political and media grumbling over Mitt Romney, John McCain, John Kerry and Al Gore, whereas the likes of Howard Dean and Newt Gingrich generated more excitement. Those who win their party's nod have to be acceptable to a broad coalition, which usually means they can't be fire-breathing insurgents.

Maybe even Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush aren't immune from premature boredom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6 Facts About Hillary Clinton & Her Dad That Totally Gave Us #FatherDaughterGoals // Bustle // Tonya Riley – July 19, 2015

Even as a first lady, the now-presidential candidate refused to be defined by the man in her life. But as the New York Times reported Sunday, Hillary Clinton's father, Hugh Rodham, had a substantial influence on the woman she is today. Clinton spoke candidly about the strength of her mother in her speech announcing her campaign, but she rarely speaks about her father, who passed away in 1993, in public. Clinton, who veered away from her father's conservative political values in college, had a tumultuous relationship with him in her early years. Clinton's former advisor Lissa Muscatine told The New York Times, "By all accounts he was kind of a tough customer … believed in no free rides, believed you had to earn what you're going to get, believed his kids could always do better."

Despite his sometimes tough personality, Rodham had a huge impact on his daughter, who would go on to be both a senator and Secretary of State. He gets several mentions in her 2003 biography Living History, in which she describes him as a hardworking, "hardheaded and often gruff" business owner descended "from a line of black-haired Welsh coal miners." And though he died long before he could have ever seen his daughter transition from first lady to possible president, Here's what we know about their relationship.

Clinton's Father Was Stern, But Cared About Her Education

One of the reasons you may have heard so little about Clinton's father is that he wasn't always the nicest guy, according to The New York Times. Rodham was a strict man and depression ran in his family. The Times, who spoke with Clinton biographer Carl Berstein, wrote:

> He would hurl criticism at his wife around the kitchen table at 235 Wisner Street. When she encouraged Hillary to learn for learning's sake, Mr. Rodham, who drove a Cadillac, would quip: "Learn for earning's sake." If his children asked for an allowance for their many household chores, he would reply bluntly: "I feed you, don't I?"

When Clinton was in fourth grade, her father woke her up at dawn every day to help her catch up on the multiplication tables she was falling behind on. Rodham never sugar-coated things for Clinton, so it's no wonder she can now tough it out with the hardest of politicians domestically and abroad.

Hillary Learned How To Play Tough From Her Father

Clinton's father always encouraged her to play sports and taught her that she was equal to any man. According to the Associated Press, one spring he practiced with her every day until she was able to hit a curveball. According to her biography Living History, he also taught her how to shoot a gun.

Her Father Encouraged Her Throughout Her Early 20s

Later when Clinton attended Wellesley and Yale, her father sent her letters to encourage her to persevere through tough times. Clinton once wrote about her father that "Even when he erupted at me, he admired my independence and accomplishments."

Hillary's Conservative Father Loved Her — Even After She Married (& Became) A Democrat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's father was a Goldwater Republican, but even after she became a Democrat herself and married a man who would go on to be a Democratic governor and president, he expressed pride in her. In 1993 right before his death, Rodham told a friend "My daughter is a real special girl."

They Shared The Same Great Laugh

Clinton wrote in her 2003 autobiography Living History, "I inherited his laugh, the same big rolling guffaw that can turn heads in a restaurant and send cats running from the room."

He Was A Great Grandpa

While Bill Clinton was governor of Arkansas, both of Hillary's parents moved to Little Rock to be closer to her. They always went to games to watch their granddaughter Chelsea play softball and would take the team out for frozen yogurt after the game, according to the New York Times.

Clinton insider faced IG probe for informal diplomacy // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 19, 2015

A longtime Clinton ally who was once under investigation for a possible violation of the Logan Act may have helped Sidney Blumenthal prepare intelligence memos for Hillary Clinton while she served as secretary of state.

Cody Shearer was the subject of a State Department inspector general probe in 1998 after he allegedly conducted rogue negotiations that "caused temporary diplomatic damage in Bosnia," according to documents obtained by Citizens United through the Freedom of Information Act.

The inspector general found that Shearer, whose ties to the Clintons stretch back to the 1992 election, "may have represented himself as speaking on behalf of the U.S. Department of State" in private conversations about the proposed partitioning of Bosnia — a policy the U.S. publicly opposed.

More than a decade later, Shearer is entangled in another instance of back-channel information peddling at the State Department.

Shearer assisted Blumenthal and Tyler Drumheller, a former CIA operative, in preparing a series of informal intelligence memos for Clinton as she waded deeper into the Libyan conflict, according to Pro Publica.

The edited tranche of emails published by the State Department in May and June suggest she relied almost exclusively on their guidance to inform her decision-making in the country.

Shearer's sister Brooke first grew close to Clinton during the 1992 presidential election, when she traveled with the former first lady on the campaign trail.

Shearer's brother-in-law, Strobe Talbott, has been close to the Clintons for decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After rising through the ranks of the State Department to become deputy secretary of state, Talbott accepted a position as head of the Brookings Institution.

But it appears he, too, maintained influence at the agency through his connection to Clinton.

When she went looking for a new assistant in June 2009, Clinton turned to Talbott for suggestions on who to hire.

Clinton's emails suggest she and Talbott were in frequent contact and even had "catch-up calls" to provide each other with diplomatic updates.

Talbott's name surfaced in the inspector general documents as having written a letter to his brother-in-law that warned Shearer to "be careful in his actions" in Bosnia during Bill Clinton's presidency.

The records suggest the FBI participated in the probe of Shearer's independent diplomacy.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

O'Malley sorry for saying 'all lives matter' // CNN // Chris Moody – July 19, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley apologized on Saturday for saying "All lives matter" while discussing police violence against African-Americans with liberal demonstrators.

Several dozen demonstrators interrupted the former Maryland governor while he was speaking here at the Netroots Nation conference, a gathering of liberal activists, demanding that he address criminal justice and police brutality. When they shouted, "Black lives matter!" a rallying cry of protests that broke out after several black Americans were killed at the hands of police in recent months, O'Malley responded: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

The demonstrators, who were mostly black, responded by booing him and shouting him down.

Later that day, O'Malley apologized for using the phrase in that context if it was perceived that he was minimizing the importance of blacks killed by police.

"I meant no disrespect," O'Malley said in an interview on This Week in Blackness, a digital show. "That was a mistake on my part and I meant no disrespect. I did not mean to be insensitive in any way or communicate that I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judith Butler, a philosopher at the University of California, Berkeley, recently explained why some find it offensive to respond to the "Black Lives Matter" movement with the "all lives matter."

"When some people rejoin with 'All Lives Matter' they misunderstand the problem, but not because their message is untrue. It is true that all lives matter, but it is equally true that not all lives are understood to matter, which is precisely why it is most important to name the lives that have not mattered, and are struggling to matter in the way they deserve," Butler said in an interview with The New York Times. "If we jump too quickly to the universal formulation, 'all lives matter,' then we miss the fact that black people have not yet been included in the idea of 'all lives.'"

O'Malley isn't the first Democrat to come under fire for the remark. Hillary Clinton was criticized in June for doing the same thing.

Martin O'Malley's Presidential Strategy: Try, Try, Try Again // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – July 19, 2015

The southwest corner of 1st Avenue and 3rd Street was Martin O'Malley territory.

This — for much of the hot and humid Friday afternoon in Cedar Rapids, Iowa — was not in dispute. A few dozen O'Malley people, each wearing an O'Malley t-shirt, stood chanting near a line of cars, each taped with an O'Malley sign. "O-Mall-ee! O-Mall-ee!"

Then came the Hillary Clinton people — twice as many, with more signs and louder cheers — an army of "H" arrows. They moved in on the corner, singing the refrain from "Land of 1000 Dances": Naaa, na-na-na-naaa, na-na-na-naaa, na-na-naaa-na-na-NA.

But even as the Hillary group took over, engulfing the smaller contingent almost entirely, the O'Malley fans stayed put until the main event: a state party dinner. Across the street was the convention center where, for the first time, from the same stage, O'Malley would face Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders — the competition he's been trying to overtake with as much persistence and as little success as his t-shirted cheer-squad.

The great sign wars of 1st Avenue kicked off a weekend that, in effect, served as the start of the Democratic contest — and put on display the distinctions in approach between the three candidates as the first caucuses and primaries draw closer. Inside the convention hall, Clinton and Sanders each fell into what is, by now, their own familiar rhythms.

He made his call for a "political revolution" to close the gap between rich and poor — and she for a unified front against the other party. Clinton, who leads the field in fundraising and among early voters in key states like Iowa, didn't acknowledge her primary opponents. "I'm already having a great debate with Republicans," Clinton told the crowd. The next day, she skipped the annual progressive conference, Netroots Nation, held this year in Phoenix, to headline a state party dinner in Arkansas — the Republican-leaning state where her campaign could hope to compete next year in the general election.

At every point this weekend — as Clinton and Sanders held to their carefully hewn strategies — O'Malley telegraphed, with trademark persistence, that no matter how bad the polls look, he is the candidate who simply won't go away: who will work harder and mingle longer, who will shake more hands, answer more questions, propose more policy, be the most progressive and most aggressive — the candidate who will always engage.

He has, now 50 days into his campaign, taken almost every opportunity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Clinton draws headlines about her “strained relations” with the press, O’Malley’s staff rarely turns a reporter away. (On Friday night, his super PAC invited members of the media to an afterparty with the sign-carrying field organizers. “It’s open-press and we promise no rope-lines,” an official said in an email, adding a smiling emoticon. The Clinton cheer-squad, meanwhile, said they weren’t allowed to talk to reporters.)

And while other Democrats in the race, including Sanders, don’t often go after Clinton, O’Malley makes a habit of it — indirectly, at least. (In his Iowa speech, he stressed his support for a $15 minimum wage, days after Clinton declined to endorse it, and suggested she was slow to oppose “bad trade deals” like the Trans-Pacific Partnership.)

But there was no greater show of the O’Malley method than inside the Phoenix Convention Center on Saturday morning — when activists aligned with Black Lives Matter, a social justice group, upended a presidential forum at Netroots Nation.

O’Malley and Sanders spoke separately. The protesters asked each candidate to address questions about violence against blacks involving law enforcement. Both “responded poorly” at the time, as the co-founder of Black Lives Matter, Patrisse Cullors, put it later.

But after the forum — a jarring event that drew attention in and far outside the Netroots gathering — Sanders canceled his afternoon line-up of small meetings, including one with Black Lives Matters backers, according to participants. O’Malley, as his aides were quick to note, added events and sought to apologize for his reaction to the protest.

O’Malley was only through about two questions from Jose Antonio Vargas — a journalist and activist who moderated the forum — before the activists started up their chorus: “What side are you on, my people,” they yelled through the hall. “What side are you on?”

At first, O’Malley tapped his knee along with the chant. But the protesters continued on, bringing the event to a stand-still. O’Malley leaned back and sighed. Vargas didn’t know what to do. When one of the activists mounted the stage, he handed her the microphone.

O’Malley stood off to the side, waiting.

Cullors, the Black Lives Matter co-founder, joined her colleague on stage. “We don’t like shutting shit down.” But we have to, she told the crowd. “We are in a stage of emergency.”

Given the chance to respond, O’Malley fumbled.

When he promised to roll out a “criminal justice reform package,” an activist shouted back, “Don’t generalize that shit.” And when he mentioned his push as governor of Maryland to repeal the state death penalty — telling the protesters that “black lives matter, white lives matter, all lives matter” — the group boomed back in anger. “We already know white lives matter,” one man yelled. “We don’t want to hear that shit!”

Then Vargas cut the event off. “Oh, man,” O’Malley said. “We just started.” He walked off, quietly chanting along with the crowd. “Black. Lives. Matter… Black. Lives. Matter.”

Sanders was waiting backstage — and apparently ready to deliver his same call for “political revolution,” a stump speech that is almost exclusively centered on the economy and has drawn crowds of thousands from the progressive and labor communities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As he took his seat next to Vargas, there were regular cheers from the crowd — “we love you, Bernie!” — but the activists still dominated, chanting over the candidate. “Whoa, whoa,” Sanders said. “Let me talk about what I want to talk about for a moment.”

“Say her name, say her name, say her name,” the group yelled back, referring to Sandra Bland, a black woman found dead of an apparent suicide in a Texas jail cell.

“Should I continue or leave?” Sanders asked Vargas. “It’s okay with me.”

Sanders tried shouting his speech over the protesters. “Of course black lives matter,” he finally told them. Sanders looked to the moderator. “What are we doing here?”

“Hold on one second, sir,” said Vargas.

Sanders stared back. “OK. Are you in charge?”

SANDERS

Liberal activists see Bernie Sanders as champion for causes failed by Obama // WaPo // David Weigel - July 20, 2015

PHOENIX — First came the People for Bernie reception, held by Occupy Wall Street veterans, at a club modeled after a Venetian estate. One night later came the We Want Bernie party, hosted by Progressive Democrats of America in a low-key tacqueria.

On the third day of Netroots Nation, an annual meeting of liberal activists that wrapped up over the weekend, Bernie Sanders himself appeared — and named what many of the activists gathered here consider the original sin of the Obama presidency.

“Today, the largest six financial institutions in this country have assets of some $10 trillion, equivalent to 60 percent of the GDP of America,” the senator from Vermont told a crowd of 11,000 people on Saturday night. “After we bailed them out, because they were ‘too big to fail,’ most of them are now a lot bigger than they were before.”

The surge of Sanders’s presidential campaign has been widely viewed as a gambit, by liberals, to force Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton to the left. The netroots activists see no downside to that.

To them, it was the Democrats’ failure to prosecute Wall Street after the 2008 crash enabled the tea party movement and the Republican Party’s comeback in Congress. It was the kludged, mandate-driven design of the Affordable Care Act that prevented it from being a boon to Democrats, as Medicare for all might have been.

These activists are not just supporting Sanders’s agenda, or asking Clinton to embrace free college tuition or vast new infrastructure spending. They're telling an alternate history of modern liberalism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Sanders has been telling it with them. In a February speech, he bemoaned how President Obama had "missed the opportunity, politically, of doing what [Franklin] Roosevelt did when he was elected and making it clear to the American people what is happening and why." In an interview last year with Bloomberg News, he said that "the key mistake of the Obama administration, starting from the day after he was elected, was to more or less disband the grass-roots network that he had put together to get elected."

Sanders's campaign, and its allies, are pledging never to repeat that. In late June, the grassroots group Ready for Warren gave up on drafting Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run for president and rebranded as the pro-Sanders Ready to Fight. It joined Progressive Democrats for America — whose founder, Tim Carpenter, died in 2014 — after beseeching Sanders to run, and the Occupy-colored People for Bernie. Some of the loudest applause at the meeting came when Warren recounted how progressives had campaigned against some Obama administration appointees. Some of the best-attended Netroots Nation panels dealt with how activists could bypass the mainstream media, and make a bad bill, or bad law, or bad police tactic too infamous to continue.

"As soon as [Obama] got elected, they should not have held back their pressure," said Netroots Nation participant Felipe Andres Coronel, a rapper best known by his stage name Immortal Technique. "We should have put the pressure on and made it even harder. There were people who made their presence known. Wall Street made its presence known."

When the doors opened here for Sanders's speech on Saturday morning, people who had been waiting in line sprinted to get as close as possible to the stage.

"[Sanders] and Elizabeth Warren are saying the sorts of things — like Jon Stewart is saying the sorts of things — we wish we heard everywhere," said Connie Aglione, 67, an Arizona activist.

Athena Soules, 36, an artist who designed banners for the Occupy Wall Street movement, said Sanders's success is possible in part because of the energy generated by the 2011 protests that began in Lower Manhattan. She unfurled a new banner — "Feel the Bern," it read — surrounded by fellow activists.

"We learned the hard way from Obama," Soules said.

Said Katherine Brezler, 33, the national digital organizer for People for Bernie: "We elected Barack Obama on the idea that we were going to get a universal health-care system. We have 35 million people uninsured in this country."

Outside of Netroots Nation, among the Democrats who had followed the Obama strategy, these critiques sounded part cruel and all wrong.

"Look, I wish this country were further left than it is, but I live in reality," former congressman Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who worked with the White House to overhaul Wall Street regulations, said in a phone interview. "These people watch MSNBC, and they talk to each other on the Internet — in some ways, they're like the tea party. They're in this parallel universe."

David Axelrod, the Obama campaign strategist who was a senior White House adviser during the crisis years, said Sanders-style criticism ignored the reality of the economic crash.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders' newest fan? Jesse Ventura. // WaPo // Hunter Schwarz – July 19, 2015

Jesse Ventura feels the "Bern."

The professional wrestler turned former Minnesota governor wrote on Off The Grid that he would help Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders anyway he could and hopes he's successful in his longshot presidential primary challenge to Hillary Clinton. It's just short of an endorsement, but not by much.

"I think what Bernie Sanders is doing is extremely healthy," he wrote. "I love the idea of somebody throwing a fly in the ointment. I'm sick and tired of the handpicked two candidates."

Ventura, who ran and won a third party bid in 1998, doesn't go for the conventional political picks; in 2012, he endorsed Ron Paul in part because of the Texas Republican's anti-war and pro-audit-the-Fed views. Paul and Sanders might have their disagreements and run as candidates for opposing parties' nominations, but for Ventura to go from libertarian-turned-Republican Paul in 2012 to Socialist-turned-Democrat Sanders isn't that big of a stretch.

Both tap into a growing frustration with voters over the two-party system, the influence of money in politics, and the prospect of another dynasty election. They also each claim grassroots support with small-dollar donors. About three-quarters of Sanders' campaign donations were $200 or less in the first three months of his campaign; 45 percent of Paul's 2012 campaign donations were $200 of less.

The relative success of Paul and Sanders is a product of a time when identifying as politically independent is more popular than ever. A January Gallup poll found 43 percent of Americans described themselves as independent, a record.

There's frustration with the system, and voters are showing it with who they're supporting for president and how they identify themselves. But does that mean we're going to soon see Socialists, libertarians, or third-party candidates in the White House? Not exactly.

Sanders and Paul both might have avid fanbases, but Paul fell far short of the nomination, and Sanders still trails Hillary Clinton by a significant margin. And despite both of their third-party pasts, both Sanders and Paul ran as candidates for major party nominations.

That move by Sanders is something Ventura believes was a savvy move. "By jumping in and going for the Democratic nomination, he'll have to be included in all the Democratic debates and that'll put him on TV, that'll get his face out there, so in a way, it's kind of a brilliant tactical move," he said.

It's not just a matter of getting on TV, though. For as much as voters say they're independent, a 2012 Washington Post-Kaiser Family Foundation poll found 63 percent of independents actually act like "disguised" Democrats or Republicans. Americans increasingly want to change the status quo, but a lot of it's just lip service. That means a lot of hype and support for candidates like Sanders early in the race, but it doesn't bode well for them come Election Day.

How the NRA helped put Bernie Sanders in Congress // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold – July 19, 2015

BURLINGTON, Vt. — A few days before Election Day in 1990, the National Rifle Association sent a letter to its

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

12,000 members in Vermont, with an urgent message about the race for the state's single House seat.

Vote for the socialist, the gun rights group said. It's important.

"Bernie Sanders is a more honorable choice for Vermont sportsmen than Peter Smith," wrote Wayne LaPierre, who was — and still is — a top official at the national NRA, backing Sanders over the Republican incumbent.

That was odd. Sanders was the ex-hippie ex-mayor of Burlington, running as an independent because the Democrats weren't far enough left. He had never even owned a gun.

But that year, he was the enemy of the NRA's enemy.

Smith had changed his mind about a ban on assault weapons. The NRA and its allies wanted him beaten. They didn't much care who beat him.

"It is not about Peter Smith vs. Bernie Sanders," LaPierre wrote, according to news coverage from the time. "It is about integrity in politics."

Today, Sanders is a senator and a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, drawing huge crowds with his calls to break up big banks, increase taxes on the rich and make college free. The election of 1990 launched him. When Sanders won, he became the first socialist in Congress since the 1950s.

That campaign also marked the beginning of Sanders's complicated relationship with the issue of gun rights — the one area where Sanders's Democratic presidential rivals have been able to attack him from the left.

As a candidate in 1990, Sanders won over gun rights groups by promising to oppose one bill they hated — a measure that would establish a waiting period for handgun sales. In Congress, he kept that promise. The dynamic served as an early demonstration that, despite his pure-leftist persona, Sanders was at his core a pragmatic politician, calculating that he couldn't win in rural Vermont without doing something for gun owners.

"The gun vote brought us down," said Judy Shailor, Smith's 1990 campaign manager. She said she had warned gun groups that, in the long run, Sanders would prove too liberal for them.

"The gun groups would say to me, 'We are going to put him in office for one term and teach Peter Smith a lesson. Then we're going to vote [Sanders] out,'" Shailor said. "I said, 'You won't get him out.' . . . He's one of the best master politicians I've ever come across."

At the time of the 1990 election, Sanders was 49, a guy who'd had a big break and was looking for a bigger one.

Trying to break through

He didn't look like a politician. With his wild hair and rumpled clothes, Sanders carried himself like a man recently startled out of a nap. But he had a sharp, relentless political mind. It had taken him from a small leftist party — where the other leftists called him "the silver tongue" — to Burlington City Hall, where Sanders had been elected mayor by a 10-vote margin. He served four terms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But he couldn't take the next step. In six runs for statewide office, Sanders lost six times — including in 1988, when he lost to Smith in a close race for Vermont's House seat.

Then, down in Washington, Smith made a disastrous, rookie mistake.

He went to a hearing. And he started to think.

The hearing was not supposed to be about guns at all. The witnesses were students who had graduated from low-performing D.C. high schools and gone on to college. Smith asked one woman what she wished she'd had more of in high school. "Courage," the woman said. She meant courage to confront the armed bullies who taunted her on the way to school.

"It personalized something for me that had always been at arm's length," Smith recalled this week. "Which is that this woman lived in a culture of fear, and she faced danger and threat because of guns every day of her life."

Just a few months before, as a candidate, Smith had promised to oppose new forms of gun control. That's why the NRA had supported him. And the NRA support was a major reason why he had won in Vermont, where guns are associated with hunting moose and deer and not committing crimes.

But to the freshman congressman, all that didn't seem to matter as much now.

"I'll never forget, [the next day] brushing my teeth, looking in the mirror in my bathroom and realizing, as clear as day, 'I'm going to have to look at this face for the rest of my life in the mirror, and I want to be proud of the person I see,'" Smith said. "I went back and looked up the gun bills."

Smith found a bill to ban the sale of some assault weapons. He signed on as co-sponsor.

That was April 1989. Almost immediately, Smith's office was flooded with angry cards, petitions, faxes and letters.

"I will do all I can to see that Mr Smith does not go to Washington much longer," Pamela K. Walters of Middlesex, Vt., wrote in May, one of the many such letters that are now preserved in Smith's papers at the University of Vermont. Someone in Smith's House office — perhaps worn down by the vitriol and certain that the letter would never be seen again — scrawled an expletive in capital letters over Walters's note before filing it.

Local gun groups passed out bumper stickers: "Smith and Wesson, Yes. Smith and Congress, No." There were pictures of Smith as Pinocchio, with the caption "The Big Lie."

"Let's get even," Ed Cutler, the current president of Gun Owners of Vermont, remembered thinking then.

The NRA made Smith the only incumbent that it actively opposed in 1990. The group eventually spent between $18,000 and $20,000 on advertising and direct mail in Vermont, according to an estimate from the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The beneficiary was Sanders, who was Smith's main opponent in the 1990 House race. The Democrat in the race turned out to be so far left — suggesting the legalization of heroin — she made the socialist look moderate.

The unlikely alliance

The NRA-Sanders bond was an imperfect love affair.

Sanders was with the gun group on one major issue: he opposed a mandatory waiting period for handguns, saying that was best left to states. But, on assault weapons, his position was the same as the one for which Smith was getting hammered.

"It's an issue I do not feel comfortable about," Sanders said after one debate, according to a memoir about the race by a former aide, Steven Rosenfeld.

Sanders couldn't very well rail against Smith for his views on assault weapons when they were the same as his own. Instead, the aide said, Sanders wanted to let others "do our dirty work for us."

Instead of talking about guns, then, Sanders talked about honesty.

"Unlike some people, I won't change my views on the subject," he told one pro-gun group.

It worked.

"Bernie Sanders was upfront with us," an NRA official wrote to one of Smith's constituents after the race. The letter ended up in another official collection of Smith's papers. "He was viewed as the lesser of two evils."

As the election approached, the socialist's good luck kept getting better.

Smith, the incumbent, invited his own party's president, George H.W. Bush, to a breakfast fundraiser in Burlington. Then, Smith criticized the president to his face, calling for Bush to do more to tax the rich. "Like all Vermonters, Peter's a man of independent mind," the baffled president said when it was his turn to speak.

On Election Day, it wasn't close. Sanders beat Smith, 56 percent to 40 percent.

Today, Sanders's allies insist that gun control wasn't a major reason for his victory. "A couple of percentage points, in an election that we won by 16 points," said Jeff Weaver, Sanders's longtime aide and his current campaign manager.

Republicans insist gun control was the most important factor in the race. "The reason Bernie Sanders got elected to Congress, beat Peter Smith, was he sided with the NRA," said Stephan Morse, a former Republican speaker of the Vermont House and a close friend of Smith. Smith himself declined to talk about the race in an interview this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The correct analysis could be somewhere in between.

One poll after the election showed that about 35 percent of Sanders voters said the gun issue was a major factor in their decision.

“The NRA did not elect Bernie. But they provided much of the margin,” said Garrison Nelson, a longtime political observer at the University of Vermont.

Either way, Nelson said, the 1990 race was another step in the evolution of Sanders, who had risen from the leftist fringe by embracing allies and tactics that the fringe would not. In Burlington, he had made allies out of the police and worked out an uneasy relationship with big business. Later, in Congress, he would join the Democratic caucus, attaching himself to the party’s seniority system, after decades of railing against the Democratic Party’s politics as weak-kneed.

In the 1990 race, he made a tacit ally out of the NRA, a powerful Washington lobby that has become a chief nemesis of the left and a fierce obstacle to gun control efforts in Congress and state capitals across the country. The alliance allowed the group to bash an opponent whose positions were almost identical to Sanders’s own.

‘Bernie wants to win’

“Most socialists don’t want to win. Most socialists want to lose, because they can blame it on the system” and justify their decision to remain outside it, Nelson said. “But Bernie wants to win.”

After he was elected, Sanders stuck to the assurances he had given gun rights groups. In 1991, he voted against a measure that would have required a seven-day waiting period to buy a gun. In 1993, Sanders voted against a broader version of the bill — named for James Brady, the White House press secretary who was shot in the 1981 attempt on President Ronald Reagan’s life — that became law.

That bill set up the national background check system in place today. But Sanders objected because it also included a provision for temporary waiting period, said Weaver, his longtime aide.

“He had been explicit with people that he would not support a federal mandatory waiting period,” Weaver said. “And he kept his word.”

Since then, Sanders has had a mixed record on guns. He supported an NRA-backed bill to shield gun manufacturers from liability lawsuits. But in 2013, in the aftermath of the massacre at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Connecticut, he backed a provision that would have tightened gun laws.

Amid his surprising rise in the presidential race, Sanders has been attacked for that record by a super PAC that backs a Democratic rival, former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley. “The NRA even paid for ads attacking a Sanders opponent?” the video ad says. “Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns.”

Sanders declined to comment for this article, as did LaPierre, the NRA executive who wrote the 1990 endorsement letter.

The senator has defended himself by saying that he’s uniquely qualified to lead a national dialogue on guns, since he can see the issue from both an urban and a rural perspective. And besides, he said, the NRA has given him little support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Except once.

“In every single race that I have run, with the exception of one, the NRA and the gun lobbies and the people who are most interested in guns supported my opponent,” he told ABC’s George Stephanopoulos this year.

Among Vermont gun groups, there is some ambivalence about that long-ago election.

“In some ways, I’m happy that it happened. And in some ways I seriously regret it,” said Cutler, of the Gun Owners of Vermont. “I’m happy I did it, because it sent a message around the state that the gun vote really does count around here.”

But now, Cutler said, when he calls Sanders’s office to ask for a meeting, he never gets one. “I regret that it happened,” he said, “because, realistically, we have no input with him.”

Sanders campaign claims highest turnout yet for Netroots Nation speech //Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 19, 2015

PHOENIX — Bernie Sanders’ campaign claimed its highest turnout yet for a speech the Vermont senator and 2016 presidential candidate gave here on Saturday night on the third day of the liberal Netroots Nation convention.

Sanders’ campaign, citing Phoenix Convention Center officials, said more than 11,000 people showed up for the wide-ranging speech. Some 10,000 people heard Sanders speak in Madison, Wisconsin, a little more than two weeks earlier.

Sanders hit his favorite notes on economic inequality and raising the minimum wage but also pushed for 12 weeks of paid family leave, the need to aggressively tackle climate change, and pass “a Medicare for all single-payer program.”

Sanders, unlike most other 2016 presidential candidates, did not weigh in on Donald Trump’s comments that Sen. John McCain is not a war hero as he was captured in Vietnam. He did, however, ding former Florida governor Jeb Bush for saying Americans need to work longer hours.

“We all heard a few weeks ago that Jeb Bush thinks the American people need to work a little bit harder,” Sanders said, provoking the crowd to boo. “Well he obviously didn’t hear the sad reality that the American people already work the longest hours of any major country on earth.”

The rest of the field wasn’t name-checked but Sanders contrasted his party with Republicans, who he said were divisive.

“Our job is not to divide, our job is to bring people together,” Sanders said to cheers from the crowd.

Earlier in the day, Sanders seemed flummoxed when Black Lives Matter protesters stormed the stage at a Netroots

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nation candidate forum, demanding Sanders and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley address police brutality.

On Saturday night, Sanders said "when a police officer breaks the law, that officer must be held accountable."

"Let us be clear, while we have overcome a lot of racism, we still have a long way to go," he also said.

Bernie Sanders Continues to Draw the Biggest Crowds of Any 2016 Candidate // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – July 19, 2015

Size matters.

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders is still drawing the some of largest crowds on the campaign trail, as evidenced by the 11,000 people who turned up to hear the Vermont senator and self-described independent socialist speak at the Phoenix Convention Center on Saturday, according to reports. He had appeared there earlier that day as part of the progressive Netroots Nation convention. The turnout broke Sanders's previous record, some 10,000 at an rally in Madison earlier this month, which was heralded as the largest crowd any 2016 candidate had attracted yet.

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump spoke at the very same venue on Saturday, and drew roughly half as many attendees as Sanders did.

Now, it's possible Sanders is drawing the most attendees because his chief rival, Hillary Clinton, is taking a distinctly different approach, preferring to meet with small groups of people at house parties and intimate sit-downs. That said, Clinton did have some empty space leftover at her official campaign launch event in New York City in June. About 5,500 people showed up, the New York Times reported, citing Clinton's campaign, but the space on Roosevelt Island's Four Freedoms Park could have held more. The Times reported that the area set up for overflow crowd was nearly empty.

The other Sanders-level crowd of the cycle so far went to Ted Cruz, for his campaign launch, which drew some 11,000 attendees, but there was a catch. Cruz launched his campaign at Liberty University, a Christian school in Virginia. He was the weekly convocation speaker, and attendance was mandatory for students, under penalty of a fine.

Can Bernie Sanders win black voters? // CNN // Nia-Malika Henderson and Chris Moody – July 19, 2015

(CNN)In his bid to ride a progressive wave to the White House, Bernie Sanders is failing to connect with a key Democratic constituency: African-Americans.

Democrats are pinning their electoral fortunes on African-American and Latino voters. But the Sanders revolution looks a lot like Vermont, the second whitest state in the country. To mount a competitive challenge against Hillary Clinton, Sanders must do something he has never had to do—reach beyond the kind of post-racial political message he honed in his home state and connect with voters who don't look like him.

And so far, he's coming up short.

"I haven't seen him engaging the black community. Nor am I hearing any chatter about him," said Rick Wade,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama for America's African-American vote director. "Black voters don't know him."

A June CNN/ORC poll showed just 2% of black Democrats supporting Sanders, a figure that has remained unchanged since February. Among non-white voters overall, Sanders polls at 9% compared to Hillary Clinton's 61%.

The challenge was on full display at this weekend's Netroots Nation conference, a gathering of thousands of left-leaning Democrats. With his populist, soak-the-rich rhetoric, this was supposed to be prime Sanders territory.

Shaky response

A group of protestors crashed his speech, forcing Sanders to go off script while they chanted "black lives matter," a phrase that has become the rallying cry for a new civil rights movement.

His initial response was shaky and some activists found Sanders dismissive.

"Black lives, of course, matter. I spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights and for dignity," Sanders said. "But if you don't want me to be here, that's OK. I don't want to out-scream people."

After the protests, Sanders retreated from public view for several hours. He canceled a small group meeting that included Elon White, a host of a show about black issues, and he was a no-show at an event hosted by the Arizona Democratic Party. Meanwhile, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is also mounting a liberal challenge to Clinton, participated in panels at the conference and took question from on the online interview show, "This Week in Blackness."

Sanders re-emerged later that evening for a short speech at a private fundraiser for the Latino Victory Project, an advocacy group led by major Democratic donors that focuses on Latino outreach, where he, again, took questions about race.

But instead of adopting the defensive stance from that morning, Sanders' tone changed. He appeared humble, and asked questions of the activists gathered about how he could better pursue and talk about policies to combat racial injustice.

"I want some help on this. I'm being very honest," Sanders said. "I want some ideas, as somebody who was arrested 50 years ago fighting for Civil Rights trying to desegregate schools in Chicago, who spent his whole life fighting against racism, I want your ideas. What do you think we can do? What can we do?"

Sanders took on questions about what activists called "institutional racism" in education, housing, and criminal justice, and called for changes in leadership and an end to mass incarceration. He listened to ideas from the small group, and he even brought those who questioned him to stand next time while he spoke. He said that stories of minorities being shot by police was "horrendous" and "unacceptable," but touted progress that had been made since he began first started protesting for civil rights as a young radical in the 1960s.

'Impatient'

"I wish I could tell you I had a magical formula for how to end racism. It's gone on in this country for before it was

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America," Sanders said. "Let me just say this, because I'm older than you: You're impatient, and you should be impatient. But if we were standing here 30 years ago and somebody said, 'You know, I think in 2008, the United States of America will elect an African-American president,' you know what people in this room would've said? They would've said, 'You are crazy. That will never happen because America has too much racist baggage.' But it happened. So, I guess you're right to be impatient, but we have made progress in this country. Not enough."

Sanders and his aides have long insisted that his central message of fixing income inequality, providing universal health care and raising the minimum wage will help all Americans -- Latinos and African-Americans most of all.

In his campaign announcement and in subsequent speeches, he bashes oligarchs and vows to take on the "billionaire class."

But in most of his speeches, he is largely silent on immigration, racial inequality, police brutality and criminal justice reform, all front-bunner issues for the sizeable African-American voting bloc.

Sanders, who has narrowed Clinton's lead in states like Iowa and New Hampshire, is trying to broaden his reach, but his stumble at Netroots suggests that, for Sanders, expanding beyond class to matters of race will be a challenge.

"He is not a rainbow coalition guy or at least he hasn't been," said Greg Guma, author of "The People's Republic: Vermont and the Sanders Revolution," who has known Sanders since the 1970s. "He feels like he knows what the problem is and it's monopoly capitalism. Anything that takes him away from that message is a distraction."

He has opportunities to connect more deeply with African-Americans in the days ahead. He is slated to speak Saturday at the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in Baton Rouge and at the end of the month he is set to address the National Urban League in Fort Lauderdale. A campaign aide said that Sanders will talk about race, touching on malnutrition in the inner city and youth unemployment among other topics in upcoming speeches.

Last week Sanders, 73, spoke at the National Council of La Raza, where he touted his immigrant roots and vowed to push for a pathway to citizenship.

'Energize minorities'

And he recently tweeted: "We must energize minorities all across the country to engage in the Democratic process and thwart efforts to disenfranchise minority voters."

"It's important for him to make sure the core constituencies know who he is," said Tad Devine, a senior campaign adviser. "We have a story to tell about him and we are going to campaign actively in different communities."

Campaign trips to Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina are planned for August—all three states have significant black populations.

Spotlighting Sanders' early activism will be key to connecting with African-American voters, Devine said.

His campaign biography now includes a reference to his participation in the March on Washington. His aides often mention his endorsement of Jesse Jackson in the 1988 Democratic primary, a move that helped the civil rights leader win Vermont. Sanders also joined the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), as a student at the University of Chicago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an ironic twist, Sanders' civil rights activism stretches further back than Clinton. While she was a "Goldwater girl," Sanders was paying a $25 fine for leading a protest march against school segregation in Chicago.

But, to some, Sanders' civil rights credentials seem dated.

"I'm happy to know that he was rallying in the 1960s. That tells me he was on the path when I was a child, but not too many people are thinking about the 60s" said Mary Brown-Guillory, president of the Vermont chapter of the NAACP. "What is he doing today about police brutality and the right to vote and equality? He has to be more than just Vermont."

Sanders' home state is 95% white. The NAACP held its first-ever state chapter meeting earlier this month.

Though Sanders' run and his ability to draw huge crowds has brought comparisons to Obama's 2008 bid, the more apt comparison is to Howard Dean, who also struggled to gain traction outside of Vermont in 2004.

But aides suggest that Sanders has a better story to tell, with his past activism and current political resume as a key selling point.

He has a solid 100% in the most recent NAACP scorecard. As a candidate for mayor of Burlington in 1981, Sanders campaigned against a plan to convert Burlington's Lake Champlain waterfront into an enclave for the rich. He announced his bid for the White House on the shores of Lake Champlain, highlighting his fight for the underdog and a class battle that he managed to win.

But absent from his announcement were people like Curtiss Reed, the executive director for Vermont Partnership for Fairness and Diversity, who skipped the event because of Sanders' one-note emphasis on class.

'Remarkably consistent'

"His message is remarkably consistent in that it is devoid of any conversation around race. He is colorblind to an extent that it seems that race is something that is uncomfortable for him to talk about. He is like a lot of Vermonters," Reed said. "It's easy to rattle off statistics, but that's not engaging people of color."

Clinton, whose weakness among black voters in 2008 cost her the nomination, has made a concerted effort to try to lock-up the Obama coalition. She gave a race speech after the Charleston massacre, called for an end to mass incarceration in her first policy speech and has made two campaign stops in South Carolina. She met with the Congressional Black Caucus last week as well as the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, mindful that there are delegates to be had among party leaders.

But even Clinton, who saw the intersection of race and class up close in Arkansas, has struggled to keep up with the rhetoric of young, progressive blacks. In a June speech at a black church near Ferguson, Missouri, she said "all lives matter," rather than "black lives matter." Grassroots activists, who see such generalizations as a way to sidestep specific race-based remedies, were outraged.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donna Brazile, a CNN contributor and longtime Clinton friend and supporter, pointed out on Twitter that Clinton has said black lives matter in the past.

Yet those are the kind of ties and connections that Sanders lacks. Several grassroots activists in Vermont complained that he didn't reach out as he ramped up his national campaign. And when they look at his campaign team, they see the Vermont problem.

"If he is going to have a serious national campaign, he is going to have to better reflect the changing demographics with his team. Diversity is a strength," said Hal Colston, a black Sanders supporter who runs Partnership for Change, a non-profit education group in Vermont. "Bernie gets it and he does listen. He's always been the champion for the person left behind. He knows he has to update his rhetoric and he is already showing signs of expanding the conversation."

Updating the conversation will mean responding to a rapid social media driven movement that is now trying to bring attention the the case of Sandra Bland, a Texas woman who died in police custody. Campaign aides said that in the coming months, they will bring on more staff, including people of color steeped in policy issues. For her part, Clinton has scooped up black policy advisers as part of her core team, putting Sanders at somewhat of a disadvantage.

"It will take some time because we are not the frontrunner, but it's a priority," Devine said. "We want a campaign that looks like a Democratic party campaign and not a Republican party convention."

#BlackTwitter Turns On Bernie Sanders // The Daily Beast // Asawin Suebsaeng – July 19, 2015

Black Twitter has a bone to pick with Bernie Sanders.

The 2016 lefty darling's seeming unwillingness to talk about race on the campaign trail is not sitting well with some black activists and observers, and a tense moment turned #BernieSoBlack into a dominant trending topic over the weekend.

Confronted Saturday by protesters at the Netroots Nation conference in Phoenix chanting "Black lives matter!" and "What side are you on?" Sanders was clearly annoyed. "Black lives, of course, matter," the populist and self-described socialist senator said. "I spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights and for dignity…If you don't want me to be here, that's OK. I don't want to outscream people."

As a senator from Vermont, which is roughly 95 percent white, Sanders has had scant direct experience connecting with black constituents and voters, and he prefers to focus his speeches on income inequality. His campaign events are overwhelmingly white, and his own advisers have conceded—and he himself has acknowledged—that he is still a virtual unknown among African-American voters.

"Basically, the Bernie Sanders campaign has a lot of groundwork to do with regards to building the relationship with black voters," Terrell Starr, a senior editor at Alternet, told The Daily Beast. "There is still privilege with how white progressives view progressive politics with regards to racial discrimination…And what we saw [Saturday] was an example of that disconnect."

Black Twitter went after the senator after his Netroots appearance:

(It's true: Sanders marched with Martin Luther King Jr. in 1963 and was also arrested for protesting in favor of desegregating public schools in Chicago.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That @AngryBlackLady tweet, sent out to her 35,000 followers, inspired Roderick Morrow—who runs the "Black Guy Who Tips" comedy podcast with his wife, Karen—to launch the mocking hashtag #BernieSoBlack:

#BernieSoBlack quickly began trending on Twitter:

Morrow, who goes by @rodimusprime on Twitter and has more than 11,000 followers, said he was surprised his impromptu hashtag suddenly took off. "I just thought it was a funny joke!" he told The Daily Beast. But he added that his lighthearted jab was rooted in a serious concern about Sanders's candidacy.

"Every time race is brought up, he pivots to the economy, which obviously a lot of racial disparity comes via economic means, but some of it is just flat out racism and discrimination," Morrow said. Sanders's view that "if we had more jobs in Ferguson, this wouldn't have happened, I'm not sure that is valid. I mean, Mike Brown was on his way to college. It's not just a jobs thing."

The Sanders backlash could indicate friction and dissonance between two critical components of the Democratic base: white liberals and African-Americans. Many younger black activists are skeptical not just of Sanders but of the current Democratic field, who they believe have taken the solidly blue African-American vote for granted.

"Not to disrespect what he did with Martin Luther King," Morrow said. "But if you want to connect with black voters, they need to know what you are going to do now and going forward, not what you've done in the past."

Still, Morrow said he thinks the backlash this weekend—on Black Twitter, and otherwise—has already done some good.

On Sunday, the official Bernie Sanders Twitter account addressed #BlackLivesMatter directly.

Morrow said he hopes those tweets are a signal the senator will discuss race more frequently during the long campaign. "Well, he's listening and paying attention," Morrow said. "The last thing I want for any candidate is for them to give up on the black vote, because that would be the most destructive. Criticism is just part of the job."

Bernie Sanders draws largest crowds yet in Phoenix // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – Jully 19, 2015

PHOENIX, Arizona – Bernie Sanders had his largest rally yet of his nascent campaign on Saturday night in Phoenix, Arizona.

"We've had big turnouts in Wisconsin, in Iowa … but this is the biggest turnout yet!" Sanders said as he took the stage to begin his speech. "And some people say Arizona is a conservative state!" he said, receiving wild applause and cheers from the crowd.

A campaign spokesperson confirmed that over 11,000 people attended the rally at Phoenix Convention Center, which the largest attendance number yet for a Sanders rally.

While the event was timed to coincide with the Netroots Nation conference that brought many progressive activists to Phoenix for the weekend, the attendees at the Saturday night rally appeared to be primarily local area supporters, with some Netroots attendees mixed in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders spoke for nearly an hour, and his speech initially focused on the economic themes that Sanders has continually emphasized throughout his campaign: income inequality, job creation, raising the minimum wage, and debt-free college.

Sanders also went after GOP candidate Jeb Bush for his recent comments suggesting that Americans should work more. “Jeb Bush thinks the American people need to work harder,” Sanders said, as the audience booed. “Our people do not need to work longer hours, they need better wages!”

But his speech also broadened beyond his usual comfort zone of economic issues and touched on a broad range of social issues, including LGBT rights, women’s reproductive rights, racial justice, and the gender wage gap.

“What our Republicans colleagues talk about is ‘family values.’ And this is what they mean by family values: they mean that a woman should not be able to have the right to control her own body. They believe that women, if you can believe this, should not be able to purchase the contraceptives they want. And they believe that our gay brothers and sisters should not have the right to marry.”

“Those are their ‘family values,’” Sanders continued, referring to Republicans. “Those are not OUR family values.”

Sanders also addressed wage inequality, saying: “It is unacceptable that women today make 78 cents to the man’s dollar. Brothers, we need to stand with our sisters and fight for pay equity.”

Earlier on Saturday, Sanders spoke at a presidential town hall moderated by journalist and immigration rights activist Jose Antonio Vargas. However, Sanders was only able to speak for a few brief minutes before the event was abruptly cut short due to protesters interrupting the event. During the first portion of the town hall, Vargas interviewed Democratic candidate Martin O’Malley, but the former Maryland governor was interrupted a few questions in by protesters chanting “black lives matter” and “say her name” to draw attention to the recent deaths of black women at the hands of police, including Sandra Bland, who died while in police custody earlier this week, sparking a Twitter movement under the hashtag #IfIDieInPoliceCustody.

At Saturday evening’s event, Sanders made a point of addressing the issues of racial justice and policing tactics that were bought up at the earlier town hall. On race, Sanders said: “While we have come a long way, we still have a long way to go.”

“It is not acceptable to me,” he added, “that we have seen young black men walk down street in this country, be beaten, and be killed unjustly, that is not acceptable.”

As supporters applauded and began to cheer “black lives matter,” Sanders continued: “When a police officer breaks the law, that officer must be held accountable.”

But as the event came to a close, Sanders pivoted back to his comfort zone of economic issues.

“We need to stand up and say, enough is enough, the billionaires are not gonna have it all, it’s our country!” he closed, to thunderous applause and cheers from the crowd.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders vaults from fringe to the heart of the fray // Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – July 19, 2015

SOMEWHERE OVER THE AMERICAN WEST — It's 7:20 a.m. and Bernie Sanders looks irritated. He's already buckled into his economy seat on Delta Flight 4516 and an attendant just announced that the flight would sit on the runway for 30 minutes before taking off.

"Planes," grumbled the Vermont senator. "Don't get me started about airplanes." Then he added, in a tone that sounded only half-joking, "This is when you want a private jet."

Sanders' insurgent campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination doesn't spring for charters like his top competitor — at least not yet. On this day he isn't even flying nonstop, as he heads from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to Phoenix via Minneapolis. If all goes well, he'll just be a few minutes late to a forum at Netroots Nation, an annual gathering of liberals.

The weekend events — another rally is planned in Houston Sunday — is capping off Sanders' best week so far in his increasingly credible quest for the nomination. Federal reports made public last week show he has raised more than $15 million for his campaign, beating every other presidential candidate from either party save Hillary Rodham Clinton (she hauled in about $46 million). He has gathered the money from an army of small donors that is larger than that of any other presidential candidate.

And, as he pulled his roller bag out of the air-conditioned terminal into the blast of Phoenix heat Saturday morning, he was preparing to speak that evening before his largest crowd yet.

Through some combination of political skill, fortuitous timing, well-tuned messaging, and sheer luck this has become the Summer of Sanders — in which an unkempt 73-year-old man who isn't even a member of the Democratic Party is mounting the strongest challenge to the Democratic establishment. He's gone from being dismissed as a fringe candidate to having a huge early impact on the primary.

The self-described Democratic socialist flying coach is suddenly a star. Clinton aides have acknowledged concern about losing ground in Iowa and New Hampshire, or both, to Sanders. One poll has shown him within 19 percentage points of Clinton in the Hawkeye State and another has him within eight points of her in New Hampshire.

But, will it last? Or, as one of his strategists put it, could the next few months bring the fall of Sanders?

Already the Sanders campaign infrastructure is creaking under the weight of the unexpected interest in his candidacy. Tens of thousands of bumper stickers were on back order. Venues for rallies need to be changed multiple times as the RSVPs pile high, and crowds swell. And most importantly, to survive, he'll need to expand his support beyond the liberal wing of the Democratic Party — and persuade the party that he should be the standard bearer.

Sanders contends that the national caricature of him as a hippy-dippy socialist from the People's Republic of Burlington, where he was mayor from 1981 to 1989, is largely inaccurate. He jokes about it — saying that he doesn't own a pair of Birkenstocks and never would "in a million years." He says that his message resonates most loudly with blue-collar workers, not the tie-dye set.

On Friday night in a vast hall in Cedar Rapids before 1,300 people, that appeal was on full display. Sanders shared the stage for the first time with the other four Democratic candidates who took turns speaking to the audience. He won multiple standing ovations for a thundering rant against the inordinate power of the super-rich. He called for a “political revolution” and predicted that without it, the country was heading toward an oligarchy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Nothing will get done unless millions of people stand up and roundly proclaim enough is enough,” Sanders said, gripping the lectern with both hands. “This country belongs to all of us, and not a handful of billionaires.”

It was a classic display of Sanders’ freewheeling approach, the aura of blunt authenticity that makes him seem a refreshing change from Clinton’s poll-tested messages and reluctance to offer detailed positions on issues of the day.

“He really connected,” said Steve Hultman, a 65-year-old retired teacher from Council Bluffs, Iowa. “Hillary has to go to work. She has to get the facts and framing to excite the Democratic side of the party.”

Some part of Sanders’ popularity flows directly from the Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party. He only began to rise in polls of probable voters when the Massachusetts senator’s name was dropped from their surveys after it became clear that she wouldn’t run. For him as for her, not having to worry much about moderate support is liberating; Clinton has no such luxury. And it doesn’t really tell against Sanders at this early stage that a liberal message like his may not play well, or at all, in some states a candidate must win to gain nomination or election.

But there’s more to Sanders than the Warren echo. Unlike others in the current field, he has been quietly building a national grass-roots network for years. His 2012 Senate campaign finance report looks remarkably similar to his presidential one last week, with most contributions coming from small donors across the country. He raised $7.2 million for that election, swamping his Republican opponent, who took in about $135,000.

While he was being written off in 2014 by the news media and other candidates focused on Warren instead, Sanders road-tested his message. In Los Angeles, he recalled, there were standing-room-only crowds this year well before announcing his candidacy. In Texas, so many people came to hear him that a traffic jam of supporters headed for the venue made it difficult for him to get to the event himself.

Still, those around Sanders weren’t sure he was going to run even weeks before his April 30 announcement. “As late as late April, if Bernie had called and said ‘we’re not doing this’ I would not have been shocked,” said Tad Devine, a longtime Sanders ally and a political consultant.

There’s a limit to the revolution Sanders is pushing: The senator won’t mount an independent bid for president. No matter how the crowds swell. “We’re doing this within the party system,” he said again Saturday on the Minneapolis leg of his trip.

Keeping it simple

Sanders’ plane landed in Minneapolis with about 30 minutes to get his connecting flight. One passenger positioned himself near the end of the jet bridge to get a photo of him getting off the plane. He paused for selfies with several others as they all waited for luggage checked at the gate.

Unlike Clinton’s container-ship-sized campaign organization with more than 300 on staff, Sanders has a much smaller operation. On Saturday he traveled with only his campaign manager, his communications director, a videographer, and his wife. He figured out most of the logistics himself — securing boarding passes for the group and leading everyone through the Minneapolis airport from one terminal to the other.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign pays 25 full-time staff members in Iowa and rents offices in 10 different towns. Sanders has just 10 full-time staffers in Vermont, 5 in Washington, and 4 in New Hampshire, plus 11 paid interns in Vermont and New Hampshire.

He revels in this relative lack of professional help. To make his point, he briefly commandeered an interview with a reporter last week in Washington.

“Ask me who my campaign finance director is,” he said over coffee in a Senate cafeteria.

“We don’t have one. Ask me who my pollster is,” he said. “We don’t have one.” He said he writes his own direct mail.

That’s not to say Sanders has a consultant-free campaign. He’s soaked up some talent from President Obama’s team. The names include Scott Goodstein, an online director for Obama’s first presidential race, and Arun Chaudhary, another veteran of the 2008 Obama campaign team who was Obama’s first videographer.

Teamwork pays off

Should this team’s work pay off and Sanders becomes even more viable, the target on his candidacy will grow. On June 25 a super PAC linked to former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley, another declared Democratic candidate, spent about $10,000 on online ads critical of Sanders’ record on gun control, which is, for a Democrat, notably friendly to gun owners.

Sanders’ team fought back, using the same rhetoric that Warren so effectively employs against her many critics: Frame the attack as an assault on the progressive movement and raise buckets of cash off of it.

The day after the ads began, Sanders’ campaign blasted an e-mail to supporters requesting help. Within 48 hours they’d raised more than $800,000, according to a source familiar with his fund-raising.

But by far the most talked about aspect of Sanders’ candidacy is the size of the crowds — it comes as a shock even to the candidate.

“You walk into an arena and find 10,000 people looking at you . . . ” he said in an interview, trailing off. Then he turned to Michael Briggs, his charmingly beleaguered press aide.

“How many RSVPs do we have now in Phoenix?” he asked. “10,000?”

The swell forced the campaign to move the event twice. The same thing happened in Portland, Maine, where he ended up speaking to more than 7,500. And in Madison, Wis., where he spoke to a crowd about 10,000. And in Denver, where he spoke to about 5,000.

Putting this many supporters in a room takes work. The campaign e-mails supporters who live near events, and they ask an enthusiastic Reddit community to spread the word.

There’s a practical reason for holding these events. Sanders hasn’t spent much time building the relationships within the Democratic Party leaders at the state level that can help propel a national candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We need to build organization, particularly in relatively early states,” Devine said.

On Saturday — when Sanders finally arrived at Netroots — the work that he needs to do to appeal to the broader Democratic coalition was clear. A group of mostly African-American demonstrators protesting police brutality had heckled O’Malley, disrupting his speech.

Sanders knew he was walking into a difficult situation. “It’s this afternoon’s talk I’m worried about,” he said before walking on the stage — and faced some of the same angry chants, competing with the cheers.

Bernie Sanders voices concerns about police brutality in Dallas campaign stop // Trailblazers Blog // Ryan J. Rusak – July 19, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, sought Sunday during a Dallas visit to calm complaints about his response to concerns about police brutality at a progressive activists gathering this weekend.

“We want a nation where a young black man or woman can walk down the street without worrying about being falsely arrested, beaten or killed,” Sanders told more than 8,000 people who packed a Sheraton Hotel ballroom to hear him.

Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont, has been drawing huge crowds in his long-shot bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. Though he’s unlikely to wrest the nomination from Hillary Clinton, liberal voters concerned about issues such as income inequality and the power of big banks have responded with enthusiasm to the self-described socialist.

But on Saturday, Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, got a less-than-friendly reception at Netroots Nation. Attendees chanting “black lives matter” interrupted the pair, and Sanders at one point threatened to leave. By Sunday afternoon, #berniesoblack was trending on Twitter, as users both mocked Sanders’ response and hailed his progressive agenda.

Sanders’ appearance in Dallas, though, drew no protests. The crowd hailed his standard lines on topics from abortion and civil rights to Social Security and corporations.

Sanders, who supports the transition to sustainable energy and away from fossil fuels, criticized the oil and gas energy industry but he said he “understands speaking here in Texas, a fossil fuel state, that people are concerned of losing their jobs.”

“We’ve got to break up these banks. If they’re too big to fail they’re too big to exist,” Sanders said. “Paying more in this election cycle than either major political party does not sound like democracy to me.”

Supporters were greeted with revolution-themed song like “Uprising” by Muse, and attendees could be heard laughing as the music changed to “Rocking in the Free World” by Neil Young—a jab at Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump.

Supporters of all ages held signs and wore T-shirts with phrases like “Feel the Bern.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dallas is the state's largest reliably Democratic county, but Sanders could struggle here to gain traction against Clinton, who is popular among Texas Democrats. The state's primary, slated for March 1, could be a key moment in the parties' nominating contests, as it's the first big state to vote after the smaller areas that traditionally lead off the process.

Sanders later headed to Houston for a rally.

'Police must be held accountable': Bernie Sanders rips bad cops who attack young black men // RawStory // Tom Boggioni – July 19, 2015

Following his townhall-style appearance at Netroots Nation that could have gone better, Democratic presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders told a packed house in Phoenix that, although the country has made great strides is race relations, "we still have a long way to go."

Before a fervent crowd that Sanders' campaign spokesperson estimated at over 11,000 took time to switch gears from his message of economic populism to address the concerns of #BlackLivesMatters protesters who disrupted his talk earlier.

"It is not acceptable that an African-American male baby born today, if we do not change things, stands a 1 in 4 chance of being in prison during his life," the Vermont independent told the crowd.

He continued, "It is not acceptable to me that we have seen young black men walk down streets in this country be beaten and be killed unjustly — that is not acceptable. Most police officers — and I was a mayor for eight years — and I worked with police officers, it's a tough job but most cops do it well. But when a police officer breaks the law, that officer must be held accountable."

Twitter users debate Bernie Sanders' civil rights credibility with #BernieSoBlack hashtag // RawStory // David Ferguson – July 19, 2015

After a group of #BlackLivesMatter protesters disrupted Democratic candidates Gov. Martin O'Malley (MD) and Sen. Bernie Sanders (VT) at Netroots Nation 2015 on Saturday, some activists took to Twitter to express their dissatisfaction with Sanders' response.

By Sunday afternoon, the hashtag #BernieSoBlack was trending, with progressives trading barbs on Twitter and accusing each other of racism, character assassination, censorship, "whitesplaining" and more.

It began as a way of mocking the candidate while trading cultural signifiers.

But then some progressives began to point out some of the real work Sanders has done for racial progress in this country.

And then the usual tears and recriminations followed.

The #BernieSoBlack hashtag is proof that #BlackLivesMatter is not organized and has no vision about how to engage to get real change

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— YeaYouRite (@YeaYouRite) July 19, 2015

While others just had fun with it.

#BernieSoBlack his wife passed Precious the bucket of fried chicken at M & G Diner in Harlem. pic.twitter.com/2F9jASsiiH

— eri (@eri_cyrus) July 19, 2015

UNDECLARED

BIDEN

Report: Joe Biden may still enter 2016 presidential race // MSNBC // Adam Howard – July 19, 2015

Vice President Joe Biden still hasn't ruled out a 2016 run for the presidency, according to a report from The Huffington Post.

Sources reportedly close to the 72-year-old told the website that he's expected to make a final decision by September.

"He has said he would announce his decision at the end of the summer," Ted Kaufman, a longtime Biden aide who briefly filled his Senate seat when he was elected vice president, told Huffington Post. On the other hand, Biden's Kendra A. Barkoff, appeared to throw cold water on the 2016 buzz. "The Biden family is going through a difficult time right now," said Barkoff. "Any speculation about the views of the vice president or his family about his political future is premature and inappropriate."

Biden has been in mourning the death of his son Beau Biden, who succumbed to a long battle with brain cancer on May 30th. Beau Biden, who had political aspirations of his own, reportedly encouraged his father to seek the White House next year.

There has been speculation about BIden entering the campaign for months. "I think there's concern about this being his last act and him losing a primary by 40 or 50 points," Bloomberg reporter Phil Mattingly said on a July 2 episode of msnbc's "Morning Joe." "In the wake of what he's done as vice president and the legacy that he's left, I do think there is a very, very real push inside his family and inside his team to get in."

"He's as good a politician as anybody in the world, he's not going to hop in something if he doesn't see a window, or a pathway forward. And I don't know that they've seen Hillary's team falter to a point where the window is very clear right now," Mattingly continued.

Current polls show Biden trailing behind frontrunner HIllary Clinton and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders among Democratic primary voters. However, a CNN poll from earlier this month showed Biden moving into second place if he were to enter the race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

William Pierce, a military veteran the leader of a "Draft Biden" Super PAC, told msnbc's Lawrence O'Donnell earlier this month that staff in the early primary voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire are working to generate enthusiasm for a potential Biden run. "We haven't seen no bat signal from the vice president telling us not to do what we're doing," Pierce said. "What we have seen though are a lot of supporters from around the entire country who have supported him in the past or who are now current, new supporters – they're coming out and they're supporting him."

However, veteran pollster Charlie Cook argued that Biden's age – he'll be 74 by next November – completely derails any chance he would have at being the Democratic 2016 nominee. "It's not gonna happen," he told O'Donnell.

OTHER

How Clinton, Sanders, O'Malley answer union's questions about education // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – July 19, 2015

The American Federation of Teachers, the second-largest teachers union in the country, became the first major union to endorse a candidate, when it picked Hillary Clinton earlier this month.

The July 11 endorsement by the AFT's executive council has sparked backlash from some union members, who support Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and/or wanted the AFT to wait longer while the political process played out. But the endorsement was never in doubt, given AFT President Randi Weingarten's longtime association with Clinton.

Putting the politics of the endorsement aside for the moment, here is how Clinton, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley answered AFT questions in questionnaires submitted before the endorsement and before both the House and Senate had passed their own versions of a rewritten No Child Left Behind bill. (They were the only three to answer the AFT's questions).

The questions involve issues including education, health care and the economy. You can decide for yourself who directly answered questions and who dodged them. Here are the questionnaires with the answers:

Hillary Rodham Clinton

AFT: Today, almost 50 million students attend our nation's public schools. Along with their parents, communities, teachers, paraprofessionals and other school employees, these students have been forced to live under test-and-punish policies that include sanctions and school closings, high-stakes assessments, and federalized teacher evaluations that are counterproductive and have taken the joy out of teaching and learning.

Q. What is your view of the current version of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (also known as the No Child Left Behind Act)? What changes, if any, would you make to the law, and why? Please include positions on:

The federal government's role in ensuring equity and access to resources for all children;

The role of standards, assessments and accountability in public education;

Ensuring that all students have access to a broad curriculum that includes art and music, as well as science,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM);

Professional development for school staff; and Community schools.

HRC: I have been working to improve and support our public schools for decades. Throughout my career I have worked to ensure that every child reaches his or her full potential, and I know a quality education is essential to reach that goal. When I was First Lady of Arkansas, I chaired the Arkansas Educational Standards Commission where I worked to raise standards for Arkansas' schools, increase teacher salaries, and lower class size. I continued in this effort as First Lady of the United States and as a Senator, working throughout my career to provide dedicated resources and support to teachers and to recruit, support, and retain more outstanding teachers. We need to attract a whole new generation to teaching because it is critical that our students have well-prepared and well-supported teachers.

When the No Child Left Behind Act was enacted, I viewed it as a historic promise between the federal government and educators. I hoped that it would lead to a greater sense of shared responsibility for our schools' success. Unfortunately, that promise was largely broken because schools struggled to meet the mandates imposed by the law and the implementation at the federal level was problematic.

I applaud Senator Patty Murray and Senator Lamar Alexander for coming together in a bipartisan fashion to unanimously pass the Every Child Achieves Act of 2015 out of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions committee to reauthorize NCLB. I believe this bill addresses some of the real challenges with NCLB while retaining our commitment to high academic standards, and to assessments that give parents and teachers the information they need to know how students are performing and if and where they need help to improve. I believe that this bill will correct for some of the real challenges that schools and communities experienced in implementing the law and will ensure that principals, educators and local communities are lifted up as full partners and innovators in improving public education. I also applaud the forward-looking investments in education contained in the bill, including a new commitment to improving early learning.

One of the issues that I am most concerned about is testing. Tests are intended to provide parents and educators with an understanding of how well kids are learning. Having that understanding is crucial. And it is important to remember that testing provides communities with full information about how our low-income students and students of color are doing in comparison to other groups so that we can continue to improve our educational system for all students.

But I understand the frustration many parents and educators feel about tests. Teachers and parents alike are concerned about the amount of time being spent on test preparation, and worry that children are missing out on the most valuable experience in the classroom– a teacher sparking a student's curiosity and love for learning.

So I am mindful that we need to find the right balance — and that starts with bringing parents and educators back into this conversation about how we ensure a robust and engaging curriculum that engages students in the love of learning rather than narrowing our schools to focus primarily on test preparation.

I do think that Senators Murray and Alexander struck the right balance in the Every Child Achieves Act by continuing to maintain the federal requirement for annual statewide testing in grades 3-8, but ensuring that accountability for improving schools will be based on multiple measures of performance. And I think it will be critical for states and communities to continue to strike the right balance and not layer test upon test. There must be room for invigorating teaching and learning in the classroom.

Q. Do you support any of the current reauthorization proposals under consideration in the 114th Congress?

HRC: I applaud Senator Patty Murray and Senator Lamar Alexander for coming together in a bipartisan fashion to unanimously pass the Every Child Achieves Act of 2015 out of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions committee to reauthorize NCLB.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. What role do you think the federal government can play in providing access to early childhood education? What specific policy proposals would your administration pursue?

HRC: I believe we need to improve access to quality child care and early learning opportunities for all children. Every child, regardless of parental income, deserves access to high-quality pre-K. I think any discussion of improving our public schools must include universal access to pre-kindergarten. I believe we can start to close the achievement gap by investing in programs that increase children's school readiness and academic preparation while making it easier for parents to balance their responsibilities at work with their responsibilities to their children. We know children's brains develop more rapidly at this time in their lives than at any other and that high quality interventions make a real difference in the outcomes of children from low-income families. In the months ahead, I look forward to laying out a significant agenda to improve early learning in our country.

I have been highlighting the importance of early childhood education for more than forty years. As First Lady of Arkansas, I helped bring the Home Instruction for Parents of Preschool Youngsters Program (HIPPY) to Arkansas. As First Lady, I hosted the first White House conference on early learning and the brain, championed the program "Prescription for Reading," in which pediatricians provided free books for new mothers to read to their infants as their brains were rapidly developing, and supported the Administration's work to create Early Head Start, which reaches children from birth to age three throughout country. As Senator, I co-sponsored the Education Begins at Home Act, which expands the Parents as Teachers program and other quality programs of early childhood home visitation. As a leader at the Clinton Foundation, I led a national initiative called "Too Small to Fail" aimed at supporting parents to improve vocabulary and brain development in the early years to close the "word gap" and better prepare children for school. As President, I will continue my lifelong work to expand early childhood and parent education programs.

Q. What are your views on private school vouchers, tuition tax credits, and charter school accountability and transparency?

HRC: I strongly oppose voucher schemes because they divert precious resources away from financially strapped public schools to private schools that are not subject to the same accountability standards or teacher quality standards. It would be harmful to our democracy if we dismantled our public school system through vouchers, and there is no evidence that doing so would improve outcomes for children.

Charters should be held to the same standards, and to the same level of accountability and transparency to which traditional public schools are held. This includes the requirements of civil rights laws. They can innovate and help improve educational practices. But I also believe that we must go back to the original purpose of charter schools. Where charters are succeeding, we should be doing more to ensure that their innovations can be widely disseminated throughout our traditional public school system. Where they are failing, they should be closed.

AFT: Access to an affordable and high-quality system of public higher education is critical to the health of the nation — both to ensure that students reach their fullest potential, and to enable the United States to continue to develop as a just society, a vibrant democracy and a land of economic opportunity.

Q. Escalating tuition and fees are leading to a growing number of students leaving college with overwhelming debt from student loans. This burden of rising costs and rising debt makes access to higher education increasingly difficult for many students and their families. What is the role of the federal government in ensuring that higher education is affordable and accessible?

HRC: First, too many young people are struggling under the burden of student debt and too many families are struggling to pay the rising cost of college. Second, too many students are starting but never completing college, which means they leave with debt but no degree. I will be offering my own ideas for how to make college more affordable, how to make sure no one graduates with crushing debt, and how to hold colleges accountable to help more students graduate. Among other things, we have to do more to link student loan repayments to income and to help people refinance their loans. And we have to think about both four-year colleges and community colleges. I support President Obama's free community college proposal. I will be talking about ways to reduce the burdens on those entering four-year colleges too, as well as those who are out in the world trying to start a business or a family. I intend to introduce significant proposals on these subjects in the weeks and months ahead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. There has been a nationwide pattern of disinvestment in public higher education such that per-student funding dropped 26.1 percent between 1990 and 2010. What would your administration do to remedy this?

HRC: State budget cuts are a primary cause of tuition increases at public universities and reversing this trend is key to making college more affordable. That's why I will make incentivizing increased state funding of higher education a priority, and explore ways to make sure that the federal government is actively partnering and working with states to address the problem of college affordability.

Q. Career and technical education programs help ensure that postsecondary credentials and skills are accessible to all — a necessity in today's economy. In your view, what is the role of the federal government in supporting high-quality CTE programs?

HRC: In the months ahead, I will lay out my ideas for a comprehensive proposal to train millions more workers over the next decade. I am exploring a number of options to incentivize GTE programs and help provide grants to train workers for the 21st century economy.

Q. What is the federal government's role in requiring appropriate transparency and accountability of for-profit institutions?

HRC: We have to do a lot more to protect students and families from unscrupulous institutions and abusive debt servicers. There are a lot of non-traditional students who want to go back to school to improve their lives, but don't have access to much information or support to figure out how best to do that. Money and time are both tight, with a lot of them trying to juggle family, jobs, and school all at the same time. So they're particularly vulnerable to exploitation and deception.

All students need more guidance in making decisions about where to go to school. We should protect them from institutions that will almost certainly not serve them well. The government should stop funding colleges where almost no one graduates and where most students accumulate a lot of debt but can't get the jobs that would allow them to repay their loans. In the months ahead, I will be laying out specific ideas and proposals on how to increase accountability in the for-profit sector.

AFT: Having a high-quality healthcare system in the United States is a moral imperative, an economic necessity and a fundamental right for all. Underpinning this right is a healthcare system that reflects the needs of the patients, providers and community.

Q. What are your views of the Affordable Care Act? What changes would you make, if any, to the ACA, including the excise tax on high-cost plans and the provisions on shared responsibility for employers?

HRC: Thanks to the Affordable Care Act, more than 16 million Americans have gained new coverage. The reduction in the uninsured rate across the country has been staggering, down to roughly 12% for adults.

These statistics translate into real change in people's lives. Families who no longer have to face the threat of bankruptcy because of catastrophic health care costs. Parents who now have health care when only their children were covered before. Women can no longer be charged higher rates solely because of their gender. People with preexisting conditions can no longer be denied coverage. Americans can make the leap of changing jobs or starting a business without worrying about whether they'll still be able to buy insurance — because now they know they can purchase it on the marketplace. So this is a real accomplishment we should be proud of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As with any piece of major legislation, it's not perfect and would benefit from updates and fixes. One area of the ACA that I am examining is the so-called "Cadillac" tax. As currently structured, I worry that it may create an incentive to substantially lower the value of the benefits package and shift more and more costs to consumers. As President, I would work to ensure that our tax code appropriately advances the health care interests of lower-income and middle-class families.

We also need to take steps beyond the ACA. We should crack down on the drug companies that charge too much and the insurance companies that offer too little. And we need to tackling rising out-of-pocket health care costs for consumers across the board.

Q. Do you support initiatives designed to move health insurance coverage away from an employer-based model? If so, what would you propose as an alternative to the current system for covering working adults?

HRC: I've long believed that progress on health care is only possible if there is a principle of shared responsibility among every major actor in our health care system. Employers have always played a critical role in ensuring working families have access to coverage — in fact more than 96% of firms with 50 or more employees already offer health insurance.

Q. Many licensed healthcare professionals, particularly RNs, are leaving hospital service because of difficult working conditions, including excessive and unsafe workloads, understaffing and mandatory overtime. What would you do to address these problems and to improve recruitment and retention of nurses and other healthcare professionals?

HRC: I know that we must address the nursing shortage in this country and give nurses the training, education, and support they need to provide the care patients deserve. We need appropriate nurse-to-patient ratios in order to improve patient care and working conditions for nurses.

I have a history of working for America's nurses. As Senator, I was proud to champion provisions in the Nurse Reinvestment Act that provided significant resources to recruit and train nurses, and I introduced the Nursing Education and Quality of Health Care Act. I believe it is important that all American employees are safe and protected where they work In particular, I believe that we need to consider the effects of ergonomic hazards in order to quickly and effectively address musculoskeletal disorders in the workplace. I know that this is a problem for nurses, who often suffer from back-related injuries as a result of having to move and lift patients.

Q. Merger and acquisition activity continues to consolidate the U.S. healthcare system into the hands of a few corporations, many of which are for-profit. What would you do to ensure competition in the healthcare industry is fair and protects the American consumer?

HRC: The federal government plays a critical role in evaluating and enforcing health care mergers to ensure that they do not stymie competition, burdening consumers with fewer choices and higher prices. Anti-competitive and costly market consolidation in health care or other markets should not be permitted. While the Affordable Care Act created incentives for providers to better coordinate care and pass those savings onto consumers, we need to make sure that acquisitions and integration of health care stakeholders will ultimately lower cost growth and increase quality of care. To that end, in addition to providing necessary guidance to health care providers about appropriate and beneficial ways to better integrate their services, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) should be funded and directed to be ever-vigilant in halting anti-competitive health care arrangements through robust enforcement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. What would you do to ensure that communities have access to public health services?

HRC: I believe we must take full advantage of the movement from volume to value purchasing of health care to encourage much more of a focus on the value of prevention and the imperative of population health. My record shows my dedication to this issue. As Senator, I led a bipartisan coalition to fight for legislation to combat childhood obesity, helped pass legislation to provide extra funding for flu vaccine and proposed legislation that would raise public awareness and speed up production of the vaccine, and proposed legislation to combat diabetes, asthma and HIV/AIDS. As the chairperson of the Superfund and Environmental Health Subcommittee of the Environmental and Public Works Committee, I held the first-ever congressional hearing on environmental justice, bringing much-needed attention to the fact that certain environmental conditions cause health problems, which is often the case in low-income or underserved communities. Following the enactment of the Affordable Care Act, providers are being more appropriately rewarded on their success in ensuring wellness and good health and not on unnecessary, wasteful, expensive and, all-too-frequently, dangerous health care interventions. By focusing on prevention and the necessity of population health, we have a real opportunity to finally make long-overdue inroads in the public's health.

AFT: An administration's economic policy has far-reaching implications for the United States and the world. It also says a great deal about a president's priorities and general philosophy about the federal government's responsibility to its citizens.

Q. What are your priorities for revitalizing the economy, strengthening the middle class, creating jobs and ensuring fair taxation? How would your plan help restore funding for education, healthcare, transportation, public safety and many other services provided to our citizens?

HRC: I want to make being middle-class mean something again. I'm going to take on four big fights in this campaign: (1) building an economy for tomorrow, instead of yesterday; (2) strengthening our families and communities; (3) fixing our broken political system; (4) protecting our country from threats.

I will lay out a number of new ideas over the course of the campaign, including helping small businesses create jobs, making college more affordable, raising workers' wages and reducing cost pressures on families, balancing work and family, helping workers get the skills they need to get ahead in a changing economy, and making sure all our kids have the chance to live up to their God-given potential.

Q. The United States has a $3.2 trillion infrastructure deficit according to the American Society of Civil Engineers — and that's just for repairs. What are the mechanisms (e.g., public, private, infrastructure bank) through which we can fund the rebuilding of this country, including the necessary renovation and modernization of our public schools, hospitals and public buildings?

HRC: Ordinary Americans can't afford failing to invest in our infrastructure. If we don't repair our roads and bridges, and upgrade our infrastructure for the 21st Century, it's harder for Americans to get to work, and for our businesses to grow and compete. It's time for us to invest in America. That means Congress must make the investments we need in our roads and highways and that means leveraging investment by the private sector as well. I will be laying out my own proposals on how to leverage both public and private sources of funding and creative financing mechanisms to address America's infrastructure needs.

Q. What would your administration do to build and strengthen retirement security for all working men and women, including protecting employees' pensions? What is your plan for sustaining and strengthening Social Security and Medicare?

HRC: Let me start by saying I've fought to defend Social Security for years, including when the Bush Administration tried to privatize it. We need to keep defending it from attacks and enhance it to meet new realities. I'm especially focused on the fact that we need to improve how Social Security works for women. I also want to enhance benefits for our most vulnerable seniors. We need to reject years of Republican myth-making that claims we cannot afford it and that the only solution must therefore be to cut benefits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I will continue to oppose Republican efforts that seek to privatize or gut Medicare.

We need a broader strategy to help Americans with their retirement security. I will have ideas on that.

Q. What are your views on the privatization and contracting out of public services, including school services and state and local government services?

HRC: I do not believe that we should be contracting, outsourcing, or privatizing work that is inherently governmental in nature, including school services and state and local government services. In the Senate, I helped secure a measure that became law that blocked the Bush administration from downsizing the Federal Protective Service. I co-sponsored legislation to protect city and rural letter carriers from having their work contracted out by the U.S. Postal Service to private firms and individuals. Lastly, I was an original co-sponsor of the Honest Leadership and Accountability in Contracting Act.

AFT: Labor unions give workers a collective voice in the workplace and are integral to the social and economic health of our country. AFT members are interested in knowing your views on the role of labor unions.

Q. Current federal laws and policies encourage and promote collective bargaining through the National Labor Relations Act. What are your views on collective bargaining for the private and public sectors? What is your view regarding agency fee and so-called right-to-work laws?

HRC: The right to organize is one of our most fundamental human rights. I believe that unions are critical to a strong American middle class. Throughout my career, I have stood with all workers as they exercise their right to organize and bargain collectively and was an original co-sponsor of the Employee Free Choice Act. I'm talking to a lot of labor leaders and labor economists about what the next president can do to support 21st century organizing and collective bargaining.

Q. As president, what would you do to: (a) prevent employers from intimidating and harassing workers who support union representation, (b) ensure that workers are free to organize and bargain in the workplace, and (c) protect the rights of American workers?

HRC: Throughout my career, I have stood with all workers as they exercise their right to organize and bargain collectively and am an original co-sponsor of the Employee Free Choice Act. I actively opposed anti-collective bargaining provisions contained in the Department of Defense's proposed National Security Personnel System and have voted in favor of collective bargaining rights for TSA screeners. It is also vital that we modernize basic labor standards. Worker protections and basic labor standards have failed to keep pace with changes over the past half century. We need to raise wages and reduce poverty among working families, including raising the minimum wage, eradicating wage theft, promoting collective bargaining, updating overtime protections, ensuring that employers do not misclassify, true employees as "independent contractors" to skirt their obligations, and leveling the playing field for women and people of color.

Q. The federal government has direct responsibility for setting labor standards. There has been a growing call for changes to those standards, including paid sick days, paid family leave and higher minimum wages. What changes, if any, would you prioritize?

HRC: Experience shows that policies that are good for middle-class families are good for everyone — including businesses. These policies are pro-growth, and pro-family, and that's a pretty good twofer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is long past time for the U.S. to join every other nation in the developed world in having paid leave, which is critical to ensuring that workers do not have to choose between caring for their family and keeping a job. I'm not under any illusions that this will be easy. We had to fight for years to pass the unpaid Family and Medical Leave Act, and the day my husband signed that law was a day I'll never forget. I look forward to talking about how we move forward on this.

I have fought to raise the minimum wage for many years, and I strongly support the fast food workers and others who are out there asking for a living wage and a fair shot at success. A higher minimum wage doesn't just help those at the bottom of the pay scale, it has a ripple effect across the economy and helps millions of American workers and middle class families. As we work to raise the federal minimum wage, we should also support state and local efforts to go above the federal floor where it makes sense to do so.

Q. More than 8 million public employees in 25 states currently have no OSHA protection or entitlement to a safe and healthful workplace. Do you support universal OSHA coverage for all public employees?

HRC: I believe it is important that American employees are safe and protected where they work. In the decades since OSHA has been enacted, we've made great strides in strengthening the safety of work environments for our workers. But there are improvements that need to be made. In particular, too few workers are protected by OSHA. That's why in the Senate I was an original co-sponsor of the Protecting America's Workers Act, which would extend OSHA protections to all federal, state, and local public employees.

AFT: The AFT and our members are champions of fairness; democracy; economic opportunity; and high-quality public education, healthcare and public services for our students, their families and our communities. We are committed to advancing these principles through community engagement. Our members are interested in knowing your views on the following important community issues:

Q. What policies would your administration pursue to ensure that all people— regardless of who they are, where they live or where they come from — are able to climb the ladder of opportunity and participate fully in our economy and democracy?

HRC: Today, there are nearly 6 million young people in America who are out of school and out of work. The unemployment rate for this rising generation is double what it is for the rest of the population. It wasn't like that in 2000. Young people were getting jobs, they were climbing the ladder of opportunity. Millions more of our young people are underemployed because the jobs that are available just aren't sufficient. They don't offer the kind of income and growth potential that should be more broadly accessible. For young people of color things are even harder. And if you don't have a college degree or didn't graduate from high school, most doors just aren't open, no matter how hard you knock.

That is why education at all levels — from birth through higher education — is so important to helping all people climb that ladder of opportunity. I have worked hard throughout my career to make sure that every child gets a chance to develop his or her mental capacity by developing their brain from the very earliest age, because if your vocabulary is so far behind by the time you're five years old, through no fault of your own but because the adults in your life are so busy, so stressed or don't know how you build brain cells, by talking and singing and reading to babies, then you enter kindergarten having heard 30 million less words than a child from one of our families. And that's very hard to overcome. It's not that when you're 18 you're not trying, it's when you're five you were already left behind.

Q. In your opinion, what are the elements of comprehensive immigration reform? How would your administration's stance on immigration reform fight back against inequality, promote economic justice and increase wages for all workers?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HRC: I support comprehensive immigration reform (CIR) and a path to citizenship not just because it's the right thing to do, but because it strengthens families, strengthens our economy, and strengthens our country. I was a strong supporter of CIR as a Senator, co-sponsoring Senator Ted Kennedy's 2004 bill and supporting the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act in 2006 and 2007. In 2003, 2005 and 2007, I co-sponsored the Dream Act in the Senate. I also support President Obama's DACA/DAPA executive actions. And if Congress continues to refuse to act, as President I would do everything possible under the law to go even further.

Q. What are your views on campaign finance reform? Do you support a constitutional amendment overturning the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision?

HRC: We have to reduce the influence of big money in politics. As I said recently, I support a constitutional amendment to get unaccountable money out of politics.

Q. What would your administration do to ensure that voting in elections is free, fair and available to all Americans? Do you oppose policies that restrict access to voting and voter registration?

HRC: As I said recently, the assault on voting rights threatens to block millions of Americans from fully participating in our democracy. We need to fix the holes opened up by the Supreme Court's ruling. Congress should pass legislation to replace those portions of the act that the Court struck down, and as President I would work to ensure that all citizens have the information and access they need to fully participate in our democracy.

Conclusion

Q. What do you think this nation's priorities should be during the next decade? How would your presidency advance those priorities?

HRC: I am committed to being a champion for everyday Americans and American families. That's what I've been devoted to my entire adult life, starting with my first job out of law school when I went to work for the Children's Defense Fund, all the way through to the work that I did as Secretary of State promoting women's rights, promoting the rights of people who would otherwise be marginalized or left on the sidelines. And I know that although we have begun to move forward again, it is still hard to imagine exactly how we're going to get to the point where people are not just getting by but getting ahead again and staying ahead. Because the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top.

We have to be focused on how we're going to bring about the changes that will ignite opportunity for everybody willing to work hard for it again. We have to build an economy that's innovative, sustainable, and producing good jobs with rising wages. We need to actually reward workers with increases in their paychecks for the increases in productivity and profitability.

It's also imperative that we give people the tools through education and job training, so that they can make the most out of their own lives. And for me that starts at the very beginning. I have been a child advocate and a child development proponent for my entire adult life, because it's what I really care about and believe in. Then we have to make sure that we are doing all we can to empower our educators, to make sure that they have the support of parents so that they can do the job they have been trained to do to help prepare our kids. And then we've got to make sure that college is affordable.

One of the biggest stresses in anybody's life is healthcare. I'm going to support and defend the Affordable Care Act, and I will work to fix those parts of it that need fixing. But, we have made a great step forward as a nation to provide a mechanism for people to get access to healthcare, some for the first time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We also have to address the unaccountable dark money in politics. I think the Supreme Court made a grave error with its Citizens United decision. And I will do everything I can do to appoint Supreme Court Justices who will protect the right to vote and not the right of billionaires to buy elections.

Finally, we have challenges around the world. But we have to be confident and strong in understanding that there are many ways to approach the problems that America will be confronting in the world, and we must do so in cooperation with our friends, our allies, our fellow democracies around the world. I am convinced that the 21st century can once again be a century in which the United States leads and helps to set the values and standards.

—

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont

Today, almost 50 million students attend our nation's public schools. Along with their parents, communities, teachers, paraprofessionals and other school employees, these students have been forced to live under test-and-punish policies that include sanctions and school closings, high-stakes assessments, and federalized teacher evaluations that are counterproductive and have taken the joy out of teaching and learning.

Q. What is your view of the current version of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (also known as the No Child Left Behind Act)? What changes, if any, would you make to the law, and why? Please include positions on:

• The federal government's role in ensuring equity and access to resources for all children;

• The role of standards, assessments and accountability in public education;

• Ensuring that all students have access to a broad curriculum that includes art and music,

as well as science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM);

• Professional development for school staff; and

• Community schools.

BS: I voted against No Child Left Behind in 2001, and continue to oppose the bill's reliance on high-stakes standardized testing to direct draconian interventions. In my view, No Child Left Behind ignores several important factors in a student's academic performance, specifically the impact of poverty, access to adequate health care, mental health, nutrition, and a wide variety of supports that children in poverty should have access to. By placing so much emphasis on standardized testing, No Child Left Behind ignores many of the skills and qualities that are vitally important in our 21st century economy, like problem solving, critical thinking, and teamwork, in favor of test preparation that provides no benefit to students after they leave school.In my home state of Vermont, almost every school is identified as "failing" under the requirements of No Child Left Behind, despite the fact that we have one of the highest graduation rates in the country, and students from Vermont continually score among the highest in the country on annual NAEP assessments.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, I have worked to reform No Child Left Behind. My top priorities during the most recent iteration of the bill have been:

• Reducing the high-stakes nature of standardized tests by basing accountability on multiple measures of a school's effectiveness.

• Including a pilot program that allows states to implement innovative systems of assessment that do not rely on standardized tests. Instead, new innovative assessments will empower educators by providing actionable information during the school year that can inform instructional practice.

• Maintaining federal support for afterschool programs provided through the 21st Century Community Learning Centers Program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• The inclusion of wrap-around support services like health, mental health, nutrition and family supports.

I believe guaranteeing resource equity is a core tenet of the federal government's role in education policy, and if elected, I will work reduce the resource disparities that currently exist between schools in wealthy and low-income areas.

In addition, I strongly support increased emphasis on a well-rounded curriculum. No Child Left Behind's narrow focus on math and literacy has deprived children, especially low-income children, from critical opportunities in the arts, music, physical education, civics and STEM fields.

I also believe that not enough emphasis has been placed on effective professional development for educators and school leaders. Districts and schools must provide more time and support for educators to pursue highly effective professional development. We should be encouraging innovation in professional development, and ensuring that teachers will be able to incorporate professional development into their classroom practice. Finally, we must provide the resources necessary to provide effective professional development for all teachers, and have consistently supported efforts to increase Title II funding.

Q: Do you support any of the current reauthorization proposals under consideration in the 114thCongress?

BS: I believe the Alexander-Murray compromise on No Child Left Behind reauthorization represents a step in the right direction, and voted for the bill in Committee. While this legislation could go much further to provide adequate resources to our lowest-income students, I believe it is an important step forward. I strongly oppose the Student Success Act because it would gut the core provisions of federal law that direct education funding toward the low-income students who need it most.

Q: What role do you think the federal government can play in providing access to early childhood education? What specific policy proposals would your administration pursue?

BS: Every child in the United States should have access to high quality early childhood education programs, and that the federal government has a critical role to play. If elected, I would pursue a federal program to guarantee access for every child, and ensure early-childhood educators receive compensation that is commensurate with elementary school teachers.

Q: What are your views on private school vouchers, tuition tax credits, and charter school accountability and transparency?

BS: I am strongly opposed to any voucher system that would re-direct public education dollars to private schools, including through the use of tax credits. In addition, I believe charter schools should be held to the same standards of transparency as public schools, and that these standards should also apply to the non-profit and for-profit entities that organize charter schools.

Q: Escalating tuition and fees are leading to a growing number of students leaving college with overwhelming debt from student loans. This burden of rising costs and rising debt makes access to higher education increasingly difficult for many students and their families. What is the role of the federal government in ensuring that higher education is affordable and accessible?

BS: Skyrocketing college tuition has left college out of reach for hundreds of thousands of students, and left millions more deeply in debt. In an increasingly global economy, I believe it is unfair and bad economic policy to force our young people to compete with workers from other countries who can pursue a higher education at little or no cost. This is why I introduced the College for All Act which would create a federal-state partnership to eliminate undergraduate tuition at public colleges and universities. In addition, this legislation would slash student loan interest rates, and allow borrowers to refinance their loans. If elected, I would continue my work to eliminate tuition at public colleges and to alleviate the burden of student debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: There has been a nationwide pattern of disinvestment in public higher education such that per-student funding dropped 26.1 percent between 1990 and 2010. What would your administration do to remedy this?

BS: State disinvestment has unquestionably been a prime driver of skyrocketing tuition costs. I strongly support the creation of a federal-state partnership that will incentivize states to re-invest in their public higher education systems.

Q: Career and technical education programs help ensure that postsecondary credentials and skills are accessible to all — a necessity in today's economy. In your view, what is the role of the federal government in supporting high-quality CTE programs?

BS: Career and Technical Education programs are vital pathways to middle-class, family-supporting jobs. I believe it is in our national and economic interest to ensure quality CTE programs are available to every American, and effectively aligned with the needs of the 21st century workforce. Accordingly, I strongly support fully-funding the Perkins CTE program. In addition, if elected, I would work to revolutionize our nation's approach to workforce development and technical education to build effective, attainable pathways for young people to pursue middle-class careers.

Q: What is the federal government's role in requiring appropriate transparency and accountability of for-profit institutions?

BS: In my view, for-profit colleges and career programs have perpetrated a massive fraud at the expense of American taxpayers, and hundreds of thousands of students who are now saddled with worthless degrees and massive amounts of student debt. As the gatekeeper to financial aid programs, the federal government must be far more vigilant, and do a much more effective job in protecting students and taxpayers from low-quality and fraudulent programs. I support efforts to implement gainful employment regulations, and regulations requiring that no institution receives more than 85% of its revenue from federal sources. In addition, I support efforts to increase transparency in the sector, so students and policymakers have a clearer understanding of institutions' activities and quality.

Q: What are your views of the Affordable Care Act? What changes would you make, if any, to the ACA, including the excise tax on high-cost plans and the provisions on shared responsibility for employers?

BS: I start my approach to healthcare from a very basic point: healthcare should be a right and not a privilege. Our healthcare system is broken, and the Affordable Care Act was an important first step. It has done a lot of good things that have improved the health and economic security of millions of Americans, including closing the prescription drug "donut hole" for seniors, allowing young adults to stay on their parents' health insurance plans, and preventing insurance companies from discriminating based on pre-existing conditions. But the ACA was not perfect, and there are some improvements we can make. Although millions more Americans have insurance now, the ACA will still leave some 30 million Americans without health coverage. Families will still face plans that have high deductibles and copays, or do not cover the medications or doctors they need.

Beyond those larger improvements, any specific changes to the ACA must be done thoughtfully and with a few key principles in mind — namely, the impact any changes will have on the rest of the healthcare system. Changes to the employer shared responsibility provision should not be done in a way that leads to higher premiums for employees or reduced revenues for the government. As for the excise tax on high-cost health plans, it is important to preserve the savings Congress intended from that provision, but I want to be certain that workers who have traded lower wages for better benefits over the years are not penalized.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: Do you support initiatives designed to move health insurance coverage away from an employer-based model? If so, what would you propose as an alternative to the current system for covering working adults?

BS: As I said above, the Affordable Care Act was a good first step towards fixing our broken healthcare system — but it also heavily relies on continuing the employer-based model of health coverage. There is no reason employers should be in the insurance business, unless they actually happen to run an insurance company! I believe the best strategy is to move to universal coverage under a Medicare-for-all single payer system. Your health coverage and your level of benefits should not depend on your employer.

Q: Many licensed healthcare professionals, particularly RNs, are leaving hospital service because of difficult working conditions, including excessive and unsafe workloads, understaffing and mandatory overtime. What would you do to address these problems and to improve recruitment and retention of nurses and other healthcare professionals?

BS: I believe that health care is a right, not a privilege and every American should have access to the health care services they need, regardless of their income. I also believe improved access to primary care will keep people healthier and reduce reliance on emergency rooms as a first site of care. These changes in our health care system will improve the lives of patients but also of health care providers, including RNs working in hospitals, who are often the ones who bear the brunt of our flawed system. Until these types of changes can be made, we need to protect this critical workforce by ensuring they have the equipment and resources they need to provide world class health care without risking personal injury. I have long supported programs and policies, including the National Health Service Corps, designed to encourage caring and dedicated individuals to go into the health care field and serve in areas of greatest need.

Q: Merger and acquisition activity continues to consolidate the U.S. healthcare system into the hands of a few corporations, many of which are for-profit. What would you do to ensure competition in the healthcare industry is fair and protects the American consumer?

BS: Consolidation and concentration of power is occurring throughout every sector of our economy and it must stop. We must not allow a few companies and a few families to control every industry in this country. This is a problem in the health care industry where only a select number companies control the system and focus more on their shareholders' profits than the health of their customers. For example, prescription medications in this country are not only made by a limited number of companies but are distributed by only a few companies with the ability to set prices however they want and can limit the supply however they choose. America desperately needs a reinvigorated anti-trust system aimed at dismantling the growing concentration in many sectors of our economy.

Q: What would you do to ensure that communities have access to public health services?

BS: Access to public health services has been a substantial focus of my time in Congress. As Chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the Senate I worked tirelessly to make sure that every eligible veteran in this country had access to high-quality, timely care through the VA. And as Chairman of the Health Education Labor and Pension's subcommittee on Primary Health and Aging I led the efforts to reauthorize the Older Americans Act, which helps guarantee access to critical health programs for seniors throughout the country and fought hard to extend funding for three key public service programs: Federally Qualified Health Centers, Teaching Health Center Graduate Medical Education, and the National Health Service Corps. I am a huge supporter of community health centers as I believe they help all Americans, regardless of income, access the preventive care that keeps them healthy and well. I would like to expand these centers, making sure even more Americans can benefit. I have also fought hard to include dental care in more public health programs so more Americans aren't forced to ignore dangerous, even life-threatening oral health problems because they don't have coverage.

Q: What are your priorities for revitalizing the economy, strengthening the middle class, creating jobs and ensuring fair taxation? How would your plan help restore funding for education, healthcare, transportation, public safety and many other services provided to our citizens?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BS: Creating Millions of jobs. If we are truly serious about reversing the decline of the middle class and putting millions of people back to work, we need a major federal jobs program. The most effective way to do that is to rebuild our crumbling infrastructure. That's why I've introduced legislation which would invest $1 trillion over 5 years to modernize our country's physical infrastructure. My bill would create and maintain at least 13 million good-paying jobs, while making our country more productive, efficient and safe.

Raising Wages and Benefits. The current federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour is a starvation wage. The minimum wage must become a living wage — which means raising it to $15 an hour over the next few years. My goal is to ensure that no full-time worker lives in poverty. We must also bring about pay equity. It's unconscionable for women to earn 78 cents on the dollar compared to men who perform the same work. Overtime protections must be strengthened for millions of workers. It is absurd that "supervisors" earning $25,000 a year — and who may in fact supervise no one — are currently forced to work 50 or 60 hours a week with no overtime pay. We also need paid sick leave and vacation time for all.

Progressive Taxation. In order to reverse the massive transfer of wealth and income from the middle class to the very rich we've seen in recent years, we need real tax reform which makes wealthy individuals and profitable corporations begin to pay their fair share of taxes. It is fiscally irresponsible for the U.S. Treasury to lose about $100 billion a year because corporations and the rich stash their profits in the Cayman Islands, Bermuda and other tax havens. I have introduced legislation which would end this legalized tax fraud.

College for All. The United States must join Germany and many other countries in understanding that investing in our young people's education is investing in the future of our nation. I have introduced legislation to make tuition in public colleges and universities free, as well as substantially lower interest rates on student loans.

Tax on Wall Street Speculation. At a time of massive income and wealth inequality, at a time when trillions of dollars in wealth have left the pockets of the middle class and have gone to the top one-tenth of one percent, at a time when the wealthiest people in this country have made huge amounts of money from risky derivative transactions and the soaring value of the stock market, I would impose a speculation fee on Wall Street investment houses and hedge funds.

Medicare for All. The United States remains the only major country on earth that does not guarantee health care for all as a right. Despite the modest gains of the Affordable Care Act, 35 million Americans continue to lack health insurance and many more are under-insured. Yet, we continue paying far more per capita for health care than any other nation. The United States must move toward a Medicare-for-All single-payer system.

Q: The United States has a $3.2 trillion infrastructure deficit according to the American Society of Civil Engineers — and that's just for repairs. What are the mechanisms (e.g., public, private, infrastructure bank) through which we can fund the rebuilding of this country, including the necessary renovation and modernization of our public schools, hospitals and public buildings?

BS:. For years, we have significantly underfunded the maintenance and improvement of the physical infrastructure on which our economy depends. That has to change, and that is why I have introduced the Rebuild America Act, which would invest $1 trillion over five years to modernize our infrastructure. I introduced a similar, but scaled down $476 billion measure as a floor amendment to the Senate Budget Resolution. Both efforts would be paid for by closing tax loopholes that allow profitable American corporations to stash their profits in tax haven countries like the Cayman Islands.

The Rebuild America would go a long way toward closing the national infrastructure deficit identified by the American Society of Civil Engineers. In fact, I worked closely with ASCE in drafting the Rebuild America, and I am proud they endorsed the bill and participated in its rollout.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Rebuild America Act would invest in roads, bridges and transit; intercity passenger and freight rail; airports; seaports and inland waterways; drinking water and waste water plants; dams and levees; electric transmission and distribution; and broadband.

Importantly, at a time when the real unemployment is more than 11%, the Rebuild America Act would create 13 million jobs that can't be outsources or off-shored.

In terms of 21′ century infrastructure technology, the Rebuild America Act would make a $25 billion investment in broadband technology over five years. There is no question this investment is needed: the U.S. ranks 16th in the world in terms of broadband access (OECD) and 12th in the world for broadband speed (Akamai). It simply isn't acceptable that businesses, schools and families in Bucharest, Romania have access to much faster internet than most of the United States.

Q: What would your administration do to build and strengthen retirement security for all working men and women, including protecting employees' pensions? What is your plan for sustaining and strengthening Social Security and Medicare?

BS: Expand Social Security. Today, we have a retirement crisis in this country. Only one in five American workers have a defined benefit pension plan that guarantees income in retirement. Over half of the American people have less than $10,000 in savings and have no idea how they will ever be able to retire in dignity. More than one-third of senior citizens depend on Social Security for virtually all of their income. And, twenty percent of the elderly are trying to live on an average income of just $7,600 a year.

Given this reality, our job is not to cut Social Security, our job is to expand Social Security.

In the Senate, I have proposed legislation to increase Social Security benefits by an average of $65 a month; expand cost-of-living-adjustments so that seniors can afford the increased prices of prescription drugs and other healthcare expenses; and lift millions of seniors out of poverty by expanding the minimum Social Security benefits that seniors receive in retirement.

This legislation would be paid for by eliminating the cap on taxable income subject to the Social Security payroll tax. Right now, a Wall Street CEO making $20 million a year pays the same amount of money into the Social Security system as someone making $118,500. That is unfair. My legislation would change that.

If we scrapped the cap, and applied the Social Security payroll tax on all income above $250,000, not only would we be able to expand benefits, we would also ensure that Social Security can pay every benefit owed to every eligible American for the next 50 years.

Stop Pension Cuts. I would reverse the provision included in last year's appropriations bill that allows the pensions of millions of workers and retirees in multi-employer pension plans to be slashed.

Expand Unions. The most important thing we can do to both preserve and expand defined benefit pension plans is to make it easier for workers to join unions. One of the most significant reasons for the decline in defined benefit pension plans is that the rights of workers to join together and bargain for better wages, benefits, and working conditions have been severely undermined.

Today, corporate executives are routinely negotiating obscenely high compensation packages for themselves, but then they deny their own employees the ability to bargain for a better life. That is wrong. We have got to turn this around.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's why I support allowing workers to join unions when a majority sign valid authorization cards stating that they want a union as their bargaining representative.

Today, about 68 percent of union workers have a guaranteed pension through a defined benefit plan; while less than 14 percent of nonunion workers do. Expanding union membership in this country would be the best way to protect and expand defined benefit pensions.

Q: What are your views on the privatization and contracting out of public services, including school services and state and local government services?

BS: I am strongly opposed to the outsourcing and privatization of public services. The reality is that many private contractors provide jobs with low pay and no benefits with little or no training. It is not a surprise that initially these private contractors out-bid their government competitors because the federal government provides better pay, health care, pension benefits and quality training to their employees. But, in the long-term, in most instances, privatization leads to poor service, high turnover, and an overall increase in taxpayer dollars.

For example, on the state government level, the State of New Jersey thought they were going to save taxpayer dollars by privatizing their vehicle inspection program. What happened? According to a 2002 report, this program turned into a "mammoth boondoggle" that ended up costing taxpayers $247 million more than it would have cost if it were run by the state.

As President, I would do everything I could to reverse the privatization of public services and support the creation of more good-paying public sector jobs.

Q: Current federal laws and policies encourage and promote collective bargaining through the National Labor Relations Act. What are your views on collective bargaining for the private and public sectors? What is your view regarding agency fee and so-called right-to-work laws?

BS: I am strongly supportive of collective bargaining for private and public sector workers. I am strongly opposed to agency fee and right-to-work laws.

I will fight to make sure that workers are allowed to join unions when a majority sign valid authorization cards stating that they want a union as their bargaining representative. This is not a radical idea. Card check recognition was the law of the land from 1941-1966.

Today, we have more wealth and income inequality in our country than at any time since 1928. There are lots of reasons for this.

The failure to raise the minimum wage is an obvious example. Unfettered free trade that forces American workers to compete against desperate workers in China, Mexico, and Vietnam is another.

But perhaps one of the most significant reasons for the decline in the middle class is that the rights of workers to join together and bargain collectively for better wages, benefits, and working conditions have been severely undermined. That will change under my Administration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: As president, what would you do to: (a) prevent employers from intimidating and harassing workers who support union representation, (b) ensure that workers are free to organize and bargain in the workplace, and (c) protect the rights of American workers?

BS: I would strongly penalize employers that illegally fire or discriminate against workers for their union activity during an organizing or first contract drive.

Perhaps most importantly, we have got to make it easier for workers who win union elections to negotiate a first contract.

We also need to address the overtime scandal in this country in which millions of Americans are working 50 or 60 hours a week but fail to get time-and-a-half for their efforts. Four decades ago, more than 65 percent of the workforce qualified for time-and-a-half pay for every hour worked over 40 hours a week. Today, that figure is down to just 11 percent. The threshold for overtime pay is now so low that it fails to cover middle class employees. Only workers who earn $23,660 a year currently qualify for overtime, which is below the poverty line for a family of four.

I would make sure that all workers who make up to $1,090 a week are allowed to receive time-and-a-half pay for working overtime. This would increase the take-home pay of millions of workers who are now making less than $57,000 a year.

Further, we need pay equity in this country so that women do not make 78 cents on the dollar compared to what a man makes for doing the same work. I am a proud co-sponsor of the Paycheck Fairness Act that would close the pay gap by empowering women to negotiate for equal pay, eliminate loopholes courts have created in the law, and create strong incentives for employers to obey the laws.

Q: The federal government has direct responsibility for setting labor standards. There has been a growing call for changes to those standards, including paid sick days, paid family leave and higher minimum wages. What changes, if any, would you prioritize?

BS: I would raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour over a period of years and index it to inflation. I would fight for paid sick leave, paid family leave, and paid sick days.

It is unacceptable that the out of 185 countries, the U.S. is one of only three that does not grant paid maternity leave.

It is unacceptable that the U.S. is one out of only 13 countries in the entire world that does not guarantee paid vacation.

That would change if I was elected President.

Q: More than 8 million public employees in 25 states currently have no OSHA protection or entitlement to a safe and healthful workplace. Do you support universal OSHA coverage for all public employees?

BS: Of course, I support universal OSHA coverage for all public employees. Every workers should have the right to a safe and healthy work environment. It is a disgrace that millions of public sector employees do not have these fundamental rights in 25 states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: What policies would your administration pursue to ensure that all people — regardless of who they are, where they live or where they come from — are able to climb the ladder of opportunity and participate fully in our economy and democracy?

BS: We need to make a 4-year education at every public college and university in this country free. If Germany, Sweden and Denmark can afford to do this, then so can we.

We need to make health care a basic right in our society, and we need to move beyond the rhetoric about growth and prosperity and recommit to the principles of the Full Employment Act of 1946.

If we are going to rely on an economy that requires people to work in order to survive, then we must make certain that work is available to every American who needs a job. By guaranteeing the right to employment, we can ensure a minimum level of economic security to all.

This is an ambitious program that would lift millions of families out of poverty and provide a pathway to greater economic security for all Americans. Free college, free health care and a guaranteed right to employment. It will not heal all wounds or relieve all tensions, but it would go beyond anything we have tried before, and it would send a clear signal that the lives of all Americans matter.

Q: In your opinion, what are the elements of comprehensive immigration reform? How would your administration's stance on immigration reform fight back against inequality, promote economic justice and increase wages for all workers?

BS: Our immigration system is broken, and it is long past time to fit it. Comprehensive immigration reform must begin with implementing a responsible path to citizenship for the more than 11 million undocumented immigrants living in the U.S. They should be given the opportunity to come out of the shadows, have the full protection of the law — including workplace safety and wage and hours protections — pay into Social Security and Medicare, and contribute to the American economy.

Comprehensive immigration must hold unscrupulous employers accountable that exploit immigrant workers. Immigration reform must not be structured such that an employer has the effective power to have a person's legal status revoked. This has the potential to lead to too many abuses.

At a time when the real unemployment rate exceeds 11%, it makes little sense to increase temporary work visas in high skill fields like science, technology, engineering and math. More often than not, these visas are used to lower wages and cover the fact that we are doing too little to education and retrain workers — both native born and immigrant alike — who already here.

We must pass the DREAM Act. If young people who were brought to the U.S. as children are willing serve in our armed forces, earn a U.S. high school diploma or attend college, and if they do not have a criminal record, I believe they should be eligible for permanent residency.

Instead of demonizing unaccompanied minors from Central America, we must make sure these children are humanely cared for while in U.S. custody. And, we must address the root causes of the crisis, including the fact that these children are fleeing economic despair, criminal violence, and false rumors of amnesty spread by the very people who profit by trafficking children.

We must provide adequate federal support for schools and communities that have large immigrant populations, by significantly increasing funding for Title III language instruction for limited English proficient and immigrant students. And we must reward and support communities that have agreed to resettle refugees, by significantly increasing funding for the HHS' Office of Refugee Resettlement grant programs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Comprehensive immigration reform will be very complex, and yes, it will have to address border security. But my top priorities will be focusing on reducing income inequality by increasing wages and legal protections for all workers.

Q: What are your views on campaign finance reform? Do you support a constitutional amendment overturning the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision?

BS: In my view, Citizens United is one of the worst decisions in Supreme Court history, and I have introduced a constitutional amendment to overturn it. We need to fix our broken campaign finance system by placing limits on contributions and expenditures, requiring more stringent disclosure, and eventually instituting a system of public financing. We cannot allow billionaires and millionaires to buy our elections.

Q: What would your administration do to ensure that voting in elections is free, fair and available to all Americans? Do you oppose policies that restrict access to voting and voter registration?

BS: We must be doing everything we can to make it easier, not harder, for people to vote. Instead, what is happening now is that Republican governors and Republican legislators are going out of their way to put up barriers to voting. They are using unfounded scare tactics and unproven cases of voter fraud to keep people from the polls. Over two years ago, I asked the nonpartisan Government Accountability Office (GAO) to look into voter fraud and the effects of voter ID laws. The GAO found that while there were very few, if any, cases of voter fraud, the ID laws were working to suppress legitimate voters. Meanwhile, the Supreme Court turned back the clock on equality when it struck down part of the Voting Rights Act, a landmark civil rights law. But the Court also challenged Congress to act, and even though this law was reauthorized unanimously only nine years ago, we still have not managed to fix this incredibly important law.

Last March, I, with many others, traveled to Selma to mark the 50th anniversary of the historic march that lead to the Voting Rights Act. Those incredibly brave men and women literally put their lives on the line and stood up for what they believed in, that all Americans, regardless of color, should have the right to vote. We must honor their legacy and continue their fight.

I have introduced legislation to make Election Day a national holiday. Although this is not a cure-all, it is a first step to show that participating in elections is an important part of Americans society. At a time when less than 40 percent of eligible voters turned out to the polls in November 2014, we must do everything we can to emphasize the importance of participating in democracy.

Conclusion

Q: What do you think this nation's priorities should be during the next decade? How would your presidency advance those priorities?

BS: 1. Reversing Income and Wealth Inequality

The great moral, economic and political issue of our time is the growing level of income and wealth inequality in our nation. It goes against everything this country is supposed to stand for when the top one-tenth of 1 percent owns almost as much wealth as the bottom 90 percent, and when 95 percent of all new income generated since the Wall Street crash goes to the top 1 percent. Addressing income and wealth inequality would be my top priority, and would include:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• Ending corporate tax loopholes that allow profitable corporations and the wealthy to stash their profits in the Cayman Islands and other tax havens.

• Demanding that the wealthy and special interests begin paying their fair share of taxes. It is a disgrace that the top 25 hedge managers last year not only made more than the nation's 158,000 kindergarten teachers combined, but also that they generally pay a lower effective tax rate than most of those teachers.

• Improving and investing in early childhood education as well as K-12, by hiring more teachers and giving them the resources they need to succeed.

• Addressing the crisis of college affordability by expanding Pell grants, allowing high school juniors and seniors to take college-level classes and earn credit, letting college graduates refinance their loans, capping student loan payments, and making community colleges free.

• Rejecting austerity policies that hurt the elderly, children, the poor and working families.

• Strengthening Social Security and Medicare: When the average Social Security benefit is $1,328 a month, and more than one-third of our senior citizens rely on Social Security for virtually all of their income, our job is to expand benefits, not cut them

• Raising the minimum wage to $15 to put more money into the pockets of workers in underpaid jobs and strengthen the economy.

• Creating 13 million new jobs by rebuilding our crumbling infrastructure (roads, bridges, water systems, wastewater plants, rail, airports, and schools), by investing $1 trillion over five years.

• Supporting working women and families by expanding affordable childcare and promoting pay equity.

• Developing a new policy on trade, rather than continue with the free trade agreements that have been unrelentingly bad for American workers and are a major reason why 60,000 American factories have closed and 4.7 million manufacturing jobs have disappeared since 2001.

These are some, but certainly not all of the components of a comprehensive approach to addressing income and wealth inequality.

2. Overturning Citizens United, campaign finance reform and reviving democracy

Another priority would be campaign finance reform. If we don't do this, we will have no hope at implementing any of the items I just listed above.

In particular, we must reverse two disastrous Supreme Court decisions that have opened the floodgates of almost unrestricted campaign spending: the 2010 Citizens United decision and the more recent McCutcheon decision. These decisions hinge on the absurd notion that giving large sums of money to a politician in exchange for influence and access does not constitute corruption.

These decisions undermine the democratic foundations of our country and have shifted political power to huge corporations and the wealthiest people in the United States. According to recent reports, the billionaire Koch brothers plan to spend $889 million in the 2016 elections, twice what their network spent in 2012, and nearly the amount spent by Obama and Romney. When one family can raise and spend as much as a major party candidate for president, the system is broken. That is oligarchy, not democracy.

We must overturn these Supreme Court decisions, to make it clear that the ability to make campaign contributions and expenditures – just like the right to vote – belongs only to real people. We must also move toward publicly funded elections.

I recently had the honor of joining Rep. John Lewis and other civil rights leaders on the 50th anniversary of the "Bloody Sunday" civil rights march in Selma. While that historic march led to the Voting Rights Act — which for decades protected voters from discrimination — the Supreme Court two years ago invalidated a key portion of the landmark law. We must undo that misguided court decision. What happened on that bridge that day was a huge step forward for democracy in America. But what is happening right now — not just in the South but all over this country — are voter suppression efforts by Republican governors and Republican legislatures to make it harder for African-Americans, for low-income people and for senior citizens to vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lastly, we must do everything possible to make it easier for people to participate in the political process, including making Election Day a national holiday so that everyone has the time and opportunity to vote. While this would not be a cure-all, it would indicate a national commitment to create a more vibrant democracy.

In last November's election, turnout was only 37 percent, and turnout was even lower among minorities and young people. Voters 18- to 29-years-old made up only 13 percent of those who went to the polls, according to exit polls. The same survey found that only 8 percent of Tuesday's voters were Latinos, far less than the Latino share of the population.

3. Dealing with Climate Change

Climate change is perhaps the single greatest threat facing our planet. We are already seeing its effects, including more super storms, severe droughts, forest fires, flooding, and rising sea levels. Virtually the entire scientific community agrees that human activity is a significant driver of global warming, and that if we don't drastically reduce greenhouse gas emissions, it will get much worse by mid-century — including crop failures, increasing hunger and illness, and more extreme weather.

We need a bold vision to address climate change, and that begins with dramatically reducing our reliance on fossil fuels. That is why in last Congress, I introduced the Climate Protection Act, which would have taxed carbon and methane emissions from coal, oil, and natural gas production, and used the revenue to make historic investments in energy efficiency and sustainable energy. It would have also tripled funding for advanced energy research, and made huge investments in wind, solar, geothermal, biomass, plug-in electric vehicles and other clean technologies.

There are many other steps we must take right now to curb greenhouse gas emissions, including using existing authority under the Clean Air Act to significantly improve fuel economy standards for cars and trucks, and reducing harmful pollution from power plants and industrial facilities.

As we accelerate investments in energy efficiency and make the transition to clean energy, I believe we can create millions of decent paying jobs. I was one of the authors of the Green Jobs Act, which created a green jobs workforce training program through the economic stimulus bill. Moreover, the Climate Protection Act alone would weatherize one million homes every year, reducing family energy bills and creating millions of good-paying jobs. Replacing old power plants with new solar, wind and other sustainable energy facilities will also create hundreds of thousands of "green" jobs.

Unless we take bold action to reverse climate change, our children and grandchildren are going to look back on this period in history and ask: "Where were they? Why didn't they listen to the scientists when they had a chance? Why did they allow this planet to become so damaged?" We have a short window of opportunity. We must act now. ——

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley

AFT: Today, almost 50 million students attend our nation's public schools. Along with their parents, communities, teachers, paraprofessionals and other school employees, these students have been forced to live under test—and-punish policies that include sanctions and school closings, high-stakes assessments, and federalized teacher evaluations that are counterproductive and have taken the joy out of teaching and learning.

Q. What is your view of the current version of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (also known as the No Child Left Behind Act)? What changes, if any, would you make to the law, and why? Please include positions on:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• The federal government's role in ensuring equity and access to resources for all children;

• The role of standards, assessments and accountability in public education;

• Ensuring that all students have access to a broad curriculum that includes art and music,

as well as science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM);

• Professional development for school staff; and

• Community schools.

MO'M: I support the reauthorization of the ESEA. The Senate HELP Committee has preserved the integrity of the bill while avoiding the most extreme Republican amendment attempts. I urge the House to maintain that integrity and to reject any changes that would radically undermine our nation's public education system.

Though I support the reauthorization of ESEA, there are a number of areas where the law needs improvements — most notably, a requirement for turning around our lowest-performing schools. This legislation must acknowledge that equitable allocation of resources for our most vulnerable kids is not the same as equal allocation of resources. As a nation, we must commit to concentrating federal dollars where the need is greatest, including in the communities with the most underperforming schools and students. As our well-performing suburban schools find new and innovative ways to connect a child's learning experience with their real-world environment, our lower-income urban schools can't be left behind.

Our children, regardless of their circumstances, deserve a well-rounded education, including training in the arts, that will prepare them for the needs of the modern workforce and economy. During my time as Governor, we increased the number of students enrolled in STEM or related CTE programs by nearly 400%.

While the federal government plays an important role in education, that role does not include the determination of standards or curriculum in the classroom. However, in order to grow a strong workforce for tomorrow, we need an accurate way of evaluating how we're building students' potential today. I support performance-based assessments, which allow students the flexibility to show their learning in ways that meet their strengths and interests — and allow professional teachers to adjust in real-time so student achievement accelerates.

Test score data should not be used as a hammer at the end of a teacher's evaluation, it should be used from the start to begin an instructional improvement process. To shift test scores from a punitive measure into a supportive one, we must make additional investments in professional development for our teachers. We also need to offer adequate training for new initiatives, and engage the educator community in virtually all systemic decision-making in our schools. I'm all for modernizing and improving education for all kids, but we should be doing so in partnership with our educators, not at their expense.

Q. Do you support any of the current reauthorization proposals under consideration in the 114th Congress?

MO'M: I support the ESEA reauthorization currently on its way to the Senate floor, but would encourage the improvements noted above.

Q. What role do you think the federal government can play in providing access to early childhood education? What specific policy proposals would your administration pursue?

MO'M: The federal government plays a fundamental role providing access to early childhood education. This is one of the strengths of the current ESEA reauthorization. I support and applaud Senator Murray's amendment creating grants to help states boost quality and access in early learning. Further, I support using federal funds, in partnership with states, to make pre-K universal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. What are your views on private school vouchers, tuition tax credits, and charter school accountability and transparency?

MO'M: I support the strengthening of our public education system, not only as a way for all children to prepare themselves for economic success, but as a way to stronger neighborhoods, healthier communities, and a more engaged citizenry and informed electorate. I oppose vouchers for private schools, and the expanded use of tax credits to support private school tuition. I am concerned about the rapid proliferation of unaccountable charter schools. Providing excellent and innovative education should be the goal of charter schools — not expansion for the sake of profit. We need strong standards, oversight, and transparency to ensure that charters are acting in the best interest of our kids — and are serving the goals of our education system as a whole.

Q. Escalating tuition and fees are leading to a growing number of students leaving college with overwhelming debt from student loans. This burden of rising costs and rising debt makes access to higher education increasingly difficult for many students and their families. What is the role of the federal government in ensuring that higher education is affordable and accessible?

MO'M: The federal government plays an essential role in making higher education affordable and accessible. While states like Maryland have worked hard to hold the line on the cost of college tuition, we cannot make college truly affordable for families unless the federal government provides leadership. This is especially true when it comes to student debt: Congress helped create the student debt crisis by setting high, fixed interest rates on student loans. My administration would fight to win student borrowers the right to refinance their loans, and would make income- based repayment the default for all borrowers. The ultimate goal must be to make college debt-free for all students.

Q. There has been a nationwide pattern of disinvestment in public higher education such that per-student funding dropped 26.1 percent between 1990 and 2010. What would your administration do to remedy this?

MO'M: My administration would restore investments in higher education. First, I would provide additional aid to states to cover the cost of tuition at public and community college and universities, tied to states also investing more. Second, I would tie the receipt of federal aid to states and schools taking steps to reduce the underlying costs of college. This includes increasing AP and dual-enrollment courses, easing the transfer of credits from community colleges, expanding quality online learning, and making sure that aid is reaching the students who need it most.

Q. Career and technical education programs help ensure that postsecondary credentials and skills are accessible to all – necessary in today's economy. In your view, what is the role of the federal government in supporting high-quality CTE programs?

MO'M: As Governor, my administration increased the number of students enrolled in STEM or related CTE programs in Maryland by nearly 400%. However, while the federal government plays a critical role supporting these efforts, the taken modest steps we have taken as a country to expand STEM or related CTE education are far from sufficient.

My administration would launch a new, comprehensive national program for CTE, starting in high schools, and in partnership with community colleges and employers. This builds on successful efforts launched by the Obama Administration, where schools partner with employers — who also provide financial support — to train students and workers for the positions they need to fill now. Our program will require greater federal investment, but we will see far greater returns — in good jobs created and filled, and in reduced spending on higher education. CTE training is an equal alternative to a four-year college degree, and we must treat it as such.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. What is the federal government's role in requiring appropriate transparency and accountability of for-profit institutions?

MO'M: I support the Protections And Regulations For Our Students Act and its efforts to protect students from the predatory practices that are too prevalent in the for-profit college sector. The federal government should not only play a strong role in cracking down on such fraudulent behavior, it should proactively seek out these bad players and cancel the federal debt incurred by students who were sold a bad deal.

Q. What are your views of the Affordable Care Act? What changes would you make, if any, to the ACA, including the excise tax on high-cost plans and the provisions on shared responsibility for employers?

MO'M: I agree that a high quality healthcare system is a "moral imperative, an economic necessity, and a fundamental right for all." The Affordable Care Act is an important step in realizing that goal. My administration would build on the successes of the Affordable Care Act while being ready, as always, to support smart changes that can better provide high quality coverage and control costs. Our guiding principle would always be the triple aim: better patient experience, lower costs, and improved outcomes.

For example, to promote creative solutions to healthcare challenges around the country, I support flexibility for states to pursue innovations in health care delivery and payment with the potential for shared savings, such as through the State Innovation Model program at the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services. One underappreciated aspect of the Affordable Care Act is its support for innovative models of health care delivery in payment. In Maryland, we adopted a creative approach with our unique hospital rate setting commission: We obtained approval to put our hospitals on global budgets covering all payers, creating a strong incentive to reduce preventable admissions and keep patients and communities healthy.

Q. Do you support initiatives designed to move health insurance coverage away from an employer-based model? If so, what would you propose as an alternative to the current system for covering working adults?

MO'M: I support a public option, which should have been included in the Affordable Care Act.

Q. Many licensed healthcare professionals, particularly RNs, are leaving hospital service because of difficult working conditions, including excessive and unsafe workloads, understaffing, and mandatory overtime. What would you do to address these problems and to improve recruitment and retention of nurses and other healthcare professionals?

MO'M: Maryland has long prohibited mandatory overtime for nurses, with some exceptions, and I support such bans.

More broadly, my administration would make securing reforms to our nation's overtime rules a priority — including raising the overtime salary threshold to 1,000 a week, limiting exemptions, and enforcing the law. Wage law violations are unacceptable and far too prevalent in the healthcare industry. My administration would invest the resources necessary to hold all employers accountable for wage theft, overtime violations, and other failures to comply with labor laws.

My administration would also vocally support efforts to organize healthcare professionals, including in hospitals and among home healthcare workers. Expanding and protecting collective bargaining rights is a critical step to securing better working conditions in the healthcare industry. I applaud AFT's efforts to organize nurses and other healthcare professionals, winning these workers a greater role in shaping the U.S. healthcare system to better meet the needs of the people they serve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finally, my administration would proactively invest in our healthcare workforce. As we continue to transform our healthcare system and the settings and methods used to deliver care continue to evolve, it is critical that our healthcare workforce is trained and prepared for the transitions ahead. At the same time, the reforms we're making within the healthcare system will align to help improve working conditions for healthcare professionals. Offering greater rewards for prevention and fewer avoidable admissions, for example, can reduce the burnout that results from a system that historically rewarded volume rather than value.

Q. Merger and acquisition activity continues to consolidate the U.S. healthcare system into the hands of a few corporations, many of which are for-profit. What would you do to ensure competition in the healthcare industry is fair and protects the American consumer?

MO'M: My administration's strategy would be two-fold. First, I would continue to embrace proven strategies for coordinating care. In Maryland we not only put hospitals on global budgets, we established a statewide information system for patients that allows doctors and nurses to securely access patients' health data from every hospital across the state. Even before the ACA took full effect, we used this big data approach to providing smarter health care to reduce avoidable hospital admissions by 10% in a single year.

While this greater coordination is critical to providing more targeted and thus less costly care, I am concerned about consolidation that does not further these aims. Far too often, mergers and acquisitions within the health care industry are used not to achieve savings through reduced fragmentation, but to drive up prices for patients and consumers – at the cost of providing better care. That is why my administration would aggressively enforce our nation's antitrust laws, and why I will continue to champion the need to restore competition to the U.S. economy throughout my campaign.

Q. What would you do to ensure that communities have access to public health services?

MO'M: My administration would look to the innovative steps we took in Maryland to expand access to public health services. For instance, we used the statewide health information system described above to pinpoint clusters of patients and diagnose public health concerns. We then used this information to charge community-level care managers with improving wellness at a neighborhood-level. We did this most importantly through the Health Enterprise Zones we stood up to improve health care access and quality, and reduce health disparities, in underserved communities. We also encouraged the development of more comprehensive women's health centers, to provide screenings and referrals for Medicaid eligibility, WIC nutrition, substance abuse and mental health treatment alongside reproductive health care.

Beyond these important steps, my administration would protect and build on the Affordable Care Act's efforts to promote good health and prevent chronic disease. I would protect the mandatory funding stream the ACA obligated for these efforts, which has wrongly been reallocated for other purposes, and develop better metrics for measuring the effectiveness of prevention-related efforts.

Q. What are your priorities for revitalizing the economy, strengthening the middle class, creating jobs, and ensuring fair taxation? How would your plan help restore funding for education, healthcare, transportation, public safety, and many other services provided to our citizens?

MO'M: My administration would focus first and foremost on raising wages: by increasing the minimum wage and the salary threshold for overtime pay; restoring and strengthening collective bargaining power; and supporting families by expanding access to paid leave and safe and affordable childcare. My administration would also restore investments in the common good and future of our nation, including in infrastructure and innovation, and most of all in education. We cannot revitalize our economy without creating an education system that empowers each and every child to reach their full potential, starting with pre-k and all the way through college.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We can restore funding for these better choices and investments by rebalancing our tax system so that the wealthiest Americans – not just middle class families – pay their fair share. This includes setting higher marginal rates, taxing capital gains and income at the same rate, corporate tax reform, and other long-overdue reforms. We must also restore accountability to our financial markets, to reverse the failed policies of deregulation and wealth accumulation that gutted funding for key priorities while costing millions of Americans their jobs, homes, and retirements. That's why I have called for real structural and accountability reforms, including reinstating Glass-Steagall, charging regulators with holding law-breakers accountable, and breaking up big banks before they break us. These steps must be an explicit part of any agenda to revitalize the economy and make it work for all families.

Q. The United States has a $3.2 trillion infrastructure deficit according to the American Society of Civil Engineers and that's just for repairs. What are the mechanisms (e.g., public, private, infrastructure bank) through which we can fund the rebuilding of this country, including necessary renovation and modernization of our public schools, hospitals, and public buildings?

MO'M: Repairing, upgrading, and modernizing our nation's infrastructure will require an historic investment — one that can only be made using both public programs and other financing tools. My administration would restore the Highway Trust Fund, while redoubling successful competitive grant programs. But I would also look to credit and loan guarantee programs; to bonding programs, for both transportation infrastructure and building construction and retrofits; and to other programs that support public-private partnerships, including an infrastructure bank. However, whenever we leverage private dollars to build public projects, I would make protecting high-road labor standards a priority, as we did in Maryland. We cannot look for cost efficiencies on the backs of American workers.

Q. What would your administration do to build and strengthen retirement security for all working men and women, including protecting employees' pensions? What is your plan for sustaining and strengthening Social Security and Medicare?

MO'M: My administration would expand Social Security benefits, not cut them. We are the most prosperous country the world has ever seen. In an economy that is increasingly out of balance towards the most privileged, expanding Social Security so seniors can retire with dignity—not cutting benefits, not privatization, not raising the retirement age, not means testing, not eating into their economic security — should be a top priority, and an achievable one.

I would expand Social Security benefits by lifting the payroll tax cap for the highest earners, starting at 250,000. Right now, millionaires are essentially done paying into Social Security by mid-February. Those in that upper income range can afford to contribute more to expand one of our most cherished programs. I would also modify the formula that determines the level of benefits that seniors receive, including so that increased benefits are targeted towards lower and middle-income beneficiaries.

These are critical steps, because we know for a fact that 401(k)s won't leave enough for many seniors to live on in retirement. The recession took its toll on families' ability to save and plan adequately, and further weakened state pension systems, including the one I inherited in Maryland. As a result, we had to implement balanced reforms that brought the pension system back on the path to fiscal health, while protecting the collective bargaining rights and retirement security of state employees. This was tremendously difficult, but we got it done not by demonizing teachers and state workers, as other states have, but by bringing them to the table. I have always fought to ensure the rights and benefits of Maryland workers, and my administration would do the same for all public employees.

Q. What are your views on the privatization and contracting out of public services, including school services and state and local government services?

MO'M: We should not privatize or contract out school services. Teachers are our partners in educating our students. We should invest more, not less, to train and equip teachers — not engage in a race to the bottom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. Current federal laws and policies encourage and promote collective bargaining through the National Labor Relations Act. What are your views on collective bargaining for the private and public sectors? What is your view regarding agency fee and so-called right-to-work laws?

MO'M: I believe that we must make it easier, not harder, for workers to organize – by tearing down barriers to collective bargaining, while embracing new and expanded organizing models, and reversing the nearly unprecedented consolidation of corporate power. As Governor, I expanded public sector collective bargaining rights to thousands of additional state workers, and to home health aides and child care workers whose pay is subsidized by the state. I signed a Fair Share Act so that unions can do their job representing the voices of their members. And I created a Public School Labor Relations Board, as well as legislation requiring prevailing wages to be paid on public school projects.

There is no question that the decline of unionization over the last 30 years has fueled growing inequality and stagnating wages, and that the steps states are taking to wipe out unions — especially those attacking teachers' unions — are failed choices. I reject right-to-work laws that weaken the bargaining power of workers and drive down wages, as well as misguided efforts to roll back public sector bargaining rights. Chasing cheaper labor will not grow our economy or more it more competitive.

Q. As president, what would you do to: (a) prevent employers from intimidating and harassing workers who support union representation, (b) ensure that workers are free to organize and bargain the workplace, and (c) protect the rights of American workers?

MO'M: My administration would do everything in its power to protect and strengthen the rights of American workers. I would support efforts to make it easier to join a union by streamlining the process and reducing employers' ability to interfere with elections. This includes the rule NLRB has moved forward to speed up union elections, which I believe is an important first step. I also support the board's efforts to hold companies jointly responsible when their franchisees violate labor laws. We've allowed large corporations to largely shed their responsibilities for managing their employees and to consolidate power over markets, and we've seen poorer working conditions and stagnating wages as a result. I would aggressively enforce our nation's anti-trust laws to reverse this concentration of corporate power and give workers a louder voice. Finally, I would strongly support efforts to expand collective bargaining rights to more people, including home care workers, as we did in Maryland — and to continue upgrading these jobs by fighting for higher wages and better working conditions. I applaud labor's efforts continue organizing and engaging new and existing members even in light of what I agree was a bad decision in Harris v. Quinn. We have to use every tool at our disposal to continue making progress.

Q. The federal government has direct responsibility for setting labor standards. There has been a growing call for changes to those standards, including paid sick days, paid family leave, and higher minimum wages. What changes, if any, would you prioritize?

MO'M: I would make changing these labor standards my first priority as president. I would call for a 15 federal minimum wage, and — if DOL does not first complete its rule — would use executive authority to raise the threshold for overtime pay to 1,000 a week. I would fight for laws that guarantee all workers access to paid maternity leave and paternity leave, and expand access to safe and affordable childcare. I have helped lead the call for these higher standards, including in Maryland, and will continue to make these issues a central issue in my campaign.

Q. More than 8 million public employees in 25 states currently have no OSHA protection or entitlement to a safe and healthful workplace. Do you support universal OSHA coverage for all public employees?

MO'M: Yes, and more. The gaps in the enforcement of our labor laws should be unacceptable to everyone. Beyond health and safety, millions of people, including some of our most vulnerable workers, are victims of wage theft every year. Our enforcement agencies must be able to hold employers accountable, and to prevent these blatant violations in the first place. My administration would dedicate the energy and resources necessary to fully enforce the law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q. What policies would your administration pursue to ensure that all people — regardless of who they are, where they live, or where they come from — are able to climb the ladder of opportunity and participate fully in our economy and democracy?

MO'M: My administration would be committed to ensuring that Americans, regardless of their background and status, would have the opportunity to succeed by investing in education, raising wages, supporting families, securing immigration reform, expanding health care, and protecting the dignity of retirement. These are the better choices our national interest demands. I have also called for a new agenda for opportunity and justice in America's cities and communities, built on investments to connect poverty to opportunity: guaranteeing every family access to affordable housing near good schools and jobs, building and upgrading infrastructure to connect poverty to opportunity, committing to reduce poverty and eradicate child hunger, and — most importantly — creating new jobs and equipping students and workers with the skills needed to secure them.

Q. In your opinion, what are the elements of comprehensive immigration reform? How would your administration's stance on immigration reform fight back against inequality, promote economic justice, and increase wages for all workers?

MO'M: As Governor I urged Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform, and I would forcefully do the same as president. Bringing undocumented immigrants out of the shadows will grow the economy, create new jobs, and expand our tax base – benefiting the country as a whole. It will help all our workers, especially our most vulnerable workers, by lifting wages, and helping to drive improved labor standards. I know this from personal experience, from what we've done in Maryland, even without federal action — passing the DREAM Act, expanding access to drivers' licenses, launching the New Americans Commission, and providing refuge for more migrant children per capita than any other state.

That's why, while we continue to advocate for and will achieve comprehensive reform, we can't wait for Congress to act. My administration would also use executive action to the fullest extent of our authority: to expand deferred arrival programs to more people, including the parents of Dreamers; to end detention, especially for families and children; and to make prosecutorial discretion meaningful, by individually examining cases to assess whether people are eligible to remain in the U.S. and contribute to their family and community.

Q. What are your views on campaign finance reform? Do you support a constitutional amendment overturning the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision?

MO'M: I support a constitutional amendment to overturning Citizens United. But I also recognize that we can't afford to wish and wait for a Constitutional amendment to restore our democracy. We can bring greater transparency to our elections: by updating the rules governing disclosure to ensure that big special interest spending is reported, and charging and empowering federal regulators to block unlawful outside spending. Even more important, we must return to a government where all voters' voices are heard. Runaway election spending forces candidates to listen to big money donors over the voters they claim to represent. We should embrace citizen-funded elections, giving candidates the opportunity to raise a larger number of smaller contributions from people back home.

Q. What would your administration do to ensure that voting in elections is free, fair, and available to all Americans? Do you oppose policies that restrict access to voting and voter registration?

MO'M: Our democracy depends on greater participation, yet in recent years we have sharply limited access to our most fundamental right. My administration would push to restore the Voting Rights Act and tear down barriers to voting, like ID requirements. And we would work to modernize voting and voter registration to make it easier for more people to vote. We did this in Maryland, establishing on-site early voting and same-day registration, as well as online voter registration. We also restored voting rights to more than 50,000 people with criminal records, and made it easier for young people to vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conclusion

Q. What do you think this nation's priorities should be during the next decade? How would your presidency advance those priorities?

MO'M: The most important thing that we as a people need to get done is to restore the truth of the American dream: that when people work hard, they should be able to get ahead. That dream is in danger of becoming a lie for the vast majority of Americans who see their families slipping further behind. Making it true again will require us to return to the better choices we long made as a country – and to fundamentally rebalance our economy so that it works for everyone, not just the wealthy few. My administration would focus first and foremost on raising wages, not only by increasing the minimum wage, but by strengthening collective bargaining and securing comprehensive immigration reform. At the same time, my administration would hold Wall Street accountable, ending the decades of deregulation that wrecked our economy and accumulated wealth at the top like almost never before. By asking the wealthiest Americans to pay their fair share, I would restore investments in the future of our country — most especially in our students, teachers, and schools.

These choices require better leadership and the ability to get things done. I have 15 years of executive experience, and I have never backed down from a fight. I fought to make these better choices in Maryland, where we put the goal of a stronger middle class at the center of every decision we made. And as a result, we made Maryland one of the top states for upward mobility for families, with the highest median income in the nation, and – since the depths of the recession – a faster rate of job creation than our neighbors in Virginia or Maryland who were mostly trying to cut their way to prosperity. These are the goals we should be setting for our nation, and I believe that with will and leadership we can achieve them.

What the First Democratic Cattle Call Reveals About the State of the Presidential Race // Bloomberg // Arit John – July 19, 2015

Hours before the first face-off of the Democratic presidential campaign, former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley stood in the far left corner of the White Star Ale House, a sleek bar in downtown Cedar Rapids, greeting a line of voters, some committed, others not so much.

"Well, thanks for coming just the same," O'Malley, who has been outspoken in his support for stricter gun control, said to man in a Second Amendment tee shirt. "You can't agree with everybody on everything." The reception was better from Jean Schultz, a 71-year-old retired teacher. She told O'Malley she'd seen him on TV a few times, liked what he'd said, and that he seemed reasonable. "You make me feel like I should keep going," he told her.

On Friday, all five of the declared Democratic presidential candidates descended on Cedar Rapids Convention Center for the first cattle call of their nominating contest, the Democratic Party Hall of Fame dinner. But even before the events, some of the candidates dominated much of downtown Cedar Rapids: during the afternoon former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, O'Malley and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders held two rallies, a meet-and-greet, and a press conference, respectively, in different venues less than a mile of the convention center. It was a chance for Iowa voters to compare the candidates side by side, but also for the presidential hopefuls to demonstrate the strength of their support in the first-in-the-nation caucus state.

Virginia Senator Jim Webb and former Rhode Island Governor Lincoln Chafee, neither of whom held any events in Cedar Rapids the day of the dinner, may need to ask themselves if they're taking the same basic steps to promote themselves as their competitors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley, who is polling in the low single digits in Iowa, used his meet-and-greet to try and rectify that situation one voter at a time.

Senator Bernie Sanders, gave a substantive, if not professorial press conference on the state of veterans affairs and his past work as chairman of that committee. But while Sanders' it's-about-the-issues-not-me approach plays well for the thousands of supporters who have filled stadiums to hear him, it doesn't have the same affect on the media, or other Democrats. During the question-and-answer session after his veterans press conference, for example, he was asked almost exclusively about Clinton.

And some candidates are already thinking past the primary race. In a new pizza parlor right down the street from the White Star Ale House, Clinton—who is leading her Democratic challengers by an average of 34 points in the polls—offered encouragement and advice at two large events, a new pizza place and the basement of the Veterans Memorial building. They were "organizing with purpose, so I can campaign with purpose, we we can win with purpose and govern with purpose" she told about 130 volunteers and staffers at Need Pizza, a new business in downtown Cedar Rapids. "Impressed" by what they've accomplished so far, she talked about how important it was for them to be part of politics.

"I am thrilled you have chosen to come and work for me, but also that you've chosen to be part of this process," Clinton told the audience of about 140 volunteers and staffers, waxing nostalgic about her own days as a campaign volunteer in 1972, when she worked for Democratic presidential nominee George McGovern. "It was just so much fun but it was also really meaningful," Clinton said.

As the candidates held their pre-dinner events, Clinton supporters, along with supporters of the O'Malley campaign and members of Generation Forward, a pro-O'Malley super-PAC, gathered outside the convention center with signs, chanting their candidates names and trying to drown out the other camp. (Sanders supporters were conspicuously absent because, according to one of his Iowa staffers, he held a meet-and-greet in the lobby of his hotel with his top volunteers.)

"We were excited to be here because so many candidates were out here and this is the start and the kick off of the real campaign," Erica Reardon, a field organizer for Generation Forward, O'Malley's super-PAC.

Inside the convention center, the rivalry between the candidates shown by the cheer-off outside was still on display. Supporters were banned from bringing in signs (and, in once case, a large quilt with a Clinton logo), and volunteers for all but Chafee's campaign manned booths with pamphlets and sign-up sheets.

About 1,200 guests filled the convention hall, many sitting at tables puchased by the campaigns. In the evening, when the candidates spoke, it was easy to discern the pockets of support were—Sanders supporters sat stage left, while the O'Malley and Clinton supporters sat at tables in the center and stage right.

Clinton, who probably had the most support in the room, received loud cheers for lines about how she was "never going to let the Republicans rip away the progress we have made" or a joke about how trickle-down economics was one of the worst ideas of the 1980s, along with "new Coke, shoulder pads and big hair." O'Malley started off slow, asking people to raise their hands if they believed kids would have a better life than they had enjoyed (less than a dozen people did). By the time he got around to talking about his record, and a not-so-subtle dig at Clinton ("And we didn't just talk about it, we actually got it done"), the crowd response picked up.

The loudest, if not the rowdiest, response in the room, went to Sanders. As the senator gave his stump speech, his supporters banged on tables and clinked their silverware on glasses. The other side of the room, where "Hil-lar-ry" and "O-Mal-ley" had come from a moment earlier, varied from applause for his hope that young black men would be able to walk down the street without fear of police brutality, to a smattering of polite claps when Sanders described the extent of income inequality today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the night was also about honoring Democrats (including the seven inductees into the Hall of Fame) and the liberal policies the party has championed over the years. Every candidate received loud applause for listing their support for and action to implement Democratic agendas. Everyone who criticized the state's Republican governor, Terry Branstad, earned a cheer. Every candidate had at least one big applause line, whether it was O'Malley proposing making it easier to join unions and collectively bargain, Sanders outlining the extent of income inequality in America (to which one man shouted "Preach!"), Chafee praising President Barack Obama's Iran nuclear deal deal, Webb calling for a candidate willing to achieve bipartisan reform, or Clinton promising to continue talking about women's issues.

"Now I know that when I talk about this some people think, I can see it in their eyes, 'There she goes again, with the women's issues,'" Clinton said. "Well I'm not going to stop so get ready for a long campaign."

Even some attendees who've already settled on a candidate had something nice to say about some of the competition. Graham Carl, a 26-year-old attorney from Cedar Rapids, walked out of the convention center with an O'Malley sticker, but thought Sanders "had the most specific goals or specific plans of action of any of the speeches." Nicholas Johnson, a, 80-year-old retired law professor from Iowa City, said Sanders "so totally stole the show" but said Chafee was "probably the highest quality maybe of the five," based on his résumé.

Libby Coyte, a 67-year-old physician's assistant from Red Field, Iowa is a Clinton supporter—she sat at Clinton's table at the event—but said all of the candidates impressed her. "If you took all of their speeches together it was a very complete program … and each one has a different strength," Coyte said. "I'm a trueblooded Democrat, so I couldn't find anyone that I didn't like."

Instead of boos there was polite golf clapping, silence, or—in Jim Webb's case—people who couldn't be bothered to stay for the full night. The candidates spoke in alphabetical order, and several audience members streamed out of the convention center after Sanders spoke. All things considered, Webb took it well.

"Bernie, you always fire me up," Webb quipped. "I'm here to turn the lights out, folks."

Democrats lose control of presidential event // CNN // Chris Moody – July 19, 2015

PHOENIX (CNN) —A town hall for liberal activists featuring two Democratic presidential candidates was interrupted by dozens of demonstrators on Saturday who shouted down the contenders and demanded they address criminal justice issues and police brutality.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders planned to attend a public sit-down interview with journalist Jose Antonio Vargas in front of a left-leaning crowd here at the annual Netroots Nation conference, a gathering of progressives, when the tone of the program shifted just a few minutes into the event.

O'Malley was answering questions from Vargas on stage when dozens of boisterous conference attendees flooded through a side door and shouted down the White House contender.

"What side are you on my people?" they sang in unison as they approached.

Tia Oso of the Black Alliance for Just Immigration, who represented the demonstrators, climbed onto the stage, secured a microphone, and delivered a speech while O'Malley looked on.

"We are going to hold this space. We are going to acknowledge the names of black women who have died in police custody. And Governor O'Malley, we do have questions for you ... As the leader of this nation, will you advance a racial justice agenda that will dismantle -- not reform, not make progress -- but will begin to dismantle structural racism in the United States?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Yes," O'Malley replied, but before he could say more, the demonstrators in front of the stage shouted over him by reciting names of black women who have died in police custody. While they shouted, O'Malley stood in silence. At one point he turned to Oso on stage: "My people came here as immigrants from Ireland."

Below, dozens shouted several chants in unison.

"Black lives matter! Black lives matter!" they shouted toward O'Malley, and began a call-and-repeat rallying cry that activists have been using in the wake of the death of 28-year-old Sandra Bland, who died in police custody last week. "If I die in police in custody!" one of the chants went, "Burn everything down! That's the only way mother* like you listen!"

Conference organizers begged them to allow O'Malley to respond.

"I think all of us as Americans have a responsibility to recognize the pain and the grief throughout our country from all of the lives that have been lost to violence, whether that's violence at the hands at the police or whether that's violence at the hands of civilians," O'Malley said, before being interrupted again.

"Don't generalize this s!" one person shouted back.

O'Malley said he wanted to require police departments to report all police-involved shootings and brutality complaints and he called on departments to implement civilian review boards. He vowed to release a wide-ranging plan on criminal justice reform.

The demonstrators started shouting and booing again when O'Malley said: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

O'Malley later apologized for the remarks, telling This Week in Blackness, a digital news site, that he "meant no disrespect" to the black community.

"That was a mistake on my part and I meant no disrespect," O'Malley told the outlet. "I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

And when he stepped off stage, he chanted, "Black lives matter! Black lives matter!"

When Sanders approached the stage a moment later, the demonstrators continued. The candidate, a favorite of Netroots Nation, threatened to leave if they continued to interrupt him.

"Black lives, of course, matter. I spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights and for dignity," he said. "But if you don't want me to be here, that's OK. I don't want to outscream people."

Sanders proceeded to deliver his usual presidential stump speech over sporadic shouting from below.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After talking over one another, Sanders eventually ditched pre-planned remarks and tried to address questions from demonstrators.

"Black people are dying in this country because we have a criminal justice system which is out of control, a system in which over 50% of young African-American kids are unemployed," Sanders said. "It is estimated that a black baby born today has a one in four chance of ending up in the criminal justice system."

When Sanders cited the Affordable Care Act as a law he supported that helped people of color by making health insurance more accessible, one man shouted, "we can't afford that!"

Before Sanders finished speaking, many of the protesters walked out on him toward exit doors in the back.

The spectacle was a far cry from what was expected of the forum. Sanders, who is running as a more liberal alternative to Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, was one of the most highly anticipated speakers at the gathering. Hours before the event, excited supporters lined up to hear him speak, and some ran to secure seats close to the stage when organizers opened the doors.

Attendees who were not part of the rally said they supported the protesters' message, but debated how it was carried out.

Conference organizers issued a statement following the townhall.

"Our aim was to give presidential candidates a chance to respond to the issues facing the many diverse communities represented here," Netroots Nation spokeswoman Mary Rickles said. "Although we wish the candidates had more time to respond to the issues, what happened today is reflective of an urgent moment that America is facing today."

O'Malley, Sanders heckled by protestors during presidential forum // USA Today // Dan Nowicki – July 19, 2015

Civil-rights protesters gave Democratic presidential contenders Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley a raucous and tense reception Saturday in downtown Phoenix, disrupting and commandeering a forum that was billed as a conversation with the two progressive candidates.

Sanders, a left-leaning independent U.S. senator from Vermont, was visibly irritated at times during his shorter-than-expected appearance at the Netroots Nation gathering. He, in turn, angered the "Black Lives Matter" protesters by not immediately responding to them.

The hashtag #BlackLivesMatter is widely used on social media by activists and their allies.

"Black lives, of course, matter," Sanders said at one point. "... But if you don't want me to be here, that's O.K."

O'Malley, a former Maryland governor and Baltimore mayor whose record has come under fire in the wake of the civil unrest in the city, spoke first. He stood by silently on stage as the demonstrators took control of the proceedings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What side are you on, my people," the several dozen protesters chanted as they filed between tables to the front of the Phoenix Convention Center hall, where O'Malley and moderator Jose Antonio Vargas were talking.

During the event, O'Malley defended his Baltimore law-enforcement legacy.

"Far from bringing forward the mass arrest/mass incarceration policing that you talked about it, I actually made policing more responsive," O'Malley said. "We did a hundred reverse-integrity stings a year."

But O'Malley was later booed when he said: "Every life matters ... Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

The comments make it clear that Democratic candidates have work to do in understanding and addressing the movement for Black lives, according to Anna Galland, executive director of the liberal group MoveOn.org Civil Action.

"Saying that 'all lives matter' or 'white lives matter' immediately after saying 'Black lives matter' minimizes and draws attention away from the specific, distinct ways in which Black lives have been devalued by our society and in which Black people have been subject to state and other violence," Galland said.

O'Malley later apologized for the remarks during an interview with This Week in Blackness, a digital show.

"I meant no disrespect," O'Malley said. "...I did not mean to be insensitive in anyway or communicate that I did not understand the tremendous passion commitment, and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

"Senator Sanders told us to wait. ... That's what marginalized people have been told to do and nothing's happened," Bradley said after the event.

Tia Oso, a Phoenix resident with the Black Alliance for Just Immigration, said she helped organize the protest because Black-rights issues were not represented at the annual national gathering of political progressives this year. While events for Latino immigrants were integrated into the convention, black immigrants were ignored, she said.

"We had to do this," she said. "This is the most important progressive gathering."

In a black shirt with white letting that said "Black love," Oso climbed on stage with O'Malley to talk about racial inequality and law enforcement treatment of the Black population and to chide Netroots Nation's programming for not addressing Black immigration issues, such as the Black refugees in Arizona who had to seek asylum because of U.S. foreign policy.

"I feel like his response is very rooted in what he believed his track record was," she said of O'Malley. "He's very tone deaf to our community."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While on-stage, Oso also hammered the Republican-controlled Arizona Legislature and recalled former GOP Gov. Evan Mecham's controversial repeal of the state's Martin Luther King holiday in the 1980s.

In a written statement, Netroots Nation said it "stands in solidarity with all people seeking human rights."

"Although we wish the candidates had more time to respond to the issues, what happened today is reflective of an urgent moment that America is facing today," the statement said. "In 2016, we're heading to St. Louis. We plan to work with activists there just as we did in Phoenix with local leaders, including the #BlackLivesMatter movement, to amplify issues like racial profiling and police brutality in a major way."

In the chaotic atmosphere, Sanders, who had many fans in the Netroots Nation audience, struggled to make his points about income inequality, the minimum wage and his other top issues.

For his part, O'Malley was kept on the defensive about police issues for most of his appearance. He said his criminal-justice plan will be forthcoming from his campaign.

"Specifically, I believe every police department in America should have to report, in an open and transparent and timely way all police-involved shootings, all discourtesy complaints and all brutality complaints," O'Malley said when the Q&A resumed after the interruption. "I believe that all departments should have civilian review boards. We implemented one, and it works. But they have to be staffed."

Hall Of Fame Wrap Up: Who Stood Out, Who Missed Out // Iowa Starting Line // Pay Rynard and Angela Ufheil – July 19, 2015

No need to bury the lede here: Hillary Clinton didn't win the Iowa Caucus with just one speech, but she came damn well close on Friday night. Her feisty, passionate barrage of policy issues, one-liners and hits on Republican candidates stood out amongst the crowd on an exciting night full of great moments. Clinton didn't only give one of the best speeches she's ever delivered, but one of the best Iowa Caucus speeches Starting Line has seen, rivaling (though not overtaking) John Kerry's 2003 Jefferson-Jackson Dinner speech and Barack Obama's one at that same event in 2007.

That's certainly not to say the other Democrats didn't turn in great performances as well. Martin O'Malley helped himself more than any other candidate Friday night with some powerful oratory of his own, positioning him as the progressive alternative with executive experience. Bernie Sanders demonstrated once again that he commands the most enthusiastic supporters of the field, and gave a classic stem-winder that brought many to their feet. Even Jim Webb, with a much lower-key approach, still improved upon his niche in the party.

Iowa Democrats were treated to an outstanding show from their candidates and Iowa leaders, gathered in Cedar Rapids at the annual Hall of Fame event to honor a number of activists and elected officials. This gathering was particularly informing on where Iowa caucus-goers feel about their 2016 candidates. It's still early enough in the cycle that many remain undecided and very few labor unions have endorsed, so the crowd's reactions weren't skewed by one or two campaigns bringing in swarms of supporters. Each campaign was given ten tables, all of which obviously cheered on their candidates loudly, but the rest of the room was fairly neutral.

Your Starting Line team roamed the pre- and post-events, talked with attendees, and sat back in press row to bring you all the angles of big night. Here's our analysis and summaries of the day's important moments:

The Pre-Events: Clinton Rally and Sign Wars

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton held a pre-rally a few blocks away from the convention center before the main event started, and a thank-you session with a smaller group of staff and volunteers at a pizza place earlier in the day. About 250 came out to the pre-rally, some of which hadn't been able to get tickets to the Hall of Fame Dinner. That turnout seemed a bit low, and is something to keep an eye on. Although, if people attended some of these pre-events around 3:00 and then the dinner, they would have been committing a full seven hours of a day.

After what Iowa Starting Line has officially dubbed "The Great Sign Wars of 2007" (and 2003), we had high expectations for each candidate's cheering section outside this year's Hall of Fame dinner. Unfortunately, high expectations led to disappointment, as they so often do. Hillary Clinton's group numbered around 50 for most of the time, not exactly like the massive, intimidating presence the campaigns had in 2007.

A group of Martin O'Malley supporters got reinforced by members of the O'Malley Super PAC, Generation Forward, which is working to hire its own campaign team in Iowa. The Generation Forward volunteers stood across the street from O'Malley's volunteers, sometimes joining in the same chants. Which raises the humorous question – does joint chanting constitute coordination?

The most unexpected moment of the sign wars was not a moment at all, but an absence. Bernie Sanders' supporters have a reputation for rowdiness, but were nowhere to be seen outside the DoubleTree Convention Complex. A meet-and-greet with Sanders nearby pulled them away, apparently replacing a planned outside rally they had. We have to assume that they were not too upset at the opportunity to meet their candidate in an air-conditioned facility. Temperatures approached 100°F, and all Democrats participating in the sign wars ran a risk of melting. Perhaps, then, all can be forgiven for "The Great Sign Wars Let-Down of 2015."

The Convention Center

The Secret Service caused long lines for attendees, as they had to pass through metal detectors, but the event otherwise ran quite smoothly. The NextGen Climate team was the most visible presence in the hall of booths, with about 40 staff and volunteers by the entrance. With nearly every important Democratic activist and leader in town, the hall was filled with glad-handing Iowa candidates. Senate hopefuls Rob Hogg, Tom Fiegen and Bob Krause all had booths, as did announced 1st District candidates Monica Vernon and Gary Kroeger. Sadly, there were only two small bars in the event and no cocktail tables – Starting Line heard a number of attendees lament the long lines, saying, "We're a bunch of Democrats, we love to drink!"

The Room

Each campaign could fill up to ten tables with supporters, and seating arrangements had an impact on the energy in the room. Face the stage and look right to find Bernie's supporters; turn left to see Hillary volunteers. Watching each side of the room get fired up for their respective candidate was fun, but most interesting was the O'Malley table placements. The candidate trailing behind Hillary and Bernie had his volunteers at tables near the press, making them sound a lot louder to the journalists. Good strategy.

Finally, there was no missing the NextGen Climate folks, and not just because they showed up in bright orange t-shirts. NextGen had a cluster of tables near the center, and were perfectly willing to give any candidate who mentioned climate change a standing ovation.

The Iowa Speeches and Honorees

While the presidential candidates spoke later in the evening, the real reason for the dinner is to honor important Democratic activists and elected officials. The honorees this year were Pam Jochum, Kay Halloran, Bev Hannon, Penny Rosfjord, Melinda Jones, Kurt Meyer and Morgan Miller. Jochum spoke on her own behalf, though we wish everyone got to get up and say something (of course it would need to be strictly time-limited). While these are all well-known Democrats to the activist/insider crowd, there's still tons of attendees who haven't seen these folks before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The night began with IDP Chair Andy McGuire bringing all five presidentials up on stage, with chants of "Bernie! Bernie!" already coming from the audience. McGuire gave a solid and well-received rally speech to get the Democrats fired up, with that day being the six-month anniversary of her election as party chair (we interviewed her about that here).

Both Dave Loebsack's and Jochum's speeches ran a little long, but the overall event only ran a mere 30 minutes past schedule. Democrats should be thankful. Starting Line has attended several Republican cattle call forums this year that have seriously lasted from six to eight hours.

The Presidential Candidate Speeches (in order of appearance)

Lincoln Chafee

Speech: Speaking before a crowd of 1,300 key Iowa Caucus activists, Chafee kept his speech to a simple six minutes of the fifteen allowed. He mostly touted his record of liberal votes, on addressing climate change, women's choice, LGBT rights, immigration reform, public education support and infrastructure funding. At times he seemed impressed at the applause he did get, smiling and looking around when the crowd clapped politely at some of his lines.

"We have a choice in 2016: prosperity through peace or endless war," Chafee said, thanking President Obama for the recent Iran deal. He stayed on the topic of foreign policy for a while, promoting diplomatic cooperation, and highlighted his resume on international affairs.

Analysis: Chafee missed a big opportunity here with a dull and short speech. About 99.5% of the Democrats in the room have never seen him in person before, and he didn't present either a memorable biography of himself or a vision for the country. If you're going to be an extreme long-shot running for President, one would figure you're running because you have something to say. Chafee didn't say much at all. And oddly, his constant recounting of liberal policies he's supported in the past seemed like a defense of his former Republican Party allegiance, but many people there probably weren't even aware of that. He was elected to the Senate and the Governor's office in Rhode Island, so he clearly has some political skills. They weren't on display Friday night. I mean, come on man, prepare a real speech next time.

Hillary Clinton

Speech: Clinton's speech targeted Republicans early and often, but she also added in near the beginning a story of speaking with her late mother, who struggled early in life. Clinton recounted how her mother instilled in her the passion for public service, a useful explanation that could help with those who doubt her motivation.

When Clinton brought up her section about paid family medical leave and jobs, she jokingly noted, "I know that when I talk about this, some people think, 'There she goes again, with the women's issues.' Well I'm not going to stop, so get ready for a long campaign." She went on to list off issues like paid sick leave, childcare help, the minimum wage, adding, "These are not women's issues, these are family issues and they are economic issues."

In one of the most well-received lines of the night of any candidate, Clinton ripped into Terry Branstad for the vetoes on the mental health facilities and education funding. "So tonight I'm adding my voice to yours: Governor Branstad, put down your veto pen," she said, bringing a long-lasting standing ovation to the room.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most of the final six minutes of her speech was a rapid-fire, non-stop applause line bonanza, bringing the crowd to their feet a number of times.

"We're not going back to denying climate change – if you ask most of these Republican candidates about that they'll say, 'Sorry, I'm not a scientist,'" Clinton shouted near the end. "Well then why don't they start listening to those that are scientists? Look, I'm not a scientist either, I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I'm not going to let them take us backwards!"

She finished with a forceful crescendo, saying, "I am running for anyone who's ever been knocked down, but refused to be knocked out, I'm running for you, we're going to build an America where we don't leave anyone out or anyone behind!"

Analysis: For whatever reason, at past major multi-candidate gatherings in 2007/2008, Clinton often struck the wrong tone of what Iowa caucus-goers were looking for. These types of events have been a real weakness for Clinton before. Not Friday night. Gone were the too-cutesy lines that often fell flat outside the most ardent supporters, the touchy-feely cadence meant to "humanize" her that just comes off weird, and the tone-deaf jokes like "I'm baaack!"

Instead Clinton was energized, punchy and a little bit chippy. She cracked a few jokes, but quickly turned serious again in the next sentence. She sounded strong and confident. Most of all, she looked and sounded authentic. It seemed like she was finally enjoying herself while campaigning.

A number of news outlets labeled the Hall of Fame room a "Hillary crowd," probably thinking a fundraiser had more "establishment" Democrats that would be predispositioned to her. But that simply wasn't the case. If you watched the crowd closely, when Clinton was introduced she got her big cheers from her section of tables, but the rest of the room gave typical, polite applause (much as happened for every candidate). It wasn't until really the last six minutes of her speech that the room erupted in excitement and sustained standing ovations, and it was most definitely earned, not already present.

Reaction:

"She was very moving – everything she said made me want to get shit done," said Tiffany Hach, who still noted she's currently supporting Sanders. "She was very good at striking a chord, hitting the heart strings."

"I love her passion and her tenacity – she's so inspiring, she knows how to get you fired up," said Cassie Yost. "What resonated with me was talking about the wage gap. I work forty plus hours at three jobs trying to pay my rent and my bills. I'm already in student debt as a nontraditional student, trying to earn my degree to get a better job. So having someone who can fight for us and has been fighting to get into this office for years, I love that. That determination to keep fighting for America, even though you get knocked down, you get back up again. She's phenomenal."

Martin O'Malley

Speech: Hillary Clinton's speech brought down the house, and Martin O'Malley had a tough act to follow. But O'Malley was impressive in his own right. He highlighted his executive experience as the governor of Maryland, where his administration raised the minimum wage, froze college tuition for four years, and expanded family leave.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley also highlighted his advocacy in Maryland for driver's licenses for new American immigrants, marriage equality, and a ban on assault weapons. "And we didn't just talk about it, we actually got it done," O'Malley said to audience applause.

O'Malley also got big applause for his criticism of Wall Street executives' role in the 2008 recession. "What have we come to as a nation that you can get pulled over for a broken taillight, but if you break the nation's economy, you're untouchable?" O'Malley said.

The middle class makes the economy strong, he noted, and many in the crowd were impressed by his desire to fight for the working class. They were especially excited when he condemned Branstad's recent education veto, a move that shows how well O'Malley knew his audience.

Also impressive is O'Malley's extensive energy platform, which certainly gave NextGen something to cheer for. "I am the first candidate, but let's hope I am not the last, to call for moving America forward by 2050 to a 100 percent clean-powered electric grid," O'Malley said.

Analysis:

For those wary of Clinton and concerned about Sanders' electability, O'Malley made himself their candidate on Friday night. His speech started out slow, but became very forceful and eloquent near the end, eliciting some of the most widely participated in standing ovations of the night. O'Malley does very well at these major speaking events, a gifted speaker armed with well-structured speeches. He certainly gained the most of anyone at this event, and should pick up a number of new activists and endorsers with his performance. Most importantly, his appeal seemed to reach broadly across the room and didn't appear to turn anyone off. He's positioned himself as part of the top three candidates, a legitimate option that should begin to pick up steam.

Reaction:

"I like his executive background, that he's actually been a governor and a mayor, and I think that's really important in a president," said Margaret Appleby. "I think he did a wonderful job."

"He has a record of being able to work with Republicans, and enact legislation, really good legislation that works for working class families," said Sharon Holle. "I thought he gave a really good speech. He touched on all the major issues."

Bernie's Speech

Speech: "Preach!" shouted a Bernie-backer in the Sanders corner of the room, and boy, did he ever.

The "Bernie" chants started the moment O'Malley wrapped up his speech, before the Vermont senator was even announced. The craziness didn't stop there. In typical "Feel the Bern" fashion, Bernie supporters whooped and hollered during the speech; a few even pounded on tables in support of Sanders.

Sanders, like the candidates before him, was game to criticize the Republican party and their emphasis on family values. "Their family values say that a woman does not have a right to control her body. I disagree," Sanders said to applause. "They say women should not be able to get the contraceptives she needs. I disagree. They say that our brothers and sisters who are gay should not be able to enjoy the same marriage rights as heterosexual couples enjoy. We disagree."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic family values are based on love and compassion, not hatred, Sanders said. “Our family values say that when a woman has a baby, she should get twelve weeks of family and medical aid,” Sanders said.

Bernie also launched his usual attacks on the billionaires who have in his eyes bought elections with Super PACs. He condemned the Koch brothers for spending more money on elections than the Democratic Party and the Republican Party. He further pledged to only nominate Supreme Court justices that would vote to overturn Citizens United, the Supreme Court decision that he said is “moving this country towards and oligarchic form of society.”

Bernie ended his speech with a declaration that stirred the passions of everyone in the room, not just his devotees. “Think big,” Sanders said as the crowd rose in a standing ovation. “Think about a future where our kids get the best education in the world, where women’s rights are protected. That is the America we can become if we stand together.”

Analysis: It’s not like it needed confirmation, but Friday night demonstrated loud and clear that Bernie Sanders has the most enthusiastic supporters of anyone in the Democratic Party. Overall, Bernie followed his usual script. While both Hillary and O’Malley seemed to tailor their speech for the Hall of Fame event, Bernie stuck to his usual call for a political revolution, albeit in a voice slightly more hoarse than usual (he’s been speaking a lot lately). People like his “Bernie persona,” and it’s gotten him far to this point, so straying from it would have been risky.

But Sanders may need to consider what his best approach is for the nomination. His attack on the TPP trade deal didn’t get the overwhelming reaction from the entire room that it does at his own events. His corner of the room cheered wildly, but again, if you watched the crowd very closely, it wasn’t like the response to Clinton and O’Malley. He got considerable applause from the full room, but not the same type of standing ovations. Sanders gave a very dramatic and, at times, angry speech – it appealed to people already with him, but it may not have picked up many new supporters.

Reaction:

“I like how progressive he is,” Payton Kears said. “He’s got a long record of that. I remember reading about him in the 70s, supporting marriage equality.”

“I think that Bernie is the candidate that everyone always says they want to vote for,” said Adam Schantz, who noted that Sanders has had to increase space in a Texas venue because so many people want to hear him speak. “It’s very interesting to see the overwhelming response that he’s getting, and it will be very interesting to see if people can actually follow through.”

Jim Webb

Speech: Webb began his turn at the lectern highlighting his past work on veterans issues, and asked the veterans in the room to stand up to be recognized. His speech was policy-heavy, but he still subtly dropped in some fun personality references that warmed the crowd to him, noting he’s likely the only former Virginia elected official “with a union card, two Purple Hearts and three tattoos.”

“We see so much demonizing of organized labor these days,” Webb said in a very well-received line, one of the few non-foreign policy topics he hit upon. “Organized labor is not the enemy – it is the friend of working people.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The most notable policy difference Webb mentioned was that he doesn't support the new Iran deal. "I would never accept directly or indirectly Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons," Webb said, getting mostly silence from the crowd for breaking with the Democratic president. It probably, however, helped his authenticity to tell such a liberal crowd something they didn't want to hear.

Analysis: Some will likely think Webb failed to impress at the Hall of Fame Dinner with the lower-key speech, but that may not actually be the case. There really is a set of activists who like Webb's approach. Not everyone gets swept up in the fancy rhetoric and applause lines. Many listen for specific policies – and on that front, Webb did deliver.

So Webb certainly did help himself with his speech. It wasn't one that's going to see him gain much in the polls, but it should help recruit a base of support, even if it's a small one. That's still important and needed for Webb to remain in any real conversations. And that's still much better than Chafee, who likely didn't pick up anything.

However, like Chafee, he alluded to potential foreign policy criticisms of Clinton, but didn't specifically mention her and failed to land a solid hit. If these folks really want to have that debate, they need to do it, not make vague critiques that don't have a more forceful impact.

Reaction:

"He's really, really good on policy," offered Joe Stutler. "Probably not the most enthusiastic speech, but then it's hard to follow Bernie. But, Webb's on message. And being a veteran myself, props to anybody who's got a Purple Heart."

"You can tell the conventionally top runners have maybe been out on the stump a little more," commented Linda Santi. "Having said that, Jim Webb had substance and he too did a great job. A little less fire in his belly, and he seemed to have the legislative perspective."

"I thought he did a good job," said Carol Dillard. "I felt like his was a male point of view, a military point of view, and that's not my point of view."

GOP

DECLARED

BUSH

Poll: Bush has edge over Rubio among Miami Cuban voters // Politico // Marc Caputo – July 19, 2015

In their home county in Florida, Jeb Bush is beating Marco Rubio by double digits among GOP voters and even among those who are most like the freshman senator: Cuban-American Republicans, a new poll shows.

Bush's "shocking" 43-31 percent lead among Cuban-American Republicans is "real serious problem" for Rubio because it indicates the son of Cuban immigrants will have broader problems in Florida in the March 15 GOP primary, pollster Fernand Amandi with Bendixen & Amandi, told POLITICO. His firm conducted the Miami-Dade poll for The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Jeb is an honorary Cuban but Marco Rubio would be the first actual Cuban-American president. So how is the Cuban community not supporting him en masse?” Amandi asked, before answering his question: “Marco Rubio hasn’t made a persuasive case to his own community that he can win. And if he can’t make that case here, he can’t win Florida if the trend holds.”

Bush’s 12-percentage point lead among Cuban-American Republicans is driving his overall 10 percentage-point lead (35-25 percent) among Miami-Dade County’s GOP over Rubio, where 73 percent of the party’s registered voters are Hispanic, nearly all of them of Cuban-American descent.

Miami-Dade, the only county in America to produce two top-tier Republican presidential candidates, is crucial to winning Florida. Of the state’s 67 counties, Miami-Dade is the most populous and has more Republicans than any other in the state, which has a closed primary where Democrats and independents can’t vote. In 2012, Miami-Dade accounted for more presidential-preference primary votes than any other in the state, 7 percent.

Bush in the early 1980s helped turn Miami-Dade’s Republican Party into a regional powerhouse and then helped do the same for the state GOP as governor from 1999 to 2007. The bilingual Bush’s efforts — and his support for the Cuban embargo and Cuban-exile politics — made him a favored local political figure for decades. Only Rubio rivaled Bush’s status as a favored local son as he climbed the political rungs of power to become Florida House speaker in 2007-2008 and, in 2010, a sitting U.S. senator.

To make sure Rubio didn’t eclipse him at home, Bush made sure his announcement for president in June had a local, Latino flavor that played far more to the Cuban-American base in the county than Rubio’s announcement. Bush also has a larger stable of longtime community figures backing him, such as Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen and Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart.

Diaz-Balart’s brother, former Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart is a longtime figure in Cuban-exile politics and supports Bush as does Mel Martinez, Florida’s first Cuban-American senator.

The poll by Bendixen & Amandi, which often surveys for Democrats, is the first publicly released survey to test the two men on the same GOP ballot. Because the race is early and because the sample size is relatively small, 250 registered Republicans, the survey is an early window into the race, not the final or most exhaustive poll that has or will be done. Of all the other candidates in the GOP race, Cuban-American Ted Cruz, from Texas, came in a distant third, earning 7 percent of the vote along with undecided. The margin of error is plus/minus 7 points.

While some have said support for Rubio and Bush in Florida and Miami-Dade reflects a generational divide, even young Cuban-Americans Republicans back Bush. Diana Arteaga, a 30-year-old voter and member of the county’s Young Republicans club said Bush’s support can be summed up in a word: “Gratitude.”

“Dade Republicans and Cuban Americans have known Jeb for a very long time. He has been embraced by our community and genuinely cares about issues that are important to us,” Arteaga said in an email to POLITICO. “He has been our advocate both in and out of office. Jeb is familia.”

And some older establishment Republicans also support Rubio, including the three brothers of the Diaz de la Portilla family. One is a state senator, the other used to hold that seat, and a third is a former school board member.

Former state Sen. Alex Diaz de la Portilla told POLITICO that he doesn’t consider Bush “an honorary Cuban” and added: “The days of a candidate yelling Viva Cuba Libre and then not doing anything about it are long gone.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Diaz de la Potilla said he could see some members of the community supporting Bush over Rubio because some might think "Marco is too young and will have another chance." But he added, "I don't think people should vote for someone because it's their last chance, and they feel sorry for him. They should vote based on who would make the best nominee and have the best shot at beating Clinton, and Marco is clearly that choice. He brings us the future and not the past."

Rubio backers say the poll results are not unexpected and say it's just a clarion call for Rubio to make the case that he's the best choice for the party. But older Cuban-Americans, the base of the Republican Party in the county, seem to deeply appreciate Bush.

"He's the only one who's going to be strong, who's going to calm things down a bit, because there's a lot of crime in this country," Dora Lorenzo, 81, told The Miami Herald. Of Rubio, she said, "of course, I like him too. But I think he's too much of a youngster."

In looking at the numbers, Amandi said Rubio's big task is to take a page from Barack Obama's successful 2008 campaign in which, at the beginning, he wasn't even backed by many African-American figures because they didn't think he could win.

"This is Miami-Dade's version of Obama v. Hillary," Amandi said. "The question we all are asking is: Will the result be the same?"

How Jeb Tackled the Cocaine Cartels // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff and Alexa Corse – July 19, 2015

It was an October day in Miami, 1985, and Leonel Martinez didn't want to die.

Margarita Escobar—a Colombian woman known as La Doctora and rumored to be a distant relative of Pablo Escobar—had paid Martinez, a construction magnate, a hefty sum to move 12 duffel bags of cocaine from The Bahamas to Miami on his luxury yacht. The load got intercepted en route, though, and La Doctora wanted her money back. But Martinez didn't have it.

So she called him up and said she would be visiting his office. Martinez did the natural thing: He bought a Cadillac limousine, sent it to pick up her and her bodyguard at the airport—in an effort to project wealth he didn't quite have—and welcomed her to his office.

She demanded he produce the cash. He didn't have it, and he offered her 10 condominiums instead. But that wasn't good enough. Give her the money, she said, or she'd kill him.

"You can kill me, or you can wait," he replied.

She decided to wait, and she flew back to Colombia. Then Martinez got to work rustling up the thousands he owed her.

Overlooking that conversation was a wall plastered with pictures of Martinez glad-handing some of South Florida's most powerful political luminaries. That's because the drug trafficker—according to a retired DEA agent and a retired Metro Dade police officer who worked to hunt him down—had a knack for creating the illusion of intimacy with elected officials.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A few of those officials had the last name Bush.

But those donations didn't get him much.

In fact, as governor, Jeb Bush became a favorite of drug warriors. He mirrored his father's tough-on-drugs tactics in Florida, won the loyalty of cops and DEA agents, and showed the limits of money in politics.

When Jeb arrived in South Florida after the 1980 presidential campaign, it was a crazy time.

The use of drug money in politics was commonplace.

In fact, his dad's presidential campaign and the Jeb-helmed Dade County Republican Party both took contributions from Martinez, and faced minimal political repercussions when Martinez's true career was revealed.

Eduardo Gamarra, a professor in Florida International University's department of politics and international relations, said at that time Southern Florida was so saturated with cocaine-tainted cash that it would have been odd if none of it could get traced to Jeb.

"That's just the way things were in the 1980s," he said.

Gamarra added that grip-and-grin photos with drug dealers didn't immediately mean the politician was in league with them. Even then-state attorney Janet Reno appeared in a photo with Martinez when he was being investigated for bribery.

Martinez moved from Cuba to Miami when Castro rose to power, and he proceeded to build a successful construction business—with a lucrative marijuana- and cocaine-trafficking business on the side.

He also made a number of contributions to the Dade County Republican Party when young Jeb Bush chaired it, as Jack Colhoun detailed in an essay in the anthology Covert Action: The Roots of Terrorism. Martinez won respect in Republican circles and, according to his former defense attorney Ron Dresnick, even managed to snag a photo with Jeb. It was never released.

This came at a time when Jeb was laying some of the groundwork for the GOP's eventual and total takeover of state-level politics there. In 1984, Politico wrote, 4,000 Democrats became Republicans and 74 percent of Hispanics to join the voter rolls that year registered with the GOP.

That success ballooned, and Bush carried Miami-Dade in both of his successful gubernatorial campaigns. His impact in the Sunshine State is hard to overstate.

And a tiny little statistically insignificant sliver of it was thanks to coke money.

By 1989, Martinez was unmasked as a narcotrafficker. The Miami Herald reported that he had promised to give a covert Drug Enforcement Administration informant a dump truck worth $80,000 and five lots worth $120,000 in exchange for 300 kilograms of cocaine. The Herald also noted that, in a government affidavit, between 1981 and 1989 Martinez and his team endeavored to move hundreds of pounds of marijuana and "multi-hundred kilogram shipments of cocaine" into Southern Florida. As one does.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Martinez case was representative of a South Florida cocaine problem of cartoonish proportions—a culture where Jeb's political ambitions first began to flourish.

"It was a nuthouse," recalled Tom Raffanello, a former Special Agent in Charge of the DEA's Miami Field Division, who had that position for three years of Jeb's governorship there. "We averaged two drug-related shootings a month for almost two years. Everybody had a gun. Everybody was pissed off all the time."

Tony Kost, a retired Metro-Dade Police Department detective who worked to apprehend Martinez, Dominic Albanese (a retired DEA agent who worked on the investigation), and Raffanello all praised Jeb's work to continue the prosecution of the Drug War that started when his father, George H.W. Bush, was vice president for Ronald Reagan.

It's an interesting story of the failure of money in politics; though Martinez managed to donate his way into the good graces of South Florida Republicans, some of his favorite politicians ended up being the most dogged foes of his industry.

Albanese said that Jeb Bush's support of the War on Drugs—despite inadvertently appearing in a photo with a powerful drug trafficker—speaks to his integrity.

"I can't say enough good things about what the Bushes did for the anti-drug department, I'm telling you now," he added. "I know where we would have been if it wasn't for them. We'd be in deep kimchi right now, I'm telling you, with the drug problems."

Jeb Bush appointed the state's first drug czar, Jim McDonough, just a month after he assumed office. McDonough's responsibilities included coordinating statewide efforts to curtail the import and distribution of narcotics. Bush prioritized streamlining the communications between different agencies and governments—local, state, and federal—to make anti-drug efforts more efficient.

Gamarra, a Democrat, also said taking Martinez's cocaine cash shouldn't taint the Bush family's anti-drug legacy.

"It's kind of popular to go around saying we've lost the drug war," he said, "but South Florida really demonstrates how they built up the correct kind of legislation—financial controls and so on."

"You're not going to find an airplane flying into the Everglades dumping cocaine," he added. "Miami has drug problems today but this is not the 1980s by any stretch of the imagination."

Gamarra described Bush and his team as "the best drug warriors in town."

"Just like today everybody has to be a badass when it comes to fighting terrorists, the '80s and '90s were really the same," he continued. "You had to demonstrate that you were a drug warrior, that you were in favor of all the extreme kind of measures to stop drugs coming into the United States."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Data from the U.S. Department of Justice indicates that total violent crime grew at a slower rate than Florida's overall population during Bush's governorship.

While the population grew steadily, from 15.1 million people in 1999 to 18.3 million in 2007, the number of violent crimes committed in the state ebbed and flowed. In 1999, there were 129,044 total violent offenses. That number dipped to a low of 123,754 in 2004. And it grew to 129,602 in 2006, his last full year as governor.

That violent crime didn't grow at the same rate as the population seems to corroborate the anecdotal evidence from South Florida's top drug warriors—that, with time, the state became less bloody.

Raffanello said Bush's efforts to improve communication between local sheriffs, the DEA, and other law enforcement arms were particularly fruitful.

As governor, he and his wife, Columba, participated in yearly Tallahassee summits that brought together the state's drug warriors for networking, planning, and coordination. Raffanello said the impact of those meetings—and the impact of the governor's involvement with them—made statewide enforcement efforts more organized and effective.

"I thought he really gave a shit," Raffanello said. "It's refreshing to see a politician care about an issue."

So his efforts seem to have made Florida less violent and crazy, but Gamarra said the overall outcome was mixed. While drug-related violence went down, there weren't great results as far as overall drug use.

"The objective of all of this stuff was to stop the flow of drugs into the United States," he said. "And we have just as many drugs coming into the United States today as we did in 1985. And the price is cheaper and quality of the drugs is better."

Still, Raffanello said Jeb's greatest impact was the shift of drug violence from the Sunshine State to the U.S.-Mexico border, saying the violence in Florida decreased "exponentially."

"We probably had three of the most successful years we had in the last two decades," he said.

Jeb Bush Wants to Share // Real Clear Politics // Debra Saunders – July 19, 2015

The most recent time I had seen Jeb Bush speak in San Francisco was in January, he addressed the National Automobile Dealers Association. It is hard to imagine a group more invested in the old-school economy. It was a friendly crowd. The former Florida governor seemed comfortable -- and boring. I left feeling as if I'd spent an hour listening to a human BarcaLounger.

The Jeb Bush I saw Thursday morning was a different candidate. He had shed some 30 pounds on the Paleo Diet. His campaign had pulled the dynasty name from the campaign logo and added an exclamation point. Now he's "Jeb!" In this trip to San Fran, Bush ventured away from the stolid GOP base to address the young workforce of Thumbtack, a 6-year-old digital service that links consumers to painters, DJs, dog walkers and other contractors. Bush arrived in a Toyota Camry ordered via Uber -- the ride-hailing company that runs roughshod over the single-occupant vehicle model dear to car dealers.

It's hard to think of a clearer contrast to Hillary Clinton. In 2014, she told NADA, "The last time I actually drove a car myself was 1996." The former first lady, who has Secret Service protection for life, has no reason to use Uber.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a recent speech, the former secretary of state took Uber to task -- without, and this is so Clinton-like, naming Uber. She said: "Many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing websites, selling products they design themselves at home or even driving their own car. This on-demand, or so-called gig, economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation. But it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future."

According to The New York Times, Team Hillary "diplomatically contacted top officials at Uber to let them know about the passage in her speech that would draw attention to the service, according to people told of the conversations." That passage probably was: "I'll crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages."

Clinton clearly is on the side of politicians who want to cripple ride-hailing startups that allow individuals to drive their cars at their own discretion. These outfits truly reflect market demand. If consumers don't like a service, they won't use it. If drivers don't like the terms, they will stop offering rides. Competition improves the outcome -- but Clinton wants to impose more regulation.

In contrast, the son and brother of former presidents embraced the benefits of "disrupting the old order." Bush started the day extolling businesses such as Thumbtack on a LinkedIn post. "I love learning about these kinds of companies precisely because before they existed, their market didn't exist either," he wrote. Startups, he added, "cause mental dissonance for people who think they can plan the future of the economy from Washington D.C. -- people like Hillary Clinton."

"He's got a good grasp of the way tech is changing the workforce," Thumbtack economist Jon Lieber told me after the talk.

2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney extolled "creative destruction" as an essential element of free enterprise. He was right, but those words mean nothing to kids used to summoning wheels with their phones. They just know what they want. Perhaps 2016 will be the year capitalism finally clicks for millennial voters.

If so, Bush is ready. When a reporter asked him about Uber, Bush talked about a college student he met who graduated without crippling debt -- because he drove for Uber. A Thumbtacker asked Bush about Obamacare. He turned "repealing Obamacare" into an act of disruption that would free consumers to "opt out of these old models."

When a Thumbtack worker asked Bush what he thinks of new FCC net neutrality regulation dear to the South of Market crowd, Bush did not pander. He answered, "The unintended consequence of these top-down proven rules is always negative."

Unlike the man I saw in January, I think, I maybe could vote for this Jeb Bush. CEO Marco Zappacosta, 30, seemed to be enjoying Thumbtack's first presidential hopeful meet-and-greet, so I asked him: Would you vote for Bush? Zappacosta answered, "I don't know."

It's not clear at all that feeling the love for the sharing economy can win Bush young voters. During the Thumbtack town hall, no one asked Bush about Uber or Clinton or niggling regulations. Other than the net neutrality query, Thumbtackers asked about equal pay for women, about gun control, whether Bush supports state laws to protect gays from discrimination in housing and the workplace -- social issues where, as with net neutrality, young voters like government regulation. And really, they're not all that impressed when a Republican uses Uber.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush consultant critiques Republican digital culture // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – July 19, 2015

SAN FRANCISCO – A top digital consultant to Jeb Bush's presidential campaign had harsh words for Republican technologists on Saturday, saying that many of them are "impostors" and that the GOP has until recently been an "atrociously bad" place for tech-savvy people wanting to get involved in politics.

The Republican Party "was a terrible place for a smart technologist to come work," Andy Barkett, a former Facebook engineer, said at a conference on technology and politics hosted by Lincoln Labs, a conservative nonprofit group.

Barkett, who was hired by the Republican National Committee as its chief technology officer two years ago, made reference to his time at the RNC, which did not go smoothly.

"I mean, it was a terrible place for me when I started. It was horrible. It was, like, the worst experience of my life," Barkett said of his entry into Republican politics after spending more than a decade at Silicon Valley companies, where he moved into angel investing on the side. "It was just, like, atrociously bad."

Barkett was brought in after the RNC conducted an "autopsy" on the 2012 election that concluded they lagged far behind the Democrats in using technology to target voters for persuasion and turnout.

But Barkett said that Republican digital culture "is getting better, and now for the first time since I've been involved in it over the last few years, you can take a smart person and plug them in and they can be really effective and make a difference."

And yet, Barkett, 34, said that too many people in Republican politics, and political culture in general, still are too ignorant of basic technology.

"There's a whole bunch of people in politics who say a lot of words, all the buzzwords that we talked about, and they say, 'I want more analytics.' None of them have any idea what any of those things mean," he said, seated on a stage during a panel discussion alongside digital operatives working for the presidential campaigns of Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

"They have no idea what the difference is between building an infrastructure of servers that know how to send e-mails to having an e-mail list or the difference between the records in the voter file and the analytics that you do in addition to those," he said.

Barkett urged people in politics doing tech-related work to "get over the impostor syndrome and learn what the ef you are talking about."

"Be honest with yourself — you're probably a political person, and you probably don't know what the ef you're taking about. And the first thing you should do is probably dig in and learn. In the short run it will hurt you, because you will be exposed as a fraud," he said. "You people will learn that you don't know these things yet. And in the long run it will help you, because you will then be one of the 1 percent of people in politics who do know what they're talking about."

"I wouldn't say all 200 of them are complete phonies. I would say that a lot of them are good at one thing or another. So a lot of them may be very good at online fundraising, which is a thing, which is important, or they may be very good at online advertising in a political context, which is a thing that's important," Barkett said. "There's not a lot of people who are genuinely well-rounded technology leaders. It's a pretty small percentage of that number."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ralston Reports: Jeb Bush pandering to nativist wing // Reno Gazette-Journal // Jon Ralston – July 19, 2015

As he strives to become Bush 45, Jeb brought his "I'm the grown-up" campaign to Carson City on Friday, leaving behind an exclamation point on why being an infantile Trumpian is so much easier.

Bush spent an hour at a town hall amid 200 or so attendees at the Silver State Charter School in the capital, looking relaxed and facing nary a hostile query after a boilerplate presentation. He checked off all the boxes, with hoary anti-D.C. and anti-Obama rhetoric, albeit wrapped in kindler and gentler language Bush 41 would have appreciated, while also showing a facility and depth on issues not often seen at such events. And he went after the administration's Iran deal with a bellicosity that Bush 43 would have smiled about, carefully adding he does not question the president's motives.

But even as he projected an amiable seriousness and subtly emphasized he's not like the other guys, he couldn't help but reveal himself as man with a difficult needle to thread to get to the nomination: Pose as the adult in the room but occasionally be willing to be a child in the sandbox.

Nowhere was that duality more evident than on the issue of illegal immigration, where Bush clearly has switched his position on a path to citizenship and only because he is now running in a Republican primary for president.

Just two years ago, Bush told Charlie Rose he supported illegal immigrants becoming citizens: "You have to deal with this issue. You can't ignore it, and so either a path to citizenship, which I would support — and that does put me probably out of the mainstream of most conservatives — or... a path... to residency of some kind."

But this year, he has taken that off the table now that he is competing against Ted Cruz and The Donald and others pandering to the nativist wing. Why?

Give Bush credit for honesty when he explained why 10 days ago: "It has changed because the climate has changed, and this is the consensus view that allows conservatives to get in the game," he told Fox News.

I came (to run). I saw (the political landscape). I conquered (my consistency.)

I pressed Bush on the issue after his town hall, in which he talked thoughtfully and deliberately about the issue, disdaining harsh rhetoric ("Self-deportation is not a plan; it's a sentiment") but stopping short of supporting citizenship, leaving it at "legal status" after paying a fine, going to the back of the line and learning English.

He almost seemed peremptory during our exchange, reminding me, for some reason, of former Democratic Rep. Jim Santini in 1986, suddenly uncomfortable in his skin as a Republican-of-convenience running (unsuccessfully) for the U.S. Senate.

"Legal status: That's my consistent view," Bush told me. Well...

What about a path to citizenship, which he backed just two years ago?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Given the environment we're in now, given the need to build consensus on how we craft an immigration policy that allows us to grow is the right one," Bush replied.

Really? THAT's the reason to change your view? The political environment? Speak softly but pander with a loud voice?

Wouldn't that kind of policy include citizenship?

"No! Legal status!" Bush all but snapped and then turned away.

Will that be enough to cut into what a recent Univision poll showed was a 42-point gap between Bush and Hillary Clinton in Nevada, and enough to help him win Florida and Colorado, for instance? If he is relegating illegal immigrants to non-citizen status, is he then not agreeing with those "angrier voices" (hello, Trump) he decried, almost in sotto voce?

Maybe.

"There are people that are preying on people's legitimate fears and anger," Bush lamented at one point. "What I don't get is why people aspiring to the greatest office in the land are preying on their fears, preying on their anger. That I don't understand."

But isn't Bush responding to those same fears and exploiting them by suddenly taking a path to citizenship off the table? Is it less damaging than Trump's manifest idiocy or Cruz's inflammatory statements?

There's a pretty simple algorithm for presidential candidate visits to key states: They don't want to make news unless they have decided to make news, and then only the news they want to make.

Bush generally met that test, making sure he took oblique shots at Trump and Scott Walker, who repeated in a Las Vegas stop last week that he would reverse the Iran agreement on Day One. Bush tried to finesse that one too, albeit taking a serpentine path.

Bush said he wouldn't have talked to Iran, hated the deal but hadn't read it and would not simply abolish it without consulting allies and his national security apparatus. "If you're running for president, it's important to be mature and thoughtful about this," Bush said.

Or at least be mature and thoughtful after you've immediately attacked the president.

To his credit, Bush showed spine in criticizing Cliven Bundy ("He is breaking the law... and the law ought to be enforced.") and standing up for Common Core even though he wouldn't call it Common Core ("I'm for higher standards... it should be a national priority, not a federal program.")

And Bush clearly is frustrated, even exasperated with the Trump phenomenon, cutting off a CNN reporter who started to ask about something the Mouth that Boored said and exclaimed, "Oh my God!" He speaks for many.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The question remains whether all of Bush's money can buy him enough love in a GOP primary to defeat those who are speaking with much more strident voices on immigration, Iran and pretty much everything else, so long as he projects gravitas while subtly pandering, too.

Sometimes, even in a room full of adults, the child wailing the loudest gets the most affection.

Leaner, meaner: Jeb Bush starts his climb // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – July 19, 2015

Monday marks the first in a series of speeches by Jeb Bush "that will outline what his priorities will be as president, beginning with taking on Mount Washington and reforming the way D.C. works" — this according to his campaign. The inaugural speech itself is titled "Taking on Mount Washington," in fact.

While it is an interesting metaphor, the tone and tenor of it also could mark a change in demeanor for Mr. Bush which could help him fend off critics who frame his campaign as inconsequential or tepid. Indeed, the candidate appears to be evolving on the campaign trail. The leaner Mr. Bush has dropped 30 pounds, raised more money than his rivals, and ramped up his public presence; he was in four states last week, with more of same in the near future.

He's recently shown his compassionate conservative style and big tent thinking: "Rhetoric of divisiveness is wrong. A Republican will never win by striking fear into people's hearts. I campaign with my arms open. I campaign embracing diversity. Come join us, come join the team that is creating hope and opportunity," a cheerful and energetic Mr. Bush recently told an audience in Iowa.

But he now appears ready to rumble, and ready to release his inner Bush, or words to that effect. His "Mount Washington" speech, to be delivered at Florida State University in Tallahassee at 10 a.m. Monday, could prove a clear challenge to big government and stifling regulations — always popular with a wide swath of voters. And yes, C-SPAN will be there, often an indicator that some substance is expected.

"Is Trump's campaign effectively over?" asks Townhall political reporter Daniel Doherty. "Trump campaign implodes," declares a New York Post headline. Some wish it was true, perhaps; at least seven of Donald Trump's fellow Republican hopefuls strongly disagree with the billionaire's recent comment that Sen. John McCain was "only a hero because he was captured" during his deployment to Vietnam in 1967. Those critics included Sens. Lindsey Graham, Marco Rubio and Rand Paul, Govs. Scott Walker and Bobby Jindal, former Govs. Rick Perry and Jeb Bush, former Sen. Rick Santorum and businesswoman Carly Fiorina.

So. Is Mr. Trump's campaign over? "Depends on who you talk to," Mr. Doherty advises.

It also depends on the shelf life of the comment; even controversial remarks can lose their edge in the welter of incessant, incoming news coverage. Mr. Trump also appears to have moved on, telling ABC News on Sunday that he owes Mr. McCain no apology. But tenacious rivals may not be ready to let it go just yet, particularly since Mr. Trump has led multiple voter polls in recent days.

"Republicans begin to surround Trump before moving in for the kill," writes Tim Hain, an analyst for Real Clear Politics.

Well, maybe. But Republican National Committee spokesman Sean Spicer has released a statement: "Senator McCain is an American hero because he served his country and sacrificed more than most can imagine. Period. There is no place in our party or our country for comments that disparage those who have served honorably."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio: Trump insulted McCain and 'all POWs' // Politico // Kevin Robillard – July 19, 2015

Republicans continued to gang up on Donald Trump on Sunday for his comments disparaging Sen. John McCain's military service.

"I do," Florida Sen. Marco Rubio said on CNN's "State of the Union" when asked if he believed Trump's comments disqualified the bombastic billionaire real estate developer and entertainer from serving as commander in chief. "This is an insult to all POWs, all men and women who have served us in uniform and have been captured."

Rubio also defended Republicans from charges they should have spoken out more forcefully when Trump insulted Mexican immigrants. (Rubio was among the GOP presidential rivals who did speak out early against Trump's comments.)

"This is a man who spent his whole life saying outrageous things," Rubio said. "So, early in this campaign when he said something outrageous, people kind of said 'Just ignore it and move on. This is what he does.' But I think now as things have gone forward and he's become more of a covered candidate and people have paid more attention to him, it requires people to be more forceful about some of these offensive things that he is saying."

Trump ignited the firestorm on Saturday at a gathering of GOP presidential candidates in Iowa, declaring of the Republican senator from Arizona was "not a war hero. He was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

The comments were immediately and widely condemned by many GOP presidential candidates, including former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who almost immediately called for Trump to drop out of the race. The Republican National Committee, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush also were quick to join the condemnations. The only GOP presidential candidates who did not directly criticize Trump's comments were former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson.

Appearing on NBC's "Meet The Press" Sunday, Perry said he would leave it up to debate organizers to decide whether Trump should be eligible to join the other candidates on stage at the first forum Aug. 6.

"I'm real comfortable being on the stage with him and confronting him on a host of issues that he's just wrong on," Perry said.

But pressed by host Chuck Todd on whether the GOP should have embraced Trump with such a fervor four years ago when he campaigned with Mitt Romney and was still regularly falsely saying President Barack Obama was born outside the United States, Perry demurred and said the problem with Trump was his failure to reach out to minorities or offer solutions.

"I haven't heard any solutions coming from Donald Trump," Perry said.

On the "Meet The Press" roundtable, the American Enterprise Institute's Danielle Pletka was decidedly more blunt in assessing Trump.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He’s an idiot,” she said. “He’s in this for himself.”

McCain and Trump have spent the past week feuding after McCain said Trump had fired up the “crazies” during an appearance last weekend in Phoenix.

Democrats have also joined the fray.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, dismissed Trump’s comments as “shameful” on the campaign trail Saturday. And Secretary of State John Kerry, whose own war record was questioned during the 2004 presidential race, defended McCain.

“One thing I know is beyond debate is that John McCain is a hero, a man of grit and guts and character personified,” Kerry said. “He served and bled and endured unspeakable acts of torture. His captors broke his bones, but they couldn’t break his spirit, which is why he refused early release when he had the chance. That’s heroism, pure and simple, and it is unimpeachable.”

“If anyone doesn’t know that John McCain is a war hero,” he declared, “it only proves they know nothing about war and even less about heroism.”

Rubio: Trump's McCain attack a 'disqualifier' // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 19, 2015

"It's not just absurd, it's offensive. It's ridiculous. And I do think it's a disqualifier as commander-in-chief," Rubio said in an interview Sunday with CNN's Jake Tapper on "State of the Union."

The Florida senator was the latest Republican White House contender to hit Trump after the real estate mogul said Saturday that McCain "is not a war hero" because he was captured and held prisoner in Vietnam.

"He is a war hero because he was captured," Trump said. "I like people that weren't captured, OK?"

He walked back those comments on Twitter later, saying that "captured or not, all our soldiers are heroes!" But opponents who'd been looking for openings to criticize Trump were already piling on.

Rubio defended Republicans who were slow to criticize Trump over his controversial comments about undocumented Mexican immigrants a week ago, too, saying that it's been Trump's rise in the polls that has "required people to be more forceful on some of these offensive things he is saying."

"I spoke out against what Donald Trump said," Rubio said. "But we have to remember, this is a man who spent his whole life saying outrageous things."

Trump defended himself Sunday, issuing a statement touting his financial contributions to veterans' causes and criticizing Veterans Affairs hospitals with long waits for military veterans to receive medical care.

He also explained his attack on McCain, saying his anger is because "politicians like John McCain have totally failed" at tackling illegal immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He pointed to McCain's reaction to a Trump event in the Arizona senator's home state.

"Last week in Phoenix, I held a record breaking rally with thousands of people. They are devastated by what is happening with illegal immigration. This group was totally united -- the silent majority became alive," Trump said.

"These were fabulous people and great Americans but John McCain called them 'crazies,'" Trump said. "Everyone was very insulted by his disgusting and unfair characterization. A nation without borders is not a nation at all but John McCain has not been able to figure that out."

Marco Rubio says Iran deal breaks 'anytime, anywhere' inspection promise by Barack Obama // PolitiFact / / Louis Jacobson – July 19, 2015

The agreement reached with Iran over nuclear weapons remained a top issue on the Sunday July 19 news shows, with critics of the deal urging that it be scuttled by Congress.

On CNN's State of the Union, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., told host Jake Tapper that "this deal violates promises the president made to the American people on multiple fronts. It is not an anytime, anywhere inspection process."

This issue also came up on the same day on CBS's Face the Nation, when Secretary of State John Kerry said of anytime, anywhere inspections, "This is a term that, honestly, I never heard in the four years that we were negotiating. It was not on the table. There's no such thing in arms control as 'anytime, anywhere.' There isn't any nation in the world, none that has an anytime, anywhere. We always were negotiating was an end to the interminable delays that people had previously. "

On Rubio's claim, we see two questions. First, does the Iran deal fall short of an "anytime, anywhere inspection process"? And second, did Obama promise that it would include an inspection regime that strict?

Does the Iran deal fall short of an 'anytime, anywhere inspection process'?

We addressed this question in the course of checking a recent claim by Rep. Don Beyer, D-Va., that "thanks to the Obama administration's negotiations, Iran's nuclear program will be under lock, key and camera 24 hours a day, 365 days a year."

We found that it's correct that certain specific Iranian assets that will be under 24/7 monitoring by inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA.

According to the agreement, "for 15 years, Iran will permit the IAEA to implement continuous monitoring, including through containment and surveillance measures, as necessary, to verify that stored centrifuges and infrastructure remain in storage, and are only used to replace failed or damaged centrifuges."

This round-the-clock monitoring will explicitly include "electronic seals which communicate their status within nuclear sites to IAEA inspectors, as well as other IAEA approved and certified modern technologies," according to the agreement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For instance, at an Iranian facility like Natanz, where more than 5,000 centrifuges will be operating, the IAEA will have cameras that provide 24-hour monitoring, said Matthew Bunn, a nuclear specialist at the Harvard Kennedy School. In addition, the agreement says, "Iran will permit the IAEA regular access, including daily access as requested by the IAEA, to relevant buildings at (the Iranian nuclear facility at) Natanz ... for 15 years."

However, this sort of 24/7 surveillance will not be the rule everywhere in the Iranian nuclear archipelago.

"At most locations, inspections will be every once in a while, on a schedule the inspectors judge to be sufficient based on the sensitivity of the activities at that location, how long it would take for Iran to do something there that would make a difference, and so on," Bunn said.

In fact, even if Iran ultimately agrees to a contentious inspection, the wait could be as long as 24 days.

The agreement spells out that if the IAEA and Iran can't work out their differences over suspicions about undeclared nuclear materials or activities within 14 days, a joint commission empowered by the agreement would try to resolve the situation for another seven days. Once the commission decides what to do, Iran would have three more days to follow through.

In other words, when looking at Iran's nuclear complex as a whole, "the IAEA can't just drive up with no warning — it's not 'anytime, anywhere,' " Bunn said

So on this point, Rubio is justified in suggesting that the deal doesn't include "anytime, anywhere" inspections.

Did Obama promise that the agreement with Iran would include an 'anytime, anywhere' inspection regime?

This question is a bit more complicated.

We located at least one, and possibly two, instances in which Ben Rhodes -- an assistant to the president and deputy national security advisor for strategic communications and speechwriting -- said the deal would include "anytime, anywhere" inspections.

One of Rhodes' comments came in an interview with Tapper on April 6, 2015. Tapper asked Rhodes, "So the Israelis have put out this list of things that they think should be in the final deal with Iran, including allowing inspectors to go anywhere, anytime. That seems perfectly reasonable, no?"

Rhodes responded, "Well, Jake, first of all, under this deal, you will have anywhere, anytime 24/7 access as it relates to the nuclear facilities that Iran has."

The second of Rhodes' comments came on the same day, in an interview with Israel's Channel 10, April 6, 2015. After objecting to the paraphrases used in a widely cited Times of Israel article about the interview, the White House sent us a transcript of the exchange.

Rhodes was asked, "Will the IAEA have the ability to visit anywhere, anytime?"

Rhodes responded, "Yes, if we see something we want to inspect. So in the first case we will have 'anytime anywhere' access to all of the nuclear facilities. We'll have the ability to look across all of their supply chain, their uranium mines and mills, their centrifuge production and storage facilities. But I think what you're mainly referring to is if there's a suspicious site, for instance, on a military base in Iran, and we want to seek access to that we will be able to go to the IAEA, and get that inspection because of the additional protocol of the IAEA that Iran will be joining, and some of the additional transparency and inspection measures that are in the deal."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Much of the coverage has focused on Rhodes' agreement with the interviewer's words that the IAEA will "have the ability to visit anywhere, anytime." The White House notes, however, that Rhodes' full comments are more nuanced, spelling out the more complicated -- and not instantaneous -- process of inspecting suspicious sites not already cited in the agreement.

So we see one pretty clear statement, plus one somewhat less clear statement, made by the Obama administration that backs up Rubio's claim.

"The answer given by Ben Rhodes is consistent with the messaging that the Obama administration has been providing since the nuclear talks with Iran began," said Rick Brennan Jr., a senior political scientist with Rand Corp. "In fact, in 2012 President Obama declared that the final deal with Iran would ensure 'the end to their nuclear program,' which we now understand is not accurate."

That said, though, Rhodes' comments are something of an outlier to the words other White House officials have said. In general, the message from senior White House officials has been that the inspections regime in the deal would be strong by historical standards -- and strong enough to achieve its goals -- but not allowing "anytime, anywhere" inspections.

Critics like Rubio "are trying to imply that the Obama administration promised that international inspectors bust into any undeclared Iranian site, whenever they felt like doing so, and without cause," said Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association. However, that was not the administration's goal, because "no sovereign state would agree to such an arrangement; no such access is necessary to verify compliance; and any such arrangement would waste the inspectors' resources. Iran is a large country and the inspectors should and will focus on particular areas/sites of concern."

A good example of the White House's usual wording is the briefing held by Press Secretary Josh Earnest on March 9, 2015. Here are some of the phrases Earnest used to describe the extent of the inspection regime:

• "We're going to insist that the Iranians agree to intrusive inspection measures that will resolve the broader international community's concerns."

• "What we are seeking from Iran are a whole set of commitments from them ... to comply with an intrusive set of inspections to verify their compliance with the agreement."

• "They're going to have to agree to a set of very intrusive inspections."

• "Any sort of agreement that is reached will require serious commitments on the part of Iran to an intrusive inspections program that allows international inspectors not just into their nuclear facilities, but also into the manufacturing facilities that are manufacturing parts and equipment for their nuclear facilities that would require inspections at uranium mines in Iran."

• "We would insist ... that Iran commit to comply with a historically intrusive set of inspections."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• The deal would "impose an intrusive set of inspections that would verify Iran's compliance with the agreement."

Such language has been echoed numerous other times by White House officials, including Obama.

In a Rose Garden address on April 2, 2015, four days before Rhodes' televised comments, Obama said: "Iran will face strict limitations on its program, and Iran has also agreed to the most robust and intrusive inspections and transparency regime ever negotiated for any nuclear program in history. ... International inspectors will have unprecedented access not only to Iranian nuclear facilities, but to the entire supply chain that supports Iran's nuclear program -- from uranium mills that provide the raw materials, to the centrifuge production and storage facilities that support the program."

Obama repeated the sentiment in his weekly address on April 4, 2015, and the message was echoed by others -- including Rhodes himself. At a press briefing at Camp David May 14, 2015, Rhodes said, "Under this agreement that we're pursuing with the Iranians, (the nuclear) program will be rolled back and face significant limitations that it doesn't currently face, and there will be the most intrusive inspections regime of any arms control agreement that we've ever had."

Rhodes also backtracked on the "anywhere, anytime" phrasing in an interview with CNN's Erin Burnett on July 14, 2015.

"We never sought in this negotiation the capacity for so-called 'anytime, anywhere' where you can basically go anywhere in the country, look at whatever you wanted to do, even if it had nothing to do with the nuclear program. What we did seek is beyond this comprehensive verification of the nuclear sites. If we have a suspicion about a site, we have the ability to go to the IAEA, the organization that conducts inspections, and to say, we need to inspect that site."

So Rubio's not wrong to say that the Obama administration promised "anywhere, anytime" inspections. However, it's also reasonable to point out that most of the administration's statements on this point have not used that specific language.

Our ruling

Rubio said that the Iran nuclear deal "violates promises the president made to the American people" because it "is not an anytime, anywhere inspection process."

Rubio has a point that a senior administration national-security official did, in at least one case and possibly two cases, say on television that the deal would include "anytime, anywhere" inspection provisions. However, focusing on these two comments is a bit of cherry-picking, since most of the White House's statements on this issue have avoided that term in favor of ones that can be more plausibly used to describe the provisions of the agreement that were ultimately reached.

The statement is partially accurate but leaves out important details, so we rate it Half True.

Rubio: Clinton's Uber Criticisms Show Someone 'Trapped In The Past' // Free Beacon // Andrew Kugle – July 19, 2015

During an interview on CNN's State of the Union Sunday, Sen. Marco Rubio (R., Fla.), said that Hillary Clinton is trapped in the past.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton outlined some of her economic platform in which she complained that new companies like Uber should treat their drivers as employees and not contractors so they can provide certain benefits to them.

"She's trying to apply 20th century constricts to a 21st century innovative industry," Rubio said. "We're trying to regulate internet development the way we regulated telephony, you know, telephone systems 20 years ago. You cannot regulate 21st century industries with 20th century ideas."

Rubio also stated that Clinton was trapped in the past.

"And her take on Airbnb, Lyft, Uber, these sorts of things, is a perfect example of someone who's trapped in the past, and cannot understand how much the world is changing, and how much it's going to change in the years to come economically," Rubio said.

PAUL

CRUZ

Ted Cruz drops off D.C. bestseller list // WaPo // Ron Charles – July 19, 2015

You win some, you lose some.

Even as Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) convinced the New York Times that his memoir is a genuine bestseller, his book fell off The Washington Post's bestseller list.

Such are the vicissitudes of publishing and various book-buying markets around the country.

Let's back up to the beginning of July.

The presidential candidate's book, "A Time for Truth," sold almost 12,000 copies nationwide its first week, but the Times refused to list it, reportedly because the editors suspected that someone was gaming the system by buying up copies in bulk. (Such books are routinely omitted.)

Meanwhile, "A Time for Truth" came in at No. 4 on The Washington Post list for the week ending July 5. The Post relies on Nielsen BookScan for data on sales in the greater Washington area.

After Cruz campaign spokesperson Rick Tyler accused the Times of "obvious partisan bias," the paper relented. The Times now lists Cruz's book at No. 7 for the period ending July 11. (That's the list readers will see in the Times's Book Review next Sunday, on July 26.)

But here in Washington, sales of "A Time for Truth" appear to be falling quickly. Cruz's book dropped off The Post's top 10 list this week. (If our list extended beyond 10, you'd see "A Time For Truth" at No. 15.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's at odds with the trend nationwide. Publishers Weekly lists his book at No. 7, with almost 19,000 copies sold at the end of its second week.

It's possible, of course, that Cruz's spat with the Times will boost his book's sales here in the Washington area. There is, after all, no bad publicity in publishing.

Ted Cruz Looks for His Iowa Moment // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 19, 2015

While Republican firebrand Donald Trump has seized control of news headlines over the past few weeks, it's Texas Senator Ted Cruz who may be poised for a breakout moment on the campaign trail, particularly after impressing conservatives over the weekend in the key state of Iowa.

Cruz led the presidential pack in fundraising during the latest quarter of the campaign, hauling in a remarkable $14.3 million in addition to $38 million raised by super PACs supporting him. He's enjoying greater publicity with the release of his book A Time for Truth, over which he battled with the New York Times about a spot on its coveted bestseller list. And he's raising fresh hackles in the Senate by threatening to block all of President Barack Obama's nominees to the State Department unless Congress gets to review the Iran nuclear deal prior to a United Nations vote.

Cruz's hopes of competing for the big prize likely hinge on Iowa, the first nominating contest which, unlike other early states, plays to his strengths, with an outsize crop of evangelical and hard-right Republicans. Judging from his reception in Iowa over the weekend, Cruz has some reason for optimism.

'A great shot'

"Senator Cruz has a great shot," said Bob Vander Plaats, a social conservative activist in Iowa who endorsed Mike Huckabee in 2008 and Rick Santorum in 2012—both went on to win the state caucuses. "He's definitely a movement conservative, who has $51 million behind him. Quite frankly, we've been hoping for a movement conservative to be well resourced."

At a Saturday gathering of religious conservatives here in Ames, Iowa hosted by Vander Plaats's group The Family Leader, Cruz turned a ho-hum question-and-answer session into a parade of cheers with his distinctive right-wing edge and wit.

Republican pollster Frank Luntz, adorned in his trademark American flag-themed sneakers as he interviewed Cruz, tried to throw the Texan off his game by pointing out that the 2013 government shutdown that he led had failed in its goal of defunding Obamacare. Cruz spun it into a tale of him "standing and fighting" against Washington. The crowd ate it up. Next, Luntz asked the crowd if they'd like to have a governor or a senator become president—overwhelmingly the answer was a governor.

Cruz interrupted: "Actually Frank, let me jump in and ask: how many of you would like to have a conservative as your next president?"

Deafening applause. Luntz was flustered. Cruz had taken over.

A festival of red meat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's a pattern that would continue through the half-hour session, which was littered with applause lines and featured two spontaneous standing ovations—one when Cruz called for defunding and prosecuting Planned Parenthood over a recent video he called "gruesome and disgusting," which featured one of its officials discussing donating fetal organs; another when he vowed, if elected, to revoke "every single unconstitutional, illegal executive action" Obama has taken. He also attacked against the Supreme Court's decision to legalize same-sex marriage nationwide, accusing his fellow Republicans who don't want to amend the constitution of spouting Obama talking points, and trashed the new Iran nuclear accord.

It was a festival of red meat for a crowd that lapped it all up. In a classic Cruzian act, he himself stood up with the crowd to applaud several of his own lines.

"You're a powerful speaker," Luntz deadpanned.

Of course, it was a Cruz-friendly crowd, but the same reception was not enjoyed by other social conservatives like Scott Walker, the Wisconsin governor currently leading the field in Iowa polls, or Huckabee, who is running for president again.

"And thank you for being a fighter," said one attendee who asked Cruz a question about "Commiecare," devising a new jeering term for the Affordable Care Act.

Obstacles ahead

Now the unsettling part for Cruz: The Family Leadership Summit was a reminder that anything less than an impressive showing in Iowa could doom Cruz's chances. He's not a natural fit for any other of the early states—New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada—and after those contests are decided, the field is expected to narrow significantly. And so far, Cruz has yet to show polling strength in the Hawkeye State. He was tied for fourth place in a Quinnipiac University poll of Iowa Republican voters released July 1. A prior Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa poll late May placed him in the middle of the pack. Potential was there—primary voters viewed him favorably—but they preferred others.

As Trump sucked up most of the oxygen Saturday with an inflammatory remark deriding Arizona Senator John McCain's war record, Cruz stood apart from most candidates in refusing to disavow the brash real estate mogul's remarks. That seems risky given the intense backlash, but it may be a calculated strategy that involves playing nice with Trump in the hope that he flames out and his supporters flock to Cruz. It's a lot of supporters, too: Trump has led the Republican field in several national polls lately.

Cruz's other problem is the massive field of candidates competing for the conservative vote, including Walker, Huckabee, Santorum and Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal.

The question is whether Cruz's book publicity and tour through Iowa can translate into the polling boost he needs. If not now, when?

"People like [Cruz] because of his bold and courageous spirit," Vander Plaats said. "He's not only willing to take on Democrats but he's willing to take out the Republicans who wear our jerseys but score for the other team."

CHRISTIE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'I Wouldn't Let This Guy Buy a Car For Me': Chris Christie Slams Obama on Iran Deal // Vice // Gillian Mohney – July 19, 2015

New Jersey governor and presidential hopeful Chris Christie once again didn't mince his words while discussing President Barack Obama, this time as he slammed the recent Iran nuclear deal.

Speaking to a crowd at a campaign stop in Franklin, New Hampshire late last week, Christie criticized the deal, saying oversight of Iran's nuclear problem would be compromised by an arbitration process.

"I wouldn't let this guy buy a car for me, let alone negotiate an arms deal with Iran," Christie said of Obama.

While nuclear negotiations regarding Iran's proposed program have been going on for a decade, the recent deal was announced on Tuesday after a marathon 18 day session, when Iran and a group of countries known as the P5+1 — the US, Russia, Britain, China and France, plus Germany — came to an agreement that is intended to limit Tehran's nuclear ambitions in exchange for relief from crippling international sanctions.

Christie told the crowd in Franklin that Obama had mis-characterized the situation to the public, describing the deal as "not built on trust, it is built on verification." Christie said that if United Nations investigators want to go to a uranium enrichment site, they have to request access from the government.

"If they object, it then goes to an arbitration panel, and the Iranians have a vote on the arbitration panel, as do the Russians and Chinese," Christie said, adding that the panel will then have another 24 days to make a decision. He compared the potential situation to asking for a search warrant and then having to wait 24 days to gather evidence.

"I got to tell you the truth, if you were engaged in that crime, I got a feeling when I came back 24 days later that evidence would be gone," said Christie.

The governor was just the latest to join in among Republican presidential candidates who have criticized the president for agreeing to the deal. Immediately after it was announced, Mike Huckabee called the deal "evil" on Twitter, and wrote that if needed he would consider using the military to topple the "terrorist Iranian regime."

Rand Paul, who previously said he would have an open mind about the deal, said he is against the agreement for multiple reasons.

"While I continue to believe that negotiations are preferable to war, I would prefer to keep the interim agreement in place instead of accepting a bad deal," he said on Facebook earlier this week.

Jeb Bush was not as defiant as his peers, and according to CNN he told a crowd that if elected president he would not destroy the current deal as soon as he's sworn in.

"One thing I won't do is just say as a candidate: 'I'm just going to tear up the agreement on the first day.' That sounds great, but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first. Maybe you ought to appoint a secretary of state, maybe a secretary of defense," he said. "You might want to have your team in place before you take an act like that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, however, is far from supporting the deal, which he said left him "deeply worried," according to CNN. He also said "every aspect of this deal, I think, is headed south."

Across the globe in Iran, the country's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei came just short of endorsing the deal and framed it as a win for Iran.

"After 12 years of struggling with the Islamic republic, the result is that they have to bear the turning of thousands of centrifuges in the country," Khamenei said according to the New York Times. While Khamenei's statements may make the deal more likely to be approved in that country, it could cause problems in the US, if his statements are seized by the deal's opponents.

The US Congress has 60 days to review the deal before sanctions can be lifted, and could potentially hold up its progress up even longer.

Chris Christie tries to trump Donald on immigration // NJ // Paul Mulshine – July 19, 2015

He was going along good for a while there.

On Thursday, Chris Christie visited Camden to outline his views on criminal-justice reform. Those views were quite innovative. But then he decided to try for a sound bite on the issue of immigration.

It bit back.

As recently as last April, the governor was positioning himself as a moderate on immigration.

"There are not enough law enforcement officers in all the country if all they were doing is rounding up and deporting people," he told a crowd in New Hampshire.

But on Thursday, he turned into a tough guy. He brought up the case of that unfortunate young woman who was killed by a stray bullet when walking with her father at a popular tourist spot in San Francisco. Police later traced the bullet to the gun of an undocumented immigrant with a long criminal record. San Francisco authorities had released him from jail in keeping with their policy of running a sanctuary city.

"Sanctuary cities have to stop protecting felons in the midst of law-abiding people," Christie said. "That has to end and if I'm elected president it will end in a Christie administration."

That San Francisco shooting has been in the news largely because of Donald Trump. Trump has risen to the top of the polls the race for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination largely because of his pounding on the immigration issue.

Meanwhile Christie's been relegated to the ranks of the 2 percenters, the candidates who are fighting to make the cut for the Aug. 6 Fox News debate. So you can see the reason he wants to sound tough on sanctuary cities.

But if you happen to be a certain former mayor of Morristown, you've got to have a good laugh upon hearing those words from Christie.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's hypocritical for him to say he's not going to have sanctuary cities when he had the entire state of New Jersey as a sanctuary state," said Don Cresitello.

Back in 2007 when Christie was the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey he had a highly publicized confrontation with Cresitello over the immigration enforcement. Cresitello had applied with the federal government for 287(g) status for his town. Local police would have been trained and authorized to enforce federal immigration laws.

Though Cresitello is a Democrat, he faced opposition from the entire Republican establishment that runs the county as well as the U.S. Attorney, he said.

At the height of the controversy Christie visited a local church with a largely Latino congregation and told the crowd that "Being in this country without proper documentation is not a crime."

That quote got him denounced by TV commentator Lou Dobbs as "out of his mind. Dobbs went on to report that that he could find only 13 instances between 2002 and 2007 in which Christie's office prosecuted immigration violations compared with 597 prosecutions by the U.S. attorney for Kansas during the same period.

But it was what happened next that offers a direct parallel to the San Francisco situation. After four college students were gunned down in a Newark schoolyard by members of a Latino gang, it was revealed that the ringleader was an undocumented immigrant who'd been released on bail by Essex County officials after being arrested for assault.

"There's the same situation. Newark was a sanctuary city," said Cresitello. "Those murders never would have happened if the law was enforced. Christie never did anything about it."

Actually, he did. After he was elected governor, Christie chose as his attorney general Paula Dow. Dow was the same county prosecutor who had failed to notify federal officials that the county was holding the undocumented alien who later led the gang involved in the schoolyard shooting.

But if Christie now wants to get tough on illegal immigration, there's nothing stopping him, said Cresitello, who is no longer mayor.

"You don't need a federal law to prosecute a contractor for hiring illegals," he said. "The governor has the authority under current state labor law to do whatever he wants to stop the hiring of illegals."

A muster zone for the hiring of day workers that was the subject of the 2007 debate is still in operation. It's about a mile from the place in Morristown where Christie is setting up his national campaign headquarters. That should make for some nice video if the national media come calling.

Perhaps the governor should do something about it. And maybe she will. Most days of the week, that's Kim Guadagno. Back when she was sheriff of Monmouth County, Guadagno also applied for 287(g) status for her officers.

So at least one member of the administration can claim to be tough on immigration enforcement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But it sure isn't Christie.

PERRY

Rick Perry: Boy Scouts 'better off' without gay leaders // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 19, 2015

Rick Perry opposes openly gay leaders in the Boy Scouts of America, he said Sunday, even after that organization dropped its ban on such scoutmasters.

"I believe that scouting would be better off if they didn't have openly gay scoutmasters," the former Texas governor and 2016 GOP presidential candidate said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The Boy Scouts dropped its policy banning gay scouts in 2013. And earlier this month, the organization also dropped its ban on gay scoutmasters after a push by the group's national president, former Defense Secretary Bob Gates.

His comments come as Republicans court socially conservative voters in the wake of the Supreme Court's June decision legalizing same-sex marriage everywhere in the United States.

Conservatives have responded by pushing state-level measures to protect businesses from having to participate in same-sex marriage ceremonies in the name of religious freedom. Republican presidential candidates have also said they disagree with the Supreme Court's ruling.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said in an interview with CNN's Dana Bash that aired Sunday that he doesn't know if being gay is a choice. And he said he supported the Boy Scouts of America's old ban on openly gay scoutmasters.

"I thought the policy was just fine. I'm saying when I was in scouts, it was fine. You're asking what should the policy be going forward. It should be left up to the leaders of the scouts," Walker said.

Rick Perry Slams GOP Rival: 'We're Seeing the Real Donald Trump Now' // NBC // Dan Cooney – July 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry on Sunday responded to Donald Trump's controversial comments about Sen. John McCain's military service, saying that "we're seeing the real Donald Trump now."

"We're seeing an individual who's more interested in throwing invectives and this hyperbolic rhetoric out there, rather than laying out solutions," the former Texas governor told Chuck Todd on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Trump, who in the past has referred to McCain as a "dummy," was asked to defend those comments Saturday at the conservative Family Leadership Summit in Ames, Iowa.

"Is that appropriate in running for president?" asked the summit's host, Frank Luntz. Lutz, a prominent pollster, later said, "He's a war hero."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump apparently disagreed. "He's not a war hero," he responded. "He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people that weren't captured."

Perry on Sunday slammed Trump's comments.

"It matters that we have a commander in chief that respects what those individuals have done," Perry said, referring to veterans. "I still stand by my statement. Until Mr. Trump apologizes directly to John McCain, and also to the veterans of this country, I don't think he has the character or the temperament to hold the highest position in this country."

Sen. Tom Cotton, R-Ark., also appearing on "Meet the Press," said he disagreed with Trump's comments on McCain and said the fellow senator is "a great American."

"I would recommend that he apologize and retract them, and then get back to the campaign that he's been running on," Cotton said.

Trump, when asked Sunday morning on ABC's "This Week" if he would apologize to McCain, said, "No, not at all." He later said, "When I left the room, it was a total standing ovation. It was wonderful to see. Nobody was insulted."

McCain has yet to publicly address the comments.

Perry on Sunday also discussed the possibility of facing Trump in the upcoming Republican presidential debates. When asked if he would advocate for Trump getting kicked off the debate stage, he said he would let the debate organizers decide that.

"I'm real comfortable being on the stage with him and confronting him on a host of issues that he's just wrong on. I mean, there's one thing to just spew invectives and spew rhetoric out there. But America's looking for somebody that's got some solutions," Perry said. "And I'll be real honest with you, I haven't heard any solutions coming from Donald Trump. Just rhetoric."

Perry Still Opposes Gay Scout Leaders, While Walker Backtracks // TIME // Justin Worland – July 19, 2015

Former Texas Governor Rick Perry said Sunday that he still opposes openly gay leaders in the Boy Scouts of America, even as the organization has moved to change a policy that banned such leaders.

“I believe that Scouting would be better off if they didn’t have openly gay Scoutmasters,” the GOP presidential candidate said on Meet the Press Sunday.

The Boy Scouts changed a policy banning gay scouts in 2013. After taking the helm of the organization last year, former Defense Secretary Robert Gates called for the organization to drop the ban on gay leaders as well. Earlier this month, the Boy Scouts executive committee voted to do just that.

Perry, who wrote a book about the Boy Scouts last year, isn’t the only GOP presidential candidate to support the ban. In a statement earlier in the week, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said the BSA should keep the ban on openly gay leaders, but in an interview with CNN he backtracked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I thought the policy was just fine. I'm saying when I was in Scouts, it was fine. You're asking what should the policy be going forward. It should be left up to the leaders of the Scouts," he said.

Both Walker and Perry are Eagle Scouts and cite their achievement in campaign materials.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham Defends John McCain: 'Being Captured Doesn't Mean You're A Loser' // HuffPo // Samantha-Jo Roth – July 19, 2015

South Carolina senator and Republican presidential candidate Lindsey Graham rose to defend Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on Saturday, after Donald Trump attacked McCain's record as a war hero.

"I think he crossed a line with a lot of people, not just me. John is my best friend in politics and one of my best friends in life," Graham told The Huffington Post at a campaign stop in Iowa on Saturday. "This will work out. Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina Republicans are conservative, but they aren't going to put up with this. This will work itself out. I'm not calling for him to get out of the race, I'm calling for people of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina to tell him he's fired."

"If you want to be commander in chief, you need to understand how the military works. Being captured doesn't mean you're a loser, it means you put yourself at great risk and you probably are young to go through hell while you're in captivity. It just shows a lack of understanding of the military, lack of respect for those who have served," he added.

McCain spent five and a half years in a North Vietnam prison where he was tortured after his bomber plane was shot down in 1967. Trump has refused to apologize for his remarks, despite near unanimous denouncements from his Republican rivals for the White House.

Graham said Trump's latest antics were the last straw.

"I can understand being frustrated about immigration, but there's no justification to slander a bunch of people that are hardworking folks," he said. "This is a line that is crossed. I think the American people, the caucusgoers, the primary voters are going to fix this. To the other candidates, this is your chance to do the right thing and disassociate yourself from somebody who has basically shown a lack of judgment to be commander in chief and to be president of us all."

CARSON

Ben Carson: Walking away from paid speaking commitments would be 'unethical' // Washington Examiner // Ryan Lovelace – July 19, 2015

AMES, Iowa — Ben Carson has run an unconventional presidential campaign and benefited handsomely. The retired neurosurgeon has never held elected office, but enjoys the support of many Iowans in attendance at the Family Leadership Summit on Saturday.

His most recent book's sales quadrupled in the immediate weeks after launching his presidential campaign, and his personal financial disclosure shows he made more than $4 million from delivering speeches across the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carson continues to give speeches for cash while on the campaign trail, and explained his reasoning for doing so while in Ames, Iowa, this weekend. He said he used to do about 100 or so paid speaking events per year, but only has two or three remaining this year.

"[I] tried to get rid of all of them, but there are a few straggling events," Carson said in response to a question from the Washington Examiner. "Some people have said to me, 'Well, why don't you just cancel those?' Well, what they don't recognize is these people have spent enormous amounts of money, time, and energy getting sponsors, setting tables; frequently this is their annual budget that we're talking about. And for me to just to walk out on them is unethical."

Other presidential candidates have stayed on the paid-speaking circuit while running for president. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee collected payment for his speeches during his failed 2008 presidential bid. He wound up with a television show on Fox News after his campaign faltered.

Carson is polling among the top five GOP presidential candidates nationally, and appears poised to appear in the first televised primary debate next month. Carson told reporters the biggest lesson he has learned during the first couple of months on the campaign trail is to avoid making inflammatory statements littered with buzz words.

But Carson also appeared to gain unwanted attention when he declined to say whether Sen. John McCain was a "war hero," in light of Donald Trump's earlier assertion that Trump was a war hero because he was held in captivity. Carson said whether McCain was a war hero "depends on your definition of a war hero," and chose not to provide any explanation. He did say he thought McCain had done some wonderful things.

Carson appears intent on making sure his message does not get lost in the shuffle of comments that others perceive to be controversial, but it appears that he still has some work to do before he takes the debate stage next month.

FIORINA

Carly Fiorina on the bubble // Politico // Eli Stokols – July 19, 2015

LAS VEGAS — When Carly Fiorina took the stage here Saturday night, she bathed in warm applause from the 200 or so attendees of the annual Mavericks PAC conference and relished her status as the only woman seeking the GOP presidential nomination.

“Go ahead, admit it,” she said to the 20- and 30-something conservatives seated in the ballroom as the cheering quieted down. “You want to see me debate Hillary Clinton in the general election.”

But there was no getting around the glaring subtext of that opening line: The woman hoping to capitalize on her unique ability to nullify the likely Democratic nominee’s gender advantage in a debate next year might not even make the first Republican primary debate in less than three weeks.

Fox News Channel, which is hosting the Aug. 6 forum in Cleveland, is taking the top 10 candidates based on an average of national polls. Fiorina, for the moment, is polling 14th out of 15 officially declared candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Everybody’s sort of fixated on this first debate and I’ve been honest, I’d love to be on that first debate stage and I’m working really hard to get there. I think I will be,” Fiorina said in an interview following her 45 minutes on stage. “If I’m not, it’s not the end of the world, it’s not the end of the campaign.”

Despite her low standing nationally, Fiorina has shown an ability to connect in New Hampshire, where she’s fifth in the most recent poll of the Republican field on the strength of a commitment to retail politics in the state.

Early state polls, however, don’t figure into the criteria for participation in the first debate; and in a race dominated by national figures and personalities like Donald Trump, whose bull in a China shop routine has left almost no media oxygen for other candidates in recent weeks. Fiorina’s methodical approach — however warmly she’s been received in New Hampshire — may not be enough for her to break through.

At this point, she says, there’s still time — more than six months, in fact, until primary voting begins.

“I think it will work itself out,” she said. “I think people, given enough time and enough information, kind of sort it out. So now we need to make sure they have enough time and enough information.”

Fiorina said voters got important information about Trump on Saturday, when he disparaged Sen. John McCain by questioning whether the Vietnam veteran who spent six years in a North Vietnamese prison was truly a war hero — and drew the loudest, more unrestrained chorus of criticism from his Republican rivals to date.

“GOP voters deserve better than outrageous statements & personal attacks,” Fiorina tweeted earlier Saturday. Rick Perry and Lindsey Graham, both military veterans (and also on the debate bubble), went even harder at Trump, calling for the bombastic billionaire to quit the race.

Trump’s sudden, unexpected surge has become an issue for the GOP field from top to bottom and for a Republican Party hoping to broaden its appeal. It’s undeniable that his personal celebrity and name ID is unmatched, and that there is a deep disaffection among some conservatives to whom his combative criticism — of immigrants, President Barack Obama, other more measured Republicans — is viscerally satisfying and resonant.

Fiorina, on the other hand, has no national profile and no real fundraising network to speak of. Unwilling to go practice Trump’s politics of grievance, Fiorina is left with little choice but to keep plodding away and hoping that this moment, Trump’s, gives way to her own.

“In New Hampshire, when we started, May 4, less than 4 percent of New Hampshire voters had ever heard my name — less than four percent — and we’re now tied for number four in the polls,” she said. “It takes enormous effort to get out there and go everywhere possible so that the message gets out.”

“I’m pleased with the progress we’re making in terms of getting out and getting known. I’m pleased with the progress we’re making in terms of building donor files and email lists, but we’re going to build it more slowly than others. As I’ve said all along, I’m not going to raise as much money as everybody else, not at first, but on the other hand, the election isn’t tomorrow.”

When she concluded her time on stage Saturday night, she asked the young conservatives in the room, who heard from Jeb Bush on Friday night, not to be swayed by her long-shot status but to help her overcome it.

“As a candidate who is not a professional politician, I need more help and more support than lots of others,” she told them. “I don’t have years of email lists; I don’t have years of donor lists, so I would really appreciate your consideration to help me and to support me. I think our nation is at a critical time and I think we do need someone different now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think we need someone different to win in 2016 and we must win."

Fiorina did not receive quite the same hero's welcome that Mav PAC attendees lavished on Bush, whose two sons helped found the group to maintain their network of young donors after his brother's 2004 presidential campaign. But Jay Ziedman, a Mav PAC co-chairman from Houston, feels strongly that serious candidates like Fiorina who make the effort to speak to groups like his, should have a place on the debate stage.

"Trump's running a reality show and, unfortunately, that's going to get him on the stage, whereas she should be up there instead of him," Ziedman said.

"He's making a mockery and a joke of running for the presidency of the United States, when there's people like Carly Fiorina putting in the time, building their own donor base, building their own list, and really networking. Trump's not raising money, he's not building support from grassroots conservatives — he's just out there running his mouth. It's disgusting."

Reynolds: Carly Fiorina, the other woman // USA Today // Glenn Harlan Reynolds – July 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton is fond of saying that if she's elected, she'll be the first woman president. But there's someone else who can say that as well. Her name is Carly Fiorina, and she's running for the Republican presidential nomination. With her history as a high-powered CEO (at Hewlett-Packard) and with cheeky videos (at BuzzFeed), Fiorina is in it to win it, just like Clinton. But because she's not as well known as Clinton, I asked her a few questions:

1. Hillary is talking about the middle class. What's the difference between your program and hers?

CF: "We help the middle class when we unburden them from the very policies that Hillary Clinton would double down on. She champions Big Government, which we know enables crony capitalism and exacerbates inequality. If you are wealthy, powerful and well-connected, you can handle Big Government. If you are small and powerless, you are getting crushed by things like our colossal, 70,000-page tax code. I have advocated for rolling back regulations, simplifying the tax code and moving to zero-based budgeting — policies that will support small businesses and raise up the middle class."

2. You said last week that Donald Trump has tapped into a general anger at the establishment. Why are people angry, and what's your answer?

CF: "People are angry that things as common sense as securing the border and eliminating sanctuary cities are being framed as extreme views. They are tired of empty rhetoric without action, and they are hungry for a leader from outside the professional political class. I think we need a real plan, which is why I have offered a much more specific approach to securing the border, fixing the legal immigration system and addressing illegal immigration."

3. Like Hillary, you're a female candidate. Like Trump, you're coming from a private sector background. What distinguishes you from each of them?

CF: "I come from a world where accountability and accomplishments matter, and where titles and rhetoric take a back seat to results. Those in the professional political class come from a world of bickering and posturing, where they spend more time worrying about protecting their position and power than doing the work of the American people. If Americans want the status quo to change, it is time to reach outside of the industry intent on preserving it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4. What would you do about the threats of Iran and the terrorist organization Islamic State?

CF: "As CEO of Hewlett-Packard, chair of the CIA's External Advisory Board and adviser to several secretaries of Defense, I have negotiated many deals. So I know that President Obama broke all of the rules of good negotiating and, as a consequence, he achieved none of his stated goals. As president, I would roll back the deal with Iran and restore our trusted friendship with Israel.

"Our allies in the Middle East know that the Islamic State is their fight — and they have asked for very specific things to help push back against ISIL. The Egyptians have asked for intelligence and the Jordanians for bombs and materiel. We must give our allies the help they need to confront and defeat this evil."

5. What's the most important issue that's not being talked about so far in this campaign?

CF: "People are tired of the status quo. You see that in various movements in and out of our party, but most candidates are offering hollow rhetoric, not specific solutions. We must first do two very specific things: We must simplify our 70,000-page tax code, and we must move to zero-based budgeting. We have runaway spending because we view smaller funding increases as budget cuts. Zero-based budgeting would fix that, forcing every agency to justify every dollar. When Hillary Clinton talks about adding more restrictions and complexity to our financial system, as she did in her economic policy speech, it shows how clueless she is about how the economy actually works."

Voters looking for a female president will have a stark choice between Hillary Clinton, a Democrats' Democrat with a history of public-sector involvement, and Carly Fiorina, a Silicon Valley Republican. And voters willing to entertain a broader range of choices will still find the contrast between them instructive. Expect to hear more from Carly — and, of course, Hillary — in the weeks and months to come.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal calls for federal religious freedom order, draws big applause lines at Family Leadership Summit // NOLA // Kevin Litten – July 19, 2015

Gov. Bobby Jindal on Saturday told Iowa voters that the next president of the United States should issue a religious freedom order similar to the one he issued in Louisiana.

Jindal's comments were in response to a question at the Family Leadership Summit, where moderator Frank Luntz asked Jindal whether the next president should ignore the Supreme Court's ruling legalizing gay marriage.

"The next president should do what we did in Louisiana: Issue an executive order immediately saying the federal government will not discriminate or take action against any individual or business that has a traditional view of marriage," Jindal said. "We're not going to threaten their tax rights, not going to fire them."

Luntz said that he interpreted Jindal's answer as indicating that Jindal wouldn't follow court rulings. Earlier in the appearance, Jindal said it was bad precedent for Republicans to ignore the constitution or laws they didn't like.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I just want to be clear that you're saying that even if the Supreme Court says, 'this is the law of the land,' you're prepared -- you think the next president should say to the Supreme Court, 'I'm sorry, you're wrong,'" Luntz said. "That's significant."

Jindal responded by saying, "clearly, the Supreme Court is wrong."

"They can't change what God has created and instituted," Jindal said. "The government should not be able to fire me, should not be able to take away my tax status, and the government should not be able to discriminate against me for being a Christian and wanting to live my life according to my beliefs. That's what's happening today."

When Luntz pressed Jindal further, asking if he was for the "whole constitution," Jindal said he was.

The Family Leadership Summit featured 10 of the presidential candidates, each taking the stage separately for about 22 minutes. According to Politico's Playbook, the candidates did not know questions in advance. They also took questions from the audience.

Luntz also asked Jindal about his ethnicity, making the case that Jindal had faced discrimination in the past when he ran for office and lost. There were elected offices Jindal deserved to win but did not, Luntz said, because he is Indian-American.

"I've never believed I've been discriminated against," Jindal said. "I am not a victim. ... We've got too many victims in this country. This president is trying to turn us all into victims. ... I'm going to win (the presidential race) not based on the color of my skin, I'm going to win based on my ideas."

Jindal also returned to a familiar refrain from his stump speech about "hyphenated Americans."

A question about the media drew perhaps the largest response in the entire interview.

"I am critical when the mainstream media -- they don't apply the same standards to this president that they apply to the rest of us," Jindal said, drawing applause that was so prolonged, Luntz had to quiet the crowd. "If we nominate a Republican who wants to be liked by the media, wants to be liked by the establishment, wants to go to the cool cocktail parties, we are done."

Another applause line from a questioner who thanked Jindal for investigating Planned Parenthood indicated Jindal's series of announcements last week about a probe into the nation's largest abortion provider is resonating in Iowa. Jindal did not address the investigation during the event because no one asked him a question about it.

Luntz also asked Jindal to name three issues he thought he could convince Democrats to work with him on if he was elected president.

"In Louisiana, we did school choice reform where the dollar followed the child instead of the child following the dollar," Jindal said. "A lot of children that are in the worst schools today are in the poorest zip codes. That's not right."

Jindal also said he thought there are Democrats who would join him in stopping Iran from getting nuclear weapons and "stand with Israel."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The third issue Jindal cited was growing the private sector economy, saying "there are Democrats who will work with me or the next president to bring good-paying jobs back to America by reining in the EPA, cutting and lowering taxes."

"The last time we had successful tax reform -- lower and flatter taxes -- was actually back in Reagan, in the late 80s," Jindal said. "Both parties have to give up their carve-outs and special interests -- that means Republicans and Democrats."

The appearance seemed to work well for Jindal: Aside from the big applause lines, Luntz could be heard telling Jindal off-microphone, "I never knew you were that good."

TRUMP

Trump Refuses to Apologize for Comments on McCain's Service // NYT // Maggie Haberman and Jonathan Martin – July 19, 2015

Donald J. Trump refused to apologize on Sunday for ridiculing Senator John McCain's war record in Vietnam and accused Mr. McCain of stoking outrage, even as Mr. Trump's comments continued to draw anger and calls from some Republicans for him to quit the 2016 presidential race.

"I always believe in apologizing if you've done something wrong, but if you read my statement, you'll see I said nothing wrong," Mr. Trump said in an interview, referring to his comments at a candidates forum in Iowa on Saturday, which he insists were taken out of context.

Responding to a question about Mr. McCain's military service Mr. Trump said of the 2008 Republican presidential nominee, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam: "He's not a war hero. He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

On Sunday, Mr. Trump also accused Mr. McCain of "working the phones real hard" and then "saying we have no comment."

"He's played this game for a long time," Mr. Trump said. And while pointing out that he had also called Mr. McCain "a hero" on Saturday, Mr. Trump questioned the Arizona senator's integrity, noting his involvement in the 1980s savings and loan scandal.

"He had the Keating Five, a tremendous scandal," said Mr. Trump, who has been targeting Mr. McCain since the senator said Mr. Trump had "fired up the crazies" at a rally in Phoenix last week.

In a separate, if just as discursive, interview Sunday on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Trump faulted some of his rivals for creating the tempest, attacked Mr. McCain for not doing more to help veterans, and claimed that the service of American military veterans who were not prisoners of war was not recognized.

"People that fought hard and weren't captured and went through a lot, they get no credit," Mr. Trump said on the network. "Nobody even talks about them. They're, like, forgotten."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked if he would withdraw from the race, Mr. Trump said, “I’m certainly not pulling out.”

He has commanded vast media attention for weeks thanks largely to an early episode of bombast, in which he portrayed Mexican immigrants as rapists. Yet many leading Republicans — because they feared offending his supporters, did not want to encourage him to run as an independent, or merely hoped that ignoring the publicity-hungry celebrity would diminish his profile — were restrained in their response to those comments.

But Mr. Trump’s inflammatory comments about Mr. McCain, whose refusal of early release from a Hanoi prison camp vaulted him to fame long before he entered politics, has left Republican officials exasperated about the developer’s disruptive presence in the campaign.

“Early in his campaign, when he said something outrageous, people kind of said just ignore it and move on, it will go away,” Senator Marco Rubio of Florida said on CNN’s “State of the Union” on Sunday. “This is what he does for a living. I think now, as this has gone forward and he’s become a more covered candidate and people pay more attention to him, it’s required people to be more forceful on some of these offensive things that he’s saying.”

Mr. Rubio said Mr. Trump had insulted the entire P.O.W. community.

“This somehow makes the assumption or he’s saying that somehow if you’re captured in battle, you’re less worthy of honors than someone who isn’t,” he said. “It’s not just absurd, it’s offensive. It’s ridiculous. And I do think it is a disqualifier as commander in chief.”

Democrats, already relishing Mr. Trump’s long shadow in the Republican race, also seized on his comments about Mr. McCain, attempting to tar the entire Republican field with Mr. Trump’s provocations.

“It’s shameful, and so is the fact that it took so long for most of his fellow Republican candidates to start standing up to him,” Hillary Rodham Clinton said at a Democratic fund-raising dinner in Arkansas on Saturday night.

The criticism of Mr. Trump was not just confined to political leaders, though. John W. Stroud, head of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, denounced Mr. Trump’s comments. “For someone who never served a day in uniform to criticize the service and sacrifice of a combat-wounded veteran is despicable,” Mr. Stroud said.

As for why Mr. Trump, 69, did not serve in the military during Vietnam, he said on Sunday that he had student deferments and a medical deferment. He said that while he was “not a fan of the Vietnam War,” he would have “proudly served.” Mr. Trump, the son of a wealthy New York real estate developer, received four student deferments while studying at Fordham University and the University of Pennsylvania, according to The Smoking Gun, which obtained his draft records in 2011.

When he graduated from Pennsylvania in 1968, Mr. Trump’s status was reclassified to 1-A, or ready for unrestricted service. But that changed in the fall of the same year. After a September medical exam, Mr. Trump was labeled 1-Y the following month — the category for those individuals with limiting but not disabling medical conditions. Under this category, Mr. Trump would have only had to serve in a national emergency.

“I had a minor medical deferment for feet, for a bone spur of the foot, which was minor,” he said on Sunday.

Bombast Trumps Organization for One Republican Candidate // NYT //Maggie Haberman and Michael Barbaro – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In what passes for normal inside Donald J. Trump's unorthodox campaign for president, he flew from Arkansas to Iowa on his Trump-emblazoned jet on Friday, arrived the next morning at a candidate forum without any prepared remarks and, wearing a bright red tie that evoked his days on "The Apprentice," told the world exactly what he thought about Senator John McCain's reputation as a war hero.

It was an improvised fit of pique, roundly and vigorously denounced by his rivals all weekend, that exposed the biggest vulnerability of Mr. Trump's campaign for president: It is built entirely around the instincts and grievances of its unpredictable candidate — and does not rely on a conventional political operation that protects presidential hopefuls from themselves.

In a reaction that highlighted the problem, Mr. Trump refused on Sunday to apologize for declaring that Mr. McCain is "not a war hero" because he was captured and instead boasted in an interview that his talk in Iowa had aroused "the biggest standing ovation" of the day.

The remarks about Mr. McCain, the 2008 Republican presidential nominee, ended any qualms party officials had about criticizing Mr. Trump for fear of alienating his supporters and might normally have led to days of backpedaling and extended explanations. Even as Mr. Trump insisted that no one was troubled by his comments, his small group of aides emailed one another about how to respond to the growing criticism.

But the word "sorry" is not in Mr. Trump's lexicon, and apologizing was not an option that was discussed, people privy to the internal debate said.

In a sign of the seat-of-the-pants nature of his campaign, it sent out a series of dissonant messages, some trying to tamp down the controversy (by showing support from veterans) and others going on the attack (especially of the media).

It remains to be seen whether Mr. Trump's standing in public opinion surveys will suffer from the episode with Mr. McCain. But recent national and early-primary state polls put Mr. Trump in the top tier of candidates.

If nothing else, the weekend reaffirmed that Mr. Trump is running a presidential campaign on his own unique terms.

Never mind that his top rivals for the Republican nomination treat campaigning like a full-time job. For Mr. Trump, the task of seeking the White House occupies half his time, he estimated in an interview. ("It's probably 50-50," he said.)

The rest of the Republican field's top tier has cast a wide net to find experienced political aides. But Mr. Trump has plucked much of his team from inside his own corporate empire. (The résumé of his Iowa co-chairwoman: She was a contestant on "The Apprentice.")

While his competitors may be busy working through thick stacks of books on world affairs to prove their qualifications, Mr. Trump says he has little use for such. ("One of the problems with foreign policy," he explained, "is that it changes on a daily basis." As a busy man, he added, he prefers newspapers.)

There is no real policy shop churning out position papers, or for that matter a well-staffed central headquarters plotting his long-term message, or speechwriters drafting — or modulating — his words. And there is a circular, interoffice quality to what the campaign does with its money.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the dangers of Mr. Trump's approach are now being laid bare. Bare-bones improvisation, which seemed sufficient to fuel his ascent in the polls, is starting to backfire.

Mr. Trump faces a moment of real reckoning. Is the man known for the catchphrase "You're fired!" willing to soften his caustic language? Will he slog through the grueling rituals of a long campaign? And, above all, will his message keep resonating — or will his own outlandishness undermine his candidacy, turning it into his latest exercise in brand-building?

So far, tellingly, he is continuing to criticize Mr. McCain, and has shown little interest in building a conventional campaign.

"I'm not trying to arm the country," he said in a lengthy interview last week, emphasizing that he does have staffs in the first three states in the nominating process: Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

The reality is that Mr. Trump is pulling off something that, for now, requires little planning, spending or organization: He is giving voice to a profound rage in the Republican electorate — over economic displacement, illegal immigration and America's diminished place in the world.

"I have a pulse to the ground," he added. "I think I know what's wrong with the country, and I think I've been able to portray that in a way that people agree with."

Unlike in the past when he mused about the presidency, Mr. Trump is putting a team on the ground as well. He has hired at least four workers in New Hampshire, for example, and has visited Iowa nearly a dozen times. He hired a campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski, a New Hampshire resident who previously worked for Americans for Prosperity, a political action committee financed by the conservative billionaire Koch brothers.

Over all, he has spent $1.4 million on his campaign, most of it out of his own pocket, and less than half of what Jeb Bush and Senator Marco Rubio have spent.

Exasperated aides, who said they were tired of making the case to skeptical reporters that Mr. Trump was really running, called those moves evidence enough that a legitimate campaign was taking shape.

"Nobody's asking Jeb Bush if he's serious about running," Mr. Lewandowski said last week, adding that his candidate's place in recent polling spoke for itself. "I don't know what to do. I don't know which metric you want to measure it by."

The unorthodox tenor of Mr. Trump's campaign may flow from its unusual origins. He has, of course, flirted with running for office before, as early as 2000 as an independent presidential candidate (he did not do it) and then 2011, when he talked about mounting a bid for the White House. (Again, he did not.) In 2013, he floated the idea of running for governor of New York. (He decided not to.)

This time he declared a candidacy. And despite questions about his sincerity, his commitment seemed to grow as his business deals became imperiled by the remarks he made about Mexican immigrants during his announcement speech last month. In that speech — an hourlong riff, delivered without a teleprompter — he said Mexico sent the United States criminals and "rapists."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those close to him said he was surprised that, in the uproar that followed, NBC severed ties with him, ending his long run on “The Apprentice,” the show that made him a television star, not just a developer. Soon, Macy’s, the P.G.A. and a prominent chef who was developing a restaurant inside a new Trump hotel in Washington followed suit.

Without his hit show as an option, Mr. Trump has little left to lose by staying in the race and conducting an increasingly provocative campaign. In fact, he may have something to reclaim — a brand that firmly identifies with the working Americans who are flocking to his events.

Hank Sheinkopf, a longtime political operative who has watched Mr. Trump for decades, said that every time a business cancels a contract with Mr. Trump, his supporters view him as the victim of entrenched, powerful institutions that do not have the interests of regular people in mind.

In any case, Mr. Sheinkopf said, Mr. Trump will benefit even if he never makes it to Election Day, by appealing to working-class white voters (and potential consumers of his corporate brand) who feel dispossessed by contemporary politics. “His real business is giving out his name as a franchise,” he added. “His business is being Donald Trump.”

But his staying power in the campaign remains highly uncertain. He has never committed to remaining in the race even through its first contest, the Iowa caucuses, early next year, although he has left open the option of running a third-party race.

And his many businesses still beckon. Last week, in keeping with his “50-50” time commitment to running for president, he took a break from the campaign to attend a ribbon-cutting at a Trump-owned winery in Charlottesville, Va. Those looking for Mr. Trump’s views on policy were treated to a sales pitch for what he called the largest winery on the East Coast.

“More important than the size,” Mr. Trump told the crowd, “we make the finest wines.”

In an interview on Sunday, Mr. Trump showed no sign of changing his style.

He checked off the names of those attacking him over his remarks about Mr. McCain, insulting Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana and former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas in the process.

“Jindal, who has nothing,” he said. “Rick Perry — I mean Rick Perry, give me a break here.”

Donald Trump didn’t apologize to John McCain. Because, of course not. // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – July 19, 2015

"No, not at all."

That was reality TV star Donald Trump's response to ABC's Martha Raddatz Sunday morning when she asked him whether he owed John McCain an apology for suggesting that the Arizona Senator wasn't a war hero because he had been captured during the Vietnam War.

If you were expecting anything else from Trump, you haven't been paying much attention to his presidential campaign. Or his life. Trump's appeal in the 2016 race appears to be built on saying things and acting in ways that other politicians would never dream of doing. Trump, to his credit, appears to grasp that fact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I will say what I want to say, and maybe that's why I'm leading in the polls because people are tired of hearing politicians and pollsters telling the politicians exactly what to say," Trump told Raddatz.

The fact is that apologizing after a comment judged as ill-advised (at best) by most politicians is exact opposite of the Trump brand. The sort of people who misspeak and then try to clean up their messes are the very people that Trump derides -- and that he believes the public can't stand either.

Even as Trump was refusing to apologize, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley was in the midst of the misspeak-apology cycle. In response to demonstrators at a liberal gathering in Phoenix demanding that O'Malley address police brutality and chanting "black lives matter, O'Malley said "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter." He later apologized; "That was a mistake on my part and I meant no disrespect," he said. "I did not mean to be insensitive in any way or communicate that I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

Now, simply because Trump won't pull the full O'Malley doesn't mean that he isn't trying to revise history a bit. In the Raddatz interview, he blames the media for not picking up the entirety of his remarks, robbing them of the context in which he described McCain as a "hero." And, he insists that what he was really saying was that those who are not captured during war time deserve as much credit and attention as those, like McCain, who have been captured. Which is absolutely fine. But is also not really what Trump said.

Regardless, when impugning a recognized war hero, most politicians would have apologized totally and completely seconds after they stepped off the stage. And, it's possible that a comment like the one Trump made about McCain might end -- or at least badly cripple -- a more traditional presidential bid.

And, who knows -- it might wind up doing so for Trump too. But, if past is prologue for Trump and what people like about him, the McCain comments seem unlikely to be the end of the line. Remember that Trump's appeal is rooted in a sort of "we're Americans, we don't apologize" mentality. He presents himself and by extension the country as the sort of person who says what he thinks -- consequences be damned. Trump speaks, dares you to be offended and then shrugs it off when/if you are.

So, no, we shouldn't expect Donald Trump to apologize for what he said about McCain. Or, really, ever. Don't like it? Tough.

Trump's attack on McCain marks a turning point for him — and the GOP // WaPo // Dan Balz – July 19, 2015

It was only a matter of time before Donald Trump crossed the kind of line he did on Saturday, when he questioned the heroism of Sen. John McCain, a Vietnam War POW. The question now is whether Candidate Trump is immune from the laws of political gravity or soon will be isolated and regarded as an object of scorn or curiosity rather than of presidential seriousness.

Since announcing his candidacy last month, Trump has enjoyed a swift rise, vaulting into the lead in some national and state polls in the crowded contest for the Republican nomination. His sharp attacks on illegal immigrants from Mexico and his flamboyant style struck a nerve with voters who are angry with Washington and with political double talk.

Trump has dominated coverage of the race with nonstop interviews and over-the-top comments. He has proved to be a skilled showman — a talent honed on reality TV — who is able to command attention with his combative verbal style.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But there is more to becoming president than what Trump has displayed so far, and many Republicans said Sunday that they believe his attack on McCain (R-Ariz.) marks a turning point for Trump the politician.

Few would offer their views for the record, owing to their positions working for other candidates or a desire not to put themselves into direct conflict with Trump. One described Trump's attack on McCain as "lethal." Another said he expects "a complete cratering" of Trump's support. Still another predicted that Trump would become "a niche candidate" and a sideshow to the main event.

But others are less confident that Trump's candidacy will take a nose dive, highlighting the combination of hope, fear and uncertainty that has gripped the party since Trump decided to run.

Phil Musser, a GOP strategist unaffiliated with a campaign, said anyone with claims to know what the next turn is for Trump is only guessing. "This guy has tapped into a very virulent strain of the anti-establishment wing of the Republican Party," he said, while adding that he finds Trump's comments personally offensive. "If he's got a message that works for 15 percent of the people in the first five states," Musser said, "he's a factor, and he's a factor with delegates."

Trump has benefited from being cast as a not-quite-serious presidential candidate, which has allowed him to carry on as he has. His Republican rivals have been tentative in attacking him for describing illegal immigrants from Mexico as "rapists" and drug dealers, hoping he will collapse under his own weight and not wanting to get into a head-to-head scrap. The media, for all the coverage and often critical commentary given to Trump, have not subjected him to the kind of scrutiny that often goes with being atop the polls.

But every candidate who becomes a serious contender for the presidency eventually has to cross a threshold of acceptability with the voters. That is measured not only in where candidates stand on issues or how authentic they seem, but whether voters conclude they have the temperament, character and judgment to sit in the Oval Office.

That day of reckoning was always coming for Trump if he remained in the thick of the nomination contest, but his remarks on Saturday may have accelerated it. "The fact that he has no filter is what some voters find appealing, but it's that lack of a filter that could doom his presidential campaign," said GOP pollster Neil Newhouse, who is working for the super PAC affiliated with former Florida governor Jeb Bush but offered his comments only on behalf of himself.

Trump's candidacy for the GOP nomination is a knot of contradictions. He disparages the Affordable Care Act but has called for a universal national health-care program. He calls himself pro-life after earlier saying he was pro-choice. He wants to expand Social Security benefits. He has repeatedly mocked his opponents in the most personal ways. Could someone like that unite the Republican Party or the country?

Such questions have been avoided, along with those of temperament and judgment. What happened Saturday could give license to his rivals and his critics to subject his candidacy — what he says and how he says it, where he stands vs. where he once stood — to the kind of scrutiny he has largely escaped.

Trump gave no indication Sunday that he had been chastened by the latest controversy or that he was ready to tone it down, as Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus asked him to do.

On ABC's "This Week," correspondent Martha Raddatz asked Trump whether he owed McCain an apology. "No, not at all," he replied. He repeatedly accused McCain — who still bears the physical scars from the torture he was subjected to during more than five years in a North Vietnamese prison camp — of having "done nothing" for veterans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Raddatz confronted him with statements of condemnations by leaders of veterans groups, Trump said, “Well, maybe they don’t speak to the same vets that I speak to.” He filibustered throughout in the face of persistent questioning.

Raddatz asked whether, as president, Trump would continue to label an opponent as a “loser” or “dummy,” as he has done as a candidate. “Look, when people attack me, I let them have it back,” he said. “You say physical appearance. You know . . . people are constantly attacking my hair. I don’t see you coming to my defense.” Then he again called McCain “a dummy.”

If Republicans — many privately and some publicly — agreed that Trump has entered a new and more challenging phase of his candidacy, they differed on what the right strategy should be for those who feel he is a threat to the party’s hopes of winning the 2016 election.

Steve Schmidt, who was senior adviser to McCain in the 2008 presidential campaign, says Trump’s GOP rivals and others in the party must step up and confront him. “What he represents has to be taken seriously. It has to be confronted seriously,” he said in a telephone interview. “It’s not just a cancer on the Republican Party and the conservative movement. It’s a cancer on our politics as a whole. . . . My personal view is that it ought to trigger a fight for the soul and heart of the Republican Party and the conservative movement.”

Another prominent GOP strategist, who to speak candidly declined to be identified by name, counseled a more nuanced approach. Candidates should prosecute the case against Trump, this strategist said. “But they have to do that with a certain amount of respect, with disappointment in their voice, and not go over the top.”

Trump’s harshest critic among his fellow Republican candidates has been former Texas governor Rick Perry. Even before Saturday’s controversy, Perry had aggressively criticized Trump for his comments on immigration. Now, after the attack on McCain, he says the businessman should get out of the race.

That’s unlikely right now, and it still would leave Trump free to mount an independent candidacy next year. Perry’s motivation may spring in part from his desire to raise his own profile in the hope of qualifying for the first GOP debate, which will take place Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

That debate promises to be dominated by the issue of Trump, and every candidate on that stage will have to weigh the political consequences of challenging him directly. Whether Trump will begin to weigh the consequences of his actions is another question. So far, there’s no indication of a change of heart. But for the candidate, the stakes have gotten noticeably higher after what he did Saturday.

How to handle a bully like Trump // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – July 19, 2015

As the candidates who will qualify for the presidential debate in August begin their preparations, they are going to want to bone up on a range of policy issues and make sure they have coherent answers to hard questions. (Now that Syria is a mess what do we do about it? If a Supreme Court vacancy opens on Day One, who is at the top of your replacement list? Has the president pardoned too few or too many people?) Equally important will be a game plan for neutralizing Donald Trump.

Even before Trump self-destructed on Saturday, we saw candidates like Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), as well as former Texas governor Rick Perry, call out Trump for talking nonsense and for racist language. At the other end of the spectrum, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) has been obsequious, slobbering over Trump with praise and refusing to rebuke his racist characterization of immigrants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now that Trump has attacked war hero Sen. JohnMcCain (R-Ariz.) and other POWs, those who shrank from criticizing him when he went after Hispanics are revealed to be near-sighted and, in fact, hypocritical. Once you excuse or ignore hatred against one group, you've lost the moral authority to knock him when he goes a step too far. Those who defended Trump — or were silent — need to demonstrate they get this. A contender like Perry, who called out Trump from the start — and now calls for him to get out of the race as unfit to be commander in chief — looks principled and a good judge of character (or lack thereof). Likewise, Jeb Bush — who called Trump out for racism — was well positioned to slam Trump again. (He tweeted yesterday, "Enough with the slanderous attacks. @SenJohnMcCain and all our veterans — particularly POWs have earned our respect and admiration.")

The Trump problem is acute for the non-Bush candidates, especially those who have been meek about calling him out. As we predicted, Trump is overshadowing all of them at the moment. "He seems to be taking support from the most conservative and anti-Washington rivals in the field, particularly Mike Huckabee, Scott Walker, Ted Cruz and Rand Paul," the Wall Street Journal reports. "Mr. Bush's rise in the polls, coming in tandem with Mr. Trump's growing strength, may be a sign that so-called establishment Republicans are closing ranks around Mr. Bush, possibly as a result of Mr. Trump consolidating his own support. Marco Rubio may be feeling some of that shift with his sinking numbers. The numbers suggest there may be very different approaches among the candidates to dealing with Mr. Trump, who has the media's attention right now."

Here is the dilemma on a debate stage, provided Trump is still in the race then. No candidate wants to further elevate Trump nor appear to be obsessed with fighting another contender when the target is obviously President Obama, Hillary Clinton and the Democratic Party. The key is an effective counterpunch — or even a gesture.

One is reminded of the 2000 presidential debate in which Al Gore circled around George W. Bush, trying to intimidate him. Bush tersely nodded in his direction and kept going. An alternative style was demonstrated by Ronald Reagan in the New Hampshire debate in 1980:"I am paying for this microphone Mr. Green!" In both cases what was needed was presence of mind, confidence and an appreciation for the visual impact. What made Reagan effective was not simply his words, but his gesture in literally standing up to the offending party.

In the case of Trump, he may interrupt, say outrageous things, fling insults or directly challenge opponents. The object of his aggression has to be willing to respond without seeming peevish or defensive, but neither can he simply ignore the bait. One of the things voters are looking for is a sense of command. Who is going to stand up to Minority House Leader Nancy Pelosi or to the liberal attack dogs at a news conference? If a candidate can't handle a buffoon like Trump, he will be overwhelmed by far more sophisticated adversaries. So here's some unsolicited advice.

Don't let Trump interrupt you. Tell him to pipe down and wait his turn.

Don't let Trump trash your record or insult you. Tell him he doesn't know what he's talking about and then succinctly respond.

Don't let Trump say something racist or offensive about a group or individual. Put him in his place and tell him that sort of talk is not what America and the GOP are all about.

Don't let him appear serious. It is perfectly appropriate to laugh when he suggests sending Mexico a $100,000 tab for each illegal immigrant. It is effective to make a joke at Trump's expense pointing out his billionaire cluelessness, his lack of experience in relevant areas or his obnoxious personality. (New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie was right to point out you cannot say "You're fired!" to Congress.)

Don't obsess about him. If he is just doing his "I'll make everyone rich!" routine, there is no reason to comment. Instead, if you have a record and have done things it is fine (irrespective of Trump) to observe that talk is cheap and you can't fake action or results.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Don't leave yourself open to attack by making excuses. Don't complain about being thwarted by Democrats in Congress or facing economic headwinds if you are a governor. Trump is likely to pounce and say he never lets anyone or anything get in his way.

Trump is a sideshow, but is also a test for other contenders. He was a test of character, which some but certainly not all candidates passed with flying colors. In a debate the challenge will about defending themselves against heckling, lies and insults.

Donald Trump Not Sorry for Comments, Not Dropping Out // WSJ // Louise Radnofsky and Sarah Portlock – July 19, 2015

Mr. Trump drew fire after he said Saturday that Mr. McCain, the party's 2008 presidential standard-bearer who spent five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was "not a war hero." Mr. Trump explained his dislike of seeing Mr. McCain was described that way by saying that Mr. McCain was "a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

The New York developer and entertainer drew broad condemnation from GOP competitors for his comments. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush called on Mr. Trump to end "slanderous attacks," and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry called for Mr. Trump to drop out of the race.

"I'm certainly not pulling out," Mr. Trump told ABC's This Week on Sunday morning.

Mr. Trump said he wasn't apologizing, "not at all" and said it was disgruntled rivals who had stirred up a controversy over his remarks. "This whole thing was brought up by a lot of the people that are competing against me currently that aren't even registering in the polls because people are tired of them."

"I'm certainly not pulling out; I'm leading and I'm leading in many states," he said.

Asked to explain his remarks, Mr. Trump said that he was angry that not enough had been done to improve medical care for veterans, and that he believed veterans who were not prisoners of wars got ignored.

On Sunday, GOP presidential candidate and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio joined the chorus of GOP rivals and calling for Mr. Trump to drop out of the race on CNN's State of the Union Sunday.

Mr. Rubio said Mr. Trump's "insult" to prisoners of war disqualified him to be commander-in-chief.

Mr. Trump has seldom backed off controversial comments. In a live phone interview with "Fox and Friends" on Sunday morning, Mr. Trump said the uproar over his comments was "total nonsense" and taken out of context of his full remarks.

"I'm saying McCain isn't fighting for the veterans," Mr. Trump said.

He compared this episode to his comments several weeks ago about illegal immigration when he ignited a firestorm after labeling the group "drug dealers" and "rapists."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I brought illegal immigration to the forefront. I believe now I'm bringing the plight of the veterans to the forefront which is great. If that is what happens, I'll be very proud because the veterans are treated very, very badly and John McCain – like all politicians – has been all talk and no action."

Trump Refuses to Back Down on McCain Criticism // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 19, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa—Presidential candidate Donald Trump refused Sunday to apologize for criticizing Sen. John McCain's war record, a politically risky stance in keeping with his long record of standing behind provocative remarks and brushing off guidance from aides.

Mr. Trump operates as his own chief strategist and political consultant—the "chief theoretician of Trumpism," according to one person who works with him. He's not known to submit himself to policy briefings or do the homework typical of successful politicians, according to another person who has worked for Mr. Trump on previous political efforts.

The result is a Republican presidential campaign of freewheeling, off-the-cuff commentary that always carries the potential to run off the rails.

On Sunday, Mr. Trump didn't back down from remarks he made a day earlier at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames, Iowa, where he said that Mr. McCain, who spent five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was "not a war hero." He added that Mr. McCain was considered "a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

Mr. Trump, who also said Sunday he was ignoring calls to drop out of the presidential race, has been fuming about Mr. McCain since the senator referred to the crowd at Mr. Trump's rally in Phoenix last week as "crazies," which Mr. Trump took as a personal insult.

Mr. McCain himself has a controversial reputation within the party for whom he served as the presidential standard-bearer in 2008, after previously going through a tough race for its nomination in 2000. He angered some fellow Republicans with his proposals for an immigration overhaul and tighter campaign-finance restrictions.

Even among critics, however, his war record has been considered off limits, and over the weekend, Mr. Trump's 2016 competitors rushed to Mr. McCain's defense. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham described the remark as one that should disqualify Mr. Trump from serving as commander-in-chief. Others, including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal also condemned the comments. A Republican National Committee spokesman said the remarks had "no place in our party or our country."

Mr. Trump has declined to rule out a bid as an independent, a move that could potentially siphon voters away from the eventual GOP nominee.

A spokesman for Mr. McCain declined to comment Sunday.

Mr. Trump said on ABC and in a phone interview with Fox News that his rivals' criticisms were self-serving, that veterans who weren't prisoners of war had been ignored, and singled out Mr. McCain as a lawmaker who had done too little to improve their medical care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This whole thing was brought up by a lot of the people that are competing against me currently that aren't even registering in the polls because people are tired of them," he said on ABC. "I'm certainly not pulling out."

Mr. Trump said in a press conference after his remarks Saturday that he didn't serve in Vietnam because he received student deferments and a medical deferment related to a bone spur in a foot.

Mr. Trump's standing in national polling—he is neck and neck with Mr. Bush at the head of the crowded field—leaves him certain to qualify for the first RNC-sanctioned debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland. His team believes sparring with Mr. McCain will only increase his popularity among the sort of anti-establishment GOP voters who have cheered Mr. Trump's caustic comments about Mexican immigrants.

"He's in first place," Corey Lewandowski, Mr. Trump's campaign manager, said Sunday. "Why would anything change?

Mr. Lewandowski declined to discuss internal discussions of the Trump campaign or whether anyone has challenged Mr. Trump internally about his comments about Mr. McCain or earlier comments about Mexican immigrants.

Mr. Trump's top strategic advisers include longtime political aide Roger Stone, who ran his 2000 presidential exploratory campaign, and a team of relative political neophytes. Nobody besides Mr. Stone in the Trump inner circle has been involved in presidential campaign at a national level before, though Mr. Trump's Iowa director, Chuck Laudner, served in a similar role for Rick Santorum in 2012.

In the past, Mr. Trump's aides haven't been able to rein in Mr. Trump's comments, the person who formerly worked with him said. "People try to steer him and he rebuffs them, meanders in his conversations and it never gets around to, 'Mr. Trump, you can't say this, you can't do this,'" said the former aide.

The Trump campaign plans campaign stops this week in South Carolina, the first opportunity to see if Mr. Trump's remarks about Mr. McCain reduce the interest in his candidacy. So far he has drawn overflow crowds at events across the country.

"Sometimes maybe he talks a little bit before he thinks, but he covers the issues well," said Jeff Frank, a corn-and-soybean farmer from Auburn, Iowa, after hearing Mr. Trump's remarks at the Ames event Saturday.

Lou Gargiulo, the chairman of the Trump campaign in Rockingham County, N.H., said Sunday that he doesn't expect Mr. Trump's remarks about Mr. McCain to damage him among the people who have propelled him atop national polling.

"There are a lot of establishment Republicans who are fearful of Mr. Trump and recognize that he is resonating with a lot of people," Mr. Gargiulo said. "There's a high level of frustration and people are looking for someone who is going to talk plainly. The only person in the race who is going to talk plainly about issues of trade and immigration is Trump."

What Donald Trump Has Said — About McCain, Obama, Immigrants, His Hair // WSJ – July 19, 2015

Businessman and now presidential candidate Donald Trump has made a series of controversial comments over the years, including remarks questioning President Barack Obama's birthplace and whether Arizona Sen. John McCain is a war hero. Here's a roundup.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* * *

On whether President Barack Obama was born in the U.S.:

"I am embracing the issue, and I'm proud of the issue. I think somebody has to embrace it because, frankly, the people that are – and I don't like the name 'birther,' because I think it's very unfair and I think it's very derogatory to a lot of very good people that happen to think that there's a possibility that this man was not born in this country, and by the way, if that were true, you know it's very interesting, if that were true, it'd be the greatest scam in the history of this country. So I feel that there is certainly a chance that he was not born in this country. Now, if he were not born in this country, that means he can't be president — it's very simple!" [MSNBC Daily Rundown March 31, 2011]

On Iraqi oil fields:

"We go into Iraq. We have spent thus far, $1.5 trillion. We could have rebuilt half of the United States. $1.5 trillion. And we're going to then leave. So, in the old days, you know when you had a war, to the victor belong the spoils. You go in. You win the war and you take it.... You're not stealing anything. You're taking- we're reimbursing ourselves- at least, at a minimum, and I say more. We're taking back $1.5 trillion to reimburse ourselves." [To ABC April 18, 2011]

On his 2012 presidential campaign:

"I maintain the strong conviction that if I were to run, I would be able to win the primary and ultimately, the general election.... Ultimately, however, business is my greatest passion." [To advertisers at an NBC TV event May 16, 2011]

On whether American aid worker Dr. Kent Brantly should receive treatment for Ebola in the U.S.

"The U.S. cannot allow EBOLA infected people back. People that go to far away places to help out are great-but must suffer the consequences!" [On Twitter, 1 Aug 2014]

On his plan to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexican border:

"I love the Mexican people. I do business with the Mexican people, but you have people coming through the border that are from all over. And they're bad. They're really bad. You have people coming in, and I'm not just saying Mexicans — I'm talking about people that are from all over that are killers and rapists, and they're coming into this country." [To CNN, June 28, 2015]

On whether Sen. John McCain is a war hero:

"I supported him for president, I raised a million dollars for him, that's a lot of money, I supported him, he lost, he let us down. But you know, he lost, so I've never liked him as much after that, because I don't like losers... He's not a war hero.... He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people that weren't captured, ok, I hate to tell you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He's a war hero because he was captured, ok and I believe, perhaps he's a war hero, but right now he's said some very bad things about a lot of people." [Ames, Iowa, July 18, 2015]

On language and name calling that might be seen as un-presidential, including comments about physical appearance:

"Oh, I don't think — look, when people attack me, I let them have it back. You say physical appearance. You know, it's my hair but people are constantly attacking my hair. I don't see you coming to my defense. I'm — my hair is just fine, but I don't see you coming to my defense. But if I say something about somebody else. Yesterday, I mentioned somebody was saying, McCain's a smart man. I said, really? He graduated last in his class at Annapolis, OK. So people laughed when I said it, but a lot of people don't know that." [ABC's This Week, July 19, 2015]

Trump and His Apologists // WSJ – July 19, 2015

It came slightly ahead of schedule, but Donald Trump's inevitable self-immolation arrived on the weekend when he assailed John McCain's war record. The question now is how long his political and media apologists on the right will keep pretending he's a serious candidate.

Speaking at a forum in Iowa, Mr. Trump declared that Senator McCain was "not a war hero," adding that "he's a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

Mr. McCain spent more than five years in a Vietnamese prison camp, was tortured to the point of lifelong disability, and yet refused an offer to be released before all of his fellow prisoners. Mr. Trump had a more relaxed war due to military deferments. The Trump dump drew immediate condemnations from most GOP candidates and others, but the political apprentice refused to apologize.

His campaign instead released a statement that compounded the felony. "I am not a fan [sic] John McCain because he has done so little for our Veterans," the statement said. "He is yet another all talk, no action politician who spends too much time on television and not enough time doing his job and helping the Vets. He is also allowing our military to decrease substantially in size and strength, something which should never be allowed to happen."

Coming from a reality TV star, this too-much-time-on-television line is hilarious. Mr. McCain doesn't need our defense on Mr. Trump's other insults, but they are notable because anyone with a cursory knowledge of politics knows they're false. They show that Mr. Trump has barely a passing acquaintance with America's current policy debates.

The summer Trump polling spurt has nonetheless been instructive in exposing a growing problem on the political right. All too many conservatives, including some magazine editors, have been willing to overlook his hucksterism as he's risen in the polls. They pretend that he deserves respect because he's giving voice to some deep disquiet or anger in the American electorate.

But America has rarely lacked for demagogues willing to exploit public discontents. William Jennings Bryan won three Democratic presidential nominations running against eastern elites. In 1948 Henry Wallace ran as a Soviet sympathizer while Strom Thurmond won 39 electoral votes running as a segregationist. Either one would have been a disaster as President.

As a standard-bearer for conservative ideas, Mr. Trump would likewise be a catastrophe. His only discernible principle is the promotion of his personal brand. His main message seems to be that because he's rich and doesn't care what anyone thinks, he can afford to tell everyone to go to hell. Some Americans may find it satisfying 16 months from Election Day to tell pollsters they'd vote for him, but that doesn't mean conservative elites should validate this nonsense.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So full credit to Rick Perry, the former Texas Governor, who led the pack in saying even before the weekend that Mr. Trump lacks the temperament to be Commander in Chief. Several other candidates have now said the same.

But note the silence of Ted Cruz, who declined to criticize Mr. Trump because he said the media enjoy such intra-Republican fights. Mr. Cruz has recently released a book whose main theme is an attack on other Republicans. It's central to his campaign strategy. The Texas Senator must be hoping to inherit Trump voters once the casino magnate flames out, but he's revealing his own lack of political character.

As for conservative media elites, too many have adopted the view that there can be no adversary to their right. This was mainly a left-wing affliction in the last century as many liberals refused to condemn Communists. But today many on the right seem willing to indulge any populist outburst no matter how divorced from reality or insulting to most Americans. If Donald Trump becomes the voice of conservatives, conservatism will implode along with him.

Donald Trump: No apology to McCain, vows to stay the course // Politico // Kevin Robillard – July 19, 2015

Trump, who has stood by past statements questioning President Barack Obama's birthplace and asserting many Mexican undocumented immigrants were "rapists," is doing the same with his comments disparaging Ariz. Sen. John McCain's military service because McCain was shot down and captured during the Vietnam War.

"No, not at all," Trump said during a phone interview Sunday on ABC's "This Week" when asked if he owed the Arizona Republican an apology.

Trump, who made his remark — "He was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured" — on Saturday at a gathering of Republican presidential at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames, Iowa, also insisted the crowd was delighted by his attack on McCain.

"I got a standing ovation, the biggest ovation they had all weekend, by far," Trump said. "When I left the room, it was a total standing ovation. It was wonderful to see. Nobody was insulted."

He said the the GOP presidential candidates who were quick to condemn his remarks were motivated by jealousy.

"Later on, the Republican candidates, some of whom are registering 1 percent and zero, and they're very upset that I'm leading the polls by actually a nice margin, they're extremely upset," Trump said Sunday, adding: "They started attacking me."

He also said he wouldn't drop out of the race, as former Texas Gov. Rick Perry called for him to do.

"Of course, they'd love to have me do that because I'm leading the pack," Trump said, naming Nevada and North Carolina as two states where polls show him in the lead. "I'm certainly not pulling out; I'm leading, and I'm leading in many states."

Trump said it was actually McCain, who still cannot lift his arms above his head because of torture he experienced while a prisoner of war in Vietnam, who needed to apologize — to the citizens who showed up at a Trump rally in Phoenix recently. McCain said Trump "fired up the crazies" at the rally, sparking their now weeklong feud.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The people in Phoenix were “devastated by illegal immigration, something I’m very proud to have brought to the forefront,” Trump said. “We had thousands of people, and he said they’re all crazies. He called them crazies. And frankly, I think he owes them an apology.”

Trump also continued to attack McCain for not doing enough to help veterans.

“I’m very disappointed in John McCain because the vets are horribly treated in this country,” Trump said. “I’m going to fight for the vets. I’ve done a lot for the vets. And the vets — I’ve been going around to the campaign trail. They’re treated like third-class citizens. He’s done nothing to help the vets. And I will tell you, they are living in hell.”

The billionaire real estate developer and entertainer said his experience helping to build the Vietnam Memorial in downtown Manhattan showed he could help veterans more than McCain could.

“He’s on television all the time, talking, talking,” Trump said of McCain. “Nothing gets done. You look at what’s happening to our veterans — they’re being decimated, OK. So, I will do far more for veterans than anybody. I’ll be able to build them new hospitals, I’ll be able to build them care centers. I’ll be able to help the veterans.”

And Trump vowed to keep a key part of his persona — responding to critics by calling people “dummy,” among other things, and insulting the physical appearance of others — even if he were elected president.

“When people attack me, I let them have it back,” Trump said. “You say physical appearance, you know, it’s my hair but people are constantly attacking my hair. I don’t see you coming to my defense.”

Donald Trump evades specifics on his draft deferment // Politico // David Rogers – July 19, 2015

Who’d have guessed it, but the Vietnam War draft could become a political issue again given the pattern of evasive answers by Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump.

The New York billionaire, who was a genuine student-athlete in his youth, came away with a medical deferment in 1968 owing to bone spurs in both heels, according to his latest explanation. But in seeking to downplay that exemption as “minor” and “short-term,” Trump’s campaign raises more questions than it answers as to how he sidestepped military service during the war.

This is not a new controversy for the wealthy New Yorker. But this weekend, Trump made himself more of a target with his attacks on Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a Navy veteran who spent years as a POW in Hanoi. And much as Trump insists that the decisive factor was his high number in the December 1969 draft lottery, the real question is how he stayed out of the draft for the nearly 18 months before.

Like politics itself, timing was everything in that crucial period of 1968 and 1969, when the Army was running out of volunteer replacements and more and more draftees were needed to man infantry units in Vietnam. Draftees represented an ever larger percentage of those Americans killed in action in 1968 and 1969, and college graduates born, like Trump, in 1946 or 1947 became a target for draft boards across the country.

Having enjoyed four years of student deferments, the name of the game for many was to find a new way to stay out of the war. National Guard slots were coveted as a safer alternative to Vietnam. Others got married, had children or found jobs, such as teaching, that might keep the draft board at bay.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most important, when the new-styled lottery was announced in 1969, it changed the rules so a young man's birth year meant less in the order of the draft. Everything now rested instead on what day he was born. A high number for that day became the "home free" ticket for those 1946-47 babies who had avoided being drafted until then.

In this same period, Bill Clinton famously posed as a future ROTC officer candidate at the University of Arkansas, until his high number came in and he was off the hook. George W. Bush and Dan Quayle opted not to wait and found places in their states' National Guard.

Trump's medical deferment for bone spurs was just as timely. The process may have been perfectly in order, but he continues to act embarrassed by the fact and is murky about the details.

Indeed, for many years, Trump — who was born June 14, 1946 — never mentioned his medical deferment, and Saturday's explanation from his campaign again downplayed its import.

"While attending the University of Pennsylvania's prestigious Wharton School of Finance, Mr. Trump received a minor medical deferment for bone spurs on both heels of his feet," the statement reads. "The medical deferment was expected to be short-term and he was therefore entered in the military draft lottery where he received an extremely high number, 356 out of 365.

"When the draft occurred, they never got near his number and he was therefore exempt from serving in the military," the statement continues. "Although he was not a fan of the Vietnam War, yet another disaster for our country, had his draft number been selected he would have proudly served and he is tremendously grateful to all those who did."

In fact, a summary of Trump's draft record — from the National Archives and Records Administration in Missouri and first published by the The Smoking Gun website in 2011 — tells a different story.

Trump's medical deferment is listed for October 1968, months after he had left Wharton. And despite the campaign's statement that it was "expected to be short-term," there is no evidence in the records of it being dropped before the draft lottery in 1969.

The dates suggest the deferment stemmed from a Sept. 17, 1968, draft physical at the Armed Forces Center in New York described in a 1992 book on the businessman by veteran journalist Wayne Barrett. "The baseball-tennis-squash star qualified for a medical deferment," Barrett writes, but no explanation is given of the cause.

Various news accounts in 2011 also stopped short, and the first mention of bone spurs appears to have come from Trump this past weekend.

The fact that Trump was called for a physical within months after graduating indicates that there was a very real threat of him being drafted — long before the December 1969 lottery. Any deferment was more than "minor" then. And one big question is whether Trump actively sought the deferment by bringing a letter from his own doctor to the physical citing the bone spur problem.

Young men with access to friendly family physicians had this advantage at the time in dealing with draft physicals. Lower-income individuals, with no doctor but health issues bigger than bone spurs, could find themselves approved for military service.

POLITICO asked a Trump spokesperson Saturday about such a letter but the only response as of Sunday afternoon was the more general campaign statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Many years later, Mr. Trump was responsible for the building of the beautiful Vietnam War Memorial in lower Manhattan, for which he contributed a tremendous sum of money,” that statement concludes. “He was also responsible for bringing back the New York City Memorial Day parade in 1995, after our military was embarrassed by the previous year’s parade where almost nobody showed up. Mr. Trump’s parade was one of the largest parades ever held. Today, he remains committed to helping and honoring all of our Veterans.”

Donald Trump Digs in as More Pile On // Bloomberg // Ari Elkin – July 19, 2015

Donald Trump on Sunday stuck to his guns after igniting criticism over the weekend when he questioned Arizona Senator John McCain's status as war hero, and said the Republicans attacking him are irked by his recent polling success.

"What happened is, later on, the Republican candidates, some of whom are registering 1 percent and zero, and they’re very upset that I’m leading the polls by actually a nice margin," Trump said on ABC's This Week. "They’re extremely upset."

Trump has been at or near the top of several national polls recently, including a Fox News Poll out last week, which had Trump leading among Republicans with 18 percent.

Trump's ABC appearance came one day after he ignited a firestorm of criticism after he said at the Iowa Family Leadership Summit that McCain, a former Navy pilot who was held for more than five years in Vietnam after his plane was shot down in 1967, qualifies as a war hero only "because he was captured."

Most of the Republican presidential candidates and the Republican National Committee swiftly condemned the comments, with the notable exception of Senator Ted Cruz of Texas. So did press magnate Rupert Murdoch, whose Fox News network will be hosting the first presidential debate next month and will be deciding which of the 16 major Republican candidates get the coveted 10 seats on the stage.

A number of leading Democrats also spoke out against Trump, including the party's presidential front-runner, Hillary Clinton, and Secretary of State John Kerry. A former Senate colleague of McCain's and a fellow Vietnam War veteran, Kerry took the unusual step of issuing a statement hailing McCain's endurance in the face of "unspeakable acts of torture." Said Kerry, who as the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, got an assist from McCain when some Republicans questioned Kerry's Vietnam war record:

"If anyone doesn't know that John McCain is a war hero, it only proves they know nothing about war and even less about heroism."

On ABC, Trump said he did not serve in Vietnam because of student deferments and then a medical deferment for a bone spur in one of his feet. He called himself "fortunate" because "I was not a believer in the Vietnam war."

Trump insisted he will do a better job than McCain in advancing veterans' issues. In a statement issued by his campaign after the ABC appearance, Trump cited his contributions to the New York City Vietnam Veteran's memorial and to a 1995 Veteran's Day parade.

During the TV appearance, he complained that he's being treated more harshly than other candidates. When ABC reporter Martha Raddatz mentioned that Trump will sometimes lampoon other peoples' physical appearances, Trump pointed out that he is not immune to such attacks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You say physical appearance," Trump said, according to the transcript. "You know, it's my hair but people are constantly attacking my hair. I don't see you coming to my defense. I'm -- my hair is just fine, but I don't see you coming to my defense."

On Sunday, Florida Senator Marco Rubio said on CNN's State of the Union that he agrees with fellow Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry, an Air Force veteran who said Saturday that Trump's comments make him unfit to serve as commander-in-chief.

"This is not just an insult to John McCain, who clearly is a war hero and a great man, but it's an insult to all POWs, to all men and women who have served us in uniform, who have been captured in battle," Rubio said. "And this somehow makes the assumption that somehow, if you are captured in battle you're less worthy of honors than someone who isn't. It's not just absurd. It's offensive. It's ridiculous, and I do think it is a disqualifier as commander-in-chief."

Trump Awakens Kerry's Vietnam Anger With Slam On McCain // The Daily Beast // Mike Barnicle – July 19, 2015

John Kerry was angry.

"Listen to this. Listen to what Trump just said about John McCain," Kerry was saying over the phone. " 'He's not a war hero. He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured.' "

"That's unbelievable," Kerry said. "That's beyond outrageous."

"John and I have some serious differences on a lot of things but he is nothing other than a hero and a good man. Where was Trump when John got shot down over North Vietnam? In school? At a party? Where was he?"

For many months now, years even, Kerry has been point man in Barack Obama's attempt to restrict Iran's plan to develop a nuclear bomb. He has been a walking high wire act, traveling a region that is nothing less than a geographical bonfire filled with the debris of failed nations, countries that have collapsed into chaos and terror largely because of the contrived plans of men like Dick Cheney who dreamed of the day when Saddam Hussein could be toppled. The conservative ideologues got their wish while the United States got a larger, longer war and the Middle East became an even bigger source of horror and death.

Trump's assault on McCain evoked immediate anger in Kerry because it resurrected feelings within him that are always there, certainly beneath a surface calm but always, always there: A long gone war called Vietnam.

"All of us sat for weeks and months around a table trying to get this deal done," Kerry was saying. "The Russians, the Chinese, the French, the British, the Germans, all of us. and every once in awhile I thought about that other table, that other time and that was nearly a half century ago."

He was talking about the Paris Peace Talks that began in 1970 and concluded with an agreement signed on January 23, 1973. Henry Kissinger, represented another president, Richard Nixon. John McCain was in Hanoi, in captivity. John Kerry had returned from Vietnam to help organize Vietnam Veterans Against The War. Donald Trump was somewhere else.

As talks in Paris dragged on, more than half of the 58,195 names carved into the wall of the Vietnam Memorial in Washington were killed. Thousands more were wounded and carry those wounds still, today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Both Kerry and Obama are firm believers that conversation is a better starter-kit than combat when it comes to dealing with a country like Iran. Neither man is naive about that nation's aspiration to dominate the region.

"But the Iranians are not suicidal," Kerry pointed out.

Clearly, the Iranians are well aware that Teheran would be turned into a field of glass and sand if they ever stepped toward open war with Israel or Saudi Arabia. And every nation around that table in Vienna knew that the sanctions that crippled the Iranian economy and caused Iran to accept a deal would soon collapse under the weight of countries like France, Russia and China that were eager to begin doing business in Teheran, the dollar emerging as the strongest weapon of all.

So as he shuttled back and forth between Washington and Vienna, his leg broken, his spirit determined, Kerry found himself thinking about that other time and those other talks. He is a student of history and in his mind's eye he saw another president, Lyndon Johnson, broken by a long war that still lingers in the American psyche. He thought about the Ivy League sophisticates that surrounded John F. Kennedy and then Johnson, men named Bundy, Rostow, McNamara and others who spent the lives of so many younger men pursuing their old men's dreams of defeating communism in the lethal laboratory of Vietnam.

In a trick of history and irony communism collapsed on a death bed that Ronald Reagan helped make up by…talking; talking to Mikhail Gorbachev. A wall fell. One continent, Europe, changed forever. Two nations, Russia and the United States, altered their behavior toward each another because of a handshake and a conversation.

Last week, John Kerry returned to the United States. After months of discussion, Germany, China, France, the United Kingdom and Putin's Russia along with the U.S. had a deal with Iran. Now it goes to a congress more than half full of politicians who place a higher priority in defeating anything Barack Obama supports than educating the country and the world with an honest debate about a deal structured to insert more than a decade's worth of roadblocks in Iran's drive to develop a nuclear weapon.

And as John Kerry came home, his mind filled with facts, the ups, the downs, the potential and the politics of getting an accord with Iran through the Congress, he was brought back to his own war five decades ago. A war that won't go away. A war that awoke him one more time because of a libelous slur uttered by a real estate man against a friend of Kerry's who will line up against him on the treaty with Iran. But hat didn't matter because brothers in arms form a bond far stronger than politics.

Trump offers no apologizes for McCain war record attack // MSNBC // Adam Howard – July 19, 2015

In his first interview since making remarks critical of Sen. John McCain's Vietnam war record, Donald Trump on Sunday did not back down, saying he doesn't owe the Arizona Republican an apology and that the former GOP presidential nominee "has done nothing to help the veterans except talk."

During a Q&A session Saturday at the conservative Family Leadership Summit, the Republican presidential candidate said of McCain: "He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people that weren't captured, okay?" McCain is one of the many prominent Republicans to come out in opposition to Trump's candidacy and his controversial rhetoric regarding undocumented immigrants. Trump's comments on McCain have since drawn widespread condemnation across the political spectrum.

And some of his fellow Republican 2016 candidates are even going so far as to call for Trump to drop out of the race. "His attack on veterans makes him unfit to be Commander-in-Chief of the U.S. Armed Forces, and he should immediately withdraw from the race for president," Rick Perry said in a statement Saturday. During a Sunday appearance on CNN's "State of the Nation," Sen. Marco Rubio echoed Perry's sentiments, calling Trump's comments "absurd and offensive."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's ridiculous," Rubio told host Dana Bash. "And I do think it is a dis-qualifier as Commander-in-Chief."

In a Sunday televised phone interview on ABC's "This Week," Trump was defiant about his comments the previous day. "I'm very disappointed in John McCain because the vets are horribly treated in this country. I'm fighting for the vets, I've done a lot for the vets," Trump told host Martha Raddatz. "They're treated like third class citizens. He's done nothing to help the vets. And I will tell you they are living in hell."

Trump claimed that "nobody was insulted" at the Family Leader Summit by his comments and that subsequent uproar was being generated by his 2016 GOP rivals "some of whom are registering 1% and 0" in the polls.

He went on to blame McCain for instigating their public squabble because the Arizona senator had described some of his supporters as "crazies." "And frankly, I think he owes them an apology," Trump said.

Trump's attacks on McCain have resurrected criticism of his own history of military service, or lack thereof. When asked about a series of deferments he received during the Vietnam War, Trump said, "I had student deferments, like many other people had, during the war or around the time of the war. I had a minor medical deferment for feet, for a bone spur of the foot, which was minor. I was then entered into the draft because if I would have gotten a different number, I could have been drafted."

"I was fortunate, in a sense, because I was not a believer in the Vietnam War. That was another war that was a disaster for this country. Lives and money and it's disgraceful what happened with the Vietnam War. I was not a fan of the Vietnam War," he continued.

The real estate mogul also defended his tendency to launch personal attacks on his critics. "You know, it's my hair but people are constantly attacking my hair. I don't see you coming to my defense," he said. He then went on to mock McCain's academic record at Annapolis. And yet, Trump admitted to having raised $1 million for McCain's failed 2008 presidential campaign.

Although he conceded that in the past he has said things "on occasion" he regrets, Trump didn't offer an example when pressed. He instead boasted about topping recent polls in early primary states like Nevada and North Carolina. He also insisted he has no plans to withdraw from the campaign.

"John McCain has failed. Because all you have to do is take a look – what you report on all the time, take a look at the scandal at the Veterans' Administration and the disastrous conditions under which our veterans have to live," Trump told Raddatz. "And believe me, I built, with a small group, the Vietnam Memorial in downtown Manhattan. I know what it is to help people and I know what it is to help veterans."

Donald Trump Says He Does Not Owe John McCain Apology // ABC // Benjamin Bell and Emily Shapiro – July 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump said he does not owe John McCain an apology for saying the Arizona senator is only a war hero "because he was captured."

Trump told Martha Raddatz on ABC's "This Week" that he won't be pulling out of the presidential race over his comments, which he made Saturday during a campaign event in Iowa. Trump said he left to a "standing ovation" after speaking at the Family Leadership Council summit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When I left the room, it was a total standing ovation," said Trump. "It was wonderful to see. Nobody was insulted."

When speaking about McCain on Saturday, Trump said he likes "people who weren't captured." He didn't back down when asked about the comment.

"People that fought hard and weren't captured and went through a lot, they get no credit," he said. "Nobody even talks about them. They're like forgotten, and I think that's a shame, if you want to know the truth."

Before Trump's comments Saturday, McCain had said the real estate mogul was firing up "crazies." Trump had already found himself embroiled in controversy over comments he made last month regarding Mexican immigrants.

Raddatz asked Trump if McCain's capture in Vietnam -- where he spent five years as a prisoner of war and was beaten and tortured by the North Vietnamese -- described a war hero. He reiterated what his campaign said following his comments Saturday -- that he was disappointed in the Arizona senator because of how veterans are treated in the U.S.

"I'm very disappointed in John McCain because the vets are horribly treated in this country," said Trump. "I'm fighting for the vets. I've done a lot for the vets."

Trump said veterans were treated like "third-class citizens," adding that McCain has "done nothing to help the vets."

Trump didn't serve in the Vietnam War after receiving four student deferments and an additional medical deferment after graduating from the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School in 1968. He said he would have "proudly served" but wasn't drafted because of his high lottery number.

"If I would have gotten a low number, I would have been drafted. I would have proudly served," he said. "But I got a number, I think it was 356. That’s right at the very end. And they didn't get -- I don’t believe -- past even 300, so I was -- I was not chosen because of the fact that I had a very high lottery number."

Asked if he would continue his pattern of "name-calling, using terms like 'dummy,' 'loser,' 'total losers' on Twitter and elsewhere" when he's "criticized or attacked" if he was elected president, Trump told Raddatz he only gives it back to people who attack him.

"When people attack me, I let them have it back," he said. "People are constantly attacking my hair. I don’t see you coming to my defense."

Trump has come under criticism from numerous fellow 2016 candidates on both sides of aisle. Hillary Clinton called the attack on McCain "shameful." Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said the comments by Trump made him unfit to be president and said the reality TV star should withdraw from the race.

John Kerry, who knows something about having his war record attacked, savages Donald Trump // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary of State John Kerry came to the defense late Saturday night of Sen. John McCain (R-Arizona), whose combat record had come under fire earlier in the day from Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump.

Kerry served in the US Senate with McCain for nearly 30 years before replacing Hillary Clinton as secretary of state near the start of President Barack Obama's second term.

"I have known John McCain for more than 30 years. We've had our share of disagreements and still do today. But one thing I know is beyond debate is that John McCain is a hero, a man of grit and guts and character personified," Kerry said in the statement.

"He served and bled and endured unspeakable acts of torture. His captors broke his bones, but they couldn't break his spirit, which is why he refused early release when he had the chance. That's heroism, pure and simple, and it is unimpeachable."

Kerry went on to blast Trump without mentioning his name.

"If anyone doesn't know that John McCain is a war hero, it only proves they know nothing about war and even less about heroism," Kerry said.

Earlier in the day during a forum in Iowa, the real-estate magnate Trump had questioned McCain's status as a "war hero." Trump, who has been in a war of words with McCain for much of the past week over his views on immigration, disparaged McCain for being "captured" during the Vietnam War.

"He's not a war hero," Trump said. "He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people that weren't captured."

"Perhaps he's a war hero, but right now, he's said bad things about a lot of people," Trump later added.

McCain's plane was shot down over North Vietnam in 1967. He spent five years in a prisoner-of-war camp, where he was tortured. He has been an outspoken advocate for fair treatment of prisoners of war, breaking with many of his Republican colleagues on whether to close the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay and clashing with the Bush administration over its use of "enhanced interrogation techniques."

Republican rivals quickly moved to condemn Trump's remarks, as many have for his assertion that the Mexican government has sent "rapists" and drug runners across the border to the US. McCain took issue with a speech Trump gave last week in Phoenix, where McCain said Trump had fired up "the crazies" in the Republican Party.

For his part, Trump has said he doesn't plan to apologize, even saying that McCain should offer an apology to those he called "crazies."

Kerry has also endured a highly public scrutiny of his war record. During the 2004 presidential election, when Kerry, the Democratic nominee, ran against then incumbent Republican president George W. Bush, a group known as the "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth" disparaged Kerry's service and attacked the awarding of some combat medals to him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group's allegations were widely discredited, but not before they became a key theme of the 2004 campaign.

Trump: I don't need to be lectured // USA Today // Donald Trump – July 19, 2015

John McCain has called his own constituents who want a secure border "crazies." No one in the news media or the establishment, including the Republican National Committee, criticized the senator for those comments.

Now, as respected reporter Sharyl Attkisson has proved point by point, the news media are also distorting my words. But that is not my point. McCain the politician has failed the state of Arizona and the country.

During my entire business career, I have always made supporting veterans a top priority because our heroes deserve the very best for defending our freedom. Our Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals are outdated dumps. I will build the finest and most modern veterans hospitals in the world. The current medical assistance to our veterans is a disaster. A Trump administration will provide the finest universal access health care for our veterans. They will be able to get the best care anytime and anywhere.

Thanks to McCain and his Senate colleague Bernie Sanders, their legislation to cover up the VA scandal, in which 1,000+ veterans died waiting for medical care, made sure no one has been punished, charged, jailed, fined or held responsible. McCain has abandoned our veterans. I will fight for them.

The reality is that John McCain the politician has made America less safe, sent our brave soldiers into wrong-headed foreign adventures, covered up for President Obama with the VA scandal and has spent most of his time in the Senate pushing amnesty. He would rather protect the Iraqi border than Arizona's. He even voted for the Iran Nuclear Review Act of 2015, which allows Obama, who McCain lost to in a record defeat, to push his dangerous Iran nuclear agreement through the Senate without a supermajority of votes.

A number of my competitors for the Republican nomination have no business running for president. I do not need to be lectured by any of them. Many are failed politicians or people who would be unable to succeed in the private sector. Some, however, I have great respect for.

My record of veteran support is well-documented. I served as co-chairman of the New York Vietnam Veterans Memorial Commission and was responsible, with a small group, for getting it built. Toward this end, I contributed over $1 million so our warriors can be honored in New York City with a proper memorial. I also helped finance and served as the grand marshal of the 1995 Nation's Day Parade, which honored over 25,000 veterans. It was one of the biggest parades in the history of New York City, and I was very proud to have made it possible.

I will continue to fight to secure our border and take care of our veterans because these steps are vital to make America great again!

Donald Trump is a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2016.

Donald Trump Says He Doesn't Owe John McCain An Apology // TIME // Justin Worland – July 19, 2015

Billionaire GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump said Sunday he won't apologize to John McCain for saying he is only a war hero "because he was captured."

"No, not at all," Trump told ABC's This Week when asked whether he owed Trump an apology. "I'm very disappointed in John McCain because the vets are treated horribly in this country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a forum for GOP candidates on Saturday, Trump questioned McCain's status as a war hero and said that the Arizona senator had failed veterans. His comments were met with widespread condemnation from both sides of the aisle, including national GOP officials and nearly all of his presidential rivals.

Trump, who is currently leading several polls of GOP presidential contenders, said on Sunday that he would "do far more for veterans than anybody" and suggested that controversy over the comments was the result of less popular candidates "attacking me."

In the interview, ABC's Martha Raddatz noted that Trump has a pattern of blaming others when he's been criticized for controversial remarks and asked whether he has ever regretted anything he has said. Trump said that he had but "surprisingly not that often."

John McCain slam seen as new low for Donald Trump // Boston Herald // Lindsay Kalter – July 19, 2015

Donald Trump's brash rhetoric reached new heights yesterday when he took at shot at John McCain's status as a prisoner of war — a move analysts say could alienate key supporters and threatens to derail the business magnate's campaign.

"The Republican Party really understands itself as more aligned with the military than Democrats," said Erin O'Brien, associate professor of political science at University of Massachusetts Boston. "He is angering folks in the Republican Party that he doesn't want to anger."

The Republican presidential candidate slammed McCain's military record at a conservative forum yesterday, saying he was a "war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

His remarks drew boos from the audience.

Earlier this week, McCain criticized Trump for his controversial remarks on immigration, saying they had "fired up the crazies" at a rally in Phoenix.

Earlier in the week, Trump called McCain "a dummy" who graduated at the bottom of his U.S. Naval Academy class.

He then took the jibe to another level.

"He's not a war hero," Trump said. "He is a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

McCain, whose experience in the Vietnam War was a linchpin of his 2008 presidential bid, was held for more than five years after his plane was shot down.

"No matter what side you're on, you can't say that being a prisoner of war for that many years is not heroic,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Brien said. "He really overstepped here. He overplayed his hands in the Republican Party."

Trump's comments were particularly careless in the wake of the Chattanooga shooting Thursday that killed five service members, said GOP national pundit Ford O'Connell.

"Trump doesn't like to apologize, but he's probably going to have to walk back some of those comments," said O'Connell, who is a former McCain adviser. "This is one of those things where you only get so many of them before you're kaput as a candidate."

Trump has, indeed, shown some signs of backtracking.

"If a person is captured, they're a hero as far as I'm concerned. ... But you have to do other things also," Trump said at a news conference after the summit yesterday.

Trump's comments weren't just offensive — they show his weakness as a presidential candidate, said Fergus Cullen, former GOP New Hampshire chairman.

"Voters want someone who's serious to be president of the United States," Cullen said. "They want someone who's responsible and measured in their rhetoric."

He added, "I think this will probably just accelerate the inevitable unraveling of Donald Trump."

Has America gone nuts? Could Republican frontrunner Donald Trump really become president? // The Guardian // Tom McCarthy – July 19, 2015

For two serene months after Donald Trump announced in March that he was forming a presidential exploratory committee, he failed to register in national political polls. People basically thought he was kidding.

Then something funny happened. Trump, the developer and reality TV star, began hiring staffers in early voting states. He travelled to political rallies. He held a campaign launch event. And his poll numbers began to climb.

Now Trump has climbed all the way to the top. In three of the last four major national political surveys, Trump is the leader in the race for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination. A Fox News survey this week had Trump ahead of the Wisconsin governor, Scott Walker, 18-15, with Jeb Bush third. Thousands of enthusiastic citizens have been flocking to Trump rallies, from Arizona to New Hampshire.

The effect of Trump's controversial weekend attack on 2008 presidential candidate John McCain , over his time in captivity in Vietnam, remains to be seen. But should Trump ride out the storm – as he has flourished in the squalls stirred up so far – the question will have to be asked.

Has American politics collapsed? Has the Republican party lost its collective mind? Is the Trump "surge" for real?

Veteran observers of US politics counsel calm, predicting that Trump will dazzle for a bit and then fade. With 16 months to go until election day and many voters doing everything they can to avoid political news, it's too early, analysts say, for polling numbers to mean much. In the turbulent 2012 Republican nominating race, they point out, the so-called “lead” was passed among at least four non-competitive candidates before settling on eventual victor Mitt Romney.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Wilson, a veteran Republican political consultant, said Trump was experiencing “a celebrity political bubble”.

He is a clown in a fancy hat, strutting the stage for a few minutes, and then the serious actors will come on the stage Rick Wilson

“This is a guy who obviously, on every axis, is not a serious candidate, but who has touched a combination of factors – he’s got a lot of built-in name ID and celebrity from being on television for 20-plus years, and being a known public quantity for 20-plus years,” Wilson told the Guardian. “He’s struck a few chords with the immigration stuff, and he’s managed to capture the most valuable asset in a campaign, which is the attention of the press.

“He is an entertainer. He is a showman. He is a clown in a fancy hat, strutting the stage for a few minutes, and then the serious actors will come on the stage in a little while.”

While Trump may not have a chance of winning the Republican nomination, however, party leaders have warned that he could disrupt the Republican selection process. The potential problem, for the GOP, is that Trump has gained in the polls by saying divisive things, particularly on the topic of immigration .

“[Mexico] are sending people that have lots of problems, and they are bringing those problems to us,” Trump said at his launch event. “They’re bringing drugs. They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists … They’re sending us the worst people”.

The rhetorical bomb-throwing has activated a hard-right faction in the party who are excited to hear their anti-immigration views broadcast and who would embrace an intra-Republican war over immigration and other issues. That war could threaten the GOP bid to make inroads with Hispanic and Latino voters, and with other centrist voters. And such a failure could make the road to the White House an uphill climb.

In an apparent attempt at damage control, the Republican national committee chairman, Reince Priebus, called Trump last week to tell the candidate to “tone it down”, NBC News reported. Trump denied the report on Twitter.

“Totally false reporting on my call with @Reince Priebus,” Trump wrote . “He called me, 10 minutes, said I hit a ‘nerve’, doing well, end!”

But other Republican leaders and candidates are joining the call for Trump to zip it. McCain, who faces re-election next year, told the New Yorker this week that a large rally Trump held in Phoenix, in which the candidate appeared onstage with the father of a man who was killed by an undocumented migrant, was “very hurtful to me”.

“Because what he did was he fired up the crazies,” McCain said.

Even before his remarks on Saturday, Trump responded characteristically.

“The thousands of people that showed up for me in Phoenix were amazing Americans. @SenJohnMcCain called them “crazies” – must apologize!” Trump tweeted . “ @SenJohnMcCain should be defeated in the primaries. Graduated last in his class at Annapolis – dummy!”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former Texas governor and current White House hopeful Rick Perry, who is lagging in the polls and could use some publicity, also squared off with Trump.

“I have a message for my fellow Republicans and the independents who will be voting in the primary process: what Mr Trump is offering is not conservatism, it is Trump-ism – a toxic mix of demagoguery and nonsense,” Perry said .

Trump fired back: “[Perry] doesn’t understand what the word demagoguery means … He should be forced to take an IQ test before being allowed to enter the GOP debate.”

On Saturday, Perry released a strongly worded statement in answer to Trump’s attack on McCain, saying he should withdraw from the race immediately.

Erstwhile frontrunner Jeb Bush has weighed in, too. “I have a big disagreement with Mr Trump about his tone and what he’s saying because it’s not accurate,” Bush said on Thursday.

Trump, in turn, has lustily criticized the Bush political machine. “Why do people listen to clown @KarlRove on @FoxNews ?” Trump tweeted Wednesday. “Spent $430M & lost all races — a Bushy!”

Senator Lindsey Graham, another weak-polling presidential candidate, has said Trump’s candidacy is a “defining moment” for the party and called on Priebus to declare Trump persona non grata.

“I think he’s riding a wave of outlandish behaviour,” Graham said of Trump on NBC . “He’s a wrecking ball when it comes to policy, and the way he’s engaging the public is hurting the Republican party.”

Not every competing 2016 candidate is going after Trump, however. Ted Cruz, the Texas senator, told NBC News he was “a big fan of Donald Trump” and planned to meet with him.

“Ted Cruz called me,” Trump said in his version . “And I don’t know why I’m meeting him, to be honest, but I do have respect for him.”

Cruz followed the same course on Saturday, decrying “Republican on Republican violence” .

The entire drama appears headed for a very public denouement in early August, when Trump is likely to appear onstage with the other candidates at the first Republican primary debate. Trump cinched his right to appear in the debates by hitting a campaign finance filing deadline on Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission.

Trump’s financial disclosure showed that he had raised $1.9m since entering the race a month ago. That included a $1.8m loan from himself – but Trump also had about 60 individual donors.

In a statement in advance of his filing, Trump claimed he was worth TEN BILLION DOLLARS, spelling the sum out in capital letters, and his team complained that the financial disclosure document was “not designed for a man of Mr Trump's massive wealth".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is a carnival seal," said Wilson. "It balances a ball on its nose, and it's very clever at doing that. It's very clever at saying, 'I'm so rich! I'm so rich! My fortune is huuuuge' – and doing the whole Donald Trump act. At playing Donald Trump.

"At some point voters are going to say, is this a man whose finger I want on the button, is this a man who is actually going to go out and negotiate with countries that don't like us on consequential things?

"This isn't about badgering someone down on cost-per-square-foot. This is about real, consequential, life-and-death, existential challenges to our nation and others.

"And at the end of the day, Donald Trump is not a person who is a serious choice."

Beat Trump, don't ban him from the debates // Washington Examiner // W. James Antle III – July 19, 2015

After weeks of pent up Republican criticism of Donald Trump, the dam finally burst Saturday. Once Trump's rivals started condemning him for insulting a party elder and, less directly, any American captured or killed in combat, it began to feel safer to attack him on a wide variety of fronts.

That's all to the good. But some Republicans are taking things a step further and hoping Trump will be excluded from the debates unless he apologizes, which he rarely does. If, as the Republican National Committee says, there "is no place in our party or our country" for Trump's comments, how can there be any place for Trump on the debate stage?

Yes, Trump's presence on that stage has the potential to tarnish the entire GOP brand. He will be seen among the top ten of the Republican field, including the eventual nominee. He is sure to be featured in ads attacking Republican candidates in the fall of 2016.

Barring Trump from the debates would still do more harm than good. First, it would appear to validate the narrative he is pushing to conservatives so disaffected with the party leadership that they are backing a Hillary Clinton donor who favored single-payer healthcare: the fix is in, the Republican establishment will pick the nominee rather than grassroots conservatives. Such speculation is already rife.

Fueling Trump's martyrdom complex is dangerous enough. When the base already feels disrespected, bolstering the perception that the party bosses are more important than the rank-and-file voters is playing with fire. And they would have a point: What legitimacy would the debate criteria have when candidates who meet them and are polling near the top of the field can be denied their spot?

Where would disenchanted voters go in 2016? Kicking Trump out of the debates would increase the chances that he runs as an independent or third-party candidate. This would mitigate his impact on the Republican brand, but also siphon potentially millions of votes away from the party's presidential nominee and make it that much more difficult to beat Hillary Clinton.

Gary Johnson wasn't even polling well enough to qualify for most of the debates in 2012, yet keeping him out still had the effect of pushing the former two-term governor of New Mexico into the Libertarian Party. Johnson won more than 1 million votes that November and he is nowhere nearly as famous as Trump.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ross Perot wasn't as famous Trump either, until he launched his 1992 presidential campaign. Like Trump, he had the resources to compete without the party system. Perot also dropped out of the race, making outlandish charges about President Bush planning to disrupt his daughter's wedding. He still won nearly 19 percent of the vote when he re-entered the campaign that fall.

Finally, the benefit of Trump-free debates to the party's image can be overstated. People justifiably ask why Trump has only crossed the line now and not with any of his other numerous crass and controversial statements. Why didn't his comments about Mexicans or his never-recanted birtherism disqualify him? The implication will be that Republicans are fine with racism and bizarre conspiracy theories, or at least unwilling to alienate voters who are.

A counterargument to most of the above is that Trump won't matter if Republicans nominate a real conservative, especially if the nominee is an otherwise attractive and capable candidate. Perhaps. Third-party campaigns are as likely to fizzle as effect the outcome of the election.

Yet this objection suggests that the best solution to Trump isn't changing the debate rules at the last minute, but trusting the voters to do the right thing. Steve Deace, the Iowa conservative radio talk show host who was among the first to predict the Trump boom, has already detected that the billionaire went too far for conservative activists.

Maybe now there can be a real discussion about Trump's record, a past that includes donations to Democratic candidates and a slew of liberal policy positions. Won't the sight of a united Republican field, from Jeb Bush to Ben Carson and Rand Paul to Lindsey Graham, holding Trump accountable also say something about the party's brand identity? It's an argument conservative candidates ought to feel confident about winning, either in the media or on the debate stage.

WALKER

Scott Walker on whether being gay is a choice: 'I don't know the answer to that question' // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 19, 2015

WATERLOO, Iowa. — Republican presidential hopeful Scott Walker is continuing to struggle over questions about gay rights, telling CNN this weekend that he does not know whether being gay is a choice.

"I don't have an opinion on every single issue out there," Walker told CNN in an interview aboard the Winnebago that is transporting him around Iowa, where he is focusing much of his time and campaign resources. "I mean, to me, that's, I don't know. I don't know the answer to that question."

As the general public has quickly become more accepting of LGBT rights and gay marriage, Walker has opposed same-sex marriage more forcefully than many of his fellow Republican candidates — and he has, at times, struggled to explain his views on other LGBT issues. After the Supreme Court's landmark decision to allow gay marriage in all 50 states, he called for a constitutional amendment that would allow states to ban same-sex marriage. Walker's two college-age sons have said that they support gay marriage. Tonette Walker, Walker's wife, has said that she's emotionally torn on the issue, as a close relative is gay and recently married her partner, but that she stands with her husband on the issue.

Although his stance could help Scott Walker win the Iowa caucuses, which are often dominated by social conservatives, some of his donors and supporters worry that it could hurt him in later primaries or the general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Early last week, Walker told the Independent Journal Review, an online news outlet aimed at young conservatives, that the Boy Scouts of America should keep its ban on gay leaders because it "protected children and advanced Scout values." That immediately ignited a backlash, with gay rights activists saying he needed to apologize for implying that young boys must be protected from gay leaders. Walker later said that he wants to protect Boy Scouts from a "political and media discussion." He has since said that it is up to the Boy Scouts, not him, to decide whether the policy should be changed.

"I'm not talking about personal protection," Walker said in the CNN interview. "I'm talking about, for me, the reason why I didn't have a problem with it is I just think it pulls scouting into a whole larger political and cultural debate as opposed to just saying scouting is about camping and citizenship and merit badges and service awards instead of pulling all these other issues out there. And I was just hoping that they could stay focused on that, that's all."

When CNN asked whether being gay is a choice, Walker said it is "not even an issue for me to be involved in."

"The bottom line is I'm going to stand up and work hard for every American, without regard of who they are, no matter where they come from, no matter what their background. I'm going to fight for people, whether they vote for me or not," he responded.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry (R) wrote in his 2008 book about the Boy Scouts — titled "On My Honor: Why the American Values of the Boy Scouts Are Worth Fighting for" — that openly gay leaders would present a problem: "[G]ay activism is central to their lives. It would unavoidably be a topic of conversation within a scout troop. This would distract from the mission of scouting, character building, not sex education."

Perry said in an interview with NBC News' "Meet the Press" on Saturday that he stands by that statement and opposes the Boy Scouts changing its policy.

"I do," said Perry, who is also making an aggressive play for voters in Iowa. "I believe that scouting would be better off if they didn't have openly gay scoutmasters."

Scott Walker tells undocumented worker that immigrants must follow the law // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 19, 2015

PLAINFIELD, Iowa — As presidential hopeful Scott Walker toured a farm in this tiny town where he lived as a child, he was confronted by an undocumented worker from Mexico who is living in Wisconsin and demanded to know why Walker does not support President Obama's plan to give temporary status to some undocumented workers, including parents of children who were born in the United States.

"We're a nation of laws," Walker, the Republican governor of Wisconsin, repeatedly told Jose Flores, 38, who was joined by two of his four children, Luis, 7, and Leslie, 13, who had tears rolling down her cheeks throughout the exchange. Flores, who lives in Waukesha and works for a medical supply factory, said he and his wife live in fear of being deported and separated from their children, who he said were all born in the United States.

"My point," Walker said, "is that you have to follow the law, follow the process."

Immigration has been a weak area for Walker, who announced his presidential campaign last week in the same town where the Flores family lives. Although he used to support granting amnesty to some of the 11 million immigrants who are in the country illegally, Walker now says his position has changed. He said that those living here need to leave and reenter legally, prompting some critics to accuse him of flip-flopping. Walker also has suggested curtailing legal immigration during difficult economic times.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even though immigration has often dominated this presidential contest, Walker did not mention it in his announcement speech or his first couple of campaign stops, including a breakfast at a Harley-Davidson dealership in North Charleston, S.C. Afterward, Walker was confronted by a man who shouted, "What about the border?" At the next campaign stop, a barbecue joint in Lexington, Walker added immigration to his stump speech and continued to talk about the issue — nearly always receiving loud, supportive cheers.

The campaign stop in Plainfield was a joyful homecoming for Walker, who lived in this town of about 400 for seven years as a child in the 1970s. Residents brought lawn chairs to a large machine shed to meet the local boy who is now running for president. The hosts were Janice and Charlie Dietz, who decades ago interviewed Walker's father for the pastor position at their church and then became close family friends. Walker's parents and third-grade teacher were in attendance, too. Walker spoke fondly of buying circus peanut candy at the corner store, swimming in a neighbor's pool and collecting money for a state flag for the city hall. He posed for photos with corn and cows and gushed about Midwestern values.

It was a childhood quite different from that of Leslie and Luis Flores, who said they worry about their parents being deported. Leslie Flores, who is in middle school, said her mother was unable to travel to Mexico to see her father before he recently died. The teenager said that she has seen "so many families" torn apart by deportation.

The Flores family stood out in the white crowd, a reminder that Iowa towns such as this one and others where Walker has campaigned are not always fully representative of the nation's diversity. At first, Walker told the family that he did not have time to talk to them, as he had an interview with Fox News Channel. But the Flores family waited by his campaign bus and approached him again, an exchange that was captured by reporters and three immigration activists, one of whom drove the family to Iowa.

It was an opportunity for Walker to demonstrate how he calmly fights back against challenges from activists. He was forceful as he told the Flores family that immigrants must follow the rules, but he added, "I completely sympathize with the situation you're all in and others are in."

One of the activists, Sam Freeman of Wisconsin's Voces de la Frontera, cut the governor off and shouted, "So that's why you want to separate their family?"

Walker curtly said that he wanted to talk only with the family and that their plight is the reason the United States must go forward with "putting in place a logical system." To address illegal immigration , Walker said, the nation needs to secure the border and enforce its laws before it can focus on other issues. An immigration system cannot come at the cost of American workers and their wages, he added.

"The president had years to deal with this throughout the legitimate legislative process," Walker said. "He had his own party in charge for the first two years ... he was in office."

Flores listened intently to Walker and then said, "Now it's my turn."

In November, Obama announced that he would use his executive authority to shield 5 million illegal immigrants from deportation and allow them to legally work in this country. This become known as Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents, or DAPA. Twenty-six states, including Wisconsin, sued, calling the executive action unconstitutional. Such legal action has halted the program.

Flores repeatedly asked Walker why he tried to block DAPA. Walker told him that he is a governor and not part of the federal government or the legal system. Flores said thousands of Wisconsin families could have benefited.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When are you guys going to fix the immigration system?" Flores said. "When are you guys going to take the time to fix immigration reform? So we've got to be deported?"

Walker stayed on message, listing his immigration talking points and criticizing Obama for not fixing the system. He also said that he supported the lawsuit Wisconsin filed to stop Obama's executive action.

"No man or woman is above the law in this country," Walker said. "That's the beauty of America."

Then Luis Flores jumped in: "Do you want me, like, to come home ... come from school and my dad get deported?"

"No, that's not what I'm talking about," Walker said. "You mentioned Waukesha. I've got two nieces who go to school there as well. ... I appreciate kids like you and kids like them, so that's not what my point is. My point is that in America, nobody is above the law."

Scott Walker Goes All In on Iowa // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 19, 2015

CEDAR FALLS, Iowa—Scott Walker's aides say his path to winning the 2016 Republican presidential nomination goes through Iowa, a course that hasn't worked for any other candidate for 15 years.

Only twice since 1976 has the Iowa caucus winner ultimately become the Republican nominee for president after a competitive primary—and not at all since George W. Bush in 2000. That spotty history, combined with Mr. Walker's decision to adopt more conservative positions to please the state's electorate, makes Mr. Walker's game plan an uncertain one.

In a crowded ballroom here Sunday, the Wisconsin governor played up his local ties and said his unostentatious style shouldn't mask his conservative record. "In the Midwest, we just take care of problems," Mr. Walker said. "We don't make a lot of fuss, we just get the job done and we go back to work."

Ed Berry, a retired postal clerk from Dike, said he admires Mr. Walker's political victories in Wisconsin, where he beat back a recall election supported by labor unions. "I was impressed by his struggle with progressives, and then he convinced voters to vote him back in," Mr. Berry said.

Mr. Walker's Iowa focus reflects a challenge for the crowded GOP field: winning an early state to cement a place in the top tier among the 16 major candidates. Govs. Chris Christie of New Jersey and John Kasich of Ohio, who is announcing his candidacy Tuesday, are among those focused entirely on New Hampshire, which holds the first primary. Sen. Lindsey Graham says his campaign is predicated on winning his home state of South Carolina. Florida will become the most coveted prize for two home-state candidates, Sen. Marco Rubio and former Gov. Jeb Bush.

Mr. Walker's stop here, at a fundraiser for a state lawmaker who is a grandson of Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley, was the ninth of 11 weekend appearances in the state; he has vowed to tour all 99 counties before the February caucuses. His staff here dwarfs those in other states. He has taken harder stands against gay marriage and immigration to appeal to the social conservatives who attend the state's Republican caucuses—a move some strategists warn could backfire in a general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The optimal endgame for Mr. Walker is to become conservative activists' favored alternative to Mr. Bush, a fundraising behemoth who, with his super PAC, threatens to swamp the rest of the GOP field in TV advertising.

Mr. Walker is seeking to remain in the top tier of candidates by the time 11 states hold primaries next March 1. A week later comes Michigan, a large Midwestern state where the Wisconsin governor can stress his regional bona fides to Republican voters who already know his story.

"We think we play well in every state," Mr. Walker said during an airport interview Friday in Moline, Ill. "We're going to play to win, I think we do first, second or third. We place in any of those first four [early states], it puts us in great shape."

Complicating matters for Mr. Walker is the fickle nature of Iowa's Republicans, who, like voters elsewhere, have propelled Donald Trump to the top tier of candidates after his caustic comments about Mexican immigrants.

Before Saturday, Mr. Walker had dodged questions about Mr. Trump. When the New York developer declared John McCain, the party's 2008 presidential nominee who spent five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, "not a war hero," Mr. Walker finally engaged.

"I unequivocally denounce him," Mr. Walker said at a campaign stop Saturday in Sioux City.

On his tour here, he offered himself as a candidate running against Washington. "I've been here plenty," he reminded a Friday crowd at a minor-league ballpark in Davenport. "I actually lived here even for a few years."

Walker's pitch is also a resuscitation of his political victories in Wisconsin intermixed with a call to take on Islamic State militants and cut off illegal immigration. It is a different political argument than the optimistic immigrant story offered by Mr. Rubio or the rock-ribbed conservatism from Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas.

Former Sen. Scott Brown of Massachusetts, who introduced Mr. Walker at his campaign stop last week in New Hampshire but hasn't endorsed a candidate, said the contrast between Mr. Walker and Mr. Rubio presents a stark choice for voters there.

Mr. Rubio, Mr. Brown said, is "appealing to a more hopeful, uplifting American dream, kind of not looking back and looking forward, and Scott Walker is looking at,'Here's what we've done in Wisconsin and here's what we can do nationally with your help."

Scott Walker on the Boy Scouts' Ban on Gay Leaders // AP – July 19, 2015

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential contender Scott Walker is struggling with the issue of gay Boy Scout leaders.

The Boy Scouts of America has taken steps to end the blanket ban on gay adult leaders and let Scout units set their own policy.

That prompted Wisconsin's governor to express support for the ban. The governor told the Independent Journal Review website the ban "protected children and advanced Scout values."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Afterward, he tried to clarify the statement, saying he did not mean physical protection from gay leaders but protection of boys from the public debate.

Now, though, he's no longer saying the ban should remain. He says that's for the scouting organization to decide.

Speaking on CNN's "State of the Union," Walker also said he doesn't know whether being gay is a choice.

Scott Walker in Iowa: Relentlessly on message // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 19, 2015

SIOUX CITY, Iowa — The outfits were nearly identical, the speeches repeated almost verbatim and even the intonations rarely varied. Over the course of Scott Walker's three-day Winnebago trip across Iowa, the Wisconsin governor stumped with the precision of a Swiss watchmaker, exhibiting the kind of discipline that most candidates can only dream of.

In his first days as a presidential candidate in the state where he's leading in the polls, Walker showed the consistency and attention to detail that propelled him to 12 victories back home — including three statewide wins. He sported the same campaign trail uniform (a blue-and-white checked, collared shirt, jeans and belt), and used the same prop (a rumpled dollar bill pulled from his pocket). He told the same anecdote about his thriftiness that's become his signature (his shopping habits at retailer Kohl's) and quoted whole paragraphs of his announcement speech from last Monday, almost word for word.

"I'm for high standards," he said of his education stance at several stops, sweeping his arm upwards to accentuate his point. But standards should be set at the local level, he would follow up, theatrically lowering his arm for emphasis.

Even by presidential campaign trail standards, where the intense media scrutiny pushes candidates to adopt a more buttoned-up approach and White House hopefuls strive to hew closely to message, Walker stands out. On several occasions, when he used a slightly different word at one stop than he had at the previous appearance, he paused and then corrected himself.

In Cedar Rapids, when a voter asked him Friday during a town hall about what he would do to keep jobs in Iowa, Walker took that as an opportunity to dive into his five-point economic plan, making a few connections between Obamacare and her question, but generally sticking to a script that he used everywhere else.

"He had a lot of things he wanted to say," said Mary Howard, 57, who asked the question. "It was more like he was still doing his speech than a direct answer."

The mechanical nature of Walker's appearances is especially well-suited for the grind of a presidential primary season where the first votes won't be cast for another six months. It will help the two-term governor steer clear of gaffes and keep the focus on his message — that he's a battle-tested fighter for conservative values.

Yet as one of the most rigorously on-message — and cautious — candidates in the GOP field, he could also eventually undercut the plain-spoken, authentic image he seeks to cultivate and fuel critics who insist it's a protective shield for a candidate who's not ready for the national stage. The scripted nature of Walker's stump speech has already captured the attention of late-night comedians like Jimmy Fallon, who has mocked the Kohl's anecdote Walker rolled out — nearly verbatim — in at least a half-dozen stops.

Walker, however, is seeking to turn it to his advantage, revealing to audiences that he can laugh at himself.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Tonette and I —and some of you might have heard this — we like to his shop at a place called Kohl’s,” the Wisconsin governor said Saturday here in Sioux City. “In fact, I’ve told this story so much that even my friend Jimmy Fallon had a little fun with it the other night.”

With his regional accent, humor and a message he delivers with energy, if not spontaneity, Walker nevertheless managed to connect with his large and enthusiastic Iowa audiences. Portraying himself as a typical Midwestern father, he frequently referenced his two college-aged sons who were in tow over the weekend.

But off the stage was where Walker shined, always ready with a handshake and a sports joke (even if it was a practiced one — anyone wearing Iowa State University gear would hear the lament, “You messed up my bracket!”). He chatted up voters more easily than many of his rivals, never appearing stiff or ill at ease, showcasing the one-on-one, retail politicking skills that even his Wisconsin opponents concede are formidable.

During his first stop Friday morning, in the eastern city of Davenport, Walker was approached by an emotional man who described himself as a homeless Vietnam veteran. When the man began to cry as he described losing his family, Walker embraced him and promised that he “won’t let you down.”

Walker’s formula has so far paid dividends. It guided him to victory in three tough, blue state gubernatorial elections over a period of four years, including in 2012 when he survived withering attacks and a harsh national spotlight in a recall election. And it’s currently got him in sole possession of first place in Iowa, with 18 percent, according to the latest Quinnipiac University poll.

“He’s a good speaker, I like his policies,” said Danny Schleisman, 78, of Carroll, Iowa, who saw Walker at a Saturday stop. “And he didn’t have notes! Totally off the cuff!”

Scott Walker: 'I don't know' if being gay a choice // CNN // Dana Bash – July 19, 2015

(CNN)In a weekend interview with Republican presidential candidate Scott Walker about whether the Boy Scouts should allow gay troop leaders, CNN's Dana Bash asked Walker, "Do you think being gay is a choice?"

"I don't have an opinion on every single issue out there. To me, that's, I don't know," Walker answered. "I don't know the answer to that question."

The Wisconsin governor said he supports the current ban that keeps openly gay leaders out of the organization but that he believes the Boy Scouts, not government, should ultimately be able to decide that kind of policy.

Bash and Walker spoke aboard Walker's RV, traveling through Iowa. Earlier in the week Walker told reporters that the Boy Scouts should keep the ban on gay leaders because the policy "protected children."

His campaign later released a statement saying he meant protecting Scouts from the media debate.

"I'm not talking about personal protection. I'm talking about, for me, the reason why I didn't have a problem with it is I just think it pulls Scouting into a whole larger political and cultural debate, as opposed to just saying Scouting is about camping and citizenship and merit badges and service awards, instead of pulling all these other issues out there. And I was just hoping that they could stay focused on that, that's all," said Walker, who is an Eagle Scout.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When pressed about whether that means he is for or against the ban, at first the governor said that's "up to the people who run the places."

Reminded that presidents of the United States are actually honorary presidents of Boy Scouts of America, Walker responded that he would have "plenty much more significant issues to deal with as president."

"From a domestic and foreign policy and national security standpoint, the one thing people find unique, I guess, whether you like it or not, is that I actually answer questions people ask me," Walker added.

With that opening, pressed again, Walker suggested he believes the ban on gay scout leaders is the right policy.

"I thought the policy was just fine. I'm saying when I was in Scouts, it was fine. You're asking what should the policy be going forward. It should be left up to the leaders of the Scouts," said Walker.

On whether being gay is a choice or not, Walker said that's "not even an issue for me to be involved in."

"The bottom line is I'm going to stand up and work hard for every American, without regard of who they are, no matter where they come from, no matter what their background, I'm going to fight for people, whether they vote for me or not," said Walker.

Contrary to popular belief, Walker said, his wife does not disagree with him on same-sex marriage.

In a recent interview with The Washington Post, Tonette Walker talked about how disappointed their two sons were that her husband called last month's Supreme Court ruling legalizing same-sex marriage a "grave mistake."

That story left the impression that Tonette Walker agreed with her sons and disagreed with her husband.

The GOP presidential candidate told CNN that is not the case.

"My wife doesn't disagree with me on my position on marriage. She said she was torn because we have some family members who have some very different views on that. She was torn just because the emotion on the family and because all of the media attention on that. Not because she was torn with me on the position," Walker said.

Tonette Walker's cousin, Shelly, married another woman last month. Alex Walker, Scott and Tonette Walker's youngest son, was a groomsman.

Wisconsin's first lady confirmed to CNN separately that she does, in fact, oppose same-sex marriage, as her husband does.

Last week, GOP presidential candidate Rick Santorum went after the Walkers, saying if she is for same-sex marriage it could have an impact on her husband's policies and positions because "spouses matter."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He's just wrong," Walker said.

Walker talks everything but Trump // Boston Herald // Chris Villani – July 19, 2015

When it comes to Donald Trump, Scott Walker seems content to let the issues and his poll numbers do all the talking.

During a campaign swing through New Hampshire this past week, the Wisconsin governor took questions of any sort, offering replies on immigration, social issues, how much time he plans on spending in New Hampshire, and even his own question-answering.

“The unique thing about me is that I answer questions,” he said Thursday. He even made sure to answer questions from local reporters rather than the same faces from the national outlets he’s apt to see after most events.

When asked whether Trump is hurting the GOP brand, Walker took a pass.

“Donald Trump can speak for himself, I am not going to put words in the mouth of any candidate,” he said. “I think people are tired of candidates lashing out at other candidates.”

He went on to pivot to what he is “for” — reform, growth and safety.

It’s unlikely Walker is going to go after Trump since he’s essentially working from the same playbook. He says he’s against amnesty for illegal immigrants. He touts reforms in Wisconsin that he says put more money in the hands of local governments and gutted funding for Planned Parenthood. He strongly disagrees with President Obama that climate change presents a greater threat to coming generations than radical Islamic terrorism.

In many ways, Scott Walker is Donald Trump with toned-down rhetoric and a more manageable, if less full, head of hair.

And his messages sell to the Republican base. The standing room only crowd cheered when he brought up his tough stance on illegal immigration and sharply criticized the president and Hillary Clinton for their foreign policy decisions.

Another reason for Walker not to punch Trump — he’d be punching himself, in a roundabout way.

When Lindsey Graham or Rick Perry take shots at The Donald, they’re doing so with polling numbers that have them outside of the top-10 tier. Walker is within the margin of Trump and beating Jeb Bush in the latest Fox News poll. He’s managed to make it a three-headed race and has only a fraction of the name recognition of his top rivals. Not to mention the fact that Walker only joined the race, officially, on Monday.

So while the newcomer to the 2016 field may not be taking shots at Trump, he may have the ability to take him out at the ballot box.

Republican Scott Walker brushes up on U.S. foreign policy // Reuters // Steve Holland – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker had a steep learning curve on U.S. foreign policy after some early miscues in his race for the Republican presidential nomination. Now an eager student of global affairs, he is staking out positions that, while perhaps short on nuance, play well to conservatives.

The governor of Wisconsin, Walker is best known for his victory over unions in his state. Republicans generally do not put him in the category of a strategic foreign policy thinker.

But he has been brushing up.

This was evident on a campaign bus tour across Iowa this weekend and on earlier stops in South Carolina.

Walker, 47, last week became the 15th candidate to seek the 2016 Republican presidential nomination. He, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush and U.S. Senator Marco Rubio of Florida are among the early front-runners in polling for the November 2016 election.

Walker saw no need for diplomatic niceties in response to the Iran nuclear deal that President Barack Obama announced last week with Tehran: He would terminate it as soon as possible and persuade U.S. allies to join Washington in imposing more crippling economic sanctions on Tehran.

"This is not a country we should be doing business with," he said in Davenport, Iowa, reminding the crowd of Iran's holding of 52 American hostages in 1979. "This is one of the leading state sponsors of terrorism."

Walker would also be more confrontational with both Russia over its aggression against Ukraine and against China, for the territorial pressures Beijing is putting on U.S. allies in the South China Sea.

He would dramatically increase U.S. military spending after budget cuts that have drawn complaints from military officials.

"The United States needs a foreign policy that puts steel in the face of our enemies," Walker says.

LEADER IN KEY STATE OF IOWA

His hawkish views are welcome among conservatives who dominate the Republican Party in Iowa and who may award him with a victory in the Iowa caucuses on Feb. 1, the first nominating contest on the road to the election.

Walker leads in Iowa and needs a win to gain momentum in the contests that follow, like Feb. 9 in New Hampshire, where his standing is not as strong.

"What he said is exactly what we need to do," said Judy Jamison of Bettendorf, Iowa, after hearing Walker speak in Davenport. "He's shown in Wisconsin that he's not going to be intimidated."

One of Walker's most prominent early missteps was a statement that his fight against the unions in Wisconsin had girded him for the battle against Islamic State.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He also said the biggest national security decision by 1980s President Ronald Reagan - who is credited with adopting policies that helped win the Cold War - was his move to fire air traffic controllers at U.S. airports.

All of this raised eyebrows among the Republican foreign policy professional class in Washington. Walker took steps to beef up his foreign policy knowledge.

He now gets daily briefings about what is going on abroad. His national security adviser is Mike Gallagher, a Middle East expert who had worked for Republican U.S. Senator Bob Corker, one of the leading voices in the party on national security. Former U.S. Senator Jim Talent is also an adviser on international relations.

OPEN TO CRITICISM

Aides said Walker has enjoyed learning more about world hot spots. But his remarks on the Iran nuclear deal opened him up to criticism.

Bush took issue with Walker's position that he would immediately jettison the deal, suggesting it lacked maturity. He did not mention Walker by name but his intention was clear.

"One thing I won't do is just say as a candidate: 'I'm just going to tear up the agreement on the first day.' That sounds great, but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first," Bush told reporters in Carson City, Nevada, on Friday.

He said a secretary of state and a secretary of defense should be put in place first. "You might want to have your team in place before you take an act like that," Bush said.

Such talk prompted a rare response from the Walker team to Bush, a possible prelude to a clash over the issue when the candidates have their first debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

The Walker campaign blasted out a statement from foreign policy adviser Robert C. O'Brien that rejected Bush's view without mentioning him by name.

"We don’t need more information, we don’t need to wait to confirm the next secretary of state, we need decisive leadership and we need it now. This won’t be easy, but when America leads, and has a strong president with clear priorities who believes in American strength, the rest of the world will follow," O'Brien said.

Republican pollster Frank Luntz, after listening to Walker at a town hall event in Cedar Rapids, placed Walker's views on national security in the middle of conservative thinking among presidential candidates. He said Walker is between U.S. Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, who would limit U.S. engagement overseas, and U.S. Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who favors more U.S. intervention.

"He's dead center," Luntz told Reuters. "That's what the public is thinking right now. That’s what Republicans are thinking. There is a general fear among Americans that we are weaker today than we were five years ago, and we’re going to be weaker still."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reuters – July 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Scott Walker had a steep learning curve on foreign policy after some early off-key statements. Now an eager student of global affairs, is staking out positions that play well to conservatives but lack a lot of nuance.

This was clear from a weekend bus tour the Wisconsin governor took across Iowa and earlier stops in South Carolina as part of the campaign swing he took in the week after becoming the 15th candidate to seek the 2016 Republican presidential nomination.

He saw no need for diplomatic niceties in response to the Iran nuclear deal that President Barack Obama negotiated with Tehran: He would terminate it as soon as possible and persuade U.S. allies to join Washington in imposing more crippling economic sanctions on Tehran.

“This is not a country we should be doing business with,” he said in Davenport, Iowa, reminding the crowd of Iran’s holding of 52 American hostages in 1979. “This is one of the leading state sponsors of terrorism.”

Walker would also be more confrontational with both Russia over its aggression against Ukraine and against China, for the territorial pressures Beijing is putting on U.S. allies in the South China Sea.

He would dramatically increase U.S. military spending after budget cuts that military officials have complained about.

“The United States needs a foreign policy that puts steel in the face of our enemies,” Walker says.

This kind of talk is welcome to conservatives who dominate the Republican Party in Iowa and who may award him with a victory in the Iowa caucuses on Feb. 1, the first nominating contest on the road to the November 2016 election.

Walker leads in Iowa and needs a win to gain momentum in the contests that follow like Feb. 9 in New Hampshire, where his standing is not as strong.

“What he said is exactly what we need to do,” said Judy Jamison of Bettendorf, after hearing Walker speak in Davenport. “He’s shown in Wisconsin that he’s not going to be intimidated.”

Walker’s position on Iran is a rejection of the White House view that it is better to take the deal available now because the sanctions regime will crumble anyway as many governments want to allow companies to resume business deals with Tehran.

One of Walker’s rivals, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, criticized the Wisconsin governor’s position that he would immediately jettison the deal, suggesting it lacked maturity. He did not mention Walker by name but his intention was clear.

“One thing I won’t do is just say as a candidate: ‘I’m just going to tear up the agreement on the first day.’ That sounds great, but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first,” Bush told reporters in Carson City, Nevada, on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said a secretary of state and a secretary of defense should be put in place first. “You might want to have your team in place before you take an act like that,” said Bush.

Such talk prompted a rare response from the Walker team to Bush, a possible prelude to a clash over the issue when the candidates have their first debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

The Walker campaign blasted out a statement from foreign policy adviser Robert C. O’Brien that rejected Bush’s view without mentioning him by name.

“We don’t need more information, we don’t need to wait to confirm the next Secretary of State, we need decisive leadership and we need it now. This won’t be easy, but when America leads, and has a strong president with clear priorities who believes in American strength, the rest of the world will follow,” O’Brien said.

Walker, along with Bush and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, are among the front-runners for the nomination.

When Republicans think of Walker, they generally refer to his victory over unions as governor of Wisconsin. They do not put him in the category of a strategic foreign policy thinker.

Walker’s foreign policy miscues included a statement earlier this year that his fight against the unions in Wisconsin had girded him for the battle against Islamic State. He also said the biggest national security decision by 1980s President Ronald Reagan – who is credited with adopting policies that helped win the Cold War – was his move to fire air traffic controllers at U.S. airports.

All this raised eyebrows among the Republican foreign policy professional class in Washington. Walker, 47, took steps to beef up his foreign policy knowledge.

He now gets daily briefings about what is going on abroad. His national security adviser is Mike Gallagher, a Middle East expert who had worked for Tennessee Republican Senator Bob Corker, who is one of the leading voices in the party on national security. Former Senator Jim Talent of Missouri is also an adviser on international relations.

Aides said Walker has enjoyed the process of learning more about world hot spots.

He has adopted some of the more hawkish views in the Republican Party.

Republican pollster Frank Luntz, after listening to Walker at a town hall event in Cedar Rapids, placed Walker’s views on national security in the middle of conservative thinking among presidential candidates. He said Walker is between Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, who would limit U.S. engagement overseas, and Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who favors more U.S. intervention.

“He’s dead center,” Luntz told Reuters. “That’s what the public is thinking right now. That’s what Republicans are thinking. There is a general fear among Americans that we are weaker today than we were five years ago, and we’re going to be weaker still.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa, July 19 (Reuters) - Republican presidential candidate Scott Walker had a steep learning curve on foreign policy after some early off-key statements. Now an eager student of global affairs, is staking out positions that play well to conservatives but lack a lot of nuance.

This was clear from a weekend bus tour the Wisconsin governor took across Iowa and earlier stops in South Carolina as part of the campaign swing he took in the week after becoming the 15th candidate to seek the 2016 Republican presidential nomination.

He saw no need for diplomatic niceties in response to the Iran nuclear deal that President Barack Obama negotiated with Tehran: He would terminate it as soon as possible and persuade U.S. allies to join Washington in imposing more crippling economic sanctions on Tehran.

"This is not a country we should be doing business with," he said in Davenport, Iowa, reminding the crowd of Iran's holding of 52 American hostages in 1979. "This is one of the leading state sponsors of terrorism."

Walker would also be more confrontational with both Russia over its aggression against Ukraine and against China, for the territorial pressures Beijing is putting on U.S. allies in the South China Sea.

He would dramatically increase U.S. military spending after budget cuts that military officials have complained about.

"The United States needs a foreign policy that puts steel in the face of our enemies," Walker says.

This kind of talk is welcome to conservatives who dominate the Republican Party in Iowa and who may award him with a victory in the Iowa caucuses on Feb. 1, the first nominating contest on the road to the November 2016 election.

Walker leads in Iowa and needs a win to gain momentum in the contests that follow like Feb. 9 in New Hampshire, where his standing is not as strong.

"What he said is exactly what we need to do," said Judy Jamison of Bettendorf, after hearing Walker speak in Davenport. "He's shown in Wisconsin that he's not going to be intimidated."

Walker's position on Iran is a rejection of the White House view that it is better to take the deal available now because the sanctions regime will crumble anyway as many governments want to allow companies to resume business deals with Tehran.

One of Walker's rivals, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, criticized the Wisconsin governor's position that he would immediately jettison the deal, suggesting it lacked maturity. He did not mention Walker by name but his intention was clear.

"One thing I won't do is just say as a candidate: 'I'm just going to tear up the agreement on the first day.' That sounds great, but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first," Bush told reporters in Carson City, Nevada, on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said a secretary of state and a secretary of defense should be put in place first. "You might want to have your team in place before you take an act like that," said Bush.

Such talk prompted a rare response from the Walker team to Bush, a possible prelude to a clash over the issue when the candidates have their first debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

The Walker campaign blasted out a statement from foreign policy adviser Robert C. O'Brien that rejected Bush's view without mentioning him by name.

"We don't need more information, we don't need to wait to confirm the next Secretary of State, we need decisive leadership and we need it now. This won't be easy, but when America leads, and has a strong president with clear priorities who believes in American strength, the rest of the world will follow," O'Brien said.

Walker, along with Bush and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, are among the front-runners for the nomination.

When Republicans think of Walker, they generally refer to his victory over unions as governor of Wisconsin. They do not put him in the category of a strategic foreign policy thinker.

Walker's foreign policy miscues included a statement earlier this year that his fight against the unions in Wisconsin had girded him for the battle against Islamic State. He also said the biggest national security decision by 1980s President Ronald Reagan - who is credited with adopting policies that helped win the Cold War - was his move to fire air traffic controllers at U.S. airports.

All this raised eyebrows among the Republican foreign policy professional class in Washington. Walker, 47, took steps to beef up his foreign policy knowledge.

He now gets daily briefings about what is going on abroad. His national security adviser is Mike Gallagher, a Middle East expert who had worked for Tennessee Republican Senator Bob Corker, who is one of the leading voices in the party on national security. Former Senator Jim Talent of Missouri is also an adviser on international relations.

Aides said Walker has enjoyed the process of learning more about world hot spots.

He has adopted some of the more hawkish views in the Republican Party.

Republican pollster Frank Luntz, after listening to Walker at a town hall event in Cedar Rapids, placed Walker's views on national security in the middle of conservative thinking among presidential candidates. He said Walker is between Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, who would limit U.S. engagement overseas, and Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who favors more U.S. intervention.

"He's dead center," Luntz told Reuters. "That's what the public is thinking right now. That's what Republicans are thinking. There is a general fear among Americans that we are weaker today than we were five years ago, and we're going to be weaker still."

Walker says he supported path to citizenship, but not amnesty // Washington Examiner // Philip Klein – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker acknowledged in a CNN interview that in the past he had expressed support for a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but said that he wasn't talking about amnesty at the time.

In an interview aboard his campaign trailer that aired Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union," Dana Bash pressed Walker about his shift from somebody who once said a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants "made sense" to a presidential candidate talking about restrictions on legal immigration. She asked whether such shifts undermined his pitch to voters that he's somebody who stands up for his principles.

"The only issue where I've clearly said I had a position before — and even on that, as governor, I didn't have a role to play in immigration. I said there should be a path, years ago, when I talked about going forward with legal immigration", he said. "I didn't talk about amnesty. In fact, I said in that specific interview, I opposed the 'Gang of 5,' the measure that Marco Rubio proposed. So I specifically even then said, 'I'm not supporting that.' But I said flat out in the beginning of the year, that's a position I have changed on."

In the 2013 interview with the Wausau Daily Herald editorial board that has gotten a second life during his presidential run, Walker was asked about the millions of individuals who immigrated to the United States illegally, and whether he could see them gaining citizenship with the right mix of penalties and waiting periods. "Sure, yeah," he responded. "I mean, I think it makes sense."

The meaning of the term "amnesty" is itself a hotly debated one in politics, and to many conservatives, any path to citizenship to those who entered the country illegally — even with penalties — would be considered amnesty.

Bash also asked Walker about comments he's made about legal immigration.

"What I've specifically said is I think priority under legal immigration should be given to the impact on American working families on their wages in a way that would improve the American economy," Walker said. "That not only means people like me who were born here, that means people like the woman I just met in Cedar Rapids, for example, who moved here many years ago, was a political refugee of the Congo, and who went through the process to be a legal citizen. She's working here. And I believe for her, and for others who were born here, there needs to be priority given, to say, we're going to need to make sure we put priority [on] American working families and their wages. Doesn't mean there won't ever be legal immigration, it just means that's what our priorities should be."

UNDECLARED

KASICH

John Kasich Group's Video All But Declares Him a 2016 Presidential Candidate // Bloomberg // Steven Yaccino – July 19, 2015

New Day for America, a group supporting John Kasich's bid for the White House, released a five-minute video Sunday about their soon-to-be candidate, highlighting his life story, record in Congress, and executive experience in a must-win swing state.

When Kasich first comes on the screen, the words "Conservative Governor of Ohio" appear beneath his name. By the end, that titled had changed to "PRESIDENT 2016."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An extended version of an ad buy that New Day is running on New Hampshire and Boston-area television, the video is the farthest Kasich's team has gone to declare publicly that he is running for president. He is expected to announce his candidacy at Ohio State University in Columbus on Tuesday morning, followed by stops in New Hampshire, South Carolina, Iowa and Michigan this week.

"Who is it that has the experience to balance the federal budget, which is very hard to do?" Kasich asks in the video, which begins by flipping through the pictures of every other Republican and Democratic candidate in the presidential race. "Who is it that's had the experience in turning a major state with huge deficits and high unemployment to prosperity? Who is it that spent time, actual time, working on the national security issues. You know, of all those people running, there's not one that has experience in all those critical three areas."

Kasich has been struggling to gain traction on the national stage, consistently getting around 2 percent in national polls. The video addresses head on what may be Kasich's biggest challenge: convincing voters that an unprecedented field of 15 GOP candidates needs one more member. And it signals exactly how Kasich will try to stand out in the coming months.

"You know, I was one of the chief architects of balancing the budget," Kasich said after the camera panned over framed photos from time in Congress, where he was the chairman of the U.S. House Budget Committee and a member of U.S. House Armed Services Committee. "First time we did it since man walked on the moon. We haven't done it since."

The spot, which is part of the digital component of a seven-figure media buy New Day recently launched, also includes footage of Kasich's time as a Fox News host and touches on the fiscal challenges of his time as governor of Ohio, where he won re-election by a 2-to-1 margin last year.

How John Kasich could win in 2016 // Cincinnati Enquirer // Chrissie Thompson – July 19, 2015

COLUMBUS, Ohio — John Kasich has two problems.

You may have already noticed the first. Kasich is going to run for president, in a campaign scheduled to launch Tuesday.

But do you know who he is?

Here's the second: Kasich is the popular second-term governor of Ohio and an 18-year veteran of Congress. But the same Ohio voters who have never handed him a loss, whose swing-state endorsement is crucial to his White House résumé, question whether he really could be president. To some, it's almost like he'll always be the boy next door.

Much of the country doesn't know him. The people who do, know him too well.

Then there's a third group: believers.

Kasich's experience, candor and moderate views are winning him a growing number of fans in New Hampshire and Iowa and among politicos elsewhere.

He could outshine presumed frontrunner Jeb Bush, they say. His experience level would challenge Marco Rubio.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And if Republican voters can coalesce around a moderate like Kasich, he might even pose a threat to Hillary Clinton.

CAMPAIGNING LIKE HE MEANS IT

Maybe the doubters don't realize what a big deal it is to be the governor of Ohio.

Every time Kasich addresses a group of Republicans, he talks about his landslide re-election in 2014. Almost without fail, several people say: "Wow." Once, in Georgia, someone gasped.

One thing is clear: Many Republican primary voters feel a responsibility to raise up a candidate who can win back the White House. And no Republican has ever won the presidency without winning Ohio.

For Kasich, the journey to presidential candidacy is rooted in his re-election. Touting income-tax cuts and economic growth, he rolled over scandal-ruined Democrat Ed FitzGerald, 64% to 33%. Kasich won 86 of Ohio's 88 counties – even the one containing Democratic stronghold Cleveland.

A month after the election, he launched a national tour to promote a federal balanced-budget amendment. Then he began campaigning in early-primary states.

"It was sort of amazing, right?" he said after his first trip to New Hampshire, in March. "You come to something like this and see how people react, and it's pretty positive. It really does have an impact on the way you think."

But to run for president requires more than positive vibes. Recently, Kasich, 63, seemed to flip a switch, from entitled elder statesman to earnest campaigner.

It's a role he hasn't filled since 2010, when he eked out a two-point victory over incumbent Democrat Ted Strickland to become Ohio's governor.

That election marked Kasich's third-straight defeat of a Democratic incumbent. He knocked the first one off in 1978, becoming a state senator at age 26. He kicked off his nine terms in Congress in 1982, becoming the only Republican in the country to defeat an incumbent that year.

Kasich's only failed election? The last time he ran for president, in 1999. Kasich had helped lead a charge in the 1990s to balance the federal budget and sought to convert a growing national profile into a White House bid. (Even now, most conservatives who recognize Kasich on the campaign trail cite his balanced-budget experience in Congress.)

Enthusiasm and financial support for George W. Bush forced Kasich to end his 1999 presidential campaign in July. The loss kicked off a decade outside of public office: working for Lehman Brothers out of a two-person office in Ohio, hosting a show on Fox News, writing books.

Kasich says he didn't prepare for his first presidential bid. This time, he says, "I can see sort of the pathway as to how I can be president. I can see what the trek is like to the top of Mount Everest."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LESSONS LEARNED

Something else has changed for Kasich. He’s intentionally less of a jerk.

Take this exchange, from a campaign stop in Georgia. When a reporter asked about an executive order he'd issued, taking away union rights for some home-health-care workers, he cut off the question, answered brusquely and walked away. He later, out of nowhere, apologized and took time to answer the question. It was a deferential, even courteous, gesture not always seen from Kasich with reporters.

He's almost assumed an "aw shucks" demeanor when he thanks voters on the campaign trail, making jokes about how few people came to see him when he ran in 1999. "Aw shucks" is definitely not natural Kasich.

"Most people don't know me very well. People make judgments," he explained.

"I'm a McKees Rocks boy," he said, referencing his Western Pennsylvania childhood hometown. "We're rough and tumble there. We're direct and blunt and all that kind of stuff."

To be fair, he is still quite sure of his own rightness.

As he said last month, "The doubters are not experts."

Are the believers experts?

"Uh, yeah, pretty much," he said.

And he is still unapologetic. Nearly every campaign stop, he answers a question the way the conservative questioner doesn't like. But most of the time, people seem OK with it. It's refreshing, they say.

"There's a Midwestern bluntness, but without a Northeastern edge," said John Watson, who served as chief of staff for former Georgia governor Sonny Perdue and who has introduced Kasich to Atlanta donors.

Republican political junkies are often familiar with Kasich's support for Common Core educational standards or for Medicaid expansion under President Obama's health care law.

But how about this?

In Iowa, a woman asked about officials' misbehavior, calling out Lois Lerner, formerly of the IRS, and Clinton.

"I'm more worried about what we're going to do to fix America than I am about Hillary's (email) server," Kasich said, almost chastising the woman.

Yet she told the Columbus Dispatch after the event that she was "fine" with his answer, and Kasich "appears to be presidential."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You have to look at the totality of the candidate on all the issues and whether they hold to their belief," said Robb Thomson, a Republican activist whose father served as governor of New Hampshire. "Are they trying to pander to me? I don't think Governor Kasich does a lot of pandering."

HOW TO MAKE FRIENDS AND INFLUENCE PEOPLE

Teresa Fedor wasn't prepared for the result of her first meeting with Kasich.

The Democratic state representative walked out during Kasich's first State of the State address, joining a protest in the Statehouse rotunda over his plan to limit the collective bargaining rights of public employees. During hearings for the anti-union bill, state troopers closed the Statehouse to the public, citing overcrowding concerns. Fedor defied them, dramatically opening the doors to crowds outside and then joining a lawsuit over Statehouse access.

The bill passed, but Ohio voters overwhelmingly voted to repeal the legislation a year after electing Kasich governor.

A few months later, Fedor asked to meet with Kasich. His advisers told him to decline. He didn't take their advice.

It turned out Fedor had been trying to pass comprehensive anti-human trafficking legislation.

Early into her pitch, Kasich signed on. "Why don't we pass your bill?" the governor said.

She stared at him. "Do you really mean it?" Fedor said.

Kasich has since signed two massive bills and an executive order, stiffening penalties for traffickers and johns and providing services to victims. Fedor still opposed Kasich's re-election bid in 2014, but newspapers have run photos of the two hugging at bill signings. "No one was more surprised than me" at the partnership, Fedor says.

Kasich credits his faith in God with his interest in stopping human trafficking. It's also one of the motivators for his signature gubernatorial accomplishment: expanding Medicaid under Obamacare, a move which angered conservatives and required heavy Democratic support.

"For me, faith is the do's, not the don'ts," Kasich said in May to a group of about 250 Georgians, who mostly responded in thoughtful silence.

Kasich says his faith has grown consistently since the late 1980s, after his parents died in a car crash with a drunken driver.

"I'm just trying to figure out how my life can have meaning in the world," Kasich told me. "My life is not going to be, 'I'm waiting for a voice' or 'I'm waiting for an email.' I don't know if God really emails or not."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kasich routinely polls at 1 to 2% nationally in the crowded GOP field– and in Iowa, and in New Hampshire. Aides believe his candor will stand out in a debate. But he's polling so poorly he risks missing the cut for the first one, Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

So Kasich goes back to his roots: what he did while running for state Senate or Congress. Calling supporters. Visiting homes. And that means New Hampshire, whose population of 1.3 million is about double that of a congressional district.

"You don't have to meet the whole country," Kasich told me. "You build your own army. ... I've never met anybody who I didn't think I could get to vote for me if I could talk to them."

For what it's worth, Kasich also has a strategy for taking on Clinton, whom he's leading in Ohio polls.

"I don't believe you beat Hillary by talking about Benghazi or emails or anything like that," said Kasich, who has repeatedly declined to criticize the former first lady and secretary of State. "The person that's going to get elected is someone that can give people confidence that they can renew the American spirit."

Is Kasich – the incumbent-defeating state senator and congressman and governor – out of his league?

Not a bit, said Dick Wright, an elderly Navy veteran from Charleston, S.C. "I think he's electable," he said.

After all, said Wright's stepson, Russell Guerard: "Somebody's got to be president."

Kasich prepared for long run in presidential bid // Columbus Dispatch // Darrel Rowland and Jessica Wehrman – July 19, 2015

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. — John Kasich is ready to compete in every primary and every caucus in America for the presidential nomination, his top campaign strategist says.

Kasich is willing to pursue that long-shot quest clear through the Republican National Convention a year from now in Cleveland.

And “when” the Ohio governor wins the nomination, he will put likely Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton on the defensive “from Day One” in a campaign that may cost $2 billion overall.

That is John Weaver’s sweeping overview of how Kasich can become the next president of the United States. Weaver, who also advised the GOP presidential campaigns of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, spoke during Kasich’s campaign swing through New Hampshire last week.

Although Kasich will become the 16th major GOP candidate when he officially declares his presidential intentions on Tuesday at the Ohio Union on the Ohio State University campus, his campaign team regards only two or three of the others — whom they wouldn’t identify — as serious contenders, Weaver said.

The campaign will continue to push the Kasich resume trifecta: experience as governor during Ohio’s recovery; 18 years as a congressman who helped balance the federal budget and reform defense spending; and almost a decade in private business. However, Weaver said, part of Kasich's status as "the best candidate in the field" is "having the most interesting personality and interesting charisma."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Is the veteran political consultant worried about a possible cringe moment along the grueling campaign trail from the governor who once chastised the "idiot cop" for giving him a ticket and warned opponents to "get on the bus or get run over by it"?

"I worked for people like (former Texas Sen.) Phil Gramm and John McCain, so when people warned me that John Kasich could be prickly — perhaps my prickly meter is worn out, because I haven't see that side of him. Look, he's direct. Only in politics could somebody who answers a question honestly, directly, is that considered something that makes people nervous," Weaver said.

"I find it refreshing, and I think the voters will reward him for being direct" in an era of blow-dried, focus-group-tested candidates. "He is who he is. We're not going to change him."

The University of Virginia's Larry Sabato, one of the nation's most-respected political scientists, doesn't disagree with Weaver's take on Kasich, but he says time is growing short and the governor needs both luck and money.

"He has a good case to make and a good story to tell, but he's going to have to make that case aggressively and tell the story quickly because the train's leaving the station because of the debates ... and right now he's nowhere man," Sabato said.

The first GOP presidential debate is Aug. 6 in Cleveland and the second on Sept. 16 at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in California. Sponsors of both are limiting their prime-time matchups to the top 10 contenders based on national polls, although secondary events are scheduled for the also-rans. Kasich is 12th in RealClear Politics' national polls' average, but only half a percentage point out of 10th.

"He's got to get in the debates, he's got to distinguish himself quickly, he's got to help Republicans understand why the governor of super swing state Ohio is a strong nominee," Sabato said.

Candidates "always overestimate how well-known they are," he said. "Outside Ohio, he's really not really well-known. He is prominent compared to 99.99 percent of Americans, but he's behind the group of presidential candidates, and that's all that matters."

The 2016 Republican race has often been described as one with a limited number of lanes: one for the Christian conservative candidate, one for the Main Street business type, and so on. And, as Weaver put it, "There are more swimmers than there are lanes."

Right now, Sabato said, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is blocking Kasich's lane to the nomination.

"Essentially, Jeb Bush and his enormous family machine have taken up that entire lane," Sabato said. "They bought the lane. They bought it. How is he going to compete with now $118 million (raised on behalf of Bush)?"

However, Sabato added, "If Jeb Bush dissolves for some reason, collapses, then Kasich is in a good position to move into the Jeb Bush lane."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Weaver's not sure he's buying the whole lanes analogy.

"You can swim in multiple lanes. You have to have some broad appeal," he said. "You can't have a winning coalition in just one lane."

Weaver said Kasich will not fall into the trap that's hurt previous presidential candidates of failing to qualify for a state primary or caucus. In 2012, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum was Mitt Romney's main challenger but wasn't even on the ballot in some Ohio congressional districts.

"We'll be on the ballot everywhere," Weaver said.

That includes Iowa, whose caucuses represent the nation's first presidential contest — one that some wondered whether Kasich would skip. The governor is stopping in Iowa on his five-day announcement tour this week, and future visits are scheduled, Weaver said.

"Every campaign has their own path to the nomination. ... We'll have a path that's unique to us, but it will include Iowa in some form," he said.

Although Kasich will make occasional forays elsewhere, his emphasis will remain on early voting states. Those include Michigan, which could turn into a showdown for Midwestern supremacy with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

The Kasich team has game-planned numerous possibilities for how the GOP contest may take shape.

"We're prepared for this to be over early — which I don't anticipate — and we're prepared for this to be over at the convention, and anywhere in between," Weaver said.

The new dynamic for 2016 is that even candidates who perform poorly can stay in the race with just one or two mega-donors.

"We're prepared for any of that," Weaver acknowledged. "I expect the race to go deep into the (election) calendar."

Kasich also is prepared for the loosely regulated campaign-finance world of modern elections. Once he formally becomes a candidate, his official campaign is limited to individual contributions of $2,700 per cycle. And it cannot legally coordinate with the two "independent" campaign committees that Kasich has been using to fund the bulk of his activity to date.

However, leaders of the independent committees — which can continue raising money in unlimited amounts — already are privy to Kasich's long-term campaign strategy (which, of course, may change as a race takes shape). His official campaign committee is managed by Beth Hansen, his gubernatorial chief of staff who ran his 2010 campaign for governor. The outside committees are headed by Matt Carle, the governor's legislative lobbyist who ran his 2014 re-election effort.

Fred Davis, the Hollywood ad-maker whose team recorded virtually every Kasich move last week in New Hampshire, will remain with the separate committees. That means the latest material shot will go to the independent groups for possible future ads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Once Kasich declares, Weaver said, the outside groups will be on their own, but “they’ll keep doing their thing. Hopefully, they’ll be doing it effectively and efficiently, and I have faith that they will … Hopefully the combination of those things being done together is successful."

The key to Kasich’s success “is how he can translate what he’s achieved in the past into a vision that is understandable by average Americans where he wants to lead the country moving forward,” Weaver said.

“I am very confident that within relative short order that the governor will be considered … in the top tier, and the race takes a different set of contours.”

OTHER

Walker, Kasich and the GOP’s Midwest bracket // WaPo // E. J. Dionne Jr. – July 19, 2015

Republicans won’t win the presidency in 2016 without making inroads in the Midwest. Happily for the GOP, two Midwestern governors are running for their party’s nomination.

Both won reelection in 2014. The one from the state with more electoral votes won with 64 percent of the vote with wide appeal to Democrats and independents. The one from the smaller state got just 52 percent of the vote after a divisive campaign.

The former fought to have his state accept the Affordable Care Act’s Medicaid expansion. He made his case on moral grounds, arguing that at heaven’s door, Saint Peter is “probably not going to ask you much about what you did about keeping government small. But he is going to ask you what you did for the poor.”

The latter adamantly opposed expanding Medicaid under the ACA, and his speeches are compendiums of every right-wing bromide party activists demand. “We need a president who — on the first day in office — will call on Congress to pass a full repeal of Obamacare,” this hopeful declared when he announced his candidacy last week. “Next, we need to rein in the federal government’s out-of-control regulations that are like a wet blanket on the economy.” And on he went.

Now: Guess which one is seen as a top contender, and which is dismissed as the darkest of dark horses? Which one was running third behind only Jeb Bush and Donald Trump in the Real Clear Politics poll average as of Sunday, and which one was in 12th place with all of 1.5 percent?

You have no doubt figured out that I’m talking about John Kasich of Ohio, who is expected to announce his candidacy on Tuesday, and Scott Walker of Wisconsin. It’s telling about the contemporary Republican party: Kasich would probably be the better bet in the general election but barely registers in the surveys, while Walker has the better chance of winning the nomination.

It’s preposterous to see Kasich as anything but a conservative. He was a drill sergeant for Newt Gingrich’s Republican Revolution in the 1990s. When Kasich was chairman of the House Budget Committee, “60 Minutes” produced a segment about him titled “The Axman Cometh.” As governor, Kasich pushed big tax cuts that included repealing the estate tax. (The Republican obsession with protecting large fortunes is beyond me.) He also took on the unions with what was known as Senate Bill 5 to end collective bargaining for public employees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it's on the labor question that the Kasich and Walker stories diverge, in large part because of the accident of state election laws. In Ohio, the unions could put Bill 5 directly to the voters, and they repealed it in 2011 by a 61-percent-to-39-percent landslide. A chastened Kasich recalibrated.

Walker is best known for a very similar attack on public employee unions, but Wisconsin had no provision for a comparable referendum. The unions felt they had no choice but to organize a recall of Walker. Voters typically don't take well to recalls that aren't a reaction to outright skullduggery and corruption. Walker prevailed, and he's been bragging about busting unions and surviving ever since. Conservatives love him for it.

Kasich, by contrast, reached out to his previous enemies. When he was endorsed by the Carpenters Union last year, Kasich said: "For too long, there's been a disconnect between people like me and organized labor." Walker is as likely to say something like this as he is to sing a rousing chorus of "Solidarity Forever."

When Kasich talks about his time as governor, as he did to my Post colleague Michael Gerson last year, the things he brags about include his work on autism, mental illness and drug addiction. He notes — the Almighty again — that all his constituents "are made in the image of God."

You can tell Kasich knows he will have to run a rebel's campaign because he has hired rebellious Republican consultants, including John Weaver, John McCain's campaign strategist who feuded famously with Karl Rove, and Fred Davis, who specializes in offbeat (and sometimes controversial) political commercials.

Kasich's poll standing might well exclude him from one or more of the early debates. That would be a shame. Perhaps there should be a Midwest debate bracket. A Kasich-Walker confrontation would be especially enlightening.

"I have a little bit of a different message here," Kasich said at a Republican Governors Association meeting last year. Indeed he does. It's probably why he can't win. It's also why his party needs to listen.

GOP field chases Iowa evangelicals // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 19, 2015

AMES, Iowa — After nine hours and 10 presidential candidates, evangelicals were no closer to settling on a standard-bearer to support in the Iowa caucuses by the end of the Family Leadership Summit on Saturday.

In the 2008 and 2012 Republican caucuses, Iowa's Christian conservatives played kingmakers by rallying decisively around alternatives to the party's establishment-backed candidate. But rather than helping them zero in on a single candidate, the summit displayed the breadth of motivating issues — from gay marriage to Benghazi to Common Core — and large number of attractive candidates that are making it difficult for the bloc to consolidate its influence.

"My hope is that the field will winnow down by caucus time, but there's really no reason to believe it will," said Robert Cramer, who serves on the board of the Family Leader, a group that promotes social conservatism and the sponsor of Saturday's event. "There might not be any clear consensus candidate."

In Iowa politics, where the group's endorsement carries significant weight, Family Leader President Bob Vander Plaats said he was not ready to declare that progress had been made. "The summit was exceptionally insightful and informative," he told POLITICO. "We will see if it serves to begin winnowing the field."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In May, national evangelical leaders met in McLean, Virginia, to try to settle on a single presidential candidate, even as they privately expressed skepticism that it could be done.

Saturday's summit demonstrated just how difficult it will be.

Conservative leaders singled out Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, the 2008 Iowa caucus winner, as the current frontrunners among the state's conservative Christian activists. But despite the doubts social conservatives have expressed about Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker — he's attended the reception for a lesbian wedding and a questioner on Saturday challenged him for hiring pro-choice staffers — he continues to lead in Iowa, including among white, born-again evangelical Christians.

In a Quinnipiac poll conducted in late June, Walker had 18 percent support among that group, followed by Cruz with 11 percent and neurosurgeon Ben Carson with 9 percent.

It was Cruz and Carson, though, who had the most visible contingent of supporters inside the Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University.

Cruz received a more enthusiastic reception than either Walker, Carson or Huckabee when he sat down with the event's emcee, Republican messaging guru Frank Luntz — including a rousing standing ovation when he called for investigating, prosecuting and de-funding Planned Parenthood after a video was released this week showing an executive of the organization discussing fetal tissue harvesting.

But Cruz is currently polling in eighth place in Iowa, according to the RealClearPolitics average of recent surveys, behind all three of those rivals.

And it was Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, currently polling 13th in Iowa, who generated the most enthusiasm, receiving three standing ovations to Cruz's two. He received one for calling for a constitutional amendment to protect religious freedom, but it was a line accusing the New York Times of going soft on President Obama that brought down the house.

"I am critical when the mainstream media, when they don't apply the same standards to this president they apply to the rest of us," said Jindal, after he had said, "The next president has to be ready to fight the New York Times, the ACLU, the Washington Post" and Luntz had pointed out a Times reporter in the auditorium.

The warm receptions weren't reserved for social conservative favorites. South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham — a defense and foreign policy-oriented candidate who has urged the Republican party to accept the Supreme Court's recent ruling legalizing gay marriage — brought the crowd to its feet by attacking Hillary Clinton for her handling of the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya.

Even the thrice-married, often profane Donald Trump, who invited Clinton to his most recent wedding, found favor with attendees. Trump was booed by some for saying that Arizona Sen. John McCain was "not a war hero" — a comment that prompted a much larger firestorm outside of the summit — and he struggled through a question about whether he had had ever asked God for forgiveness.

But Trump had the crowd laughing and cheering at several points. Luntz called out the mogul for his language when Trump questioned whether federal bureaucrats "give a damn about education," asking him, "Do you really want to use that word in this forum?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I do ... We're so politically correct that we can't do anything anymore," said Trump to loud cheers.

The willingness to entertain a range of candidates and the fractious effect of a broad range of pressing issues speaks to the diffuse disaffection of religious conservatives six and a half years into Obama's presidency. It follows a string of recent developments — from the Supreme Court rulings on Obamacare and gay marriage in June, to this week's nuclear deal with Iran and release of the Planned Parenthood video — which the group considers setbacks and all of which came up repeatedly on Saturday.

"They see more failures than successes," Luntz told POLITICO in between interviewing candidates and struggling to keep them from using language that turned the tax-exempt summit into a campaign event (by the time Walker concluded the day by telling the audience, "I ask for your vote," he had given up).

As a result of this palpable sense of discouragement, Luntz, who has been conducting polls and focus groups among religious conservatives, said they have less of an appetite for electoral politicking. "There is a greater rejection of politics than I would've expected and a much greater embrace of a philosophical approach."

That mood could make settling on a pragmatic consensus candidate all the more difficult.

If the current dynamics of the race in Iowa hold, the immediate beneficiary of a splintered evangelical bloc could be Scott Walker, who is currently ahead in the state and palatable to many evangelicals, even if he is not the favorite among the most conservative activists. But the ultimate beneficiary could be Jeb Bush, if he remains the national favorite of moderate Republicans and the party establishment, and no clear alternative emerges from Iowa with evangelical backing.

That would be just one more in a long series of disappointments for a group looking for any shred of encouragement. "They want to win," said Luntz. "They desperately want to win, and I don't mean politically."

GOP Candidates' Rosy 4 Percent Growth Goal // RealClearPolitics // Rebecca Berg - July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush and other Republican presidential candidates have recently introduced a lofty goal into their campaign platforms: 4 percent growth in the country's economy — or, in some cases, even more.

Most economists agree the number is arbitrary and implausible; many have called it downright impossible. Now, Bush and others face the daunting prospect of explaining their math, much of which hinges on policy proposals that, at this early stage, are sketchy at best.

Bush tripped up for the first time last week when he said the 4 percent objective would demand that Americans "be a lot more productive."

"Workforce participation has to rise from its all-time modern lows," Bush said during a meeting with the New Hampshire Union-Leader editorial board. "Means that people need to work longer hours and through their productivity gain more income for their families."

Democrats immediately seized on the remark. In a major speech on the economy this week, Hillary Clinton said Bush "must not have met very many American workers."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the teacher who is in that classroom, or the trucker who drives all night,” Clinton said. “Let him tell that to the fast-food workers marching in the streets for better pay. They don’t need a lecture. They need a raise.”

Bush explained later that he was referring to workers whose hours have been cut, and the Union-Leader backed up his logic. “Bush was exactly right,” the paper’s editorial board wrote.

But the incident illustrated the policy contortions that will be required of candidates pushing for 4 percent GDP growth or higher.

Pivotal to Bush’s argument is his record in Florida, where the state’s economy grew at 4.4 percent while he was governor. But that pace likely owed much to the housing bubble, which collapsed on itself in 2008 after Bush left office.

“There is not a reason in the world why we cannot grow at a rate of 4 percent a year,” Bush said last month when he announced his candidacy. “And that will be my goal as president.”

Other Republicans have echoed Bush’s economic optimism, many of them latching on to the same number, 4 percent — a pleasantly rounded, big-sounding number.

In May, Chris Christie unveiled his “Five-Point Plan to take America to 4 percent growth.”

In March, Ted Cruz told Fox News: “If we can get back to historic levels of growth — 3, 4, 5 percent — suddenly, the federal budget picture transforms.”

Scott Walker followed suit last month. “I think we could go from the stagnant growth we have today anywhere to upwards to 4.5 percent if with did dramatic growth, pro-growth policies that are not just about reining in taxes,” Walker told Fox News.

In economic terms, such a growth objective is rather shock-and-awe. Since the economy began to rebound in 2009, growth has averaged just 2.2 percent.

“Let’s face it, 4 percent sustained economic growth would be out of range of what we have had for most of American economic history,” said Allen Sinai, co-founder of Decision Economics, where he is CEO and chief global economist.

But if the threshold is something of a pipe dream in reality, it has often been paid lip service in presidential politics by candidates who recognize the persuasive power of a positive economic message.

During the 2011 presidential election, Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty reached for an even higher number than Bush: “Let’s grow the economy by 5 percent, instead of an anemic 2 percent,” he wrote in a Chicago Tribune op-ed.

“It's been done before,” Pawlenty noted. “Between 1983 and 1987, the Reagan recovery grew at 4.9 percent annually. Between 1996 and 1999, under President Bill Clinton and a Republican Congress, the economy grew at around 4.7 percent annually.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That benchmark is not solely the creation of Republican candidates. The Democratic Party and its candidate, John F. Kennedy, used the same number to rally voters during the 1960 presidential election.

“We Democrats believe that our economy can and must grow at an average rate of 5 percent annually,” the party platform read that year — setting a goal of nearly double the average growth rate from the preceding seven years.

A 5 percent marker, and even 4 percent, has always been ambitious. But many economists argue that it is even more so now in a changed economic landscape.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has projected that the economic growth will average 3 percent in 2015 and 2016, with a dip in 2017 to 2.5 percent. Later, the outlook dims: Between 2020 and 2025, the CBO estimates GDP growth at 2.2 percent, with labor growth stifled as baby boomers retire.

Economists who argue sustained growth at 4 percent is possible have pointed to Reagan’s presidency, when the economy grew at nearly 5 percent. But women at that time were entering the workforce in historically large numbers, expanding the country’s productivity.

Underpinning the political argument for 4 percent GDP growth is not just optimism alone, however, but a push for substantial changes to tax policy, welfare, trade and spending, among other areas.

In the Wall Street Journal recently, Kevin Marsh and Glenn Hubbard, an economist who has advised Jeb Bush, wrote that “setting a goal of 4 percent growth invites meaningful policy contributions from those who would be our leaders.”

“Many leading economic thinkers judge the economy’s underperformance as unrelated to the policies adopted in the last several years. Instead, their thinking goes, the economy is no longer capable of performing as in previous recoveries,” Hubbard and Marsh wrote. “… We strongly disagree. A more vigorous recovery from the financial crisis was an opportunity squandered. Even today, the economy can grow at significantly higher rates than the prevailing pessimism.”

But there is profound disagreement even over the magnitude to which policy changes can grow the economy.

Last month, the International Monetary Fund presented findings that reforming spending and revenue policies could grow advanced economies by ¾ of a percent. But Doug Elmendorf, a former director of the CBO and incoming dean of Harvard’s Kennedy School of Government, cautioned in a response to the IMF’s paper that such effects are often exaggerated.

“Economists should be careful not to overstate the potency of positive policy changes, because subsequent disappointments can undermine people’s confidence in economic analysis,” Elmendorf said.

To hedge expectations, perhaps, Republicans have so far sought to present the 4 percent growth marker less as a promise than as something to aspire to. But aiming for such nuance can be politically risky.

“If a candidate says, ‘I’d like to see 4 percent growth,’ it’s going to be seen as a campaign promise,” said one Republican who has advised presidential candidates on policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And each candidate will need to back up his promise with concrete proposals, which will be subject to the full scrutiny of the electorate.

Some economists have practically dared them.

Gene Sperling, the diminutive former head of the National Economic Council under President Obama, recently told the New York Times: “My personal goal is to be six feet tall and have a six-pack stomach, but I don’t think most people would think either Gov. Bush or myself have a very viable plan for reaching our targets.”

OTHER 2016 NEWS

Some surprising winners and losers in the 2016 fundraising race // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – July 19, 2015

The results of the first major test of the 2016 presidential race were announced this past week: the initial six months of fundraising numbers for the slew of candidates running to be their party’s nominee next year and for aligned super PACs.

As with any test, some people passed with flying colors. Others, well, didn’t. Here are the winners and the losers of the cash dash for those contests and other races.

WINNERS

● Jeb Bush

Sure, we all knew the former Florida governor was going to raise scads of money, largely through his Right to Rise super PAC. But meeting such lofty expectations is a lot harder than it might seem. The Republican’s $103 million raised through the super PAC is a stunning number and almost certainly ensures that he will enjoy a considerable financial advantage throughout the primary season. Money isn’t determinative for Bush or anyone else, but his cash stash will allow him to overcome a slip-up in one of the early states.

● Ted Cruz

Bush’s number is the biggest, but the senator’s haul may be the most important. The Texas Republican’s $52 million raised puts him behind only Bush — a spot that must thrill his team. Cruz is something we haven’t seen in recent presidential contests: He’s the favorite of the base of his party and has the money to stay within shouting distance of the more-establishment candidates.

● Hillary Clinton

As with Bush, we knew the Democrat was going to have a massive quarter. And she did it the hard way. She raised her $46 million through a federal campaign committee, meaning that she collected it all in $2,700 chunks rather than the unlimited donations that super PACs can accept. That is pretty impressive. Yes, she does have some of the same problems with small donors that afflicted her in the 2008 race against Barack Obama, but there’s no President Obama in the 2016 race — at least fundraising-wise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

● Bernie Sanders

Guess who raised the second-largest amount of money through his campaign committee of any 2016 candidate over the second quarter? Yup! The Bern. The socialist senator from Vermont, who is running for the Democratic nomination, has collected $15.2 million over the past three months. The independent's strength among small-dollar donors was a stirring contrast to Clinton's top-heavy, big-dollar donor base. Can he possibly keep it up?

●Todd Young

The Republican congressman from Indiana just launched his Senate campaign, and he did so with a splash, pulling in $1 million in the second quarter despite not being an official candidate yet. The even better news for Young? Former state GOP chairman Eric Holcomb, the top party opponent and erstwhile favorite, raised just $200,000.

● Michael Bennet

The vulnerable Democratic senator from Colorado pulled in more than $2 million in the second quarter — a very good off-year sum — and has $4.3 million cash on hand in his reelection bid. Perhaps more important, he raised that as Republicans struggle to find a candidate.

●Russ Feingold

The Democratic former senator outraised Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), $2.2 million to $2 million, for a rematch of their 2010 race. Johnson self-funded heavily last time but has said he won't do so again. Given that, the fact that Feingold ($2 million cash on hand) is already approaching Johnson in total cash on hand ($2.75 million) means even more.

LOSERS

● Mike Huckabee

Every time people ask us about the top tier of candidates and we don't mention the former Arkansas governor, they inevitably say: What about Huckabee? Well, here's what about Huckabee: As someone who is near the top of the pack in most national polling in the race, he raised $2 million, with $6 million more coming in from his super PAC. Not so good. The Republican has never been a good and/or committed fundraiser. Not much appears to have changed this time around.

● Rand Paul

One of the arguments in the Republican's favor has long been that he has a deep and almost-exclusive fundraising base among the libertarian-minded crowd that gave his father's 2008 and 2012 presidential bids tens of millions of dollars. The senator from Kentucky brought in $7 million for his presidential campaign committee during the quarter, however, which is not close to what some expected of him. (By way of comparison, Republican contender Ben Carson raised $8.5 million through his campaign committee in the same period.)

● Rick Santorum

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This guy won Iowa in 2012! He won 11 states in the GOP nomination fight against Mitt Romney! And yet in his first quarter of active fundraising for 2016, the former senator from Pennsylvania brought in only $608,000 and had a meager $232,000 left in the bank. Ouch. Gut punch.

● Lincoln Chafee

The former Rhode Island governor and U.S. senator, who is seeking the Democratic nomination, raised less than $30,000 from people not named "Lincoln Chafee" in the second quarter. Um, what? Chafee's meager — and that's being nice — fundraising total raises the question: If no one other than you wants to invest in your candidacy, why are you running?

●Ohio Democrats

Anytime you see this headline — "Ted Strickland is far behind in the fundraising goals advisers proposed" — it's probably bad news. That was written before the former governor, who is seeking his party's nomination to take on Sen. Rob Portman (R), announced a seven-figure quarter last week. But he was still outraised by Portman, $2.9 million to $1 million. And as a former governor, Strickland should really be able to tap into cash more quickly. The other Democrat in the race, Cincinnati City Council member P.G. Sittenfeld, saw a dip in fundraising, to $270,000, which suggests that his campaign is in pretty rough shape.

The Iowa Crisis t he Candidates Aren't Talking About // Politico // Clay Masters – July 19, 2015

As a parade of presidential hopefuls visits Iowa ahead of its first-in-the-nation caucuses, the candidates are promising to fight for the issues that matter most to Iowans. "What this election needs to be about is making sure that America is once again a nation where people out here in the heartland of this country are not forgotten," Mike Huckabee told a crowd at in Urbandale back in May. "This campaign isn't going to be about me, it's going to be about Iowans and people across our country who are ready for a better future," Hillary Clinton wrote in a Des Moines Register op-ed in April. "America at its best is when people pursue their dreams as they see fit," Jeb Bush said in Pella last month. "A farmer in Iowa sees the massive regulation in their lives overwhelming them, making it harder to make ends meet."

Yet for all their love for everyday Iowans, none of the candidates is getting anywhere near the biggest crisis to hit the state in years—one of the worst animal health emergencies in U.S. history. That would be avian flu, which since April has wiped out more than 30 million chickens and turkeys in this top egg-producing state. There have been no new cases reported for about a month, but egg prices have shot up and poultry farmers have had to dispose of entire flocks, incinerate the dead animals and rebuild their farms. Last month, Gov. Terry Branstad requested a presidential disaster declaration for the four counties hit the hardest in northwest Iowa, appealing to Barack Obama himself for federal aid. FEMA denied the request and wrote the damage was "not of such severity and magnitude that it could not be handled by the state"—leaving Iowans on their own to make up for losses projected to exceed $1 billion.

You wouldn't know any of this from campaign stump speeches. At the peak of the outbreak in early June, a fundraiser for freshman Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) drew a handful of candidates to Boone, in Iowa farm country. Surrounded by corn fields, the speakers—Scott Walker, Carly Fiorina, Marco Rubio, Lindsey Graham, Mike Huckabee, Rick Perry and Ben Carson—went with their usual speeches about smaller government, immigration and foreign policy, but not the outbreak. This weekend, Democratic and Republican candidates held court at two big multi-candidate events in the state, but at neither was there a mention of avian flu or that the state's denied presidential disaster declaration.

Of course, there are other topics that come first for 2016 candidates on the trail—the economy, immigration, Iran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in Iowa, it's not uncommon to hear presidential hopefuls talk about issues that matter to farmers here—wind energy or ethanol subsidies, for instance. Whether they think bird flu has fewer national implications or that the rural counties most affected by the crisis (and less frequented by presidential candidates) aren't as crucial electorally, it's clear the candidates are leaving this issue unaddressed—to some Iowans' chagrin.

The candidates' apparent indifference "reflects a general lack of understanding and appreciation of where our food comes from for most of the general public," says Randy Olson, the executive director of the Iowa Poultry Association and Iowa Egg Council.

Former Republican Party chairman Matt Strawn, a GOP strategist who hasn't committed to a candidate this cycle, suspects more political motives. He's surprised that, other than a well-funded and aggressive effort to highlight the Renewable Fuel Standard (a federal program that regulates how much ethanol to blend into gasoline), the candidates have given little attention to the agricultural economy in Iowa in general, especially at a time of "dark clouds on the ag economy," including falling commodity and land prices. Still, Strawn says, "Generally, when you're dealing with hyperlocal public policy or political issues, there is very little upside for a national candidate to weigh into something that may well not have clearly defined ideological lines."

Still, this is a crisis that affects more than just Iowans. The federal government has stepped in, for one thing. Although the outbreak was initially blamed on migrating water fowl, officials now suspect that humans broke biosecurity measures somewhere along the line and even that the virus has been transmitted by the wind. In response, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has assigned more than 2,300 staff to respond to the outbreak and assisted poultry farms financially with the process of incinerating and euthanizing affected birds. As of late June, all the commercial laying and pullet facilities affected by the outbreak have been depopulated. The agriculture department will also cover some of the catastrophic costs of the crisis with a fixed price per animal lost. Iowa Senators Charles Grassley and Ernst, both Republicans, held a congressional hearing days before the Obama administration denied the presidential disaster declaration, though there is no bailout legislation for Iowa pending in Congress.

Then, there's the economic impact. Surrounding states, like Minnesota and Nebraska also experienced an avian outbreak and nationally, egg prices have gone up. Even in Europe, prices are starting to soar because of the increase in demand from the United States.

In Iowa alone, the $1 billion in expected losses assumes an annualized loss of 34 percent of poultry production, says Iowa State University economist David Swenson. Still, he cautions against over-attributing statewide losses to localized tragedy; the more important figure, he says, is the loss of GDP, which is still expected to be $327 million in the state. Although Swenson says the economy should grow back to the level it was before the outbreak once production resumes, more than 2,800 workers are expected to have lost jobs in the meantime. The egg and poultry industry remains on high alert, "bracing for the worst-case scenario across the country in the fall where we might have it spread further east," Olson says.

With that much money and that many jobs on the line, many farmers in the midst of cleaning up their flocks don't have their minds on politics. "I haven't paid any attention," says Buena Vista County poultry farmer Dan Ehlers, who lost 52,000 turkeys in his flock. "I've been too busy taking care of my own affairs to pay attention to politics."

Ehlers was one of dozens who attended a recent prayer supper in Buena Vista, one of the counties hit hardest by avian flu. The crowd feasted on pulled pork sandwiches and various salads as they listened to speeches from local pastors, as well as Iowa Secretary of Agriculture and Land Stewardship Bill Northey, who struck a comforting, if resigned, tone.

"Put your arms around the folks that went through this," Northey said. "Let them know there's not a lot that you can do for them other than to let them know you care."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Turkey farmer Mark Herrig, who lost more than 40,000 birds, was listening in the crowd. He says if there was anything he could tell those running for president, it would be a plea for more open trade. Many countries have placed partial or, in the case of places like China and Mexico, total bans on U.S. poultry and egg imports—which Northey says is an overreaction.

"We need to find answers," Herrig says. "If we can't, we need to go to a vaccination program, then we need our trade partners to work with us on accepting our products that are vaccinated. ... We all need to be able to keep our own bird populations safe. We can do it in a way that doesn't destroy each other's industry or trade relationships."

True, Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders and Marco Rubio have been talking about trade while in Iowa—specifically, the proposed international trade deals on the table. But when it comes to the trade issue that matters most to Iowans now—the crisis that the candidates' beloved everyday farmers are dealing with every day—there's been nary a peep on the campaign trail.

'Too big to fail' a flashpoint in 2016 race // The Hill // Kevin Cirilli – July 19, 2015

Too big to fail has emerged as a flashpoint in the presidential race, five years after President Obama signed sweeping financial regulations into law.

Candidates on both sides of the aisle are vowing to end the massive taxpayer bailouts that angered the nation after the 2008 economic collapse, though they differ on their policy prescriptions.

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton vowed to "appoint and empower regulators who understand that too big to fail is still too big a problem" during an economic speech in Manhattan on Monday.

Jeb Bush said last month the "systematic risk is perhaps greater now than it was when the law was signed" while talking to reporters in Berlin.

Clinton's Democratic challenger Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said Friday that "if an institution is too big to fail, it is too big to exist" while endorsing a policy from Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) that'd aims to break up big banks.

And Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett Packard, told Breitbart in May that the 2010 Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform law "="has taken ten banks too big to fail and turned them into five banks too big to fail."

The rhetoric underscores how candidates are looking to tap into voters' deep-rooted frustration and angst that's still prevalent seven years after the financial crisis, said Jason O'Donnell, chief information officer at Bluestone Financial Institutions Fund.

"The candidates are playing on the emotion of the public," O'Donnell said, noting that the slow pace of the economic recovery has left voters angry.

"They may want different solutions to 'too big to fail,' but they both hate it," said Michael Norbert, a financial services research fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation.

On policy, liberals have argued that Dodd-Frank didn't go far enough to prevent more taxpayer bailouts. Conservatives argue that Dodd-Frank went too far and ended up codifying too big to fail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It's very popular because on both the left and the right it plays into many cases the extremist narrative that drive that smaller percentage of people who turn out in presidential primaries,""said Richard Farley, author of Wall Street Wars: The Epic Battles with Washington that Created the Modern Financial System.

Farley argued that politicians aren't capturing the whole truth of the 'too big to fail' debate, noting the big banks are "generally safer" than smaller financial institutions.

"But it's easier, I guess, for politicians to attack the fat cats on Wall Street," Farley said.

The Snapchat Elections Begin With Bernie, Hillary and Jeb // Recode // Mark Bergen – July 19, 2015

In 2008, it was the Google election. 2012 was Twitter’s turn as the campaign centerpiece. Facebook populism rang in the ’14 midterms.

And now, as 2016 approaches, prepare for the presidential politics of Snapchat.

Enter Bernie Sanders, the lefty, 73-year-old Democratic contender chasing Hillary Clinton in the polls. On Friday, the honorable Independent senator from Vermont made his debut on the mobile app (though judging from his expression, he doesn’t look entirely comfortable with the medium yet).

Politicians since time immemorial have done their glad-handing where the voters are. And the young voters are on Snapchat. Sanders is following behind Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush, both of whom have made cameos in Snapchat’s “2016” curated stories since announcing their elections.

Sanders’ press team told Re/code a Snapchat representative in Cedar Rapids met with Sanders, took the picture and added it to Snapchat’s public story for the election. Sanders team is considering whether they want to create a Snapchat account for the Senator’s social media strategy. According to Snapchat, neither Clinton nor Bush has created their own accounts yet so their pictures and video were submitted by their staffers or users on the campaign trail. Scott Walker, on the other hand, does have his own account.

The platforms, for their part, are game to help the pols out, particularly when the ample campaign advertiser dollars are at play. In May, Snapchat poached Rob Saliterman, a four-year veteran of Google’s political ad sales and former George W. Bush operative, to leads its own GOP efforts. A month later Snapchat ran its first ever political ad — a 10-second spot, paid for by a nonprofit affiliated with House Republicans.

Of course, money also flows the other way. But, sorry Bernie. So far, Silicon Valley’s campaign cash is mostly going to Clinton.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

What US leaders have never understood about Iran // NY Post // Amir Taheri –July 19, 2015

“American rulers have always dreamed of forcing us to change our behavior, and failed,” Iran’s “Supreme Guide,” Ali Khamenei, said Saturday. “Five US administrations took that dream to their graves. The present one shall have the same fate.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Khamenei's analysis is not far off the mark. Successive American presidents have worked hard to persuade the Khomeinist regime in Tehran to modify aspects of its foreign policy, so far with no success.

The reason may be the inability or unwillingness of successive US presidents, and a good part of the American political and cultural elite, to properly understand the nature of the Khomeinist regime.

Jimmy Carter believed the Khomeinist seizure of power represented the return of religion to the center of public life.

His administration described Khomeini as "a holy man" and "the Gandhi of Islam." Carter wrote letters to Khomeini "as a man of faith to a man of faith." He even ordered the resumption of arms supplies to Tehran.

We all know what that did to Carter.

President Ronald Reagan, who had visited Iran just a year before the revolution, thought he knew Iranians better. He described them as "carpet merchants and dealmakers." Accordingly, he smuggled arms that the mullahs needed to stop the Iraqi army from advancing farther into Iran. He also sent a huge heart-shaped cake and a personally autographed copy of the Bible to the ayatollah.

One result was the Iran-Contra scandal that rocked Reagan's presidency.

Dealing with the aftershocks of that crisis, President George H.W. Bush developed no policy on Iran beyond a number of secret talks that led nowhere but reassured Tehran that the American "Great Satan" had been neutralized.

President Bill Clinton saw the Khomeinist regime as "progressist," a view shared by many American liberals who think anti-Americanism is the surest sign of progressive beliefs.

Here is what Clinton said at a meeting on the margins of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, in 2005: "Iran today is, in a sense, the only country where progressive ideas enjoy a vast constituency. It is there that the ideas that I subscribe to are defended by a majority."

And here is what Clinton had to say in an interview a bit later with Charlie Rose:

"Iran is the only country in the world, the only one with elections, including the United States, including Israel, including you name it, where the liberals, or the progressives, have won two-thirds to 70 percent of the vote in six elections: two for president; two for the Parliament, the Majlis; two for the mayoralties. In every single election, the guys I identify with got two-thirds to 70 percent of the vote. There is no other country in the world I can say that about, certainly not my own."

Clinton and his secretary of state, Madeleine Albright, apologized to the mullahs for unspecified "crimes" committed "by my civilization" and removed a raft of sanctions imposed on the Islamic Republic after the seizure of the US hostages in Tehran.

But what crimes?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton summed them thus: “It’s a sad story that really began in the 1950s when the United States deposed Mr. Mossadegh, who was an elected parliamentary democrat, and brought the Shah back and then he was overturned by the Ayatollah Khomeini, driving us into the arms of one Saddam Hussein. We got rid of the parliamentary democracy [there] back in the ’50s; at least, that is my belief.”

Clinton did not know that in the Islamic Republic that he so admired, Mossadegh, far from being regarded as a national hero, is an object of intense vilification. One of the first acts of the mullahs after seizing power was to take the name of Mossadegh off a street in Tehran.

Apologizing to the mullahs for a wrong supposedly done to Mossadegh is like begging Josef Stalin’s pardon for a discourtesy toward Alexander Kerensky.

Too busy with Afghanistan and Iraq, President George W. Bush paid little attention to Iran. Nevertheless, in his second term he, too, tried to persuade the mullahs to modify their behavior. His secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, sent an invitation, not to say a begging note, to the mullahs for “constructive dialogue.” They responded by stepping up the killing of US soldiers in Afghanistan and Iraq by local surrogates.

Needless to say, he did no better.

President Obama has gone further than any of his predecessors in trying to curry favor with the mullahs. Even in 2009, when the regime’s paramilitary units were massacring people in the streets of Iranian cities during a nationwide pro-democracy uprising, Obama decided to side with the mullahs.

Earlier this month, Obama officially recognized the Islamic Republic as a threshold nuclear state in exchange for dubious concessions by Tehran that have not yet even been endorsed by Khamenei, who has every intention of ignoring them at the first opportunity.

One key reason for misunderstanding the nature of the present regime in Tehran is the failure to acknowledge that, for the past four decades, Iran has suffered from a Jekyll-and-Hyde split personality.

As a people and a culture, Iran is immensely attractive.

Valerie Jarett, reputed to be Obama’s closest adviser, remembers Shiraz, the Iranian cultural capital and the Florence of the East, where she was born and grew up. Before the revolution, Shiraz, with its breathtakingly beautiful architecture, was a city of gardens, wine and music with an annual international art festival. How could one not love Iran through it?

Today, however, Shiraz, where John Kerry’s sister worked for years, is a scene of public hangings and floggings, with its prisons filled with political and religious dissidents.

The film star Sean Penn, acting as a part-time reporter, visited Iran and wrote laudatory pieces. He saw Isfahan, the great former capital of Iran, as something of a paradise on earth. Like Clinton he was impressed by “incredibly progressive” people he met. What he ignored was that the Islamic Republic has been top of the list in the world for the number of executions and political prisoners.

Another movie star, George Clooney, praises Iranian cinema as “the only original one” in the world. But he ignores the fact that the films he admires, seen in festivals in the West, are never shown inside Iran itself and that many Iranian cineastes are in jail or in exile.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The pop star Madonna sings the ghazals of Persian Sufi poet Rumi and admires Iran. She ignores the fact that under the Khomeinist regime, Sufis are assassinated or in jail or forced into silence.

Secretary of State John Kerry admires Iran because he knows it through his Iranian son-in-law, who hails from a pre-revolution middle-class family. He doesn't know it is precisely such families that suffer most from Khomeinist terror and repression; this is why many fled into exile.

As a nation-state, Iran has no problems with anybody. As a vehicle for the Khomeinist ideology it has problems with everybody, starting with the Iranian people. The Khomeinist regime makes no secret of its intense hatred for Iranian culture, which it claims has roots in "the age of ignorance" (jahiliyyah).

To admire this regime because of Iranian culture is like admiring Hitler for Goethe and Beethoven and praising Stalin for Pushkin and Tchaikovsky.

This regime has executed tens of thousands of Iranians, driven almost 6 million into exile, and deprived the nation of its basic freedoms. It has also killed more Americans, often through surrogates, than al Qaeda did on 9/11. Not a single day has passed without this regime holding some American hostages.

Iran as a nation is a solid friend of America. Iran as a vehicle for the Khomeinist revolution is an eternal enemy of "The Great Satan."

The only realistic strategy for the United States would be to help it stop being the Islamic Republic and become Iran again.

President Obama's policy, however, points in the opposite direction. He has made it harder for the Iranian people to regain their human rights.

Tehran getting missiles

If Iran does violate its nuclear agreement, it will be harder for the US to stop it militarily.

Iran is buying five Russian S-300 long-range surface-to-air missile systems, which can shoot down aircraft and intercept ballistic missiles.

The UN Security Council still needs to vote Monday on a resolution that would endorse Iran's nuclear deal but Russia — one of the council's permanent members — has already agreed to sell it the missile systems.

The deal was first inked in 2007 but then delayed by Russia after pressure by the West and Israel when UN sanctions were imposed in 2010.

It's unknown exactly which model of S-300 Iran will get (the original 2007 deal was for missile systems developed two decades ago), but the S-300 is one of the most complex defense systems available.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Russia tried to claim in April that other countries should not fear Iran arming itself.

“The S-300 is exclusively a defensive weapon, which can’t serve offensive purposes and will not jeopardize the security of any country, including, of course, Israel,” Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said.

But a S-300 can down aircraft flying at 90,000 feet, can track aerial targets 150 miles away, and has a range of 93 miles, putting neighboring countries at possible risk.

“It is proof that the economic momentum in Iran that will come after the lifting of the sanctions will be exploited for arming and not for the welfare of the Iranian people,” Israeli Intelligence Minister Yuval Steinitz said.

Deal with the devil // The News-Gazette – July 19, 2015

Whether one supports or opposes President Obama's nuclear agreement with Iran, the simple, undeniable political fact is that it's going to be implemented and the world is going to have to live with it.

How can that be when Congress has not yet begun its review of an agreement that has most Republicans and many Democrats expressing reservations?

It's simple math. Even if Congress rejects the plan, President Obama can veto that rejection. All Obama needs to sustain his veto is one-third plus one vote of either the House or Senate. Given the hard-core cadre of party loyalists Obama enjoys in both bodies, it's hard to imagine that his inevitable veto will not be sustained.

Here's something else to chew on. Even before Congress begins its review, Obama will take his case to the United Nations, where that body will repeal its previous resolutions that impose bans and sanctions on Iran's nuclear program.

Think of the international economic sanctions that crippled the Iranian economy and brought it to the negotiating table as a modern-day Humpty Dumpty. Once they come crashing down, they will be virtually impossible to restore.

So given the leverage the U.S. has forfeited, the question then becomes what does the U.S. gets out of this agreement? President Obama insists that it will block Iran from gaining nuclear weapons for at least 10 years, prevent a sure war between the U.S. and Iran and lay the groundwork for a rapprochement between our two countries.

That's theoretically possible, but it assumes the Iranians intend to strictly abide by the agreement's terms.

The U.S. has played this game before, trading tangible benefits for promises of good behavior vis a vis other countries' nuclear programs.

President Bill Clinton reached a similar deal with North Korea during the 1990s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is a good deal for the United States. North Korea will freeze and then dismantle its nuclear program. The entire world will be safer as we slow the spread of nuclear weapons. The United States and international inspectors will carefully monitor North Korea to make sure it keeps its commitment," Clinton said when he announced the settlement of nuclear talks with the Hermit Kingdom.

Americas know now, of course, that North Korea, which is led by an unstable, ruthless regime, has nuclear weapons that it regularly threatens to use.

In other words, North Korea viewed its accord as a mere scrap of paper that opened a gateway to political subterfuge.

What assurance does the international community have that Iran will be any different? Obama touts planned inspections, but the agreement establishes all kinds of hurdles that must be cleared before inspectors can take a look-see.

Why, if Iran is bent on compliance, is it so resistant to inspections? One need not be unduly suspicious to conclude that it has no intention of following the rules.

This is tough stuff. Iran has been pursuing nuclear weapons for many years, even as it relies on more tried and true techniques — terrorism and direct military intervention — to influence the affairs of Iraq and Syria. But it's also bragged that it will annihilate Israel one day while threatening Saudi Arabia.

Israel already has nuclear weapons while the Saudis say they intend to acquire them to re-establish a military balance with the nuclear Iran they see in their future.

So rather than helping to stabilize a region of the world already in turmoil, Obama's agreement appears to be unleashing an arms race.

Where this will go, no one can say. The Israelis view a nuclear Iran as an existential threat and see this agreement as guaranteeing that Iran will become a nuclear power — sooner rather than later.

President Obama considers it as a path to permanent peace, one that reinforces his legacy of trying to turn enemies like Cuba, Russia and Iran into friends.

That assumes that this country's enemies actually want to be friends. Obama's proposed reset with Russia has failed, his passivity encouraging Soviet leader Vladimir Putin to invade his neighbors in an effort to restore the old Soviet empire.

Tiny Cuba no longer matters any more, its geographic significance lost in the aftermath of the end of the Cold War.

As for Iran, its leaders routinely chant "Death to America," not exactly a harbinger of glad tidings, while crowing that they got everything they wanted in their nuclear deal with Obama.

A New York Times headline characterized this agreement as reflective of "Obama's leap of faith." That it surely is. But he's taking this country and the entire world along for the ride, and it looks like it's going to be a very bumpy trip.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

For G.O.P., Pope Francis's Visit to Congress Comes With Tensions // NYT // Jennifer Steinhauer – July 19, 2015

WASHINGTON — In the Reading, Ohio, neighborhood where Speaker John A. Boehner grew up, nearly every house had two things on the wall: a crucifix and a photo of the pope. "You never ever expected to meet the pope," said Jerry Vanden Eynden, a lifelong friend of Mr. Boehner's. "In all of our minds, the pope was the closest thing to meeting God in person here on earth."

When Pope Francis comes to Capitol Hill in September, he will be the first pontiff to address a joint meeting of Congress, where more than 30 percent of the members are Catholic. The visit will fulfill a long-held dream of Mr. Boehner, who says only his working-class roots as a bar owner's son are more essential to his core than his Catholic upbringing. He has extended offers to popes for the last 20 years, and Francis, after taking nearly a year to consider, was the first to accept.

The pope's visit comes with inherent tension for many Republicans, including those who are Catholic. While he has made no changes in church doctrine, Francis has forcefully staked out ideological ground opposite that of Mr. Boehner and his party. He has excoriated the excesses of capitalism as the "dung of the devil," pleaded for action to stop global warming and enthusiastically supported the new nuclear accord with Iran.

For Republicans, fiscal issues are more immediate and problematic. They are pushing for spending cuts, including ones that would reduce funding for the poor, setting up a fight with Democrats that could lead to a government shutdown around the time of the pope's remarks, which will be broadcast live from the West Front of the Capitol.

Many Republican leaders have been quietly discussing their fears of a spending fight or government shutdown during his visit. "That would be awful," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and a Catholic. "My hope is that we will all be infused with the spirit of St. Francis," she added, suggesting that Congress would perhaps be moved to agree on some appropriation bills to avoid embarrassment.

For all the potential tension, Mr. Boehner remains thrilled, shelving ideological differences to honor Francis, who might sound to most Americans more like Bernie Sanders than Ronald Reagan.

"Well, listen, there's one thing we know about this pope," Mr. Boehner said. "He's not afraid to take on the status quo or not afraid to say what he really thinks. And I can tell you this: I'm not about to get myself into an argument with the pope. So I'm sure the pope will have things to say that people will find interesting, and I'm looking forward to his visit."

The pope's speech to Congress — one of the most significant events of his visit to the United States — will afford him a rare opportunity to deliver a message at the seat of American political power, with a vast audience around the nation. Before him will be 535 House members and senators who dare not show even a whiff of disrespect during the speech, whether he is imploring action on climate change or wading into the issue of abortion.

For their part, House Democrats, including their leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, who is also Catholic, have their own disagreements with the pope, who opposes abortion and same-sex marriage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More than half a century since John F. Kennedy told voters that he would not be taking orders from the pope, Catholic politicians have had to reconcile tenets of their faith with the imperatives of their politics.

On his recent trip through Latin America, Francis denounced aspects of capitalism and human-caused climate change, echoing his encyclical, which environmental activists praised. The pope has not been directly confrontational with host countries, preferring to speak broadly about political priorities, but his words are instantly scrutinized for signals.

While Catholic groups certainly insert themselves into the political process — the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops labored to prevent employers from being compelled to offer contraception as part of standard health insurance, but supported Democrat's ideas for immigration reform — the Vatican's views do not comport with the American left-right political framework.

"There is a common perception that he is really shaking things up," said Mark A. Smith, who is a professor of politics and expert on comparative religion at the University of Washington in Seattle. "But I read him as really reiterating themes that have been part of Catholic doctrine for a long time. At the end of the 19th century, the pope wrote an encyclical that had a lot of themes about needing to take care of the poor and not let business take over the world. He has put it back on the agenda."

Mr. Smith added: "When he said about gays, 'Who am I to judge,' that looks like it is certainly a new tone. But if you read deeper, for a long time there has been this sense in the church that we are not going to condemn people for their desires, only their behavior."

For Mr. Boehner, a visit from the pope is the culmination of a religious honor that he would never have expected, in the context of a job he could never have dreamed about as a child.

Mr. Vanden Eynden, the speaker's childhood friend, recalled daily Mass during the school week: "There were the little old ladies and us." The two boys rolled up papers together at 2 a.m. for their Sunday paper route, and then zipped off for 5:30 a.m. Mass before delivering them.

"We would sit up in the balcony because we were not dressed for church," Mr. Vanden Eynden said.

School papers during their years in Catholic high school were initialed with J.M.J. (Jesus Mary Joseph), and prayers were said along the sideline during football games with their intensely religious coach, who also made players do the rosary on the way to practice in the car. "We still say Hail Marys when we get together on the golf course," Mr. Vanden Eynden said. Mr. Boehner, who came from a working-class home with 12 children, also went on Saturdays with his father to Cincinnati to distribute charity to the poor.

"John has been exposed to that from an early age on, that you help your fellow man," Mr. Vanden Eynden said. The message of the church of their upbringing emphasized charity, but did not demonize wealth, either, he said.

"There is nothing wrong with being successful at all with Catholics," he said. "I am not sure this pope is saying that. If you go over to Europe, the Catholic Church is pretty successful with what they own."

Inflation's Steady Tick Poses Headaches in Congress // WSJ // Josh Zumbrun – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The U.S. government has an inflation challenge.

Many familiar programs, from Social Security to income-tax thresholds, are indexed to inflation and rise accordingly. Many dozens more aren't, a simple fact now causing heartburn among policy makers and politicians in Washington.

Take three issues in the news: the federal gasoline tax, the minimum wage and overtime pay. All are affected by the slow but steady tick of inflation, prompting fights over whether it is time for Congress to adjust them.

Federal statutes and the tax code are littered with dozens of examples of thresholds and figures put in place decades ago. Left unchanged, they cause an array of unforeseen consequences, including depleted funding for infrastructure, less-generous pay for employees and higher taxes on Social Security benefits.

Currently up for debate in Congress are measures to shore up the Highway Trust Fund, which pays for much of the nation's highway and mass-transit projects and maintenance. The fund has been depleted because the federal tax of 18.4 cents a gallon for gasoline hasn't changed since 1993, while inflation has cut the real value of the tax by nearly 40% since then.

Each year the fund's resources dwindle and the expense for Congress to keep them on track increases. The House passed a measure last week that would temporarily maintain the fund through December. Some senators, who will debate the issue this week, favor a two-year extension that would be much more expensive.

Both the minimum wage and overtime threshold—battlegrounds in the Obama administration's campaign to boost the middle class and reduce income inequality—are set in fixed dollar terms.

In 2009, the minimum wage was raised to $7.25 an hour. Back then, that amount went as far as $8 goes today. Even that is a cut from the 1960s; the minimum wage then was the equivalent of about $9.50 today.

The overtime threshold has fallen ever further. In 1970, anyone earning under $200 a week was eligible for overtime pay. That is the equivalent of about $1,090 a week today, more than double the current threshold of $455 a week.

The Labor Department has proposed that anyone earning less than $970 a week should be eligible. That would be a huge jump that could suddenly require many employers to pay overtime, or to retool their workforce to stop their employees from working more than 40 hours a week. But it still wouldn't be as generous as the policy of the late 1970s.

The policy was established with the understanding that officials "will raise the threshold to accommodate changes in the economy, or inflation, or whatever," said Ross Eisenbrey, a vice president at the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank that supports boosting the minimum wage and overtime threshold. "And they've just stopped doing that."

Democrats argue the overtime and minimum-wage measures will give workers a much-needed pay boost, while Republicans warn that a big jump in either measure could hinder employers' ability to hire.

Even in an era of generally low inflation, thresholds in laws end up changing drastically if left unchecked for years or decades. Most Americans are acutely aware of this erosion. The median household earned $51,939 in 2013, according to the Census Bureau. In nominal terms, that is a record, but adjusted for inflation, families earn

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

$5,000 less than they did in 1999.

Inflation's slow but inexorable creep tripped up Congress for years with the alternative minimum tax, a levy designed to ensure wealthy people weren't avoiding taxes. Only about 20,000 people owed the AMT in 1970, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center. Because of inflation, however, the tax began to apply to more households. By 2010, the AMT would have hit 27 million families, barring new legislation. Congress applied temporary patches nearly a dozen times before indexing the thresholds to inflation in 2013.

Many important federal tax provisions are indexed, including income- and estate-tax thresholds, the standard tax deduction and the earned income tax credit. So are some spending programs: federal employee retirement programs and the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, commonly known as food stamps.

But other provisions haven't been adjusted in years. Mr. Eisenbrey, a former commissioner of the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, cites the penalty a company can be charged for knowingly putting an employee at risk of death, which was set at $70,000 in 1990 and hasn't been changed since. Thanks to inflation, that penalty is only half as onerous today.

Social Security checks rise with the consumer-price index, but the threshold for taxing those benefits was set in 1984. An unmarried Social Security recipient has to pay tax if he or she earns more than $25,000 in benefits and other income. In 1984, that threshold was the equivalent of $54,000 in today's dollars—what was once a tax that hit relatively well off people now falls on seniors with much more modest incomes. Every year that Social Security checks increase, a growing share is swept away by the never-adjusted tax.

Inflation even helped ensnare former House Speaker Dennis Hastert. He was indicted this year after federal officials caught him avoiding a $10,000 threshold for transferring funds. When the Bank Secrecy Act's threshold was established, in 1970, the figure was equivalent to more than $50,000 today. Indexed for inflation, the transfers by Mr. Hastert might not have been high enough to raise eyebrows.

"There's a broader issue here of what you want to index to," said Donald Marron, director of economic policy initiatives at the Urban Institute and a former member of George W. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. For the gas tax, "you might want something reflective of miles driven plus inflation," he said. But for income tax "you might want to index in measures of income growth, not just inflation."

A host of additional tax thresholds are fixed, including the brackets for corporate profits. As inflation rises over time, more profits go to tax. More recently, the Affordable Care Act imposed an additional tax on the investment income of people earning $200,000 or more a year. For now, that is a high income, but if left unadjusted for decades, it would sweep up more middle-class households.

Even with low inflation, these aren't easy decisions for lawmakers. The issue hits home for Congress eventually, however. Congressional salaries aren't automatically adjusted for inflation either. Every year they erode a little bit. After adjusting for inflation, today's salaries for congressional lawmakers are at a 25-year low.

Same-Sex Couple Featured In Hillary Clinton Video Get Married // CBS Chicago // Dana Kozlov – July 19, 2015

A few months after a Chicago couple that was in Hillary Clinton's campaign launch video invited the candidate to their wedding, they got married without her, reports CBS 2's Dana Kozlov.

Jared Milrad and Nathan Johnson appeared in Hillary Clinton's campaign launch video. They represented her support of gay marriage. On Sunday, they actually tied the knot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They were surrounded by family and friends at Montrose Harbor this afternoon. Absent, though, was the presidential candidate. They sent her a Twitter invitation to their wedding today right after they publically appeared in her campaign announcement video. They say they were honored to be included in that and wanted to include her in their wedding day.

The couple says Clinton's staff immediately got back to them with a sort of 'we'll see.' In the end, she didn't make it.

"She rightfully pointed out that if she came to the wedding, it might distract from our special day so we understand she supports us," said Milrad.

Clinton did send them a congratulatory note.

Milrad and Johnson have been together for several years.

Being that they got married in a public space, Clinton's attendance would have likely caused quite a security nightmare on an already really busy beach day.

INTERNATIONAL

U.N. Vote on Iran Nuclear Deal Irks Congress // NYT // Michael R. Gordon and David E. Sanger – July 19, 2015

WASHINGTON — During the closed-door talks in Vienna on limiting Iran's nuclear program, Secretary of State John Kerry argued that the United Nations Security Council should not vote on lifting sanctions on Iran until Congress had a chance to review the deal.

But he ran into a wall of opposition from Iran, Russia and even the United States' closest European allies, who argued successfully that Security Council action should come first, according to Western officials.

On Sunday, as the Obama administration submitted the Iran nuclear agreement to Congress for what promises to be a raucous 60-day debate, Mr. Kerry and President Obama began grappling with the fallout of that decision, which has complicated their efforts to secure much needed support within their own party.

At least two senior Democrats have joined the Republican leadership in complaining that the Security Council action, expected Monday morning, would pre-empt the congressional debate. Their concern is that it would signal the international community's intention to dismantle the sanctions — if Iran meets the nuclear terms of the accord — before American lawmakers have had time to vote on it.

Asked if she thought Democratic lawmakers would support the deal, Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, told CBS's "Face the Nation" that "the jury is out."

Mr. Kerry expressed little sympathy on Sunday for congressional demands that the Security Council delay its vote, insisting that lawmakers will still have ample opportunity to carry out their review.

A provision inserted into the agreement at the behest of American negotiators, he said, stipulates that the deal will not take effect until 90 days after the Security Council formally endorses the accord — giving Congress time for action.

Mr. Kerry, a former senator from Massachusetts, scolded some of his erstwhile colleagues. "It's presumptuous of some people to suspect that France, Russia, China, Germany, Britain ought to do what the Congress tells them to do," he said on ABC's "This Week."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They have a right to have a vote" at the United Nations, Mr. Kerry added, referring to his negotiating partners, who include the four other permanent members of the Security Council, plus Germany. "But we prevailed on them to delay the implementation of that vote out of respect for our Congress, so we wouldn't be jamming them."

The congressional review, which formally begins on Monday, will focus on an array of contentious issues, including the duration of the agreement, the strength of inspection provisions and the procedures for reimposing sanctions if the Iranians violate the agreement. Critics have also complained that the lifting of sanctions and the eventual end of an arms embargo will empower Iran to act against American interests around the world.

In response, the White House has stepped up its campaign to argue that a congressional rebuff would bring about the very outcome lawmakers want to avoid: the collapse of sanctions and an Iran on the threshold of having a nuclear weapon.

"If Congress says 'no' to this deal, then there will be no restraints on Iran," Mr. Kerry told "Face the Nation" on Sunday. "There will be no sanctions left. Our friends in this effort will desert us."

So far that argument has failed to impress Republicans, who have long pressed for tough sanctions and have viewed the idea of the Security Council voting first as an affront to the United States' role as the ultimate check on Iran.

But some Democrats have also voiced concern that the administration may be trying to box them in by agreeing to swiftly proceed with a Council vote that will reduce the international pressure on Tehran.

Senator Bob Corker, Republican of Tennessee, who chairs the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and Senator Benjamin L. Cardin of Maryland, the panel's ranking Democrat, sent a joint letter to Mr. Obama last week urging him to postpone the Council vote until after Congress has voted on the accord.

Some legal experts, including those who have worked for Republican administrations, say congressional fears that Security Council action would tie the hands of the United States are misplaced.

The adoption of a new Security Council resolution that lays out the terms for lifting United Nations sanctions, and which is already circulating in draft form, would not legally require the United States to lifts its sanctions on Iran, said John B. Bellinger III, who served as the legal adviser for the State Department and the National Security Council during the administration of George W. Bush.

"The draft resolution appears to have been carefully crafted by administration lawyers to avoid imposing binding legal obligations on the United States before Congress considers the JCPOA," he wrote on the Lawfare blog, using the abbreviation for the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action, as the Iran agreement is formally known.

The Obama administration had hoped to sidestep this highly charged political debate by persuading its negotiating partners in Vienna to let Congress vote first. But the Iranians wanted to ensure a Security Council vote as soon as possible to get the international community behind a road map for sanctions relief.

The Russians also wanted speedy action at the United Nations, if only to underscore the authority of the Council and their own influence. For some of the Europeans, Council action was seen as a way to reinforce the multilateral character of the negotiations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When the congressional review period doubled to 60 days after a July 9 deadline was missed, Mr. Kerry's hopes of persuading the United States' negotiating partners to delay going to the United Nations dimmed further.

The compromise American diplomats engineered — stipulating that the "adoption date" of the agreement would come 90 days after the Security Council endorsement — was intended as a way to provide time for Congress to complete its review while accepting the allies' argument that the adoption of the Council resolution should be a significant step and not an afterthought.

Even after an endorsement, United Nations sanctions would not be lifted until the Iranians take the required steps under the deal.

As strenuously as administration officials have pressed their case, many in Congress do not yet appear to be persuaded. On Friday, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, a senior Democrat in the House, joined House Speaker John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, in urging that the United Nations vote be delayed.

"I believe that waiting to go to the United Nations until such time as Congress has acted would be consistent with the intent and substance of the Iran Nuclear Agreement Review Act," said Mr. Hoyer, the House minority whip, referring to the legislation Mr. Obama reluctantly signed in May that will give Congress 60 days this summer to debate the Iran agreement.

War Crimes and Rwandan Realities // NYT // Stephen W. Smith – July 19, 2015

Gen. Emmanuel Karenzi Karake, the head of the Rwandan intelligence services who is now free on bail in London pending an extradition hearing in October, is an exemplar of the tightly knit group of diaspora Tutsis that ousted Rwanda's Hutu-dominated government and rose to power during the 1994 genocide. Once a victim of human rights abuses, he now stands accused as a perpetrator. He is also a hostage — not of any justice system, but of an increasingly lone and erratic dictator, President Paul Kagame, who uses and abuses his inner circle as he grows more desperate to stay in power.

General Karake was arrested on June 20 at Heathrow airport on charges brought by a Spanish investigative judge, who accuses him of crimes against humanity and war crimes committed between 1990 and 2002 in Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of Congo. In particular, he is suspected of ordering the killing, in 1997, of three Spanish nationals working for the relief organization Medicos del mundo.

The fact that General Karake was arrested in Britain, a country he has visited with impunity for years, and hitherto one of post-genocide Rwanda's staunchest allies, suggests that Mr. Kagame himself is no longer beyond the reach of international justice. It also shows that the fate of the two men, so close for many years, is inextricably linked. General Karake has nothing to gain from a break with Mr. Kagame, beyond a stiff sentence from a foreign tribunal. But the reverse is equally true. Both men can only be free and powerful in Rwanda.

The arrest was only the latest twist in the wandering life of Mr. Kagame's spy chief. Both men were raised in Uganda, where their parents sought refuge after a revolution in 1959 led to the creation of a Rwandan "Hutu Republic." The young Mr. Karake earned degrees in business and international studies from universities in Uganda and Kenya, and an M.B.A. from the University of London before joining the Rwandan Patriotic Front, fighting to reclaim power in Kigali. The civil war, started in 1990 by the RPF, culminated in the massacre by Hutu extremists in 1994 of an estimated 800,000 civilians — mainly Tutsis but also Hutus who opposed the killing.

After the rebels took Kigali, Mr. Karake became a member of Mr. Kagame's inner circle — mostly English-speaking Tutsi returnees from Uganda — that now rules Rwanda. But even as the new government won the favor of a Western leadership riddled with guilt for failing to halt the genocide, Mr. Kagame and his men orchestrated revenge killings. During the second half of 1994, at least 40,000 Hutus were killed inside Rwanda. Between October 1996 and May 1997, another 200,000 perished as they fled across Zaire, now the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Many died of hunger or disease or at the hands of RPF fighters and their Congolese rebel allies, whom a U.N. investigation accuses of crimes against humanity and possibly "acts of genocide."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2007, General Karake was appointed deputy commander of the African Union peacekeeping force in the Sudanese province of Darfur. Though he was promoted deputy commander of the larger U.N. mission in Darfur in January 2008, the United Nations was embarrassed by allegations by Human Rights Watch that forces under his command had massacred Congolese civilians in the battle for Kisangani in 2000.

Nevertheless, the U.N. extended the general's tenure beyond its expiry in October 2008 after Mr. Kagame threatened to pull the Rwandan contingent out of Darfur. Both the United States and Britain, which have praised Mr. Kagame for his efforts to lift Rwanda out of atavistic poverty, also exerted pressure on the United Nations.Since then, in the face of an increasingly vindictive and megalomaniac leader, the phalanx controlling Rwanda has broken up. Many of Mr. Kagame's closest supporters have opposed the president's iron-fisted methods on the grounds that they jeopardize not only their own future but the future of the minority Rwandan community. Rebuked and punished by Mr. Kagame, several of his former associates have fled into exile. Some have been assassinated, including one of General Karake's predecessors, Col. Patrick Karegeya, who was murdered in a Johannesburg hotel room on Jan. 1, 2014. General Karake fell from grace in April 2010 when he was arrested for "immoral conduct." Like many colleagues, he was cashiered and detained, but eventually rehabilitated after he was made to understand that his destiny is entangled with that of his boss.

Mr. Kagame can't leave office without risking arraignment by the International Criminal Court, a threat from which even a trusted successor could not shield him — and Mr. Kagame no longer trusts anyone. Ignoring constitutional limits, he is orchestrating a "popular" movement to seek another term in 2017. Another election "victory" lies ahead, unless justice catches up with him. Thus the president is defending General Karake as if he himself were being forced to remain in London. He has denounced his spy chief's arrest as a continuation of "colonialism" and accused the British of "arrogance and contempt" for complying with what is in fact a legal obligation.

Mr. Kagame has also called on his foreign allies for support. Cherie Booth, former Prime Minister Tony Blair's wife, leads the Karake defense team. Two of the Rwandan leader's most steadfast supporters have been Mr. Blair and Bill Clinton, who has said that one of his greatest regrets as president was not intervening to stop the genocide in 1994.

The post-genocide regime in Rwanda has many friends around the world for understandable — and in most cases, honorable — reasons. Horrified as we were by the bloodbath in 1994, and ashamed by our inability to prevent or stop it, who would want to believe that the good face Mr. Kagame has put on Rwanda — creating an image as a prospering and healing nation — is in fact a lie? Today, opposition voices in Rwanda have been completely silenced.

Yet, it is precisely the outside world's need for a soothing moral tale — for a Manichean narrative to believe in — that betrays the reality in post-genocide Rwanda and renders us complicit, yet again, in more bloodshed. In a place where the absence of democracy and gross violations of human rights have already led to the ultimate collective crime, we simply cannot afford to continue to avert our gaze from Mr. Kagame's violent and arbitrary rule.

General Karake's case is a searing reminder of the need to hold Mr. Kagame accountable. He too belongs in the dock, standing trial before the International Criminal Court in the Hague.

U.S. Seeks to Allay Concerns of Allies on Iran Nuclear Deal // WSJ // Carol E. Lee and Gordon Lubold – July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Obama administration has launched an aggressive campaign to try to allay the fears of allies in the Middle East over the Iran nuclear deal.

Senior administration officials are making the strongest overtures to Israel and Saudi Arabia. There have been repeated offers recently to increase the $3 billion U.S. military aid package to Israel.

The U.S. is specifically looking at ways to expedite arms transfers to Arab states in the Persian Gulf and is accelerating plans for them to develop an integrated regional ballistic missile defense capability, a senior administration official said.

One of the administration's top challenges is to counter backlash over a provision in the nuclear pact that would lift United Nations embargoes on arms and ballistic missile technologies to Iran, in five and eight years respectively.

The White House is seeking to ease Saudi Arabia's anxiety over the Iran deal to keep the oil-rich kingdom from trying to match Tehran's nuclear capabilities. President Barack Obama wants to assure that Israel doesn't launch a military strike on Iranian nuclear sites. The Israelis also exert political influence in Congress, which can vote to approve or disapprove the deal.

Defense Secretary Ash Carter was to arrive in Israel late Sunday for a two-day visit—the first cabinet member to do so since the Iran deal was reached last Tuesday. He will also visit Saudi Arabia later this week to discuss security issues.

Both sides were braced for possible friction. Some Pentagon officials said Israeli leaders could use Mr. Carter's trip to further chastise the Obama administration. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appeared on U.S. Sunday morning news programs to lambaste the deal and defense officials held out the possibility that Mr. Carter could personally bear the brunt of the Israeli leader's unhappiness.

"I think he would be unwise to do that with us," said one senior defense official. "But if the secretary has to defend the deal, he will."

In Israel, top officials are expected to remain unwavering.

"Israel will not be timid in stating its views about this agreement, because it affects the national security of the country," said Dore Gold, a former Israeli Ambassador to the United Nations who recently became foreign ministry director general.

A former senior Israeli security official said that Israel can't afford to look like it is accepting any form of compromise with the administration.

Secretary of State John Kerry will follow Mr. Carter's visit to the region, meeting early next month with his counterparts from the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council, including Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and the United Arab Emirates.

The high-level talks are designed to set the agenda for a series of meetings Mr. Obama is expected to hold with Middle East leaders, including Mr. Netanyahu, in September around the annual United Nations General Assembly, senior administration officials said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Israeli officials are refusing to discuss with the White House additional American military assistance at least until after Congress completes its review of the Iran deal in September. Instead, Israeli leaders are training their focus on pressing lawmakers to reject the deal and view entertaining any new offers of military assistance as condoning the agreement.

“We have repeatedly offered to the Israeli leadership to hold these consultations, including the president to the prime minister on their last few calls, but they have made clear privately and publicly that they do not want to engage in this conversation at this juncture,” a senior U.S. official said. “Our offer still stands.”

U.S. officials said they don’t expect any serious discussions on new military assistance for Israel during Mr. Carter’s visit. Mr. Carter also will not be there to try to persuade Mr. Netanyahu to support the agreement. Mr. Netanyahu has disparaged the deal as a “historic mistake.”

“We have a first-order difference of opinion whether this deal makes them and us more safe; we believe it does, he believes it doesn’t,” a senior defense official said.

By refusing to stand down, however, Israel could be forgoing hardware prized by its military—a trade-off that might spur opposition to Mr. Netanyahu’s tactics within Israel’s top brass. It also might mean missing the opportunity to collaborate more closely with U.S. on implementation of the agreement or influence the U.S. draft of an expected U.N. Security Council Resolution codifying the deal.

“These are the dilemmas,’’ Mr. Gold acknowledged. “Right now, it’s too premature to say what the Israeli policy will be in the coming period.”

Mr. Carter, who has visited Israel numerous times in previous jobs, will use his personal ties to Israel to provide assurances that the U.S. will maintain its security commitments, officials said.

In addition to meeting with Mr. Netanyahu, Mr. Carter will meet his Israeli counterpart, Moshe Ya’alon. Mr. Ya’alon will host Mr. Carter at a military facility in the north, along Israel’s border with Lebanon, to discuss the security threat posed by Iranian-backed Hezbollah. The two are expected to discuss ways to defend against the Shiite militant group and the readiness of the Israel Defense Forces in the region, but not Mr. Obama’s offer of new aid.

Mr. Obama spoke with Mr. Netanyahu on Tuesday after the Iran deal was announced. He has also spoken with the leaders of Arab states and met last Friday at the White House with Saudi Arabia’s foreign minister.

U.S. officials have been working with the Gulf states on a host of new security guarantees and military cooperation following Mr. Obama’s meeting with officials from Gulf nations at Camp David in May. They met last month on new measures involving maritime and cyberthreats, and U.S. officials are studying the GCC’s existing ballistic missile defense capabilities to develop a plan for an integrated system.

Another senior U.S. official said the U.S. and GCC nations have implemented some of the measures agreed to at Camp David. The U.S. also plans to hold a meeting with GCC officials in coming months to discuss expedited arms transfers, longer-range military planning and how they can procure other needed military capabilities.

Mr. Carter’s visit to Saudi Arabia isn't expected to include announcements of new weapons deals. The Pentagon chief also will travel to Jordan this week to discuss the fight against Islamic State.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican-led Congress has 60 days to review and could vote on the deal. Mr. Obama has said he would veto any resolution rejecting it. Lawmakers then would need significant majorities in both chambers to override the president's veto.

In Tehran, Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said Saturday that Iran will uphold its anti-American policies and continue to support regional allies.

"Our policy regarding the arrogant U.S. government will not change," Mr. Khamenei said in a televised address to mark Eid al-Fitr, the Muslim feast day at the end of the holy month of Ramadan. "We don't have any negotiations or deal with the U.S. on different issues in the world or the region."

His comments are being closely watched because he has final say in most matters of state and could scuttle the agreement. He didn't explicitly reject its provisions, nor did he fully embrace the deal, an ambiguity that appeared to both play to his hard-line base and appeal to Iranians who support the negotiations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Michael Bronfein" <mbronfein@gmail.com>
To: "Dennis Cheng" <dcheng@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 1/27/2016 4:13:57 AM
Subject: Fwd: The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worr y Hillary's pro-Israel backers

I am fielding quite a few concerns over this.. , seems to have some viral qualities.. FYI

Begin forwarded message:

From: Cary Luskin <cary@thebigtv.com >
Subject: Fwd: The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worry Hillary's pro-Israel backers
Date: January 27, 2016 at 10:34:22 AM EST
To: mbronfein@gmail.com

The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worry Hillary's pro-Israel backers

Resize Text

Print Article

Comments 92

By Jennifer Rubin January 25

Iranian Foreign Minister I

(REUTERS/Leonhard Foeger)

For $250,"friends" — or $1000 for a "champion" (photo included) — you too can attend a fundraiser with Chelsea California, according to an invitation to the event obtained by Right Turn. Michael Chegini served on theboard of (NIAC), a notorious group with links to the Iranian regime that opposed, among other things, any sanctions on I

"The Clintons never miss an opportunity to put money ahead of principle," a spokesman for the Republican Jewish concern has been supporting the NIAC — a notorious supporter of the Radical Islamic Mullahs in Iran. Instead as is hard cash."

The NIAC, you may recall, was forced to pay damages for a spurious lawsuit against blogger Hassan Daioleslam, v dedicated to Israel's destruction. (A federal court found in 2012 "that the work of NIAC president and founder Tı for the regime.' The judge essentially found it was conceivable that NIAC could reasonably be accused of lobbying

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is not the first Clinton encounter with the NIAC. Bill Clinton, while Hillary was secretary of state, according t the NIAC: "An aide to Bill Clinton asked the State Department in 2012 about the former president potentially deliv U.S. sanctions against Tehran, according to an email exclusively obtained by Fox News." Ultimately Bill Clinton c Congo – an event that would have included notorious Democratic Republic of the Congo leader Joseph Kabila." (So appointment).

It does however suggest that the Clintons are quite comfortable with taking money from people with ties to apolog Clintons willingness to take money for themselves and their foundation from scoundrels and despots (e.g. Arab that propagandists for Iran would have Hillary Clinton's ear should she make it to the White House. Former ambas Clinton foreign policy on Iran will be no different from what we have now," he told me.

The event should also serve as a reminder to Clinton's pro-Israel backers, argues Noah Pollak, executive director o insist that she cannot dance at two weddings. To the extent they do not deliver this message, they share part of th

In any event, it is one more reminder that with Clinton comes a whole parade of influence peddlers, some of whom American Enterprise Institute, observing that the fundraiser "just isn't good politics," asks, "Surely there's someo Hillary Clinton will not take money.

nifer Rubin writes the Right Turn blog for The Post, offering reported opinion from a conservative perspective.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Danielle Brian, Project On Government Oversight" <danielle@pogo.org>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 7/30/2015 5:27:22 AM
Subject: Is government accountability important to you?

POGO
PROJECT ON GOVERNMENT OVERSIGHT

Dear John,

With the year just a little more than halfway over, we need a moment to catch our breath. We've packed a lot into the past six and half months.

As we've done for nearly 35 years, we've continued our mission of holding the federal government accountable. This past spring, we exposed the Navy's questionable—possibly illegal—attempts to lobby Congress for an off-budget account to fund new nuclear submarines. We also exposed the Senate Armed Services Committee's secret and improper vote to keep the Pentagon budget debate behind closed doors.

Last month, the Society of Professional Journalists' DC Chapter recognized our investigative work by giving us five awards, including their top "Watchdog" prize.

It has, to some degree, been a year of addition by way of subtraction. We pushed the Obama administration to remove officials who failed the public interest—and in several cases, we claimed victory.

Those we're not sorry to see go include the Air Force general who asserted that airmen communicating with Congress about the capabilities of the A-10 aircraft were "committing treason," the Commerce Inspector General with a history of acting against whistleblowers, the Department of Defense "watchdog" who seemed more interested in protecting Pentagon superiors than holding them accountable, and the Veterans Affairs Acting Inspector General who helped perpetuate the department's toxic culture of retaliation and intimidation.

In the last case, the VA official stepped down just a few weeks after I testified before a Senate committee about his terrible record.

None of these victories would have happened without our supporters, people like you, who make our work possible through contributions and by signing petitions and sending emails to Congress and the President demanding accountability.

Donate now

But there is much more work to be done. Please support us by making a contribution to the Project On Government Oversight today.

With your help, POGO will continue to be able to tackle problems like these, and to make a difference in Washington.

Sincerely,

Danielle Brian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Danielle Brian
Executive Director

We rely on people like you to spread the word about our work. Tell a friend about POGO!

POGO :: 1100 G Street, NW, Suite 500 :: Washington, DC 20005 :: (202) 347-1122

View this email online | Unsubscribe

POWERED BY blackbaud nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Daniella Gibbs Leger" <daniellagibbsleger@gmail.com>
To: "big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 9/12/2008 10:11:52 AM
Subject: [big campaign] two reviews of Palin

Thought you might enjoy these.

From Politico's Arena:

Norman J. Ornstein , Resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute:
She had me at hello Charley-- had me scared to death. Not a single doubt that she is ready to be president-- everyone, no matter how experienced, should have doubts about the ability to take that job. A combination of utter inexperience and utter arrogance is about the worst possible combination I can imagine. Not knowing what the Bush Doctrine is would be bad enough, but saying unequivocally that Georgia should be in NATO-- meaning we would now perhaps be in a state of war with Russia-- and then without a beat saying that military action should be the last resort-- shows a series of knowledge and logic gaps that ought to shake every foreign policy specialist, liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican, to his or her roots. Maybe they can force feed her enough facts to skate through a debate, and maybe her self-confidence will still play well with many voters, but this first cut performance underscores our worst fears.

From Swampland:

A Joke

Posted by Joe Klein | Comments (304) | Permalink | Trackbacks (0) | Email This

This woman clearly has no idea what she's talking about. What an embarrassment.

Update: Jim Fallows spells it out.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John M Deutch" <jmd@mit.edu>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 11/30/2014 3:01:32 PM
Subject: Re: global tech initiative

John,

I am happy to talk about this and I do have ideas about how an international CCS initiative should be/might be organized. It would be different that the pattern of bilateral until now. Let me know when you are free; Pete and I will be at the SEAB meeting at NREL in Denver on Tuesday and Wednesday.

John

> On Nov 30, 2014, at 2:38 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> wrote:
>
> The three of us should talk. China project is supposed to involve international partners.
>
> JP
> --Sent from my iPad--
> john.podesta@gmail.com
> For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com
>
>> On Nov 30, 2014, at 1:19 PM, Pete <progden@gmail.com> wrote:
>>
>> Yeah, Deutch didn't have any answers off the top of his head about how to operationalize something bigger but said that if you wanted him to spend time trying to work something like that up he'd want to talk to you directly first.
>>
>> Let me know if you do want to do that -- I am going to see him Thur -- or if there's someone else you'd like me to approach. Arun Majumdar?
>>
>> --Pete
>>
>>
>> On Nov 30, 2014, at 11:33 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> wrote:
>>
>> Not sure what to do with this beyond ccs demo announced in Beijing.
>>
>> JP
>> --Sent from my iPad--
>> john.podesta@gmail.com
>> For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com
>>
>>> On Nov 29, 2014, at 2:07 PM, Pete Ogden <progden@gmail.com> wrote:
>>>
>>> Hi John -- Good seeing you the other day, and hope you had a good Thanksgiving.
>>>
>>> I asked John Deutch if he had any thoughts about what a global technology initiative might look like, and he sent the attached note for you to take a look at. He makes the case that the focus should be on CCS, and told me that nuclear he thought too expensive and solar was progressing on its own. If you are interested in him thinking about what exactly the shape of an initiative might be, he'll want to hear from you directly.
>>>
>>> Let me know if there's anyone else you think that I should solicit ideas on this from at at this stage.
>>>
>>>
>>> --Pete
>>> <CCS RD&D proposal.pdf>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Kristina Schake" <kristinakschake@gmail.com> "Karen Finney" <finneyk8@yahoo.com> "Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com> "Jesse Ferguson" <jesse@jesseferguson.com> "Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com> "Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@gpg.com> "Adrienne Elrod" <adrienne.elrod@gmail.com> "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com> "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com> "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com> "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com> "Amanda Renteria" <amandarenteria@gmail.com> "Marlon Marshall" <marlondmarshall@gmail.com> "Katie Dowd" <katie.w.dowd@gmail.com> "Teddy Goff" <teddy.goff@gmail.com> "Lona Valmoro" <lvalmoro@hrcoffice.com> "Harrell Kirstein" <hkirstein@hillaryclinton.com> "Tyrone Gayle" <tgayle@hillaryclinton.com> "Mike Vlacich" <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com> "Alex Hornbrook" <ahornbrook@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	4/28/2015 7:57:11 AM
Subject:	NYC Finance Day | 4.28.15

Just leaving the first fundraiser of three today.

Did the photo line and straight up to a balcony for remarks and Q&A.

She did well with the points.

Questions were an even balance between foreign policy and campaign machinations stuff for the most part. What's the deal with Russia? Cyber security. How do we get young people excited?

She did well. Had people laughing. Did the Eleanor Roosevelt/skin like a rhino bit.

ABC on the way in and out. On the way out, they shouted a Baltimore question but she didn't engage.

Just got to # 2. No press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/27/2008 1:19:24 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/27

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 27th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

10:30am McCain: Tour and Employee Town Hall in Warren, OH
- Tracking scheduled for this event
12pm McCain: Finance Luncheon in Howland, OH

4pm McCain: Fund Raiser in Hunting Valley, OH

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

Schwarzenegger criticizes McCain's offshore drilling proposal (LA Times 6/27/08)
By Carol J. Williams
At a Florida conference on global warming, California's governor says drilling will not bring down oil prices, and he urges consumers to use more renewable resources.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-me-arnold27-2008jun27,0,1954634.story
See* HuffPo's "Schwarzenegger: McCain "Blowing Smoke" On Offshore Drilling": http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/26/schwarzenegger-mccain-blo_n_109451.html

Obama, McCain Likely to Step Up Government Role in U.S. Economy (Bloomberg 6/27/08)
By Rich Miller and Lorraine Woellert
An era of active government may be approaching -- no matter who wins the presidency. In a variety of areas -- from oil-futures trading and investment banking to climate change and home mortgages -- Republican John McCain and Democrat Barack Obama both see a bigger government role in the economy.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601070&sid=a5Ol9JeDatck&refer=home

McCain seeks to reassure conservatives in Ohio (LA Times 6/27/08)
By Peter Wallsten and Bob Drogin
Participants in the private meeting say he promised to consider an anti-abortion running mate and to talk more openly about his opposition to gay marriage.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-mccain27-2008jun27,0,2333.story
See* WSJ's "Conservative Leaders Urge McCain To Speak Out on Social Issues": http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121452732081709177.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

McCain tries to assure conservatives (MSNBC blog 6/26/08)
By Matthew E. Berger
McCain told conservative leaders that he would speak out more to highlight his pro-life record and views on other social issues to garner more Christian conservative support, leaders in the room said Thursday.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/06/26/1171065.aspx

Faithful in pews might not be voters in November (AP 6/26/08)
By PHILIP ELLIOTT
If Christian conservatives stay on the sidelines during the fall campaign, presidential hopeful John McCain probably stays in the Senate.
http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/feedarticle/7612531

McCain, GOP unleash anti-Obama plan (Politico 6/27/08)
By: Jonathan Martin
... After weeks of criticism from Republicans about the leisurely pace at which they seemed to be preparing for the general election, McCain's campaign has apparently settled on a highly personal campaign theme that aims to differentiate McCain and Obama on both character and issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/11372.html

McCain Praises Supreme Court Gun Decision (Washington Post blog 6/26/08)
By Michael D. Shear
Sen. John McCain leaped quickly Thursday to praise the Supreme Court decision striking down the District of Columbia's gun ban. It is a political position that that will surely please gun owners and the National Rifle Association. ... But McCain has his own checkered history when it comes to the Second Amendment.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/26/mccain_praises_supreme_court_g.html#more
Link to McCain statement on SCOTUS ruling: http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/PressReleases/87e4941a-3753-4a82-8985-7d461b1b894e.htm

McCain backs gun decision, Obama straddles issue (AP 6/26/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
John McCain welcomed a Supreme Court decision invalidating a District of Columbia handgun ban. Barack Obama sought to straddle the subject by saying he favors an individual's right to bear firearms as well as a government's right to regulate them.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5iws_NUP4CywbKPEd1Czf0PY8NWVAD91I2T0G0

Gun (law) battle coming today (Boston Globe blog 6/26/08)
By Foon Rhee
While John McCain and Barack Obama agreed in their disdain for Wednesday's US Supreme Court ruling outlawing the death penalty for child rapists, the presidential candidates will not be united in today's decision throwing out the handgun ban in Washington, D.C.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2008/06/gun_law_battle.html
Link to McCain release in response to Obama's statement on SCOTUS ruling: http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/PressReleases/8528d447-e576-439f-89b6-718238ed7ed3.htm
Link to McCain oppo release on Obama "A Timeline of Political Positioning on Second Amendment Rights": http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/PressReleases/5a80daf7-b81f-4e61-aef0-6f70fd44f933.htm

John McCain's Voodoo Reformism (The Nation 6/26/08*)
*Print version of this article will appear in July 14th issue
By Ari Berman
In early April John McCain held a top-dollar fundraiser at Washington's Willard Hotel, where President Ulysses S. Grant invented the term "lobbyist." It was a fitting locale, as the election-reform group Public Campaign noted, since thirty-five of the forty-three hosts for the evening were registered lobbyists. The following week Rick Davis--on leave from his job as a lobbyist to work as McCain's campaign manager--gave a strategy presentation to lobbyists from the oil, utility and nuclear power industries, soliciting campaign contributions.
http://www.thenation.com/doc/20080714/berman

Modern Maturity? (Newsweek 6/26/08)
By Michael Hirsh
McCain's campaign touts his 'grown-up' energy plan
http://www.newsweek.com/id/143405

In Call To End Partisanship, McCain Camp Jabs Bush, Obama (CBS blog 6/26/08)
By Jamie Farnsworth
A memo circulated by the McCain campaign Thursday morning calls for an end to partisan bickering and promotes putting the country before politics. In the same statement, the campaign hits the Bush Administration for having "disappointed many" and hits Sen. Obama for never putting "his career on the line for a cause greater than himself."
http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2008/06/26/politics/fromtheroad/entry4211824.shtml

McCain, Obama cautious on N. Korea moves (AP 6/26/08)
Say trade sanctions, terrorism blacklist removal should be looked at closely http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/25392717/
Link to McCain statement on N. Korea: http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/PressReleases/a375dc21-a2c6-4ec1-9058-92f368d0c595.htm

McCain and Obama on energy issues (Cleveland's The Plain Dealer blog 6/26/08)
Republican presidential candidate John McCain isn't playing it safe by sticking to friendly turf as he travels the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

United States to sell voters his plans for energy independence.
http://blog.cleveland.com/openers/2008/06/washington_republican_presiden.html

McCain focuses on 'undecideds' (Cincinnati Enquirer 6/26/08)
By Howard Wilkinson and Peggy O'Farrell
That Republican John McCain would come to Cincinnati for a town hall forum with undecided voters so early in the general election campaign made it clear that he knows this will be a major battleground... And what he talked about made it clear the battle won't be won on the issues he has been most comfortable with in his long congressional career - national security, defense, and, in recent years, the war on radical Islamic terrorists. "The economy, the economy, and the economy," the senator from Arizona said after his town hall performance at Xavier University's Schmidt Hall.
http://news.cincinnati.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080626/NEWS0108/306260040/1055/NEWS
Link to video: http://news.cincinnati.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080626/VIDEO/80626006/1055/NEWS

McCain to tap top donors (Cincinnati Enquirer 6/26/08)
By Malia Rulon
When it comes to rounding up money from Greater Cincinnati's top Republican donors, John McCain is no George W. Bush. These big donors - nicknamed "Rangers" or "Pioneers" for raising more than $200,000 or $100,000 for President Bush... so far, they haven't opened their checkbooks as much for McCain, the presumed GOP presidential nominee.
http://news.cincinnati.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080626/NEWS01/806260366/1055/NEWS

Not everybody undecided at McCain event (Dayton Daily News 6/26/08)
By William Hershey
More than 150 people packed into a meeting room in Schmidt Hall at Xavier University in Cincinnati for a town hall meeting with Republican presidential candidate John McCain. ... The crowd mainly undecided voters, picked by a marketing firm, but there also were college students and McCain backers.
http://www.daytondailynews.com/o/content/shared-gen/blogs/dayton/ohiopolitics/entries/2008/06/26/not_everybody_undecided_at_mcc.html

Calling all McCain fans (Cincinnati Enquirer blog 6/25/08)
An evening email from the Hamilton County GOP:
Dear Republican Supporter,
There are a few seats available for Senator John McCain's townhall meeting tomorrow at noon at Xavier University. ... Please let me know if you are intersted in attending.
http://news.cincinnati.com/apps/pbcs.dll/section?Category=blog02&plckController=Blog&plckScript=blogScript&plckElementId=blogDest&plckBlogPage=BlogViewPost&plckPostId=Blog%3aec38bb2b-982e-46ba-819a-da01a547e8eaPost%3a418a2432-9b87-47a4-8124-2524aa1a4b5f&plckCommentSortOrder=TimeStampAscending&sid=sitelife.cincinnati.com

Distorting Obama (FactCheck.org 6/26/08)
By Brooks Jackson
...Sen. John McCain's campaign announced the new Web-only ad on June 25. It portrays Obama as "The Dr. No of energy security." We find that some of the claims in the ad go too far and misrepresent some of Obama's positions.
http://www.newsweek.com/id/143344

Hill Dems launch major assault on McCain policies (Politico blog 6/26/08)
By Martin Kady II
Democrats on Capitol Hill have launched a major assault Thursday on John McCain's policies, targeting two areas where he is thought to be the strongest: taxes and foreign policy.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/thecrypt/0608/Hill_Dems_launch_major_assault_on_McCain_policies.html

After Impeaching Clinton, McCain Now Dismisses Idea Of Impeaching Bush: 'I Do Not Agree With It' (ThinkProgress 6/26/08)
Today during a town hall event at Xavier University, an attendee forced Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) to respond to Rep. Dennis Kucinich's (D-OH) impeachment articles against President Bush. McCain immediately brushed off the question, saying that he opposes them:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/26/mccain-impeachment/

McCain heads for top-level talks in Colombia, Mexico (AFP 6/26/08)
Republican White House hopeful John McCain is heading to Colombia and Mexico next week for talks with their presidents on trade and narcotics, aides said Thursday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5i13e_Z_T2JSRgUZAk9xxMX220zOw

HALPERIN'S TAKE: What Smart Republican Strategists Think Should Be on John McCain's To-Do List (The Page 6/26/08)
1. Prove to your staff you can drive a message for more than one consecutive day.
http://thepage.time.com/halperin%e2%80%99s-take-what-smart-republican-strategists-think-should-be-on-john-mccain%e2%80%99s-to-do-list/

Black Ops (New Yorker Magazine blog 6/25/08)
By Hendrik Hertzberg
All the ostentatious indignation about Charlie Black's comment that a terrorist attack on American soil would be helpful to McCain's candidacy—MoveOn has just jumped into the fray with a demand that Black be fired—is a little puzzling. Black merely stated the conventional wisdom. The view that terrorism is good for McCain is supported by polling data and is shared across the board http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/hendrikhertzberg/2008/06/black-ops.html

Budweiser deal puts political pressure on McCain campaign (The Hill 6/25/08)
By Michael O'Brien
A Belgian brewery's recent attempt to buy out iconic American firm Anheuser-Busch is putting Cindy McCain in a politically difficult position.
http://thehill.com/campaign-2008/budweiser-deal-puts-political-pressure-on-mccain-campaign-2008-06-25.html

Charlie Crist's McCain Problem (TIME 6/26/08)
By Tim Padgett
...Crist's environmental victory came just as many Floridians and other national political observers had begun to wonder if he was going overboard in a perceived bid to be John McCain's running mate. McCain announced earlier this month that he favors allowing new offshore oil drilling to help ease America's gas-pump nightmare.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1818326,00.html

La. gov. signs chemical castration bill (UPI 6/26/08)
Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal has signed into law a measure that would force convicted rapists and others to undergo chemical castration. Calling sex offenders "monsters," Jindal signed Senate Bill 144 into law on Wednesday http://www.upi.com/Top_News/2008/06/26/La_gov_signs_chemical_castration_bill/UPI-16241214510807/

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

McCain's Day Of Repudiation (Washington Post 6/27/08)
By George F. Will; A17
Two of yesterday's Supreme Court rulings -- both decided 5 to 4, and with the same alignment of justices -- concerned the Constitution's first two amendments. One ruling benefits Barack Obama by not reviving the dormant debate about gun control. The other embarrasses John McCain by underscoring discordance between his deeds and his promises.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/26/AR2008062603651.html

Let McCain Be McCain (WSJ 6/27/08)
By PEGGY NOONAN
Why should Obama be the only interesting candidate?
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121450930616708139.html?mod=todays_columnists

No, McCain Isn't 'Doomed' (WSJ 6/27/08)
By JOHN FUND; Page A13
Some pundits claim John McCain has no chance of beating Barack Obama. "The current bundle of economic troubles should doom any Republican hoping to succeed George Bush," says NBC's Chris Matthews. "It's almost impossible to believe that another Republican could get elected," insists Katty Kay, the BBC's Washington-based correspondent. They need to better understand the rhythms of presidential campaigns and show more humility in a year that's been chock full of political surprises.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121452433272409083.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries

McCain has answers to U.S. energy needs (Morning Call 6/27/08)
By Sen. ARLEN SPECTER
"McCain knows America needs to reform its energy portfolio to include both new and proven sources of energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He supports harnessing solar, wind and clean coal as well as expanding the use of nuclear power."
www.mcall.com/news/opinion/anotherview/all-right_col-b.6478598jun27,0,7962234.story

On energy, McCain sounds a lot like Cheney (Salon 6/27/08)
By Joe Conason
The GOP nominee wants to distance himself from Bush on climate change, but he'd do better to emulate Jimmy Carter than the vice president.
http://www.salon.com/opinion/conason/2008/06/27/energy_plans/

BUSH NEWS

Bush Rebuffs Hard-Liners to Ease North Korean Curbs (NYT 6/27/08)
By HELENE COOPER
Two days ago, during an off-the-record session with a group of foreign policy experts, Vice President Dick Cheney got a question he did not want to answer. "Mr. Vice President," asked one of them, "I understand that on Wednesday or Thursday, we are going to de-list North Korea from the terrorism blacklist. Could you please set the context for this decision?"
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/27/world/asia/27nuke.html?ref=todayspaper

Flashback: As Governor, Bush Said, 'Why Should I Care About North Korea?' (ThinkProgress 6/26/08)
Today, President Bush announced that North Korea has turned over a statement describing its nuclear program, prompting Bush to lift sanctions and rescind its designation as a state sponsor of terror. The news is a step "toward reintegration into the world community and rapprochement with the United States," the New York Times observed.
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/26/bush-north-korea/

Bush Policies On Terror Get Fresh Airing (WSJ 6/27/08)
By Evan Perez
Democrats in Congress used a rare House appearance by David Addington, an aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, to take aim at the Bush administration's interrogation and terror-detainee policies.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121453420995409733.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

White House insiders refuse to shed light on interrogations (CNN 6/26/08)
* Alleged architects of detainee interrogation policy prove to be difficult witnesses
* David Addington, vice president's chief of staff, dances around questions
* John Yoo, ex-deputy assistant attorney general, refuses to answer questions
* Men among 6 accused of colluding to form legal rationale for harsh treatment http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/06/26/interrogations.hearing/index.html

Pastor Who Officiated at Jenna Bush Wedding Launches Pro-Obama Website (Washington Post blog 6/26/08)
By Krissah Williams
Sparks are flying in the 2008 culture wars. The Rev. Kirbyjon Caldwell, leader of the largest Methodist congregation in the country, launched a website yesterday titled "James Dobson Does Not Speak For Me."
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/26/pastor_who_officiated_at_jenna.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

North Korea Destroys Tower at Nuclear Plant (NYT 6/28/08)
By CHOE SANG-HUN
In a gesture demonstrating its commitment to halt its nuclear weapons program, North Korea blew up the most visible symbol of its plutonium production Friday, South Korean media reported from the site.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/28/world/asia/28korea.html?ref=world

NWS: Levee breaks, threatening eastern Mo. homes (AP 6/27/08)
The National Weather Service says a corner of an earthen levee has broken, and officials say the leak will "ultimately inundate" part of an eastern Missouri town.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hw95ek5Sllmi4SoQ_N4HJvwHE0ZAD91ID9QG1

Landmark Ruling Enshrines Right to Own Guns (NYT 6/27/08)
By LINDA GREENHOUSE
The Supreme Court on Thursday embraced the long-disputed view that the Second Amendment protects an individual right to own a gun for personal use, ruling 5 to 4 that there is a constitutional right to keep a loaded handgun at home for self-defense.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/27/washington/27scotus.html?ref=todayspaper

Supreme Court Strikes Down 'Millionaire's Amendment' (NYT 6/27/08)
By ADAM LIPTAK
The Supreme Court on Thursday struck down a law meant to level the financial playing field when rich candidates pay for their own political campaigns. The 5-to-4 decision, legal experts said, was significant for rejecting the rationale behind the law, known as the "millionaire's amendment," and for confirming the court's continuing skepticism about the constitutionality of campaign finance regulations.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/27/washington/27money.html?_r=1&ref=politics&oref=slogin

Lawmakers Call for Air Force to Reopen Tanker Competition (Washington Post 6/27/08)
By Dana Hedgpeth; D04
Congressional and military leaders said yesterday that they are continuing to investigate how the Air Force awarded a $40 billion aerial refueling tanker contract to Northrop Grumman and its European partner, leaving the deal's future on shaky ground.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/26/AR2008062603793.html

Obama, Clinton Join Together in Show of Unity (Washington Post 6/27/08)
By Anne E. Kornblut and Matthew Mosk; A04
Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton showered each other with praise yesterday in their first joint appearance since the end of the Democratic presidential primary season at an event in which the senator from New York urged hundreds of her top donors to get behind the party's presumptive nominee.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/26/AR2008062604151.html

Obama Gives $2,300, Intended as a Spur, for Clinton Debt (NYT 6/27/08)
By JEFF ZELENY
Senator Barack Obama said on Thursday that he had written a personal check of $2,300 to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a goodwill gesture intended to nudge his top donors to help ease Mrs. Clinton's campaign debt and help the two Democrats move beyond their rivalry to focus on the fall contest.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/27/us/politics/27campaign.html

Wave of bad news sends Dow down nearly 360 (AP 6/26/08)
By MADLEN READ
A barrage of bad news including yet another record high for oil drove stocks sharply lower Thursday, hurtling the Dow Jones industrials down nearly 360 points to their lowest level in almost two years.
http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20080626/ap_on_bi_st_ma_re/
wall_street;_ylt=Am0qDWRwSyPqWjg03eHYs1Gs0NUE

Senate finalizes war funding bill (CNN 6/26/08)
* $165 billion bill funds the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan into early 2009
* Measure includes money for a new GI Bill, extended unemployment benefits
* Bill also provides disaster assistance for Midwest flooding http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/06/26/senate.war.funding/index.html

Housing bill, FISA delayed until after July recess (The Hill 6/26/08)
By Manu Raju and J. Taylor Rushing
The Senate hit impasses over legislation aimed at helping struggling homeowners and a rewrite of spying laws, forcing Democratic leaders to push back consideration of those measures until next month.
http://thehill.com/leading-the-news/housing-bill-fisa-delayed-until-after-july-recess-2008-06-26.html

New high for Afghanistan deaths (CNN blog 6/26/08)
A roadside bomb killed three service members and a local-national interpreter in a coalition convoy in eastern Afghanistan, the U.S.-led coalition said. With the deaths, the number of foreign forces in Afghanistan killed in June has reached 39, the highest monthly toll of the war, according to a CNN count of official figures.
http://cnnwire.blogs.cnn.com/2008/06/26/new-high-for-afghanistan-deaths/

3 Marines killed in attack on Iraq officials (AP 6/26/08)
At least 20 Iraqis also slain at meeting; 18 die in Mosul car bombing
http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/25384438/

Weather delays U.S. handover of Iraqi province (Reuters 6/27/08)
The handover of security control in Iraq's Anbar province to Iraqi forces has been put on hold, the U.S. military said on Friday, blaming a sandstorm forecast to hit the region.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.reuters.com/article/featuredCrisis/idUSL27289784

POLLS

Americans Prioritize the Economy Over Terrorism (Gallup 6/27/08)
by Lymari Morales
Confidence in a presidential candidate's ability to handle terrorism may not be enough to satisfy American voters in 2008. A majority of Americans say they prefer a candidate whose greatest strength is fixing the economy (56%) rather than one whose greatest strength is protecting the country from terrorism (39%).
http://www.gallup.com/poll/108415/Americans-Prioritize-Economy-Over-Terrorism.aspx

Obama Leads McCain In Key Battleground States (WSJ 6/27/08)
By JUNE KRONHOLZ; Page A6
Four states that are expected to be pivotal in deciding November's presidential election are trending comfortably toward Barack Obama, with independents giving him wide support over John McCain, according to a Quinnipiac University poll conducted in partnership with The Wall Street Journal and washingtonpost.com : [Colorado, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin]
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121448793591307047.html?mod=hpp_us_whats_news

Obama Lead Tight Over McCain (TIME 6/26/08)
By Jay Newton-Small / Washington
Illinois Senator Barack Obama enters the General Election with a tight lead, 43% to 38%, over Arizona Senator John McCain, according to a new TIME Magazine poll of registered voters. The poll shows Obama gaining only a slight bounce from Hillary Clinton's departure from the campaign early this month.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1818386,00.html

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Hudson Institute" <events@hudson.org>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	8/27/2014 8:40:06 AM
Subject:	Invitation: Children of Misery: Guns and Gangs in Central America - Wednesday, September 10, 12:00 - 2:00 pm

Hudson Institute
Event Invitation

Children of Misery: Guns and Gangs in Central America

Wednesday, September 10th
12:00 to 2:00 pm

Hudson Institute
Betsy and Walter Stern Conference Center
1015 15th Street, NW - Sixth Floor
Washington, DC 20005

Register for event

The Central American countries of Guatemala, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras have missed out on the economic growth that many other developing countries have experienced over the past decades. Despite confronting some of the same challenges faced in neighboring countries, Costa Rica's democracy has strengthened and its economy has flourished. This disparity largely results from the pervasive violence and crime that have stifled other Central American economies, undermining growth and interfering with social development. In particular, youth gangs (maras) have wreaked havoc in the region.

Central American gangs tend to be involved in a range of criminal activities, including arms, drug, and human trafficking; kidnapping and extortion; and migrant smuggling. The toll taken by such crime is evident in the stories told by local children and adolescents. They report that their options are to join a gang, die, or emigrate.

Such entrenched, wide-spread criminality is not only a human rights issue, but one that directly impacts the United States and all countries facing a surge of migrant children from Central America. What can be done?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On September 10th, Hudson Institute's Center for Latin American Studies will host a discussion with noted regional experts. Moderated by Ambassador Jaime Daremblum, the panel will examine the underlying social, economic, and political environment fueling gang activity, with particular focus on whether policymakers in the region have adopted the right responses to counter this crisis, or instead paid too little attention to its structural causes.

A buffet lunch will be available beginning at 11:30 am.

Hudson Institute is grateful to the Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation for their generous support of this conference series.

Panel

Armando González

Armando González is Chief Editor of La Nación in San Jose, Costa Rica. He is currently a member of the Executive Committee of the Inter-American Press Association and president of the Legal Affairs Committee. As a journalist and editor for more than 18 years, Mr. González has received multiple awards, including the Pío Víquez National Award for Journalism in 1989.

Evan Ellis

Evan Ellis is an associate professor with the National Defense University's William J. Perry Center for Hemispheric Defense Studies. As an analyst of Latin American economies, politics, and security, Dr. Ellis is an expert on Latin American relationships with China, Iran, India, Russia, and other nations. He has published more than 70 works and has presented his research in more than 25 countries.

Yleem Sarmiento de Poblete

Yleem Sarmiento de Poblete served for close to two decades on the staff of the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs, including as its Chief of Staff, until early last year. She was listed as one of the "14 Top Women on the Hill for 2011." She is currently a fellow at the Institute for Policy Research at The Catholic University of America and leads a team of experts at Poblete Analysis Group providing strategic advice and analysis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Celina Realuyo

Celina Realuyo is a professor at the William J. Perry Center for Hemispheric Defense Studies at the National Defense University where she focuses on U.S. national security, social, and economic problems in Latin America. Professor Realuyo has over two decades of international experience in the public, private, and academic sectors.

Ambassador Jaime Daremblum

Ambassador Jaime Daremblum is a senior fellow and director of Hudson Institute's Center for Latin American Studies.

Program

11:30 am — 12:00 pm
Registration and Lunch

12:00 pm — 12:10 pm
Introductory Remarks

12:10 pm — 1:30 pm
Speaker Presentations

1:30 pm — 2:00 pm
Audience Q & A

View all upcoming events

Hudson Institute
1015 15th Street, N.W. 6th Floor
Washington, DC 20005

Unsubscribe
View this email in a browser
Forward to a friend

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu from Hudson Institute. To ensure that you continue receiving our emails, please add contact@hudson.org to your address book or safe list.

© 2014 Hudson Institute, Inc.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 12/3/2014 4:01:25 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday December 3, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday December 3, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Bloomberg: "Hillary Clinton's Historic 2016 Primary Advantage in Two Charts"

"The press wants a race, and the left wants a race, but the Democratic electorate isn't sure that it needs one."

Politico: "Delay of game"

"Despite a commanding lead among Democrats and the widespread expectation that she'll run, Clinton is still uncertain about whether to launch a second run for president, according to several people familiar with her thinking in recent weeks."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Elizabeth Warren Still a Longshot in Possible 2016 Matchup"

"Mrs. Clinton is in a more dominant position than was the case eight years ago, when she was also seen as the inevitable nominee (only to lose the nomination to then-Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois)."

Washington Post blog: The Switch: "Can political groups raise money for the mere idea of a woman president?"

"ActBlue, the Democratic online fundraising powerhouse group, is asking federal election officials whether it can set up a system for allowing fundraising on behalf of a female presidential candidate before knowing who, exactly, the money would go to."

Dallas Morning News: "Cruz links Hillary Clinton to Obama as he blasts U.S. foreign policy"

"In the jockeying ahead of the 2016 presidential race, Sen. Ted Cruz blasted the 'Obama-Clinton foreign policy' on Tuesday — taking aim at the current president and the Democrats' leading contender to replace him."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal: "Sen. Rand Paul Says Foreign Policy Stance Puts Him in Mainstream"

"Mr. Paul didn't mention potential Republican competitors for president but he did take a shot at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton , who is weighing another bid for the Democratic nomination. Mr. Paul called Libya 'Hillary's war,' referring to Mrs. Clinton's support for the 2011 bombing campaign aimed at eradicating the Gadhafi regime."

New York Post column: John Podhoretz: "Why Hillary's walk to the Democratic nation is a sign of the party's weakness"

"Mrs. Clinton will be the best-known person to run for the presidency since Dwight David Eisenhower decided to go for it in 1952."

Articles:

Bloomberg: "Hillary Clinton's Historic 2016 Primary Advantage in Two Charts"

By David Weigel

December 3, 2014, 9:14 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The Democratic frontrunner is running twice as strong as she did at this point in the 2008 cycle.

There are oodles of silly tropes in politics, but in the winter of 2014, this might be the silliest: "Hillary Clinton seems inevitable now, but wasn't she inevitable last time?" It's a blinkered way of viewing presidential politics, and the latest CNN/ORC International poll demonstrates why.

First, the numbers. CNN's poll, conducted right before Thanksgiving with a sample of "1,045 adult Americans," finds the former secretary of state far ahead of the Democratic field in a national ballot test. Clinton's at 65 percent support among Democrats, followed by Senator Elizabeth Warren at 10 percent, Vice President Joe Biden at 9 percent, Senator Bernie Sanders at 5 percent, Governor Andrew Cuomo, Governor Deval Patrick and (the only candidate so far exploring a bid) former Senator James Webb at 1 percent, and Governor Martin O'Malley with support too low to calculate.

[GRAPH]

There is no National Primary. There's an Iowa caucus, where Clinton's 3rd place 2008 showing started the Obama wave, in large part by convincing black voters that the Illinois senator could win. But about the national poll—it shows a Clinton lead that has not diminished in what, the punditocracy decided, was a rotten year for her. Her book was outsold by Ben Carson's! Most of the candidates she stumped for lost! (They include the Democratic gubernatorial nominees in Warren's and O'Malley's states.) In November 2013, The New Republic's great Noam Scheiber published a cover story that pronounced Warren to be "Hillary's nightmare." The November 2013 CNN poll found Clinton at 63 percent and Warren at 7 percent. After 13 months of hype, Democratic voters have remain unmoved: A supermajority of them favors Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How does this compare to the “inevitability” of 2008? Good question! In late November 2006, CNN polled “1,025 adult Americans” and came back with a ballot test. Clinton led with 33 percent; three other candidates were above 10 percent, stronger than Warren now.

[GRAPH]

It's just a national test, but the story's identical in the states—Clinton with swollen leads in New Hampshire and Iowa. In Iowa her numbers are better than twice as high as they were at this point in that cycle, when a war-skeptical Democratic electorate was desperate for another choice. You see why the discussion among the chin-strokers is about whether Clinton can remain so aloof from voters and still win the nomination. The press wants a race, and the left wants a race, but the Democratic electorate isn't sure that it needs one.

Politico: “Delay of game”

By Maggie Haberman and James Hohmann

December 3, 2014, 5:34 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Clinton’s speech schedule indicates 2016 announcement may be months away.

The would-be 2016 presidential candidates are increasingly seeing the benefits to waiting longer before declaring their intentions — including the dominant person in the race, Hillary Clinton, who shows few signs of making a decision before next year.

Despite a commanding lead among Democrats and the widespread expectation that she’ll run, Clinton is still uncertain about whether to launch a second run for president, according to several people familiar with her thinking in recent weeks.

While some advisers suggested she should form an exploratory committee this year to send a signal to donors, her allies who argued otherwise have won the debate — with no committee expected until well after January 1, the sources said.

“She should take her time,” said one adviser who believes that the high-profile Clinton would only give license to her critics by becoming a declared candidate too early.

Last time, Clinton felt pushed into the race earlier than she’d wanted to be by Barack Obama’s January 2007 announcement of an exploratory committee. Now she appears comfortable moving at a slower pace. She is still scheduling paid speeches, as POLITICO first reported, as late as February 24 – suggesting she’s unlikely to be a declared candidate until after that date. What’s more, the man she is expected to tap for a major role in her campaign, current White House adviser John Podesta, has raised the possibility of remaining in his job until after the State of the Union address in late January.

Clinton could, in January, make clear she’s running but delay an announcement. And if she doesn’t intend to run, she would be criticized for harming the party’s chances of holding the White House if she waits much beyond mid-January, several Democratic insiders said.

Clinton is by no means the only candidate waiting until next year. Other than Jim Webb, the long-shot former Virginia senator who recently launched an exploratory committee, the people likeliest to announce intentions now are those who aren’t running.

That was apparent early Tuesday morning, when Ohio Sen. Rob Portman told a local newspaper that he planned to seek reelection to the Senate instead of launching a national campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Portman's decision will have little bearing on what other Republicans decide to do in a field of up to 20 potential candidates. But at a moment when national politics seems relatively quiet, it provided clarity that the invisible primary is taking shape behind the scenes. Anyone considering running is assessing their chances, talking to supporters and debating when to make a move.

For the 2008 election, the last time there was an open White House seat, candidates started announcing exploratory committees as early as December 2006, looking for an edge in a crowded field. In the 2012 race, with an incumbent President Obama, most Republicans waited until well into 2011 before declaring their intentions.

The 2016 campaign is poised to look more like 2012 than 2008, with the majority of the major candidates waiting at least until January to make an announcement – and some saying they'll put off a decision until summer. The debates this cycle are unlikely to start until August, and the Iowa caucuses may happen in February 2016, instead of January, giving candidates an additional cushion.

"The benefits of starting early aren't what they were eight years ago," said Republican strategist Chip Saltsman, who managed Mike Huckabee's dark-horse campaign in 2008. "For some of the bigger names out there, they're a known quantity and they don't feel like they need to get out of the box early."

In 2012, former Minessota Gov. Tim Pawlenty was harmed by his early entry into the presidential race, in March 2011. He faltered and ultimately cratered at the Ames Straw Poll in Iowa over the summer. By contrast, Rick Perry, the outgoing Texas governor, entered the race in August – giving him no time to recover from serious blunders.

"I don't think you're going to see anybody go out before the end of the year, and I'm not so sure you're going to see anyone officially get in until maybe late first quarter," said Saltsman, adding that big money super PACs alleviate the fundraising imperative and thus provide potential candidates more time to weigh their options. "And I think the bulk of people will get in during the second quarter."

There is little question, in interviews with more than a dozen operatives and donors, that Clinton is the dominant figure in both primaries. Some Republican may see a window in early 2015, if she still hasn't declared, to try to position themselves as the strongest "anti-Hillary," several operatives said.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), the libertarian favorite who has attracted attention for his attempts to broaden the party's reach among African-American voters, announced Tuesday he will run for reelection. But Paul's decision is not just about looking like he wants to defend a seat – if he runs for president, the time he spends raising money for his seat can also work for a national race down the road.

On a conference call with reporters Tuesday, senior advisor Doug Stafford said Paul, who has been the most transparent about his national ambitions, is "still months away" from an official announcement on a White House run.

"He'll make that decision in the early spring," said Stafford. "We don't have an exact hard cut off on that."

One issue for Paul is that legally he cannot be on the ballot for president and Senate at the same time, but his team has satisfied itself that there are ways around this.

Jeb Bush appears genuinely torn whether to give it a go. At a Wall Street Journal event on Monday, he said he would decide "in short order, not that far out into the future." Bush learned earlier this year the dangers of being perceived as a candidate too early: after he described illegal immigration as an "act of love" by families, he was promptly eviscerated by conservatives. He lowered his profile shortly after.

If Bush bows out, he's expected to say so fairly soon; no word from him would indicate that he's learning toward running. But he doesn't have the luxury of waiting until, say, May, given the work involved in launching a campaign operation and soothing Republican donors who are waiting to see what he does before committing to a candidate.

Another formidable potential candidate, Republican Scott Walker, seems poised to wait as long as possible before announcing. The Wisconsin governor has kept on a host of aides from his successful reelection campaign for a likely bid, but he said in a recent interview that a formal announcement would not come until after a spring legislative session, and possibly as late as midsummer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His team feels no need to rush because Walker built relationships with the donor class during his successful campaign to beat back an effort to recall him from office.

“Rick Perry got in too late” in the 2012 election cycle, a senior Walker adviser said recently. “Tim Pawlenty got in too early. So it’s all about figuring out what’s just right.”

Many Republicans have expected that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie would make a decision shortly after the midterms. But he recently said he plans to wait until after the first of the year.

Some donors believe Christie will move to form a committee sooner rather than later to be the “first ask” with donors from whom he and Jeb Bush would both seek support.

The GOP field has a key advantage this time around that no one other than Mitt Romney had last time – existing donor networks. Former Romney adviser Kevin Madden said the candidates eying a run seem to be moving at a “a more measured pace” in hiring staff and lining up fundraising commitments.

“Many like Christie, Paul and Bush,” Madden said, already “have existing core teams or a strong national fundraising base.”

There are a handful of other candidates who appear certain to run. Perry is convening donors and seems likely to launch a campaign early next year, given the work he needs to do to restore credibility after his disastrous 2012 run. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal said in a statement that he’ll decide “in the first half of next year.” Rick Santorum won the 2012 Iowa caucuses and has made no secret that he’s running again, but the former Pennsylvania senator is never going to raise huge money, so there’s little pressure to enter the race early.

Huckabee, the 2008 caucus winner, would likely draw from Santorum’s support if he ran. The former Arkansas governor has been speaking with donors and is looking at a possible announcement in April or May if he runs.

As for establishment figures, Rep. Paul Ryan, the Wisconsin congressman and 2012 vice presidential nominee, has said he will wait until 2015 to decide. People close to him believe he is giving it a close look, but would only run if there is a clear path to the nomination.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has a book coming out on January 13, which will be followed by a national book tour that’s expected to take him into the early presidential nominating states. A formal announcement wouldn’t likely come until after the tour ends.

Rubio is also up for reelection to the Senate in 2016 and has said he won’t run for both offices. If Bush runs, Rubio’s fundraising and path to the nomination would become much more difficult, potentially dissuading him from a White House bid.

Ohio Gov. John Kasich is the only potential candidate who would appear to benefit from Portman’s decision this week, giving him easier access to the Buckeye State’s conservative donor network. Among those said to have spoken favorably of Kasich privately is Rupert Murdoch, the billionaire News Corporation and Fox News owner. A News Corporation official declined comment.

Kasich, who briefly sought the presidential nomination in 2000 and just skated to reelection, is about to launch a national tour to lobby other states to pass a Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution. He has trips planned to states including Idaho, Utah and Wyoming.

“Right now the governor is preparing for a second term in office, he’s writing the next budget for the state of Ohio, and he’s engineering Ohio State’s national championship win,” said Kasich spokesman Rob Nichols. “Needless to say, he has a lot on his plate.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Elizabeth Warren Still a Longshot in Possible 2016 Matchup"

By Peter Nicholas

December 2, 2014, 1:13 p.m. EST

No other prospective Democratic candidate comes close to threatening a Hillary Clinton bid for the party's presidential nomination, a new poll shows.

A CNN/ORC survey shows that Mrs. Clinton commands 65% support from Democrats and independents who lean Democratic. Far behind was Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), whose support stood at 10%. Ms. Warren is a favorite of the Democrats' liberal wing. Only 9% backed Vice President Joe Biden.

The poll underscores the hard reality of 2016 Democratic presidential politics: Though the party has a long history of contested nominations, no one at this stage seems positioned to mount a serious challenge to Mrs. Clinton.

Ms. Warren, for her part, has said she won't jump in the race. Mr. Biden has said he is considering a run.

Mrs. Clinton said she will announce her plans in the new year, though she is widely expected to enter the race.

Democrats who seem more inclined to run trail Mrs. Clinton by even wider margins. Former U.S. Sen. Jim Webb, a Virginia Democrat, announced last month he was setting up a presidential exploratory committee. Mr. Webb notched only 1% in the CNN/ORC poll. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who has made repeated trips to Iowa and New Hampshire and is also mulling a presidential bid, is actually losing ground, the poll shows. He had 2% support in three different polls over the past year, but wound up with less than 1% in the latest survey.

Should Mrs. Clinton decide not to run, Mr. Biden stands the most to gain. The poll showed that if Mrs. Clinton were to bow out, 41% of Democrats and those who lean that way would favor Mr. Biden. By contrast, 20% would support Ms. Warren, the survey shows.

Mrs. Clinton is in a more dominant position than was the case eight years ago, when she was also seen as the inevitable nominee (only to lose the nomination to then-Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois).

In the summer of 2006, a Gallup survey of Democrats showed Mrs. Clinton with 36% support. Ranking second was former Vice President Al Gore, at 16%.

As strong as Mrs. Clinton now appears, some Clinton loyalists worry that her public image is more blemished now than was the case when she served as secretary of state.

A Wall Street Journal-NBC News poll from September, for example, showed that her favorability rating had fallen 16 percentage points over the past five years.

"It's all well and good to be the front-runner, but that pales in comparison to being the front-runner on election day," said Doug Schoen, a former pollster for ex-President Bill Clinton. "And right now her numbers are not going in the right direction."

The CNN/ORC poll interviewed a total of 457 Democrats and had a margin of error of +/- 4.5 points. The survey was conducted Nov. 21-23.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post blog: The Switch: "Can political groups raise money for the mere idea of a woman president?"

By Nancy Scola

December 2, 2014, 2:02 p.m. EST

ActBlue, the Democratic online fundraising powerhouse group, is asking federal election officials whether it can set up a system for allowing fundraising on behalf of a female presidential candidate before knowing who, exactly, the money would go to.

This is how it would work: Democrats would chip in $5, $10, $50, $100 for a generic, to-be-named female candidate. If, say, Hillary Clinton or U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren got the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, she would get whatever money had piled up.

But if, say, former senator Jim Webb was the Democrats' nominee instead, the accumulated money would revert elsewhere -- perhaps to a group like EMILY's List.

That cash could give a female candidate a little more incentive to run -- and the Democratic establishment a little extra motivation to rally behind a female candidate. That's ActBlue's hope, anyway.

"If someone has a strong preference for a woman, but not for one candidate over the other," says Steven Gold, ActBlue's general counsel, "this is a way they could express that preference." ActBlue executive director Erin Hill describes it as letting small-dollar donors shape the "marketplace" for candidates.

The nonprofit ActBlue has received FEC approval for other unusual fundraising strategies. The group was the first to establish "draft campaigns" to raise money for candidates who had not announced they were running. Warren, for example, had more than $100,000 in ActBlue -- collected donations waiting for her from one "Draft Warren" fund alone -- when she got into the 2012 race for the Senate.

Of course, gender can be a tricky thing. ActBlue told the FEC in its application that it "looks forward to the day when a transgender candidate mounts a viable presidential campaign, but for purposes of this opinion, we respectfully request that the Commission treat gender as though it is easily determined."

Founded in 2004, ActBlue has figured out how to use the Internet to extract vast sums of money from Democratic donors. Donations can be as small as a dollar, and the mean donation last election cycle was just $45, but ActBlue has managed to raise more than $680 million in its decade of existence. The platform's first great innovation was making it trivially easy for campaigns of any size to tap into state-of-the-art online fundraising technology and a networked base of ready donors. It's been pushing the boundaries of what's possible with small-dollar, digital donations ever since.

Republicans have tried to set up ActBlue equivalents over the years, but none have stuck.

The FEC declined to comment on ActBlue's application as the request is still pending.

Dallas Morning News: "Cruz links Hillary Clinton to Obama as he blasts U.S. foreign policy"

By Todd J. Gillman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

December 2, 2014, 10:11 p.m.

WASHINGTON — In the jockeying ahead of the 2016 presidential race, Sen. Ted Cruz blasted the “Obama-Clinton foreign policy” on Tuesday — taking aim at the current president and the Democrats’ leading contender to replace him.

“I guess Antarctica is doing OK,” Cruz joked. In a scathing critique, he asserted that the rest of the world suffers from a lack of American leadership — a vacuum that he said Russia, Iran, China and the Islamic State terror group are eager to exploit.

“The failures of the Obama-Clinton foreign policy are manifest,” he said. “If Saturday Night Live were parodying a hapless, ineffective president, they couldn’t make things up worse. Just a few months ago, Jimmy Carter criticized this president for being weak on foreign policy. Holy cow.”

Cruz was delivering the keynote speech at a lunch hosted by Concerned Veterans for America, a conservative group, and the conservative magazine The Weekly Standard at a hotel a block from the White House. Cruz has given several such addresses and will deliver another next week at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, as he burnishes his credentials for a presidential run.

Tuesday’s speech included numerous references to Hillary Rodham Clinton, Obama’s first secretary of state and the presumed Democratic front-runner for 2016.

The Texas freshman, like Obama before he leapt from the Senate to the White House, lacks executive and military experience. He offered a vision of a far more muscular foreign policy. When the U.S. uses military force, he said, there should be a clear objective, overwhelming force and a quick exit.

“It is not the job of our military to produce democratic utopias around the world. … Hunt down our enemies and kill them before they kill us,” Cruz said. “That is a focus that sadly has been lacking the last six years.”

He asserted that Obama had allowed a “KBG thug,” Vladimir Putin, to flex Russia’s muscles virtually unchecked. When Russia menaced Ukraine and invaded Crimea, Cruz said, he would have hit back by expanding U.S. energy exports to undermine Russia’s leverage over its neighbors.

When it comes to the Islamic State, Cruz accused Obama of pursuing a “photo op campaign” against the terror group rather than a “serious, concerted, real bombing campaign.” If he were in charge, he said, “We would be using the boots on the ground or the peshmerga to hunt down and kill the leadership of ISIS.”

Cruz blasted Obama for failing to speak out with “a clarion voice for freedom,” especially religious freedom. He cited, as he often does, the cases of Saeed Abedini, a Christian pastor imprisoned in Iran since 2012, and others.

Amid reports that Obama will pick Ashton Carter as his next defense secretary, Cruz asserted that the administration has treated Pentagon chiefs “as subservient to political lackeys in the White House.”

“It is my hope that Mr. Carter will not give in to that,” he said.

Carter would be Obama’s fourth defense secretary. The turnover reflects “a failure of leadership at a time when the world is on fire,” Cruz said. “We shouldn’t see more turnover at the Defense Department than one has at the typical Burger King.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal: "Sen. Rand Paul Says Foreign Policy Stance Puts Him in Mainstream"

By Beth Reinhard

December 2, 2014, 7:33 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Possible Republican Presidential Contender Speaks at Wall Street Journal CEO Council Meeting

WASHINGTON—Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul , who is positioning himself for a bid for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, sought Tuesday to present a fine-tuned approach to foreign policy that he said puts him in the mainstream of the country and his party.

Mr. Paul said he sees war as a "last resort," seeking a middle ground between his party's traditional defense arm and a libertarian wing skeptical of foreign entanglements. Congress needs to be consulted on military actions and should approve defense budgets that don't compromise national security or increase the deficit, he said.

"I'm not going to apologize for this. If I'm ever commander-in-chief, I will not want to take the country to war," he told The Wall Street Journal CEO Council's annual meeting.

Mr. Paul's support in September for airstrikes against the Islamic State terrorist group in Iraq and Syria marked the first time since his 2010 election that he sided with President Barack Obama 's use of military force. His caution is a potential political liability in a party that typically nominates candidates with a more muscular approach to foreign policy.

To critics who call him an isolationist and could seek to block his path to the nomination, Mr. Paul said, "That's a caricature and I will have to fight that." He added, "I'm right there with most of the country and most of the party."

Support for U.S. intervention in foreign conflicts declined in the wake of protracted wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, but public opinion started to shift amid the rising threat of Islamic State and videos of the group beheading civilians. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll in September found almost two-thirds of respondents believed it is in the nation's interest to confront the group, also known as ISIS.

Mr. Paul touted his recent request for a congressional declaration of war against ISIS—a move that demonstrated his willingness to go to war while reassuring his libertarian base that he would pursue limits on executive-branch powers.

Mr. Paul accused a "docile" Congress of abdicating its responsibility and said he introduced the war resolution "to shake them up a bit and say, 'Hey guys, this is our responsibility.'" Asked if the president needs to seek congressional approval for every military action, Mr. Paul demurred, saying, "I don't think anyone can give a blanket answer to every possible instance."

He also declined to be pinned down on a percentage of the gross domestic product that should be devoted to the military. During his first year in the Senate, Mr. Paul proposed cutting military spending by 10%. He now favors increasing the defense budget over spending limits set in the 2013 deal reached by Congress and the White House to avert a government shutdown.

"I'll spend more money [on defense], as much as I can get out of Congress if I were president," he said. "However, I won't do it and run up another $10 trillion in the deficit. So it has to be done by cutting other parts of government."

Mr. Paul said he doesn't favor increasing sanctions on Iran as the U.S. continues diplomatic efforts aimed at ending the Iranian nuclear weapons program, saying, "I think it would be a mistake to push them away from the table."

Mr. Paul's position puts him at odds with at least one potential 2016 rival, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio , who wants to boost sanctions and has tried to position himself as one of the biggest hawks in the nascent GOP field.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R., Wis.), incoming House Ways and Means Committee chairman and another possible GOP candidate, separately told the CEO Council he will pursue an overhaul of the tax code next year focused on business rates.

Mr. Ryan also said Republicans would spend the next two years working to build a GOP platform to sell to voters in the 2016 election and would pursue broader changes to a variety of programs, including welfare, if they win the White House.

Mr. Paul didn't mention potential Republican competitors for president but he did take a shot at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton , who is weighing another bid for the Democratic nomination. Mr. Paul called Libya "Hillary's war," referring to Mrs. Clinton's support for the 2011 bombing campaign aimed at eradicating the Gadhafi regime. In a sign of the continued instability in Libya, the U.S. had to evacuate its embassy there this summer, Mr. Paul noted.

"Every time that we have toppled a secular dictator, it's been replaced by chaos and the rise of radical Islam," he said.

Mr. Paul's speech came just hours after he announced he will seek re-election to the Senate, triggering a broadside from national Democrats. Kentucky law forbids a candidate from running for two offices at once, but Mr. Paul's allies are exploring options to allow him to do so.

New York Post column: John Podhoretz: "Why Hillary's walk to the Democratic nation is a sign of the party's weakness"

By John Podhoretz

December 2, 2014, 7:12 p.m. EST

You'd have to be crazy, right now, to run for the Democratic nomination against Hillary Clinton — but it would say something terrible about the condition of the American polity if she doesn't face a serious challenge going into 2016 from within her party.

You'd have to be crazy because, according to the latest CNN poll, Hillary is 55 points ahead — yes, I said 55 points ahead — of her closest rival. She gets 65 percent to Sen. Elizabeth Warren's 10 percent.

We've never seen numbers like this for any putative presidential candidate before.

Even when Hillary herself seemed like a prohibitive front-runner for the 2008 nomination, she only led Barack Obama 33 percent to 15 percent in a comparably early CNN poll (taken in the third week of November 2006).

What's striking about 2016 is that Hillary's service in the Obama administration allowed her effectively to steal away the veep slot from Joe Biden, who's only five years older than she.

In the CNN poll, he gets only 9 percent, a vertigo-inducing 56-point margin for Hillary.

Democrats aren't stupid; they may be amused by Biden or even admire his passion, but they know he'd likely embarrass them as their nominee.

They admire Hillary, not least because she is so roundly disliked by the very people they dislike so much.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More important, her vote for the Iraq war, which gave Barack Obama the opening he needed against her in 2007, will have been 14 years past by the time 2016 rolls around.

What accounts for her colossal lead? Two decades as one of the world's most famous people, for one thing. Mrs. Clinton will be the best-known person to run for the presidency since Dwight David Eisenhower decided to go for it in 1952.

At the time, Ike was the most revered figure in American public life after commanding the Allied forces in Europe in the Second World War and leading the West to its victory over Nazi Germany.

Hillary is no Eisenhower, to put it mildly. Her tenure as secretary of state featured no signature accomplishments and was marred (by her own admission) by the security failures that contributed to the slaughter of four Americans at the Benghazi consulate in 2012.

No matter, to Democrats at least.

In contrast to 2008, when she consciously chose not to trumpet her position as the first serious female candidate for the nation's highest office, Hillary and her people are making it clear that her 2016 candidacy will provide Democrats with a second historic opportunity to cast votes representing social change, comparable to their votes for an African-American in 2008.

So she's golden.

And yet there's something undeniably discomfiting about the ease with which she's sliding straight into the nomination without any evident friction.

Even Eisenhower faced a competitive field that included the governors of California (Earl Warren) and Minnesota (Harold Stassen). Ike was never assured of the nomination, and was challenged all the way to the national convention in Chicago by Sen. Robert Taft of Ohio.

The presidency was up for grabs in 1952, since Harry Truman had chosen not to run for re-election.

There have been five such open elections since. In all save the 2008 race, vice presidents were in the running.

If one considers her the equivalent to Obama's vice president, that too should make her supporters confident: Her four "veep" predecessors all secured their party's nomination.

But they faced challenges.

Richard Nixon faced down Henry Cabot Lodge in 1960. Hubert Humphrey was nearly toppled by Eugene McCarthy and might have been taken by Robert F. Kennedy had RFK not been assassinated in June 1968. George H.W. Bush had seven rivals in 1988 and lost Iowa and several more states to Bob Dole.

Only Al Gore skated into the nomination in 2000 after facing what turned out to be a lifeless challenge from Bill Bradley.

Right now, Hillary's token challenger is James Webb, a fascinating gadfly with no known constituency in the Democratic Party. She might have another in Sen. Bernie Sanders — who isn't even a Democrat, but a Socialist. Neither is a remotely serious rival.

This is disturbing because Hillary Clinton has no natural claim to her party's nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She's not even an especially gifted politician. Aside from the spectacular incompetence of her 2008 campaign, she is as gaffe-prone as Dan Quayle and as awkward as Bob Dole.

It doesn't speak well of the health of the Democratic Party that she and its voters seem to think she does have that claim. Rather, it's a mark of lifelessness, of a hardening of the party's arteries.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· December 3 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton helps launch the "Security Through Inclusive Leadership" event at Georgetown (International Peace and Conflict)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

· December 5 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Saban Forum (CNN)

· December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce's "Global Perspectives" series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Lotte Murphy-Johnson" <lotte@brooklapping.com>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	4/24/2015 9:37:01 AM
Subject:	FAO: John Podesta, America in the Obama years: a 4-hour television history for the BBC
Attachments:	Brook Lapping Method and Reviews 2015.pdf

Brook Lapping

America in the Obama years

a 4-hour television history for the BBC

John Podesta
Founder, Center for American Progress

24 April 2015

Dear Mr Podesta,

I am writing to ask for a filmed interview for our four-hour TV history of US politics in the Obama years. The series will be broadcast early in 2016 on the BBC – and on partner broadcasters in America, Europe, Canada, Australia, Japan and the Middle East.

You probably have forgotten but we met long ago (in the first week of the Center for American Progress). You gave us an off-the-record briefing for our series ELUSIVE PEACE. We still remember a very funny story about President Clinton's bout of food poisoning after a delayed visit to Pakistan – or was it India?

What is unusual about our histories is that the story is told only by the decision-makers and their close advisors. No journalists or pundits tell the audience what to think. (To view some short excerpts, click on this link: Brook Lapping Documentaries .)

The London Times said of our most recent series, THE IRAQ WAR, for the BBC and the National Geographic Channel: "Television is rarely as gripping, informed and important as this."

Other series – such as IRAN AND THE WEST (2009) and PUTIN RUSSIA & THE WEST (2012) – have won top awards on both sides of the Atlantic, including five Peabody Awards, four duPonts, two British Academy Awards and a prime time Emmy. They are used to brief policy-makers and are part of university syllabuses. A note on our method and some reviews are attached.

Those we have interviewed for previous series include Bill Clinton (three times), Jimmy Carter, George H. W. Bush, Walter Mondale, Dick Cheney, Colin Powell, Condoleezza Rice, Madeleine Albright, Bill Burns, Mike McFaul, Jim Jones, as well as Tony Blair, Vladimir Putin, Jacques Chirac and Mikhail Gorbachev. That such people are willing to take part – and do so again, after they have seen the result – we hope speaks for itself.

For AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS we have interviewed or are arranging interviews with (among others): Robert Gates, Valerie Jarrett, Kathleen Sebelius, Cecilia Munoz, Jason Furman, Phil Schiliro, Jack Lew, Samantha Power, William Daley, David Axelrod, Jim Messina, Larry Summers, Ben Rhodes, Peter Orszag, Mona Sutphen, Dick Durbin, Joe Lieberman, Chris Dodd, Bill Burns, Wendy Sherman and Jake Sullivan.

We would like to talk to you about your time with President Obama – especially how you successfully pushed forward the President's climate change agenda through executive action and the historic deal you reached with China, dealing with the ISIS crisis, the immigration executive order and the decision to start normalising US relations with Cuba.

This is a serious history that will reach millions worldwide. Without your participation we can't get it right. We hope you can spare us an hour.

Best wishes,
Norma Percy, Series Producer

Lotte Murphy Johnson Researcher
Brook Lapping Productions
6 Anglers Lane, London, NW5 3DG

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

t: +44 (0)207 428 3123
m: +44 (0)759 002 8559
e: lotte@brooklapping.com e: usa0916@brooklapping.com
www.brooklapping.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Progressive Policy Institute" <info@ppionline.org>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	8/15/2014 6:06:50 AM
Subject:	PPI WEEKLY UPDATE: Democrats Need a Willard Hotel moment, Public Opinion and Foreign Policy, and Youth Unemployment

Dear John,

In a special to Politico Magazine , PPI President Will Marshall reflects on Hillary Clinton's important interview with the Atlantic and urges Democrats to heed her challenge to talk more about the positive uses of American power. Marshall argues that President Obama's "realism," focused on correcting his predecessor's errors and avoiding mistakes, offers an insufficient guide the United States as we confront a resurgent Russia and spreading jihadist violence. "Democrats once again need a Willard Hotel moment," writes Marshall. "They need to find the party's misplaced moral compass and rededicate themselves to defending freedom against its new enemies."

In a related piece for Time , pollster and former PPI Vice President Jeremy Rosner challenges the view that President Obama's discretion in foreign affairs is constrained by polls showing Americans turning away from global engagement. Rosner aruges public attitudes about foreign affairs are more fluid and contingent on events than on domestic matters. Giving presidents wide latitude to lead and shape inchoate public opinion than many realize. Read "Obama Can Ignore Public Opinion on Foreign Policy " at Time .

PPI also released a policy brief by Rosner, "Don't Listen to the Polls: Why Obama Has More Room for Foreign Activism Than Polls Suggest". In the brief, Rosner offers a more detailed commentary on why we should all pay less attention to the polls when it comes to national security and foreign policy.

Diana Carew, PPI economist and director of the Young American Prosperity Project, was quoted on youth unemployment in CS Monitor . "You see overall progress," says Carew. "It's a slow recovery, but there have been some gains."

In an op-ed for the New Jersey Star-Ledger , Carew argues that Congress should repeal an outdated and innovation-restricting requirement on the design of cable boxes.

Regards,

Progressive Policy Institute

Progressive Policy Institute · 1101 14th St. NW, Suite 1250 · Washington, DC 20005

You're receiving this email because of your interest in the Progressive Policy Institute. Not interested anymore?
Unsubscribe Instantly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

empowered by salsa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 2/5/2016 5:39:06 PM
Subject: New News! (2/5/2016)

News as of February 5, 2016

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

---

Polls

Most voters don't think any of the 2016 candidates would make a good president: Of the 9 candidates included in the survey, more voters said each would make a "terrible" president than a "great" one. Pew Research Center

Iowa Republican entrance poll finding: "Moderate" caucus-goers heavily favored Trump. "Somewhat conservative" ones picked Rubio. "Very conservative" ones picked Cruz. CBS News

Iowa Democratic entrance poll finding: Young voters favored Sanders by a margin of 6 to 1, while older voters went overwhelmingly for Clinton—revealing a party split along generational lines. The Atlantic

Trump holds lead in New Hampshire; Rubio gains ground: Trump holds 30% support of likely Republican primary followers while Rubio holds 17% support, up from 11%. Mark Murray, NBC News

After Iowa, Sanders leads Clinton 2-to-1 in NH: Sanders 61% support, up from the 57%. Clinton holds 30%, down from the 34% she held before the caucuses. Jennifer Agiesta , *CNN

2016 Campaign

Iowa caucus results are in: with 99.9% reporting: Cruz 27.7%, Trump 24.3%, Rubio 23.1%; Carson 9.3%, Paul 4.5%, Bush 2.8% , Fiorina 1.9%, Kasich 1.9%

Clinton claimed victory despite a virtual tie with Bernie Sanders, winning by approximately .3%. Dropping out: Martin O'Malley, Rand Paul and Mike Huckabee. Stephen Collinson, CNN

Pollsters got Iowa wrong: They were close on the Democratic race, but all of them missed Ted Cruz's win," Steve Shepard, Politico

Rubio had a model in Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa), who has found support from both the right and the center of Iowa's GOP going back to 2014, when she navigated a crowded primary Bob Costa & Bill Rucker, Wash Post

What Iowa revealed about 2016: "As David Corn (TCG Speaker) of Mother Jones has described it..the system isn't working well enough to maintain the living standards of the vast bulk of Americans who live between the coast. ... You can't call Sanders a crank or an accident anymore. He embodies something real. ... [W]hat Clinton really must do now is engage the economic issues." David Ignatius, Op-Ed, Wash Post

Ted Cruz on 'dirty trick' against Ben Carson: Cruz is on the defense after a caucus night email sent to his supporters suggested that Ben Carson was about to drop out of the Presidential race. "[Cruz] told reporters that his staff simply "passed on a CNN news story that CNN broke."" Callum Borchers,NY Times

Trump's loss is significant, but don't discount him just yet: "Even if [he] fizzles, the passions and discontents that have fueled him shouldn't be ignored." Rich Lowry, Op-Ed, Nat'l Review

Trump & Sanders voters share anger but express it differently: While on the opposite ends of the political spectrum, Trump and Sanders share striking similarities, particularly within the raced and gendered makeup of the majority of their followers and their shared distrust of Hillary Clinton. John Leland, NY Times

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GOP's Holy War: While religion typically plays a prominent role in elections,the Republican candidates talk of religion in Iowa was excessive, with candidates professing their own piety and questioning that of their opponents. Frank Bruni, Op-Ed, NY Times

The Economy

American worker finally getting a raise? After years of scant real gains despite steadily falling unemployment and healthy hiring, wages picked up significantly last month, a sign the job market could be tightening enough to force companies to pay more to attract and retain employees. Nelson D. Schwartz, New York Times

US Service sector growing at the slowest pace in the past 2 years: Retail, banking, and healthcare companies have been in a steady decline for at least the last 3 months, according to the ISM service index, suggesting a lull in hiring practices this month. Jeffry Bartash, MarketWatch

The market predicts slim chance for Fed interest hikes this year, despite Fed prediction of 4 raises in interest rates this year, as the beginning of this year has seen falling oil price and a raise on the dollar. Heather Long, CNN

Businesses are indicating an unwillingness to take on risk. Loan demand declined for the 1st time in 4 years: Jeff Cox, CNBC

Last month 151,000 jobs were added, wages rose 2.5%, & the unemployment rate dropped below 5% for the 1st time since the recession. Camila Domonoske, *NPR

Doug Elmendorf, former CBO director, on the shifting picture of US Debt: "Our analysis of the implications of low interest rates provides strong evidence that addressing the debt is not especially urgent and is not the overriding budget issue–and that a strategy of increasing federal investment now and addressing the debt on a delayed and gradual basis makes more sense." David Wessel, WSJ

Obama to seek new tax on oil in budget proposal to support the nation's transportation infrastructure: The bid would involve a $10-a-barrel tax on crude oil and would be paid by oil companies. This tax would be phased in over the next five years. NY Times

Greece fears more austerity pain ahead to unlock bailout loans: The recent talks with the IMF and other European institutions have spurred fears of higher taxes and spending cuts in order to receive loans. "Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras is caught between creditors' demands for fiscal retrenchment including pension cuts, and pressure from an austerity-weary public." Stelios Bouras, WSJ

Foreign Affairs/National Security

Syrian forces press Aleppo, send thousands fleeing: "The Syrian government's dramatic advance on Aleppo has sent insurgents scrambling, led thousands to flee toward the border with Turkey and scuttled peace talks in Geneva." Ann Barnard, NY Times

Syria talks open with shuttle diplomacy: The talks are the first since 2014 for negotiations "to end a war that has left more than a quarter-million people dead, displaced millions and entangled regional and global military powers. But unlike in the previous talks, the United States and Russia seem to have shown far more interest now in seeking an end to the war." Somini Sengupta & Anne Barnard, New York Times

Saudi Arabia is ready to send ground troops into Syria: "The Saudi announcement came as pressure increased on international stakeholders in Syria's separate, civil conflict to push for a ceasefire that would allow Syrians to shift their attention away from fighting each other and focus on the Islamic State." Carol Morello & Karen DeYoung, *Wash Post

United Nations human rights panel has concluded that Julian Assange, founder of WikiLeaks has been arbitrarily detained in violation of international law. Assange sought refuge in the Ecuadorean Embassy in London in 2012. Sewell Chan and Liam Stack, New York Times

Turkey accuses Russia of again violating its airspace: "Russia denied that any of its aircraft had crossed into Turkish territory." Liam Stack, NY Times

US missile destroyer sailed close to island claimed by China: ''This operation was about challenging excessive maritime claims that restrict the rights and freedoms of the US and others, not about territorial claims to land features.'' Missy Ryan, Boston Globe

Military intervention in Libya could be real possibility: With ISIS taking advantage of civil war and unrest in Libya, western military intervention might happen soon in attempt to counter its threat to international security. The Economist

Obama forced again to rethink troop numbers in Afghanistan: "For a second time, Obama is rethinking his plan to drop U.S. troop levels from 9,800 to 5,500 before he leaves office in January 2017." Deb Riechmann & Robert Burns, Boston Globe

Nobody wins if Britain leaves the EU: The referendum to withdraw from the Union will "deal a serious blow to a European Union already battered by an economic crisis and an immigration crisis." The Editorial Board, NY Times

Domestic Affairs

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

22 of Clinton's email deemed too classified for release: While over 1,000 emails have had portions blocked out due to classified information, this is the first time that entire emails will be withheld from the release of the archive. Byron Tau, WSJ

State Dept probe finds that Secretaries Colin Powell & Condoleezza Rice may have received classified information on personal email accounts: "Investigation looks at record-keeping practices of previous five secretaries of state." Byron Tau, WSJ

CDC confirms Zika can be sexually transmitted: The virus, now found in the US and at least 28 other countries, is confirmed to be transmitted both by mosquitos and sexual intercourse. The new warning focuses especially on pregnant women due to the birth defects the virus causes in babies born to mothers infected with Zika. Sandee LaMotte, CNN

Obama's budget urges a $4 billion commitment to help states offer computer education: Michael D. Shear, NY Times

Facebook banning gun sales: Vindu Goel & Mike Isaac, NY Times

Senator John Cornyn pushes fellow Republicans on criminal justice legislation: The legislation, written primarily by Mr. Cornyn, involves reducing some sentences and easing reentry into society. This is a continuation of the growing support of a "comprehensive criminal justice package aimed at easing mandatory minimum sentences for nonviolent offenders." Carl Hulse, NY Times

Obama visits US Mosque, warns citizens to not be "bystanders to bigotry": The Islamic Society of Baltimore was the first Mosque Obama has visited in his terms as president. Gardiner Harris, NY Times

Who poisoned Flint, Michigan?: "A writer returns home to find a toxic disaster, giant government failure and countless children exposed to lead." Stephen Rodrick, Rolling Stone

How aviation made the modern modern mind: "Has the internet made air travel irrelevant?" Nathan Heller, The New Yorker

Books & Film

"Realpolitik - a History": John Bew explores the many definition of realpolitik over history: politics based on practical rather than moral or ideological considerations, from the 16th century Niccolo Machiavelli to Harry Truman. WSJ

"The Real Legacy of Steve Jobs" by Sue Halpern: NY Review of Books

Upcoming Events

Meet the Candidate: Congresswoman Tammy Duckworth (D-IL), Candidate for US Senate

Monday, February 29, 2016
Breakfast & remarks: 10:30-11:30am

RSVP

The Comm Good Forum on "Security and Opportunity in Turbulent Times"

Friday, May 20, 2016, 8am-4pm, Sessions all day on national and economic security

RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff, Isabelle Lehner, Emily Samuels, and Isaac Getlan, and our interns Emily Abrams, Juliet Kirk, Uzma Azhar, Daniela Gutierrez, and Grace Ewing.
Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
Date: 8/18/2015 12:47:03 PM
Subject: Re: Albright: Another Bush Gets It Wrong on Iraq

Thanks and no I had the old numbers.

On Tuesday, August 18, 2015, Fariba Yassaee <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com > wrote:

Hi John,
Thanks for the message. I'll pass it on immediately.
Not sure if you have our numbers at the new office (since March). I'm at 202-759-5156 and main line is 202-759-5100. Feel free to call my cell anytime too - 201-739-7272.
Hope you and your family are enjoying some downtime this summer. At least some!
Best, Fariba

On Aug 18, 2015, at 7:26 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

Fariba,
I tried calling but maybe you changed your main line. Will you tell Madeleine I loved her op-ed and so did my current boss!
John

On Tuesday, August 18, 2015, Fariba Yassaee <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com > wrote:

All, pasted below and at link is a piece Madeleine wrote in response to Jeb Bush's position on Iraq.

http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/08/another-bush-gets-it-wrong-on-iraq-121435.html#.VdJv8oKCOnM

IN THE ARENA
Another Bush Gets It Wrong on Iraq
By MADELEINE K. ALBRIGHT

August 17, 2015
Since leaving office, I have come to a détente with many of my Republican friends, agreeing not to keep rehashing mistakes of the past and to instead focus on the future of America's foreign policy. However, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush's brazen attempts to rewrite history in a series of campaign appearances last week cannot go unchallenged. By blaming President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton for the rise of ISIL, Governor Bush is clearly seeking to absolve his brother's administration of responsibility for today's problems in Iraq. This argument may serve Governor Bush's political interests, but it does a disservice to the truth

No honest discussion of the situation today in Iraq can brush aside the mistakes that were made by the Bush administration during the invasion and its aftermath, much of it based on faulty intelligence and flawed assumptions. They sent too few troops to secure the country. They replaced a government that was a sworn enemy of Iran with one that had close ties to the mullahs. They disbanded the Iraqi Army and dismissed thousands of Sunni officers, who soon launched a violent insurgency.
None of these facts were acknowledged by Governor Bush in his speech at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library or in his recent campaign appearances in Iowa, because they undermine his attempts at blame shifting.

According to Bush's emerging narrative, the fatal U.S. error in Iraq was the withdrawal of our troops on December 31, 2011. If that is the case, then the error was made by President George W. Bush, who negotiated that withdrawal date in a binding agreement reached with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2008. The Obama administration sought to extend the mission for U.S. troops, and by all accounts Secretary Clinton strongly supported such a residual presence. But Prime Minister Maliki refused to give U.S. troops immunity from prosecution—and the administration wisely decided not to put U.S. troops at risk to support a government that did not want them there any longer.
It is these circumstances that Governor Bush believes led to the rise of ISIL, but once again, he is only telling part of the story. ISIL, which emerged from al Qaeda in Iraq, was established in 2003 in the chaos that followed the invasion. AQI became a magnet for disaffected Sunnis and remnants of Saddam Hussein's army, who still help lead ISIL.

No one, Democrat or Republican, would claim that all is going well in the Middle East today. The Obama administration has certainly made mistakes, and the Bush administration did not do everything wrong. We should also not fall into the trap of assuming everything is America's fault. Sectarian Iraqi leaders, the Assad regime in Syria and malign Iranian influence also bear responsibility for the tremendous problems facing the region.

Still, the United States has been and will be an important force in the Middle East. Our country does not need a backward-looking partisan fight over our policy in the region. Instead, we should be having a substantive, forward-looking discussion about the kind of role we can play in bringing stability to a critical part of the world.

To his credit, Governor Bush did present some ideas for how his administration would deal with Iraq. While his rhetoric has been lofty, and his criticism of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton has been sharp, the policies he proposes look remarkably similar to what the administration is already doing—supporting the Iraqi military in their fight against ISIL. The areas where he appears to differ are his willingness to put more U.S. lives at risk by sending troops into combat, and his unwillingness to rule out waterboarding in interrogations.
Governor Bush also spoke of the importance of alliances, but his rhetoric and proposed actions would jeopardize these important sources of strength. Nothing would infuriate our European allies more than Governor Bush's plan to break away from the nuclear agreement with Iran that they spent years negotiating alongside us. Similarly, Governor Bush made a point of using the term "Islamic terrorists," a phrase that our allies in the Arab world have pressed us not to use because it feeds the false narrative that we are at war with a religion.

Words matter in the world of diplomacy, and so does leadership. The reputation of the United States was severely damaged during President' Bush's administration. Today, America's place in the world is far stronger than it was in 2009 thanks to the leadership of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton. They renewed alliances, relentlessly pursued our terrorist enemies, and forged international coalitions on Iran sanctions and on the fight against climate change. That's a laudable record of achievement—one that needs no re-writes.

In the months ahead, I would encourage Mr. Bush to be a true student of foreign policy rather than a hurler of political potshots. The United States cannot afford another President Bush who blinds himself to global reality and who forges ahead into chaos. Americans deserve a president who will acknowledge the past and will forge a better future.

Read more: http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/08/another-bush-gets-it-wrong-on-iraq-121435.html#ixzz3j7jyKZKa

Fariba Yassaee | Vice President
Albright Stonebridge Group LLC

1101 New York Avenue, NW | Suite 900 |Washington, DC 20005

T +1.202.842.7222 | D +1.202.370.3584 | Skype: fariba.yassaee

fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Wilson Center" <IonRatiu-Award@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/4/2015 1:04:28 AM
Subject: Reminder: 2015 Ion Ratiu Democracy Award Workshop

To view this email as a web page, click here

Global Europe

Wilson Center

Political Challenges of Contemporary Azerbaijan

2015 Annual Ion Ratiu Democracy Award Workshop

Established in 2005, the Ion Ratiu Democracy Award (IRDA) aims to bring visibility and international recognition to the ideas, ideals and accomplishments of individuals around the world who are working on behalf of democracy. Previous awardees include Mustafa Nayyem (Ukraine, 2014), Angela Kocze (Hungary, 2013), Aung San Suu Kyi (Myanmar, 2012), Nabeel Rajab (Bahrain, 2011), Oleg Kozlovsky (Russia, 2010), Adam Michnik (Poland, 2009), Eleonora Cercavschi (Moldova, 2008), Anatoli Mikhailov (Belarus, 2007), Saad Ibrahim (Egypt, 2006), and Sergio Aguayo (Mexico, 2005).

2015 Ion Ratiu Democracy Award Recipient

Dr. Jamil Hasanli
Historian; Chairman, National Council of Democratic Forces of Azerbaijan; former Wilson Center Public Policy Fellow

Speakers

Audrey Altstadt
Professor of History, University of Massachusetts; former Wilson Center Fellow

Richard Kauzlarich
Director, Center for Energy Science and Policy and Adjunct Professor, George Mason University; former U.S. Ambassador to Azerbaijan and Bosnia & Herzegovina

Richard Morningstar
Founding Director, Global Energy Center, Atlantic Council; former U.S. Ambassador to Azerbaijan

Christian F. Ostermann
Director, History and Public Policy Program, Wilson Center

Cory Welt
Associate Director & Associate Research Professor, Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies; Co-Director, PONARS Eurasia, The Elliott School of International Affairs, The George Washington University

Kenneth Yalowitz
Global Fellow, Wilson Center; former U.S. Ambassador to Belarus and Georgia

RSVP NOW

Tuesday, December 8, 2015
2:00 - 6:00pm

5th Floor Conference Room

Directions

Wilson Center
Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza
1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW
Washington, D.C. 20004

Phone: 202.691.4000

IonRatiu-Award@wilsoncenter.org

Privacy Policy

THE RATIU FAMILY CHARITABLE FOUNDATION

RCD Ratiu Center for Democracy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RSVP NOW » Forward to a Friend

© Copyright 2014, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/12/2014 9:44:51 AM
Subject: How the Mainstream Media Helped Kill Michael Brown

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Tuesday, 12 August 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Gaza's Doctors Struggle to Provide Basic Care Amid Strikes on Ambulances, Health Workers, Hospitals

Nora Barrows-Friedman, Truthout: Two major international human rights organizations have called for immediate investigations into possible war crimes committed by Israel, after evidence has emerged of the Israeli army's targeted killing of Palestinian medical staff and rescue workers in Gaza.

Read the Article

How the Mainstream Media Helped Kill Michael Brown

Aaron Cantú, Truthout: It took three days for the mainstream media to report any version of events surrounding Michael Brown's killing in Ferguson, Missouri, beyond what the police had to say. This distorted coverage, which favors the authorities' narrative, is not an aberration for dominant media outlets.

Read the Article

As Iraq Unravels, US Repeats Mistakes

Matthew Schweitzer, Truthout: The United States' invasion essentially created sectarian politics in Iraq. Airstrikes will not mold the country into a stable or inclusive state, which is what is necessary for Iraq to face the challenges before it.

Read the Article

Abolishing the Broken US Juvenile Justice System

Hannah K. Gold, Truthout: In her second book, Burning Down the House, Nell Bernstein focuses on the criminalization of American young people, from the mid-1980s when the trend first exploded to the present day when the United States incarcerates more of its kids than any other industrialized nation.

Read the Review

Truths and Falsehoods About Ralph Nader's New Book

Bruce E. Levine, Truthout: Readers of Ralph

BuzzFlash

Taxpayers Pay About $88,000 a Year to Confine a Juvenile; It's Wasted Money That Wastes Lives

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: Imagine how the future of young people could be positively changed by investing in them instead of brutalizing and stigmatizing them. To accomplish this goal, we need to end their incarceration in juvenile facilities.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Shouldn't We End the "Members Only" Club of Nuclear Arms by Destroying the Weapons?

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nader's new book, Unstoppable: The Emerging Left-Right Alliance to Dismantle the Corporate State, may not conclude that liberal-libertarian alliances are inevitable, but will come to see how they can be profoundly productive.

Read the Review

Advice for "Meet the Press"

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: Going on "Meet the Press" shouldn't be a walk in the park. Lawmakers and guests should be grilled. Instead of asking the same old beltway regulars the same old questions and relying on boring panels, "Meet The Press" should be talking to experts on the issues.

Read the Article

Justice Ginsburg Wants "Equal Dignity" for Women in Court Decisions

Karin Kamp, Moyers & Company: Supreme Court rulings on gay rights are progressively pushing forward, while decisions related to women's equality are moving in the opposite direction, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg says.

Read the Article and Watch the Video

Critical Moment to Stop the TPP and Other Rigged Trade Agreements

Kevin Zeese and Margaret Flowers, Popular Resistance: The moment facing the Trans-Pacific Partnership, its sibling the Trans-Atlantic Trade and Investment Partnership and the future approach to trade is reaching a critical stage. These new trade agreements are meeting significant opposition and obstacles. We can stop the "fast track," and defeat corporate trade.

Read the Article

Blown Chances in Gaza: Israel and the US Miss Many Chances to Avoid War

Sandy Tolan, TomDispatch: Alongside the toll of death and broken lives, perhaps the saddest reality of the latest Gaza war is how easy it would have been to avoid. For the last eight years, Israel and the United States had repeated opportunities to opt for a diplomatic solution in Gaza.

Read the Article

Federal Investigators Crack Down on Two Virginia Schools' Use of Restraints

Heather Vogell, ProPublica: Federal investigators have faulted two Virginia schools for pinning down and isolating disabled students improperly, saying the schools used the practices routinely as a "one-size fits all" response to disruptive behavior despite evidence they didn't work.

Read the Article

Paul Krugman | Solving the Poverty Problem With Magic Asterisks

Paul Krugman, Krugman & Co.: Ezra Klein recently asked the wrong question in an article on Vox: Why should anyone trust Paul Ryan's poverty plan? That's easy: Nobody should. This has been another edition of simple answers to simple questions.

Exxon Starts "Most Controversial Oil Rig in the World"

Read the Article at EcoWatch

Congress Takes Summer Break From Doing Nothing for Years

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Robin Williams: What Will Your Verse Be?

Watch the Video on YouTube

Eyewitness to Michael Brown Shooting Recounts His Friend's Death

Read the Article at MSNBC

Power Struggle on Baghdad Streets as Maliki Replaced but Refuses to Go

Read the Article at Reuters

Tales of the Cities: the Progressive Vision of Urban America

Read the Article at The Guardian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Read the Article

The Mass Destruction of Iraq: The Disintegration of a Nation: Why It Is Happening and Who Is Responsible

Truthout writers William Rivers Pitt and Dahr Jamail have collaborated on a new e-book that examines the history behind the chaos in Iraq. From PNAC to Bush, with vivid reporting from the scene, this book definitively explains why this is happening. Order The Mass Destruction of Iraq for Kindle now!

Get the E-Book

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Cammie Croft" <cammie@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/7/2008 9:04:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall Meeting Denver, Colorado 07/07/08

Hello All,

Just off the phone with our tracker Sara who is on the ground today in Denver. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS

- CO Independent: Pea Pod and other Protesters threatened with Arrest, http://coloradoindependent.com/view/pea-protesters-at
- McCain pledges to balance budget by 2013
- McCain praises the company Crocs - just like Bush did in 2006, http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/what_a_crock.php
- McCain has difficult exchange with veteran over GI Bill and Veteran's health care benefits
- Restated his position on FISA, telecommunication companies should not be held liable for serving their government
- McCain tells disabled American that he will not support the Community Choice Act
- McCain tells college student that he has "very attractive friends" -- refers to the young blonde woman sitting next to him
- McCain gets into a difficult exchange with a questioner on the articles of impeachment and why he voted for impeaching Bill Clinton, but opposes impeaching Bush now

Denver, Colorado: McCain Town Hall Meeting 07/07/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details:
- Demonstrators asked to leave event or be arrested
- Approximately 300 in attendance; most of audience white, casually dressed
- There were 10 cameras -- mostly local news outlets, one pool camera
- Three teleprompters set up to assist McCain
- Security was really light, tracker had no problem getting in
- Small business owner, Beth Ecern opened the event and introduced Cindy McCain
- Cindy McCain gave introductory remarks and introduced her husband
- Post-event demonstrators holding McBush and Obama signs

FULL Remarks
LINK: http://thepage.time.com/full-remarks-of-mccains-denver-speech-on-jobs/

ARLINGTON, VA — U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery at a town hall meeting in Denver, CO, today at 12:00 p.m. MDT (2:00 P.M. EDT):

Thank you, Beth, for the kind introduction and inspiring words. Bethany Manufacturing is one of the many small business success stories in America. Beth is rightfully proud to have created good, secure jobs. Through her and her employees' ingenuity and hard work, Bethany keeps growing. But Beth tells me it gets harder every year, not because of the market and competition, but because of government regulations, taxes and the cost of health care. Beth, I promise you, if I'm elected President, we're going to remove these obstacles to your continued success, and make government a catalyst for growth and good jobs.

Before I take your questions, I want to begin by talking about the issue in this campaign Americans worry the most about – the American economy.

All of us know what is happening to the economy. It is slowing. More than 400,000 people have lost their jobs since December, and the rate of new job creation has fallen sharply. Some economists have noted that companies seem to be on a "hiring strike." Americans are worried about the security of their current job, and they're worried that they, their kids and their neighbors may not find good jobs and new opportunities in the future. To make matters worse, gas is over $4 a gallon and the price of oil has almost doubled in the last year. The cost of everything from energy to food is rising.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I have a plan to grow this economy, create more and better jobs, and get America moving again. I have a plan to reform government, achieve energy security, and ensure that healthcare and a quality education are affordable and available for all. I believe the role of government is to unleash the creativity, ingenuity and hard work of the American people, and make it easier to create jobs.

At its core, the economy isn't the sum of an array of bewildering statistics. It's about where Americans work, how they live, how they pay their bills today and save for tomorrow. It's about small businesses opening their doors, hiring employees and growing. It's about giving workers the education and training to find a good job and prosper in it. It's about the aspirations of the American people to build a better life for their families; dreams that begin with a job.

So how are we going to create good jobs? Let's start with small businesses, which create the majority of all jobs. A recent report says small businesses have created 233,000 jobs so far this year while other sectors are losing jobs. Small businesses are the job engine of America, and I will make it easier for them to grow and create more jobs. My opponent wants to make it harder by imposing a "pay or play" health mandate on small business. This adds $12,000 to the cost of employing anyone with a family. That means new jobs will not be created. It means existing employees will have their wages cut to pay for this mandate. My plan attacks the real problems of healthcare – cost, availability and portability.

Some economists don't think much of my gas tax holiday. But the American people like it, and so do small business owners. Just ask Andrew Emmett who runs Air-Tite insulation in Michigan. He has had to stop hiring new workers because of the cost of fuel for his trucks.

We need to keep the IRS from taking more of your income and making life harder for small business. If you believe you should pay more taxes, I am the wrong candidate for you. Senator Obama is your man. The choice in this election is stark and simple. Senator Obama will raise your taxes. I won't. I will cut them where I can. Jobs are the most important thing our economy creates. When you raise taxes in a bad economy you eliminate jobs. I'm not going to let that happen.

Senator Obama's tax increases will hurt the economy even more, and destroy jobs across this country. If you are one of the 23 million small business owners in America who files as an individual rate payer, Senator Obama is going to raise your tax rates. If you have an investment for your child's education or own a mutual fund or a stock in a retirement plan, he is going to raise your taxes. He will raise estate taxes to 45 percent. I propose to cut them to 15 percent. His plan will hurt the American worker and family. It will hurt the economy and cost us jobs. For those of you with children, I will double the child deduction from $3,500 to $7,000 for every dependent, in every family in America. At a time of increasing gas and food prices, American families need tax relief and I, not my opponent, will deliver it.

In addition to small business, the other bright spot in the economy are our exports, which are estimated to be growing at over seven percent. I will expand markets for our goods and services. Twenty-five percent of all the jobs in this country are linked to world trade. In five states alone – Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Colorado – over five million jobs depend on open markets.

My opponent believes America would be better off by refusing opportunities to sell in growing foreign markets. But protectionism not only puts a hidden tax on almost everything you buy, but it undermines American competitiveness and costs jobs. Ninety-five percent of the world's consumers live outside the U.S. Our future prosperity depends on opening more of these markets, not closing them.

Five years ago, the outdoor footwear company, Crocs, was started by a couple of entrepreneurs with a great idea, ingenuity and drive. This former small business now employs 600 people in Colorado alone, and sells over 50 percent of its products in 90 countries around the world. Building barriers to Crocs or any American company's access to foreign markets will have a devastating effect on our economy and jobs, and the prosperity of American families.

I understand free trade is not a positive for everyone. If a worker loses a job we must retrain them and prepare them for 21st Century jobs. That's why I have proposed a comprehensive reform of our unemployment insurance and worker retraining programs. We will use our community colleges to help train workers for specific opportunities in their communities. And for workers of a certain age who have lost a job that won't come back, we'll help make up the difference in wages between their old job and a temporary, lower paid one until they've completed retraining and found secure new employment at a decent wage.

We must also get government's fiscal house in order. American workers and families pay their bills and balance their budgets, and I will demand the same of the government. A government that spends wisely and balances its budget is a catalyst for economic growth and the creation of good and secure jobs.

This Congress and this Administration have failed to meet their responsibilities to manage the government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Government has grown by 60 percent in the last eight years. That is simply inexcusable. When I'm president, I will order a stem to stern review of government, modernize how it does business and save billions of dollars. I will veto every single bill with wasteful spending. We aren't going to continue mortgaging this country's future for things Americans don't want or need. My opponent has a very different record on this issue. He has sought millions upon millions of dollars in earmarks since his election to the Senate. In 2007 alone, Senator Obama requested nearly $100 million for earmark projects. I have never asked for a single earmark in my entire career. He supported the $300 billion pork laden agricultural subsidy bill. I opposed it. He voted for an energy bill stuffed with give-aways to oil compan ies at a time of record profits. I voted against it.

Let me give you a little bit of straight talk on energy. Our dangerous dependence on foreign oil has been thirty years in the making, and was caused by the failure of politicians in Washington to think long term about the future of the country. If we don't act now to break our strategic dependence on foreign oil, we are putting our national security, our economy and our environment at grave risk. By 2030, America's demand for energy will rise by nearly twenty percent. Our jobs and our very way of life depend on the next President beginning to solve this challenge.

Two weeks ago, I announced the Lexington Project to secure our energy future, named for the place where Americans first fought for their independence. We will begin by producing more of our own oil and gas. Increasing our own supply will send a message to the market and result in lower prices for oil and gas.

We will develop more clean energy. Nuclear power is the most dependable source of zero-emission energy we have. We will build at least 45 new nuclear plants that will create over 700,000 good jobs to construct and operate them.

The development of clean coal technology will create jobs in some of America's most economically disadvantaged areas. Our coal reserves are larger than Saudi Arabia's supply of oil. Clean coal demonstration projects alone will employ over 30,000 Americans. In the state of Colorado over 80 percent of the electricity comes from coal, and in Ohio it's over 90 percent.

My proposal to help automakers design and sell new generations of cars that don't depend on gasoline will re-invigorate that struggling industry. My plan to develop wind and solar power and renewable technologies will drive innovation and create high-tech jobs.

My opponent's answer to the Lexington Project is no; no to more drilling; no to more nuclear power; no to research prizes that help solve the problem of affordable electric cars. For a guy whose "official seal" carried the motto, "Yes, we can," Senator Obama's agenda sure has a whole lot of "No, we can't." The Lexington Project will create millions of jobs, help protect our environment, improve our security, and solve the nation's energy problems.

Americans are having a tough time. But we've been through worse, and beaten longer odds. Even in these difficult days, we must believe in ourselves. Nothing is inevitable in America. We've always been the captains of our fate. All you've ever asked of government is that it stand on your side, not in your way. I intend to do just that: to stand on your side; to help business and not government create jobs; to fight for your future and not the personal ambitions of politicians and bureaucrats.

We have much work to do if we are to end the self-interested partisanship that prevents us from fixing problems that need to be fixed and changing government to keep this country prosperous and at peace. I make you one promise I will always keep, no matter what.

In war and peace, I have been an imperfect servant of my country. But I have been her servant first, last and always. Whenever I faced an important choice between my country's interests or my own interests, party politics or any special interest, I chose my country. Nothing has ever mattered more to me than the honor of serving America, and nothing ever will. If you elect me President, I will always put our country first. I will put its greatness; its prosperity and peace; and the hopes and concerns of the people who make it great before any personal or partisan interest. I will keep that promise every hour of every day I am in office. And I will ask you to help me convince Congress, Republicans and Democrats, to keep that promise as well. There is nothing beyond our ability to achieve. We are Americans, and we don't hide from history. We make history. All we need is to believe in ourselves as we always have, and to cherish the beautiful country we are so blessed to call home.

Link to Economic Plan: http://thepage.time.com/official-mccain-camp-economic-policy/

Link to McCain Release on Economists Backing His Economic Plan: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-release-on-economists-backing-his-proposals/

Question and Answer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1 Q) Vietnam Vet asks -- GI bill you spoke out against, and why did you vote against increasing health care funding for soldiers returning from these two wars in Iraq and Afghanistan?

MCCAIN: We need to increase educational benefits -- but the problem that I had was that we didn't have enough incentives for career military members. I don't know what you're referring to -- I've received every award from veteran's organizations - they give me a perfect voting record.

FOLLOW-UP: You do not have a perfect voting record from the VFW. Names votes.

MCCAIN: Thank you and I'll be happy to examine your version of my votes. But again I've received every endorsement from veteran's groups.

2 Q) Could you change the tax code for small business so we don't outsource jobs? And two, can you pick Mitt Romney as your VP?

MCCAIN: On your second question, I'm going through a process. And Mitt Romney is a well-respected Republican.

On your first question, the corporate tax rate here is 35% -- in Ireland it's 11%. We have the second highest rate in the world, second to Japan. I want to reduce the taxes on business.

3 Q) Veteran: Thank you it's an honor.

MCCAIN: Do you agree with this other gentleman?

Follow-up: No. I'm a registered Democrat -- and I am going to vote for you.

MCCAIN: Hugs gentleman. Thank you very much and thank you for your service to this country.

My friends, I hate war. And nobody knows that better a veteran. And I want to tell ya -- I believe we are in a transcendent struggle with Islamic extremists. I want to bring our troops home - But I'm going to do it with honor and dignity.

4 Q) [carrying camera] We're spending a trillion dollars a year on wars, while here our rights our being trampled on at home. How will you personally address the redress of grievances that you were given to you on June 30. People petitioned you to restore the rule of law. Will you restore the rule of law?

MCCAIN: I will be happy to look that over. On FISA, we needed to be able to monitor the communications of terrorists. I believe that any telecommunications company when called upon by their government should not have to be punished or sued for that. There has to be a continued balance between rights and national security. We should have the ability to monitor the communications between organizations that want to do American harm.

I'm glad you are recording this. The Telecommunication companies should not be held liable for serving their government.

5 Q) [young person] How do you plan to fix social security for future generations?

MCCAIN: I have to give you some straight talk - you will not have social security benefits under the current system unless it is fixed. How do we fix it? We have to reach across the aisle and sit down and come up with a plan. It's broken again. I wanna promise you -- I'm gonna say to the Democrats and American people that there's this chart and not enough money is coming in. This issue has to be addressed. We are grid-locked by partisan politics. And I promise you I'll change it.

6 Q) Group member from ADAPT. 40 of us were arrested at your offices in DC back in April. Will you sign on to the Community Choice Act?

MCCAIN: I will not because I don't think it's the right kind of legislation. I will continue to communicate to you and continue to respect disabled Americans.

7 Q) I honor your service. Keep people off the roads -- make the 4 day work week common practice. Have people earn their living from home.

MCCAIN: I look forward to hearing more and I agree with you. More and more people are working from home. A large number of people are working off of Ebay from home and are off the roads. Let's encourage more Americans to work in industries that require less transportation.

8 Q) You didn't vote for the latest Medicare bill. What do you say to those who can't get their bills paid now as a result?

MCCAIN: The medicare system is broken -- it's an underfunded liability. And I'm going to tell you we have to fix the broken system -- sit down and reach across the aisle. I want every family in America to have a choice -- be given a $5K tax credit to go anywhere to get insurance. We also have to provide insurance for the quote uninsurables and I will deal with that too. I'll work with the states to build risk-pools to make insurance available for those uninsurables. We also have to deal with childhood obesity. I'd love to see every respected athlete in the country going to schools and motivating kids to get in shape.

9 Q) On this oil thing, these other countries are going to get benefits by us sacrificing and roller-skating to work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I believe that the estate tax is the death tax -- Bush had that right. I don't understand why that's supported.

MCCAIN: Basically everything under $10 million is tax free -- anything above that is 15%. That takes care of 99% of the population.

Greenhouse gas emissions are poisoning our planet. I believe that nuclear power is part of the solution -- my friends the French do it, 80% of their electricity is from nuclear power. We need to produce it, reprocess it. The point is, it's an economic issue finally. We are sending hundreds of billions of dollars overseas to countries that don't like us very much. Some of that money ends up in the hands of terrorist organizations. The Lexington Project is a national mission. Americans need to come together. It's not just nuclear power -- and roller skates -- it's wind and solar, etc.

10 Q) How are going to gain energy independence in any real timely fashion?

MCCAIN: I believe that when President Jack Kennedy challenged us to get to the moon -- no one thought we could do it then -- but we did it. And I believe Americans are capable of very great things.

11 Q) Welcome to Colorado! You tax us when we're born, you tax us when we die -- you tax us when we eat, you tax us when we sleep. You tax us every which way. Get off our backs!

MCCAIN: If you're not busy, I'd like to take you everywhere I go.

FOLLOW-UP: We know certain things aren't possible. Americans have gotten fat and lazy and they want everything handed to them. It goes both ways. It's time to wake up!

MCCAIN: Thank you. Can I say thank you and thank you for your passion. I have a small disagreement -- every time Americans have been asked to serve, I believe they've answered that call.

12 Q) What are your plans to alleviate the burden of recent college graduates? They are graduating with the highest debts ever.

MCCAIN: In the short-term, we got to make sure student loans are available this fall. In the long term, we have to provide incentives -- including incentives to join the military, to teach, etc. We have to put in programs for national service. That's the first step. We have to find ways to rewards those who enter engineering and computer fields.

[NOTE: During this exchange, McCain said the young man has 'attractive friends' - refers to the young blonde woman sitting next to the questioner]

13 Q) Tells Frank's story who is a vet on Medicare and still can't pay his bills. Do you have a more concrete answer for those who can't pay their bills?

MCCAIN: If he's a veteran, I would make sure he'd have the ability to get veterans care. Outside of that, I would have to look into the specifics of his case. But whatever it is, no American should go without the necessary health care. That's the promise of government.

There's a pilot program that's been rather successful -- cash and carry. We give seniors cash to then choose and take care of their needs themselves.

14 Q) I'm an intern with the COPIRG foundation, health care project. More young adults are going to college, having children. What is your plan to help 19-34 year olds?

MCCAIN: Their health care is going to be affordable, available and portable. My plan will give every family a $5K tax credit to go across state lines and choose their own health care. We have to bring health care costs down -- it has to be one of our highest priorities. And technology is really helping. I don't want the government making decisions, I want families making decision.

15 Q) Thank you for not screening questions. My family emigrated here. I am all for legal immigration -- what is your plan for illegal immigration.

MCCAIN: Legal immigration is the vitality and strength of American. And we tried twice to develop a comprehensive immigration reform. We now have a president of Mexico that is committed to helping us. We have to secure the borders first. And we have to install a biometric identification system. And then we have to figure out what to do with the 12 million illegal immigrants. And this is going to require republicans and democrats.

16 Q) [carrying camera] You voted in favor of impeachment of Bill Clinton. And then last week you said you didn't support articles of impeachment for Bush. How do you explain that?

MCCAIN: I don't believe that any effort to impeach the president is appropriate.

17 Q) What's the fundamental difference between you and Obama?

MCCAIN: I think it's the role of government and security. He has a liberal democrat voting record. His solutions are big government, mine are different. On national security - we also differ. I supported the surge -- and he said that it was doomed to failure. I am a very proud conservative and believe in less government and more security. Government only intervenes in people's lives when it's absolutely necessary. I believe in the individual first.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

18 Q) With 75 cents of every health care dollar going to chronic disease, how do you plan on paying for preventative care?

MCCAIN: I believe all parents should know what their child is eating at school. We have to make wellness and fitness a core part of our daily lives. Employers can help incentivize this as well.

Conclusion

It's been as always and entertaining and enjoyable experience. Thank you all the men and women who brought cameras -- keep buying them. It helps the economy.

[Impeachment questioner yelling in the background]

All I can say to you is that I respectfully disagree. I thank you for being here. Whether you vote for me or not -- thanks for being here and being part of this process, the essence of the democratic process.

My friends, I will always, always put my country first.

--
Cammie L. Croft
Tracking/Media Monitoring Director
Progressive Accountability Office
cammie@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7679 (office)
206-999-3064 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: theSkimm <dailyskimm@theskimm.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/5/2015 3:19:19 AM
Subject: Daily Skimm: Ohhh, we're halfway there

Is this email not displaying correctly? View it in your browser.

theSkimm

Skimm for August 5th

Skimm'd over cantaloupe

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Ample scientific data" – Russia's justification for saying 'that's mine' to almost half a million square miles in the Arctic, which reportedly hold a lot of the world's unused oil and gas. Because…why not?

SKIMM THIS

THINGS HAPPENING FAR AWAY

SYRIA

THE STORY

Yesterday, the US confirmed that the Syrian rebels it's training aren't doing so hot in the fight against ISIS. Read: some of them have been captured .

WAIT, BACK UP.

Last year, the US announced it planned to train thousands of Syrian rebels in the fight against ISIS. Last month, the Pentagon said it has trained …wait for it…60 people so far. And then earlier this week, a group connected to al-Qaeda reportedly kidnapped five of those rebels.

theSKIMM

These moderate rebels are supposed to be a key part of the US strategy to fight ISIS. Turns out that strategy doesn't work so well when you don't have many rebels.

SKIMM THIS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

IRAN

THE STORY

Yesterday, President Obama told US Jewish leaders that the Iran nuclear deal is a really, really ridiculously good idea. And Israeli PM Netanyahu told the US Jewish community it's a really, really ridiculously bad idea.

GIMME THE DEETS.

Earlier this summer, the US, Iran, and five other world powers signed an agreement that will limit Iran's nuclear program, in exchange for lifting sanctions that have been crippling Iran's economy. Obama said 'yaass,' this is a foreign policy win. Netanyahu said 'woof,' this is a neighborhood nightmare.

WHY?

Because Netanyahu thinks that if you give Iran a nuclear inch, it'll build a weapon. Which would be scary news for Israel, since Iranian leaders have repeatedly called for the country's 'elimination.' Yesterday, Netanyahu said "this deal will bring war." Meanwhile, Obama has said this deal is actually an alternative to war.

theSKIMM

Israel and the US are usually BFFs. Not the case when it comes to the Iran nuclear deal. But Obama has more than Netanyahu throwing shade to worry about. He has less than 60 days to convince Congress to get on board with the deal. Always easy .

SKIMM THIS

REPEAT AFTER ME...

WHAT TO SAY TO YOUR FRIEND WHO ALWAYS BRINGS UP POLITICS AT DINNER...

This is your moment. Tomorrow's the first GOP presidential debate — aka "The Apprentice Season 15." And there's been A LOT of hype about it. Partly because it's the first official 2016 debate, and partly because everyone only found out yesterday which top 10 candidates made the cut. Who's in? Reality star slash billionaire real estate mogul Donald Trump, political newbie former Gov. Jeb Bush (FL), Gov. Scott Walker (WI), former Gov. Mike Huckabee (AR), Sen. Ted Cruz (TX), Sen. Marco Rubio (FL), Sen. Rand Paul (KY), Gov. Chris Christie (NJ), Gov. John Kasich (OH)…and a neurosurgeon named Ben Carson. Who's not invited? The other seven candidates. They'll be pregaming and debating a few hours earlier at what's been dubbed the 'kid's table.' Burn. PS Skimm some of your Candidates here.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR BLOG GETS SO POPULAR IT STARTS CUTTING INTO YOUR 9-TO-5...

I'm a victim of my own success. Just like Apple . Yesterday, The Fruit's stock dropped like it was very, very hot. So much so that it's now in "correction" territory – which is Wall St. speak for being really off your game. It's not because people have stopped loving their iPhones. It's because a lot of investors are worried that the good times can't last. A big market where Apple's been trying to grow – China – has been having a rough ride lately. Plus, some analysts think sales of the Apple Watch have been meh. Hence the "correction" territory.
Reminder: Apple is the world's most valuable public company. So when the world's most valuable public company has a bad day, it hurts the rest of the stock market . TBD on whether The Fruit can turn it around today.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR FRIEND SAYS SHE'S NOT WEARING FUR ANYMORE...

Delta's changing its ways too. Earlier this week, Delta announced it's not going to let hunters take home their big game 'trophies' on its airplanes anymore. Think: lions, leopards, elephants, rhinoceroses, oh my. American Airlines and United have since announced similar policies. Yes, this has to do with Cecil, a famous lion that was killed by an American dentist recently in Zimbabwe. What's unclear is how many of these 'trophy' kills have been carried as cargo in the first place, since American has zero flights to or from Africa, and United has one.

SKIMM THIS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR FRIEND BRINGS UP T-SWIFT'S SPOTIFY DISS ...

Here's another feud for you. Rappers Drake and Meek Mill are NOT getting along lately. And they've been handling their feelings like mature adults. By tweeting about it. It allegedly started earlier this summer when Meek's new album came out, and Drake didn't tweet his support. So Meek tweeted that Drake doesn't write his own lyrics. Which led to Drake releasing a song about it. Because nothing says 'don't F with me' like a smooth Drake beat. Then earlier this week at a festival in Canada, Drake put up a slideshow making fun of Meek Mill or the backdrop behind him. This isn't the last time you'll be hearing about this. Sorry.

SKIMM THIS

THING TO KNOW

Flonde: Kinda sounds like the dessert. Means 'fake blonde.' See: your friend who was "born blonde" and now spends half her paycheck keeping it that way.

SKIMM LIFE

Skimm HQ writes late. And then orders in a lot. Pro tip: This does the shopping for you, but still lets you feel domestic. And full. Dinner is served .

SKIMM BIRTHDAYS

*indicates Skimm'bassador. Go bananas.

Skimm'tern Emily Golden (Boston, MA); Jheannelle Laguerre (Baltimore, MD); Tanya Holmes (Memphis, TN); Mary Grace Ford (Winnetka, IL); Amber Carter (Camden,NJ); Kristin Kemp (Atlanta, GA); Mallory McKinnon (Richmond, VA); Regan Edwards (Notre Dame, IN); Susan Gerock (Alexandria, VA); Lainey Segel (Boston, MA); William Alfano (Union, NJ); Nicole Wachter (Charlotte, NC); Parker Wheat (Richmond, VA); Michelle Fort (Boston, MA); Elizabeth Johnston (Chicago, IL); Alliah Livingstone (Montclair, NJ); Debbie Soo (Brooklyn, NY); Diane Haggard (Amity, ME); Jerry Bell (Corpus Christi, TX); Grace Goetz (Brooklyn, NY);Lindsey Simpson (New York, NY); Kat Worten (Rosslyn, VA); Katie Kowalski (Chicago, IL); Kelly Wall (New York, NY); Luisa Longo (Chicago, IL); Nick Berglund (Raleigh, NC); Patty O'Dell (Bellevue, NE); Stephanie Molloy (Rutherford, NJ); Megan Garafola (Washington, DC); Nupur Bal (Richmond, VA); Kelly Ricker (New York, NY); Melissa Manganello (Boston, MA); Melinda Moody (Midland, TX); Pamela Weyl (Kennebunkport, ME); Rachel Severance (Jefferson City, MO); Katie Warner (Cleveland, OH); Julisa Medina (Maspeth, NY); Mary Claire Gibson (Columbia, MO)

Skimm'd something we missed?

Email SkimmThis@theSkimm.com • Read in browser »

SHARE & FOLLOW US

FACEBOOK TWITTER TUMBLR INSTAGRAM PINTEREST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Copyright © 2015 theSkimm, All rights reserved. You are receiving this daily Skimm because you opted in at our website

Unsubscribe john.podesta@gmail.com from this list

Update subscription preferences

Our mailing address is:

theSkimm

584 Broadway

Ste. 409

New York, NY 10012

Add us to your address book

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
To: "Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
Date: 3/21/2015 11:43:59 AM
Subject: Re: SCHWEIZER / Clinton Cash

That would be big - we are having a hard time finding it.

Sent from my iPhone

> On Mar 21, 2015, at 6:36 PM, Margolis, Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com> wrote:
>
> May have a line on it
>
>> On 3/21/15, 3:01 PM, "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com> wrote:
>>
>> Adding Kristina who is poking around as well
>>
>>
>>
>>> On Mar 21, 2015, at 5:54 PM, Margolis, Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com> >>> wrote:
>>>
>>> Definitely would be good to get a copyŠ
>>>
>>>
>>> <Clinton Cash - Annoucement Release.doc>
>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 2/21/2016 3:21:13 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: Trump and Clinton cement their claims to front-runner status

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

Trump and Clinton cement their claims to front-runner status

Donald Trump takes the stage in Spartanburg, S.C., last night. (Photo by Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

Good morning from GREENVILLE, South Carolina.

Marco Rubio will edge out Ted Cruz for second place in the Republican primary here. With 100 percent of precincts reporting, the Florida senator received 165,881 votes to the Texas senator's 164,790. Jeb Bush dropped out after getting less than 8 percent of the vote.

But the big stories out of last night are Donald Trump's decisive 10-point win and Hillary Clinton's 5.5-point victory in the Democrats' Nevada caucuses. The billionaire and the former Secretary of State are now each in the driver's seat, front-runners to win their party's respective nominations. Both won two of their first three contests and are strong favorites to win the fourth (Nevada for Trump this Tuesday; South Carolina for Clinton next Saturday).

-- The deeply-divided anti-Trump factions in the GOP really only have three weeks to get their act together if they're going to stop the first-time candidate. If Donald wins Cruz's home state of Texas on March 1 and then Rubio's home state of Florida on March 15, it's difficult to see how the convention in Cleveland does not become his coronation. "Let's put this thing away and let's make America great again," a confident Trump said last night.

-- Cruz failed to carry a single county, including here in the deeply-religious Upstate, which should be tailor-made for someone with his profile. As National Review executive editor Rich Lowry put it, "If tonight is any indication of his strength versus Trump, how is Cruz going to win any March 1 state besides Texas?"

-- While Rubio got his groove back after the fifth-place finish in New Hampshire and benefits from Bush being out, it's not at all clear which will be the first state he actually wins. Remember only a few weeks ago top people linked to his campaign were saying they could win South Carolina outright.

-- "As the campaign moves soon from a series of isolated contests in single states to primary days with multiple contests across a much wider terrain, Trump holds some key advantages," Dan Balz explains in his column today . "The principal one is that the race will become ever more nationalized, favoring someone who has shown mastery for dominating media coverage at the expense of his rivals. A second is that his coalition appears similar to that of past winners of the nomination, as he is doing better than the others among Republicans who call themselves 'somewhat conservative' or 'moderate,' rather than those who say they are 'very conservative.' … A third is that against a divided opposition, Trump can continue to win primaries and caucuses with less than half the vote. That could become significantly more valuable starting on March 15, when states award delegates on some version of a winner-take-all basis."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

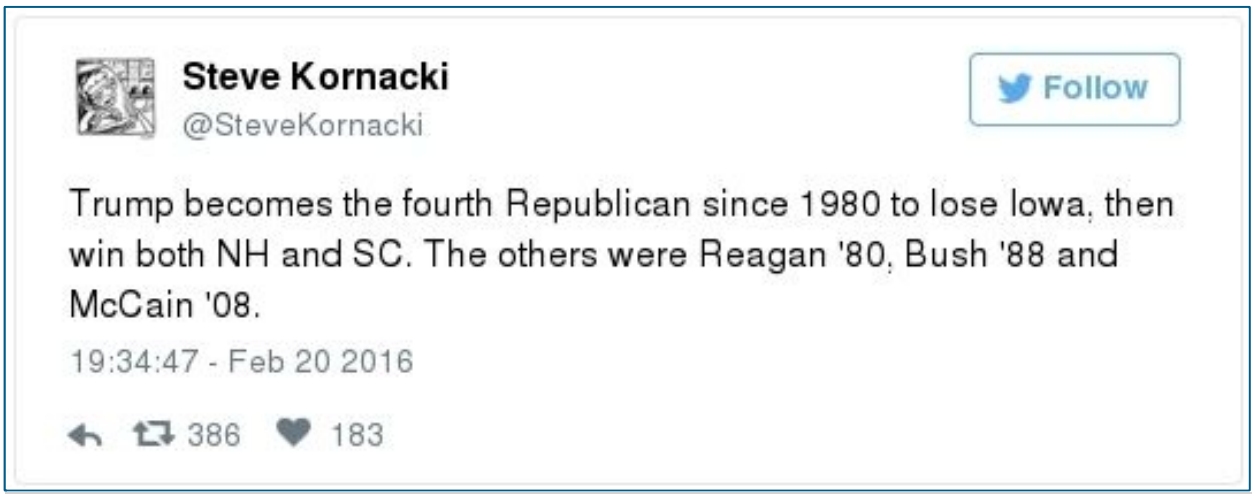
-- NBC's Chuck Todd notes that Trump won by double digits despite defending Planned Parenthood, saying George W. Bush lied about weapons of mass destruction as a pretense to invade Iraq and getting into a war of words with Pope Francis.



The crowd reacts at Trump's party in Spartanburg when CNN declared him the winner. (Photo by Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

-- But, but, but – Dan Balz flags three potential cracks in Trump's façade:

1. "Trump's winning percentage was the lowest or second lowest recorded here over the past 10 presidential primaries."
2. Late deciders broke against him: "Trump had a margin of nearly 2 to 1 among the 60 percent of voters who said that they had made up their mind earlier than in the last few days of the primary. Among the other 40 percent, however, he ran third behind his two leading rivals."
3. "He scored overwhelmingly among voters looking for someone who tells it like it is and led the field among those who are looking for a candidate to bring change to Washington. But among those in South Carolina who said that they wanted a candidate who shares their values, fewer than 1 in 10 backed Trump."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

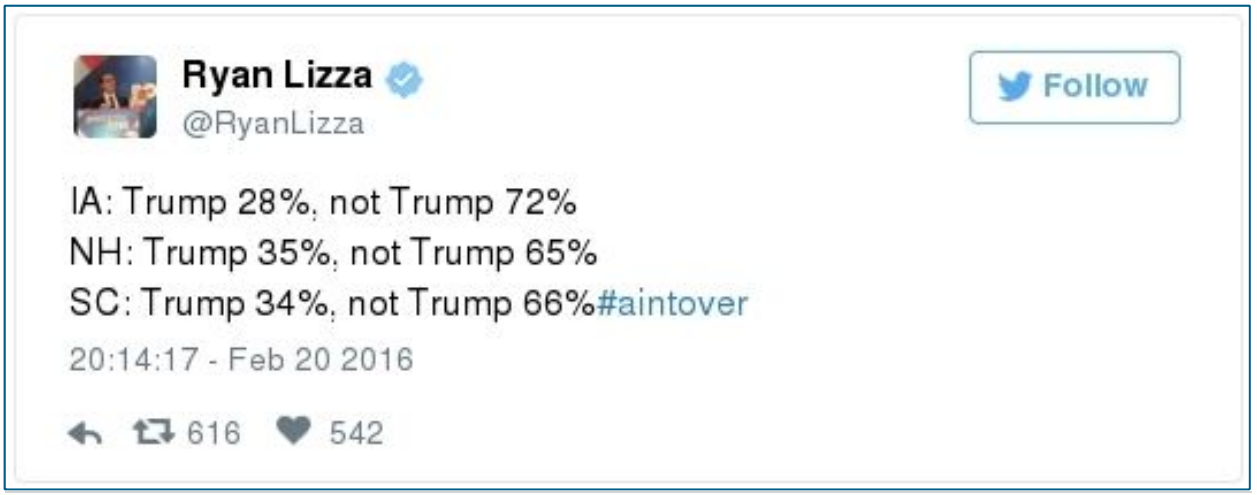
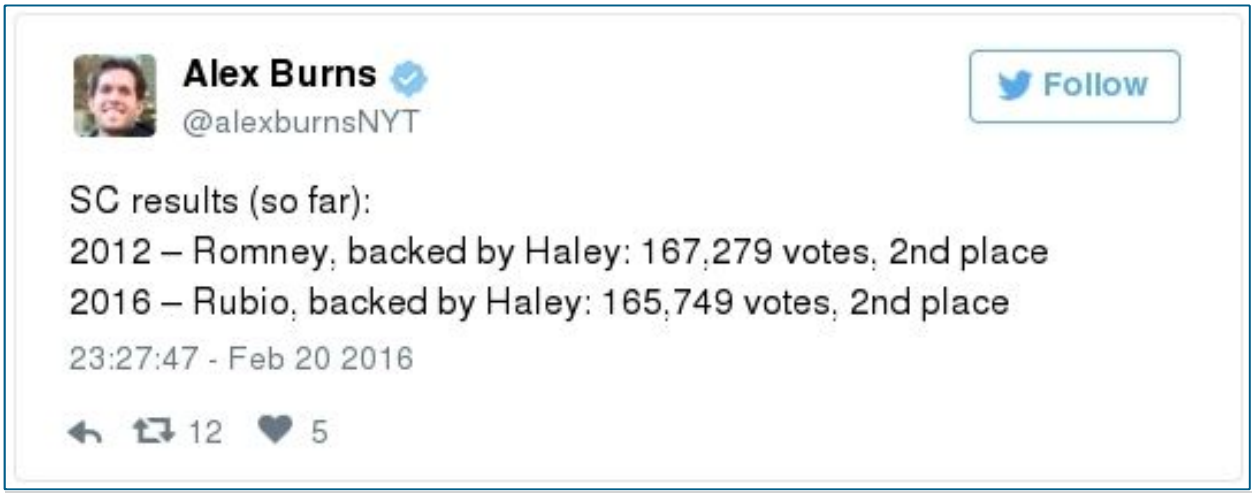
-- And here are three others ways of thinking about the South Carolina results:





This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton gives a victory speech at Caesars Palace in Las Vegas. (Photo by Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

-- Hillary's firewall is holding, and Nevada gave Clinton her first clean win. Iowa was basically a tie. New Hampshire brought a 22-point shellacking. A clear victory is exactly what the campaign needed to soothe anxious donors and elites.

"Some may have doubted us, but we never doubted each other," she told supporters at Caesar's Palace.

Her victory speech got high marks. After over-using "I" recently, she used a lot more "we"-s last night.

-- Clinton's much-needed win comes as the calendar moves to much friendlier terrain. A deep look at preliminary network entrance polls shows two exceptionally important data points: Hillary won women by 16 points and carried African

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans three-to-one. Whites made up 59 percent of the electorate, far less than in Iowa and New Hampshire, while 19 percent were Hispanic and 13 percent were black. (Preliminary exits show Sanders leading among Latinos.)

-- Also significant: Clinton battled Sanders nearly to a draw among liberal voters, while winning moderates handily. "What's more, half of those who came out to caucus want a president who will continue the policies of Barack Obama," The Fix's Philip Bump flags, a validation of her strategy to run as his rightful heir. "This is Clinton's proposition over the long term: a close race will tilt her way as more black voters go to the polls. Nevada appears to have proved that correct."

-- David Weigel humanizes Hillary's win in one telling vignette , from a caucus site inside the Wynn: "Felicia Fletcher, a 44-year-old cashier at Circus Circus, was one of two undecided voters. Precinct captains for Clinton and Sanders descended on her, reducing lifetimes of politics to a few sentences. 'Hillary's been there for the working people,' said Autumn Johnson, 38, a black woman with a blue Clinton T-shirt and a small American flag pinned in a hair bun. 'I know that personally.' Melanie Malfabon, 26, leaned in a little closer to argue for Sanders. 'The banks have lobbyists, and that's why so many people can't get ahead,' she said. 'His average donation is $37. He's not owned by big money.' Finally, politely, Fletcher dropped the poker face. 'I trust Bernie more,' she admitted. 'But I like Hillary's views more.'"

Bernie waves to supporters before delivering his concession speech at the Henderson Pavilion. (Photo by Ricky Carioti/ The Washington Post)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Don't forget: Sanders invested heavily in Nevada. He actually ran more ads on TV than Clinton did. This is a major factor in a n alarmingly high burn rate , revealed in an FEC report that the campaign filed late last night. For the first time, Sanders outraised Clinton last month, bringing in $21.2 million to her $15.6 million. BUT he spent nearly $35 million to her $21.2 million during that time. Now she has more of a comfortable cash cushion. She started February with $33.7 million to his $14.7 million.

-- The big question on the Democratic side now is: Where does Bernie win next? Most of the states that vote on Super Tuesday should be Hillary country, from Alabama to Georgia and Virginia. Sanders' team argues that he's making inroads in each of those places, but they think he can win outright in Massachusetts and Vermont, with possible victories in Minnesota, Colorado and Oklahoma.

-- In his concession speech, Sanders already seemed to be looking past South Carolina to the 11 states that vote on March 1. He's holding an afternoon rally here in Greenville that I'll cover. But then he's flying north.

-- To be sure: Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook said just last month that their polling had Hillary up 25 points in Nevada. By this metric, she actually under-performed by 20 points. But public polling this week showing a neck-and-neck race rejiggered the expectations game in Hillary's favor.

-- Even though the caucuses were much closer than anyone would have envisioned a year ago, that point is largely missing from the clips this morning. Instead, The Narrative has finally broken in HRC's favor. Here are five examples from the coverage that's out there this morning:

- Jon Ralston in the Reno Gazette-Journal: "Nevada may indeed prove to be the state that saved Clinton's campaign … (in which) Clinton blunted Sanders and slingshotted her with new momentum into South Carolina and then Super Tuesday."
- ABC's Rick Klein: "Clinton regained control of the Democratic race … Sanders will need to win some states he's not expected to if he's going to contend for the nomination."
- The New York Times' Nate Cohn: "Clinton's victory in the Nevada caucus suggests that her national advantage, although diminished, has survived … She carried Las Vegas's Clark County, the most diverse in the state, by a 10-point margin."
- The New Republic's Jeet Heer: "Coming out of Nevada, Clinton can reasonably argue that she won in a state that looks much more like the Democratic coalition … The only thing missing from the equation is the enthusiasm of young people, which Sanders still has."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MSNBC's Joy Reid : "Sanders has to prove he can win in a diverse state. And he needs to beat Hillary decisively in a big state to make up the delegate deficit."

-- The conversation is once again about WHEN Clinton will wrap up the Democratic nomination, not IF:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush, accompanied by his wife Columba, speaks in Columbia. (AP Photo/Matt Rourke)

-- The Bush Dynasty is over. (Until George P. is ready to run…)

Almost a year ago, I wrote a piece that explained why Jeb could not count on South Carolina, which had delivered big time for his dad in 1988 and his brother in 2000. It was based on more than two dozen interviews here with folks who should have been for Bush but were not. The story generated some of the most profane pushback I've received this cycle, from members of the former Florida governor's high command. This was back when no one thought Trump would actually run, but it was a wake-up call that Jeb and his inner-circle were full of hubris, that their "shock and awe" strategy was not going to scare anyone away and that they really did not grasp the buzz saw they were walking into. (He had not been on the ballot since 2002, and it took him many months to get the rust off.)

Since I wrote that story, Bush's super PAC spent more than $95.7 million and Jeb shook up his campaign, but it was all to no avail. He finished sixth in Iowa and then fourth in the last two contests. Last-minute visits from Bush 43 and Barbara Bush did nothing to arrest his continuing decline in the polls. "The people of Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina have spoken, and I really respect their decision," Jeb said last night in Columbia.

Finance reports due last night showed that Bush had only $2.9 million in cash at the start of this month. His super PAC, Right to Rise, only raised $370,000 in January. The Post's Ed O'Keefe, who has been following Jeb full-time for a year, has written his political obituary. (Read it here.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio is greeted by South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley in Columbia last night. (Photo by Win McNamee/ Getty Images)

-- An endorsement that mattered: Nikki Haley throwing her support to Rubio demonstrably hurt Bush. In the exit polls, 26 percent of voters said the governor's endorsement was important. Half of them voted for Rubio. Rubio also fared 9 points better among voters who said they decided in the final few days voting than those who decided earlier (27 vs. 18 percent). This is why Bush had been polling in the double digits but wound up with 7.8 percent.

The Rubio surge "was fueled by the upper class pragmatists of the Republican Party -- a coalition that skews wealthier and higher-educated, and cosmopolitan, just the type of Republican who is apprehensive about Trump," Washington Post pollster Scott Clement explains. For example, 15 percent of Republican voters said electability in November was the most important factor in their vote in preliminary exit poll data. Rubio won 47 percent of those voters. And he won 36 percent of those looking first and foremost for a candidate with experience in politics.

Standing on stage with Haley last night, Rubio unveiled a new talking point aimed at turning his youth into an advantage. "Ronald Reagan made us believe that it was 'morning in America' again. And it was," he said. "Now the children of the Reagan Revolution are ready to assume the mantle of leadership." Expect to hear this a lot more.

-- The question now for Rubio: How long does it take Jeb voters and donors to fall in line? It took less than an hour for Norm Coleman, the former Republican senator from Minnesota. “I thought Jeb was the most qualified to be president," he told the Star Tribune . "But Rubio clearly is our best hope and most qualified to be commander in chief with Jeb out of the race."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

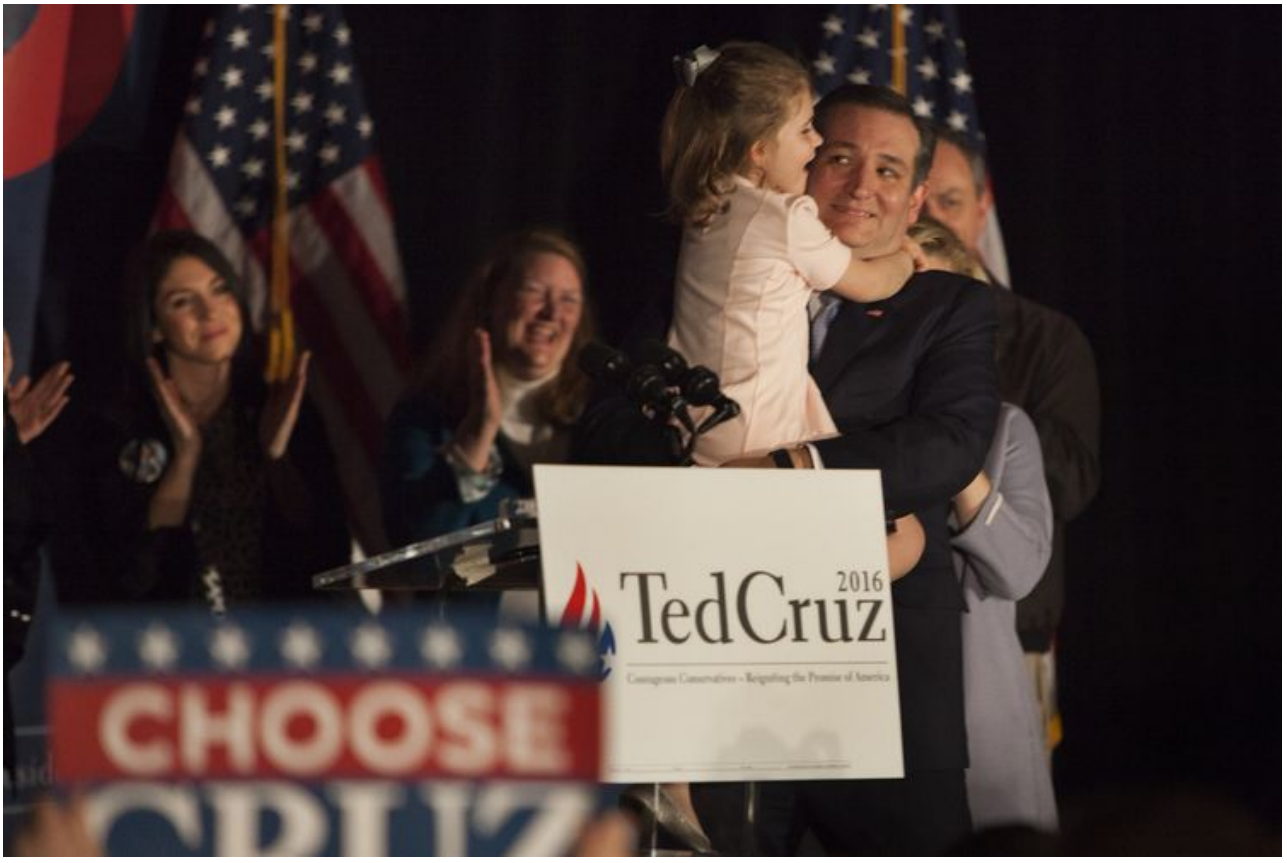
-- But not everyone will follow so quickly, especially Bush himself. There is a LOT of bad blood between the two now. The onetime mentor deeply resents his protégé. The big question in Florida politics is whether he’ll endorse at all, with some Bush allies saying he’d hold off until the general. “No one knows what’s going to happen. There are a lot of hard feelings,” a Florida House Republican told Politico’s Marc Caputo . “We’ll have to wait till the dust settles. Make that the dirt. Once the dirt settles.”

-- Rubio needs a strong second-place finish Tuesday night in Nevada’s caucuses to crystalize his argument that he’s the establishment’s best hope to stop Trump. Cruz would be helped by the same. We have limited polling, and it’s hard to predict what turnout will look like, which makes the Silver State even more suspenseful.



Ted Cruz holds his daughter, Catherine (4), as he thanks supporters in Columbia. (Photo by Lucian Perkins / for The Washington Post)

-- Why Cruz’s narrow third-place finish is such a blow: “He is now in danger of being cast as the 2016 iteration of Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum — social conservatives who simply weren't able to expand beyond that base,” Washington Post’s Chris Cillizza explains.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ben Carson's declaration that he will remain in the race will also make it harder for Cruz to consolidate evangelicals who do not like Trump. The retired neurosurgeon continues to resent the Texan for his underhanded tactics on the night of the Iowa caucuses.

Cruz's team predicts they can reassert themselves as the main alternative to Trump on Super Tuesday. "If you are a conservative, this is where you belong because only one strong conservative is in a position to win this race," Cruz said in his concession speech. "This is the only campaign that has beaten, and can beat, Donald Trump."

Jeff Roe, Cruz's campaign manager, stresses that the electoral map still favors them. "There were 79,000 people choosing between us and Trump in the last four days," he told Katie Zezima. "We were calling them. We know them. Now you don't do that on Super Tuesday. Super Tuesday becomes much more of a narrative-based campaign, much more of a national campaign."

(Photos from last night's parties by Jabin Botsford, Alex Holt and Lucian Perkins, for the Washington Post)

-- With the above comments from Rubio and Cruz, it is quite difficult to see this quickly becoming a two-man race.

-- And don't forget that John Kasich is still running. He got the outcome he wanted last night, which was squeezing Bush out. His strategy requires continuing chaos – and the nominee being decided during an open convention this summer, at which he could play a kingmaker role or emerge as a consensus alternative to Trump. But first he'll need to win the Michigan primary on March 8. "To survive until then, however, he will have to weather 16 earlier contests, with more than 750 delegates at stake," Balz notes. "The more he finishes behind the three leaders across a swath of states before Michigan, the more difficult that will become."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- In something else to keep an eye on, an interesting turnout trend continued:

Republicans appear to have broken another record: 735,000 people voted in South Carolina, just narrowly eclipsing a previous record set in 2000 and higher than in 2012 or 2008. That's 20 percent of eligible voters in the state. (Philip Rucker and Robert Costa)

Democrats saw another drop-off compared to eight years ago: About two-thirds as many caucused in Nevada as did eight years ago, 80,000 compared to 120,000. (Abby Phillip, John Wagner and Anne Gearan)

On "Meet the Press" this morning, Sanders blamed his loss on lower turnout. "The voter turnout was not as high as I had wanted," he said. "And what I've said over and over again, we will do well when young people, when working-class people come out. We do not do well when the voter turnout is not large."

-- Breanne Deppisch and Elise Viebeck contributed to this special Sunday edition of The Daily 202.

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

-- THE MONEY CHASE: FEC filings for January fundraising were due at midnight and trickled in while we were awaiting results. From Matea Gold and Anu Narayanswamy's round-up:

- Of the $15.6 million that Clinton raised, $2.4 million was collected through the Hillary Victory Fund, a joint fundraising committee with the DNC and 32 state parties. She is also helped by a well-funded super PAC, Priorities USA Action, which collected $9.6 million in January, including $3.5 million from hedge-fund billionaire James Simons.
- Cruz was the money leader among the Republicans, raising nearly $7.6 million in January. He began the month with $13.6 million in the bank. He raised $3.2 million from contributors who gave $200 or less — 42 percent of his entire haul in January.
- Behind Bush, Rubio has been the beneficiary of the second-largest amount of super PAC spending: His group, Conservative Solutions PAC, has poured more than $30 million into ads touting him and attacking rivals. In January, the group raised just under $2.5 million. Oracle's executive chairman, Larry Ellison, gave $1 million. Rubio's campaign raised $4.9 million and spent twice that in January. He began the month with $5 million in the bank.
- Trump lent his campaign $4.9 million in January. In all, he has now put in $17.5 million. He reported $973,000 in donations from supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GET SMART FAST:

1. The Justice Department said it would allow Apple to retain possession of, and later destroy, specialized software it created to hack a San Bernardino terrorist's iPhone. The less intrusive option was issued in response to Apple CEO's Tim Cook, who said any software created to hack the iPhone would, by extension, "threaten digital privacy of millions of Apple customers worldwide." (AP)
2. New detail: An FBI mistake got them into this mess. During the chaotic hours after the shooting, investigators asked a technician in the California county for which the shooter worked to reset the phone's iCloud password. "But that action foreclosed the possibility of an automatic backup to the Apple iCloud servers that might have turned up more clues," Ellen Nakashima and Mark Berman report .
3. Six are dead and three more are injured in Kalamazoo, Mich., after a man drove around and opened fire at three locations, including a Cracker Barrel restaurant and a Ford dealership. (AP)
4. A Michigan woman suffered non-life-threatening injuries after being shot in the head by her 3-year-old son. (USA Today)
5. Prime Minister David Cameron announced that Britain will have a referendum on June 23 over whether or not to remain in the European Union. The announcement comes after more than two days of concession negotiations with the E.U. over currency protections and immigration. Though the UK emerged with a deal, British voters remain deeply divided over a potential "Brexit." (Griff Witte and Karla Adam) (Confused? Check out a handy guide to the drama for non-Europeans here .)
6. One of the occupiers arrested in the Oregon standoff is arguing he was there "as a journalist" in an attempt to avoid indictment. (Leah Sottile)
7. John Kerry traveled to London and Jordan to discuss Syria's civil war and the ongoing battle with ISIS. The Secretary's weekend of diplomacy underscores his concern for pending peace talks in Geneva, which have so far been unsuccessful. Last week's deadline for a "cessation of hostilities" has also expired. (Carol Morello)
8. Tropical Cyclone Winston, a Category 5 cyclone with winds nearing 150 mph, is expected to make direct landfall on Fiji's most populous island. (Angela Fritz)
9. France has extended an eviction deadline for over 1,000 refugees living in its famous "Jungle" refugee camp. The original notice gave refugees seven days to vacate the camp before it was demolished. (James McAuley)
10. After months of heavy fighting with Taliban insurgents, Afghan forces have pulled out of bases in Musa Qala, a strategic district in Helmand. Officials speculate the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Taliban's takedown of Musa Qala could signify further losses elsewhere. (Reuters)

11. Two New York police officers were shot after a car chase in Brooklyn. They were responding to a noise complaint when a suspect pulled a revolver on them and fled. Both are in stable condition. (Niraj Chokshi)
12. Rep. Todd Young (R-Ind.) will appear on the ballot for Indiana's GOP Senate primary after barely surviving a signature challenge. He faces fellow Republican Rep. Marlin Stutzman in the May 3 primary. (Politico)
13. The White House unveiled an initiative to connect over 1 million students with mentors in an effort to improve school attendance. (Emma Brown)
14. Yahoo announced it is "exploring strategic options" for the company's core business – another euphemism suggesting the company might soon put itself up for sale. (Hayley Tsukayama)
15. Novelist Harper Lee, the author of "To Kill a Mockingbird," died on Friday. (Emily Langer)

Father Paul Scalia, the son of Antonin Scalia, leads the funeral Mass for his father at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception. (Pool photo by Doug Mills/AFP/Getty Images)

-- Among the thousands in attendance at Scalia's funeral were Vice President Biden and all but one of the living Supreme Court justices with whom Scalia served. (Read Robert Barnes ' spot story here.)

-- "Funeral cements Scalia's legacy as a larger-than-life conservative force,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

scene story by Joel Achenbach: "Replacing Scalia — how, when, with whom — is the urgent Washington partisan question of the moment, one that has intruded ungraciously upon what for many people at his funeral is a grieving period. When they say you can't replace Scalia, they're not just talking about a seat on the Supreme Court … Justices tend not to be flashy, verbose characters. Scalia, however, broke the mold and then shattered it into a thousand pieces. He was by leaps and bounds the court's most voluble, entertaining, maddening member. Scalia tore up jelly-kneed lawyers in oral arguments. He sought no coalitions, happy to be the lone dissenter. He had no desire to ever be anything as mutable as a 'swing vote.' And beyond inciting all this grief, Scalia's death is a blow to 'originalism,' the conservative legal philosophy that Scalia personified … 'He's one of a kind,' said former solicitor general Ted Olson. 'You can't get over a man like that.'"

-- Meanwhile, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley will meet privately with the 11 Republicans on his panel to decide whether or not to even hold a hearing for Obama's pick to replace Scalia.

-- And retiring Sen. Dan Coats (R-Ind.) said the president's nominee deserves a hearing, even though he's ultimately likely to vote against that person. (The Journal Gazette)

Dick Cheney and Clarence Thomas take their seats during the funeral mass. (Pool photo by Doug Mills/AFP/ Getty Images)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

-- "Obama's final year in office shaping up to be one of genuine relevance ," by Steven Mufson: "It was not so long ago that many observers were arguing that it was time to slide Obama's presidency onto the bookshelf labeled 'history.' The president's political capital seemed spent, and [Obama] seemed tired … He looked and sounded like a lame duck. Then, bam! A confluence of events has conspired to keep the president not just relevant but also vital, even as the campaign to replace him intensifies. The unexpected Court vacancy, a historic trip to Cuba and a deeply unsettled presidential primary campaign all promise to keep the president at the center of Washington politics and policy deep into his final year in office. And he still has a chance to do damage control on foreign issues, such as the war in Syria … Many U.S. presidents have faded early from the political scene. [But] the White House insists that Obama still has some fight left in him."

-- "Turkey's increasingly desperate predicament poses real dangers ," by Liz Sly: "Turkey is confronting what amounts to a strategic nightmare as bombs explode in its cities, its enemies encroach on its borders and its allies seemingly snub its demands. Russia, Turkey's oldest and nearest rival, is expanding its presence around Turkey's borders … recently announcing the deployment of a new batch of fighter jets and combat helicopters to an air base 25 miles from the Turkish border. Strings of suicide bombings have brought fear to Turkish streets and dampened the vital tourist industry, [and] collapse of a peace process with Turkey's Kurds has plunged the southeast of the country into war. Worries that the tensions could escalate further are spreading, both in Turkey and in the international community. 'Turkey is facing a multifaceted catastrophe,' said Gokhan Bacik, professor of international relations at Ankara's Ipek University. 'The scale of what is happening now is beyond Turkey's capacity for digestion.'"

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— ZIGNAL LABS VISUAL: Check out the emojis most often tweeted in conjunction with Trump and Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ZIGNAL LABS DONALD TRUMP EMOJI CLOUD

ZIGNAL LABS JEB BUSH EMOJI CLOUD

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are some moments from the day:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monica Alba
@AlbaMonica

Follow

Dueling Sanders and Clinton supporters waiting to enter a caucus site at Caesars Palace pic.twitter.com/5skXu5vrjj

14:58:05 - Feb 20 2016

21 24

Donald J. Trump
@realDonaldTrump

Follow

What a great night. Thank you South Carolina, a special place with truly amazing people! LOVE

22:01:10 - Feb 20 2016

3,828 11,951

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

lesley clark
@lesleyclark

Follow

@JebBush + @LindseyGrahamSC share a laugh after Jeb says he won't be @realDonaldTrump VP pic.twitter.com/RtQQT39RdE

13:33:54 - Feb 20 2016

42 60

George P. Bush
@georgepbush

Follow

I love you Dad and proud that you offered a servant's heart to the people of this great Country #allinforjeb

20:57:31 - Feb 20 2016

465 1,105

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul Kane
@pkcapitol

Follow

2 Bushes, Adamses, Roosevelts won presidency. Maybe still a 2nd Clinton. Never a 2nd Kennedy, not a 2nd Taft. Our dynasties have limits.

00:20:03 - Feb 21 2016

3 4

Philip Bump
@pbump

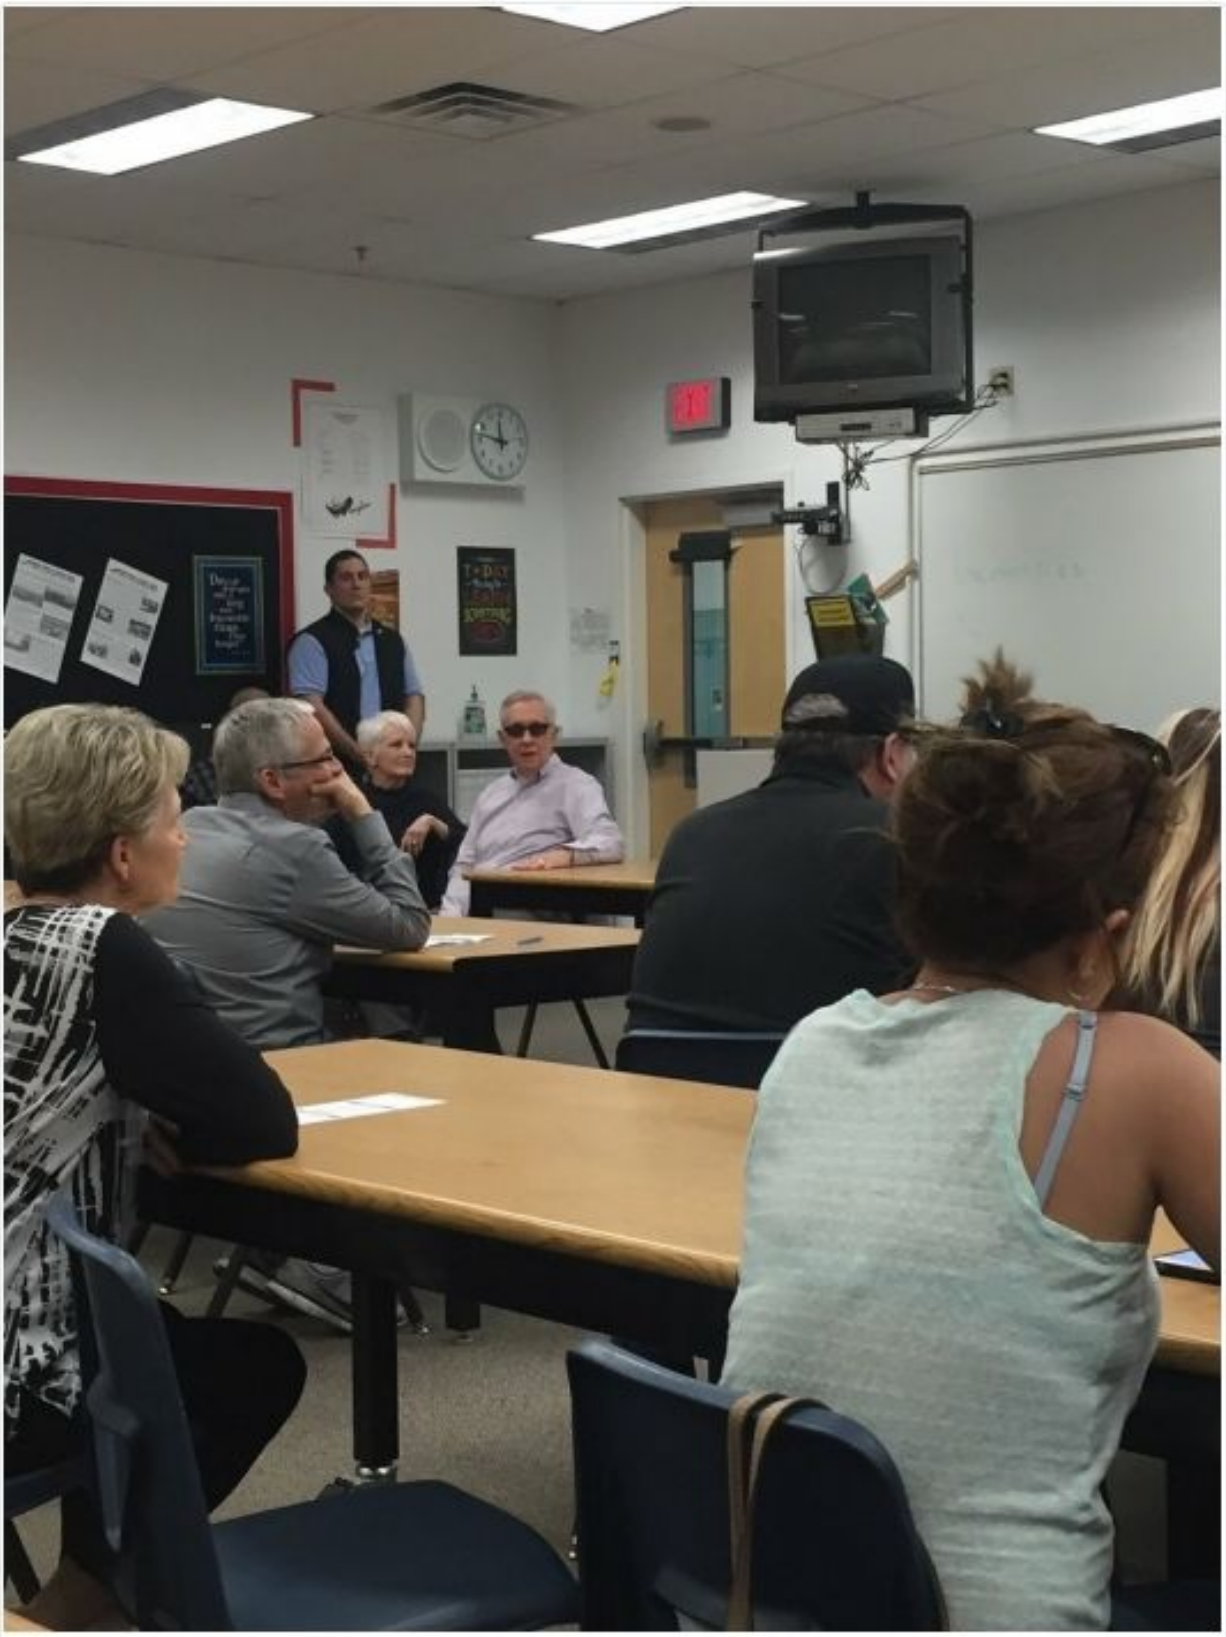
Follow

Guess now is when I remind the world Jeb's N.H. headquarters was in a closed furniture store next to a cemetery.
pic.twitter.com/OXOdOYL5an

22:21:49 - Feb 20 2016

92 156

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Byron Tau ✓
@ByronTau

Follow

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid is at his caucus site, a middle school classroom in Henderson, Nev. pic.twitter.com/oFsy3X8Lrg

14:47:51 - Feb 20 2016

40 44

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Harry Reid's spokesman joked about an advisory that included the directions to go past "the fire breathing praying mantis":

MEDIA ADVISORY

TODAY AT 6:30pm PT

Reid To Hold Press Conference

Las Vegas, NV – Nevada Senator Harry Reid will hold a press conference today at 6:30 p.m. PT in downtown Las Vegas.

WHO: Nevada Senator Harry Reid

WHAT: Press conference

WHERE: Downtown Container Park, 707 Fremont St, Las Vegas, NV 89101 (Event location is on the second floor above bin 707. Enter the Container Park past the fire-breathing praying mantis, take a left and walk up the stairs.)

WHEN: Today at 6:30 p.m. PT

###

SENATOR HARRY REID

Adam Jentleson
@AJentleson

Follow

I love Las Vegas. #DTLV pic.twitter.com/ZVRir1elRa

19:04:15 - Feb 20 2016

46 69

But it was not all fun and games for the Democrats. There was quite a lot of drama. Longtime civil rights and farm-labor activist Dolores Huerta was heckled by a Sanders crowd, chanting "English only" after she offered to translate at a Nevada caucus. (Read the story by Janell Ross and Abby Phillip here.)

Dolores Huerta
@DoloresHuerta

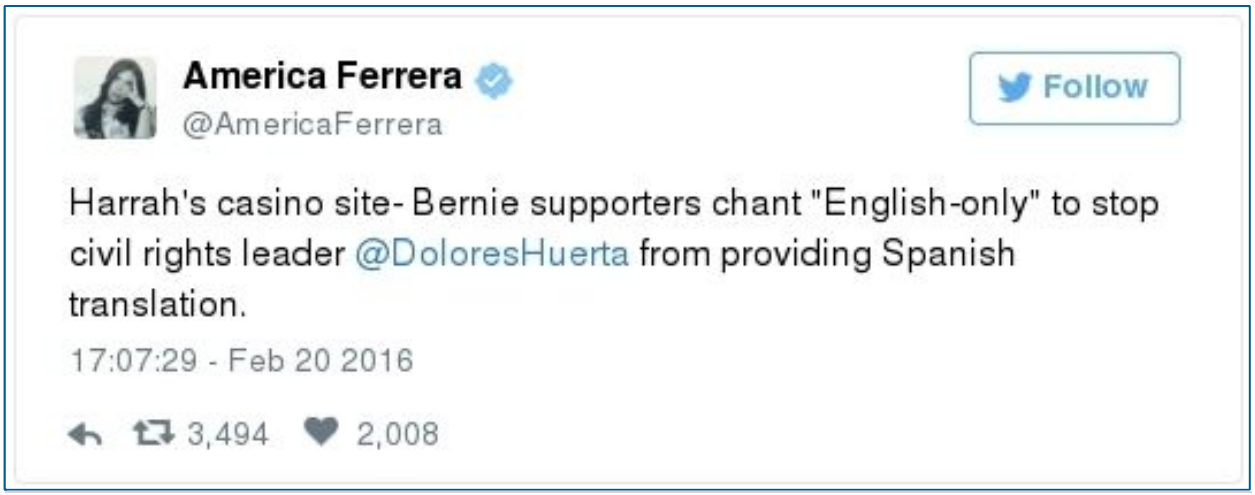
Follow

I offered to translate & Bernie supporters chanted English only! We fought too long & hard to be silenced Si Se Puede! #ImwithHer #NVcaucus

18:18:43 - Feb 20 2016

3,478 2,996

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Watch a clip of the moment:

Harrah's Democratic Nevada Caucus Shouting over Dolores Huerta

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NationalNursesUnited
@NationalNurses

Follow

This morning of the #NVcaucus, @RoseAnnDeMoro & @DBurgerNNU of @NationalNurses spend a few moments w @BernieSanders pic.twitter.com/lEm9osn0F5

14:10:42 - Feb 20 2016

79 153

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RoseAnn DeMoro
@RoseAnnDeMoro

Follow

Photo of Clinton campaign pretending to be @NationalNurses in #Nevadacaucus. More deception @SymoneDSanders #1U pic.twitter.com/3G372xmtvX

13:28:53 - Feb 20 2016

379 262

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie

PRESS

Sanders Wins Latino Vote in Nevada

February 20, 2016
Contact: Michael Briggs (802) 233-8653

LAS VEGAS – After trailing by as many as 50 points in Nevada, U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders pulled within 4 points of former Secretary Hillary Clinton in the Nevada caucuses.

A key factor in Sanders making up so much ground in Nevada was his strong showing with Latino voters. According to entrance polls Sanders won among Latino voters by 8 points.

"What we learned today is Hillary Clinton's firewall with Latino voters is a myth," Arturo Carmona, deputy political director for Bernie 2016, said. "The Latino community responded strongly to Bernie Sanders' message of immigration reform and creating an economy that works for all families. This is critically important as we move ahead to states like Colorado, Arizona, Texas and California."

Jennifer Palmieri
@jmpalmieri

Follow

Yeah. Reporting Hispanic precincts have @HillaryClinton up by 20. Yeah this doesn't appear to be the case. pic.twitter.com/FnQ0Ow6vEy"

22:19:25 - Feb 20 2016

123 128

Sarah Silverman
@SarahKSilverman

Follow

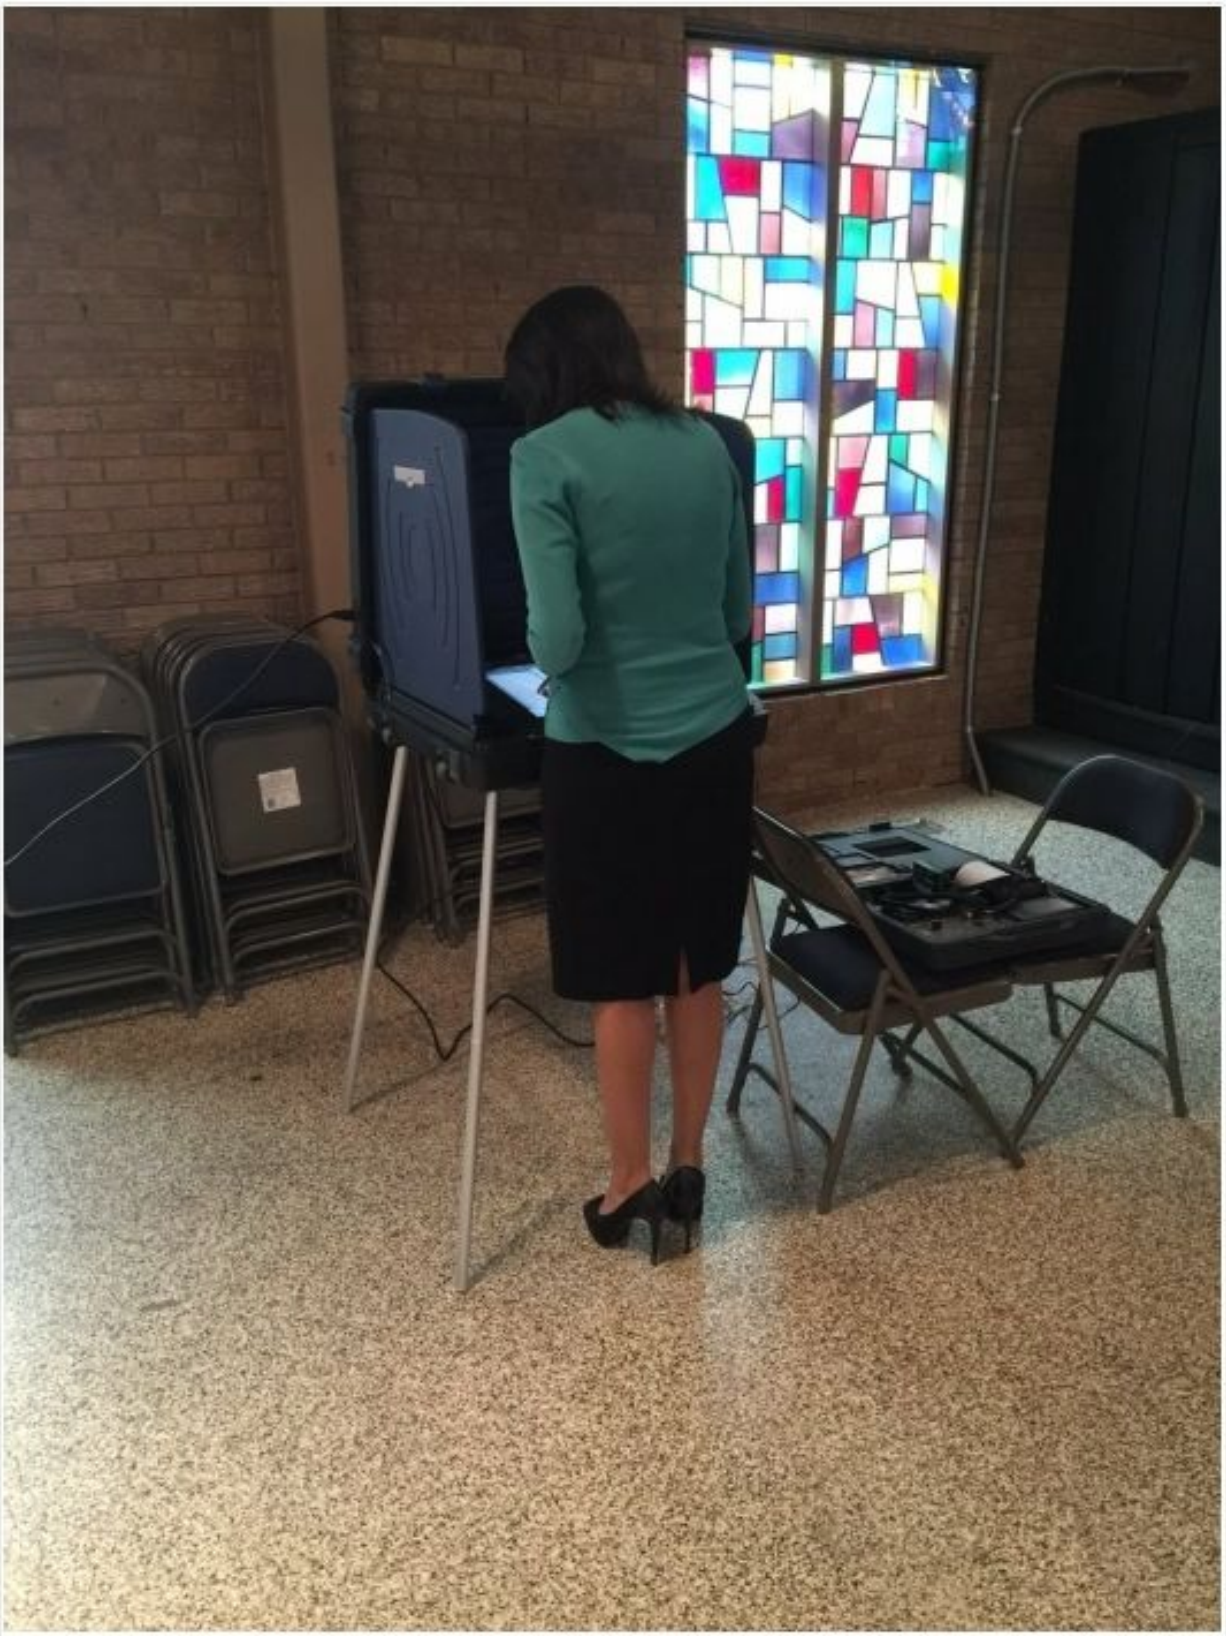
Must we pit the woman & the Jew against each other? They're both swell- good Lord w the in-fighting. See who u agree w more & vote, cuz

23:13:02 - Feb 20 2016

448 1,615

Back in South Carolina:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Rob Godfrey
@RobGodfrey

Follow

.@nikkihaley casts vote for @TeamMarco @marcorubio in @scgop first in the South presidential primary. pic.twitter.com/ajLDBC4aux

11:34:06 - Feb 20 2016

41 45

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

marcorubiofla · 17 hours ago

+ Follow

Two of our star supporters helping get out the vote in South Carolina today

6,506 likes 167 comments Instagram

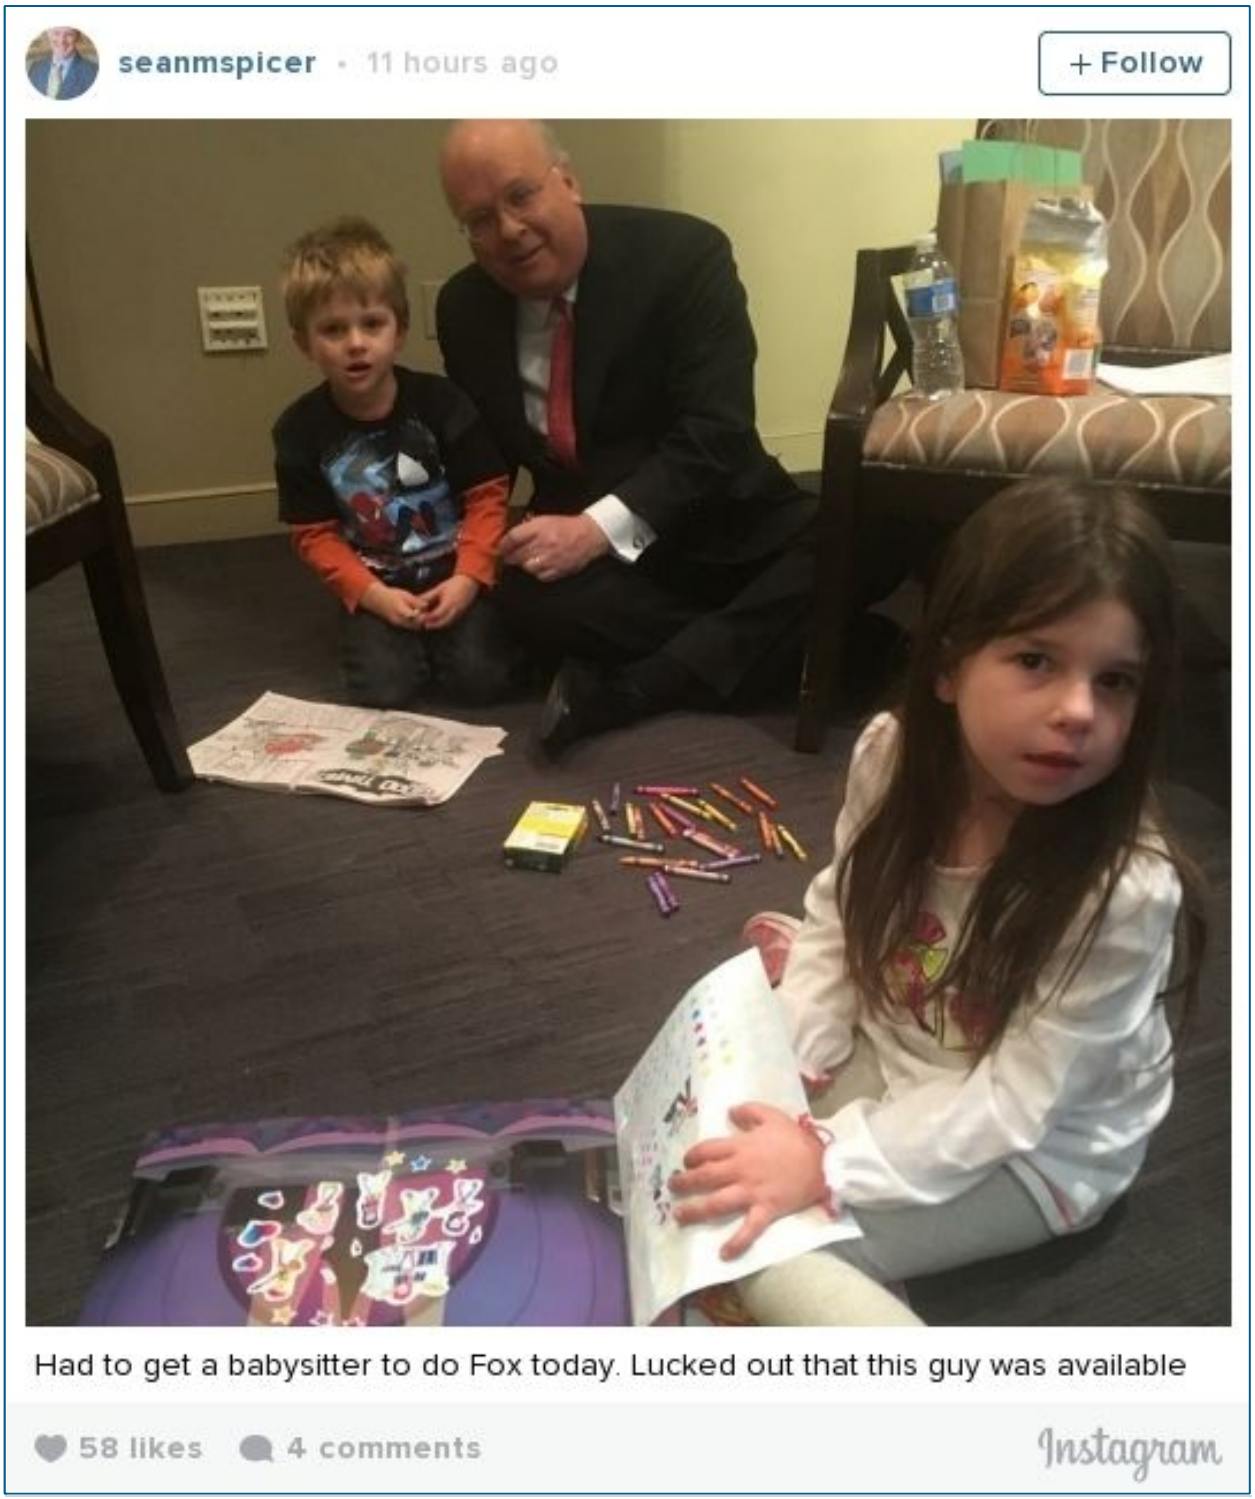
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

cruzforpresident · 1 day ago + Follow

Backstage with Sean Hannity and Phil Robertson in Charleston! #ChooseCruz tomorrow, South Carolina: votetedcruz.com/sc

4,080 likes 234 comments Instagram

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Here's a taste of the online reaction to the results:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joe Carter
@joecarter

Follow

Trump is the monster created by 20yrs of talk radio conditioning listeners to be angry and spiteful rather than conservative and principled.

22:28:04 - Feb 20 2016

418 540

Matt Viser
@mviser

Follow

Trump wins SC primary. After calling GWB a liar. After fighting with the Pope. After threatening to sue Ted Cruz. Welcome to the new GOP.

19:29:57 - Feb 20 2016

1,194 969

Amanda Carpenter
@amandacarpenter

Follow

GOP must unite together to fight for core beliefs or risk losing everything to Trump. Wake up time.

19:41:49 - Feb 20 2016

369 400

Jon Favreau
@jonfavs

Follow

Marco Rubio's gonna do five Sunday shows to celebrate a comeback that netted him ZERO delegates https://t.co/InBIjOSSxL

23:10:48 - Feb 20 2016

169 161

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Roger Stone
@RogerJStoneJr

Follow

Now @marcorubio carries the Discredited Bush Agenda

22:29:28 - Feb 20 2016

82 94

Joe Scarborough
@JoeNBC

Follow

Big loser tonight: Nikki Haley.

20:18:22 - Feb 20 2016

422 826

Robert Draper
@DraperRobert

Follow

For 7 months Team @JohnKasich's goal was to overtake Jeb! Congrats, but that's like winning Gulf of Tonkin. Now comes the quagmire.

23:15:45 - Feb 20 2016

10 25

Trip Gabriel
@tripgabriel

Follow

Carson claimed to be non politician. Longer he stays in w these results, more he shows he's in it to build an email list and sell books.

23:01:43 - Feb 20 2016

2 7

A few other images that are going viral:

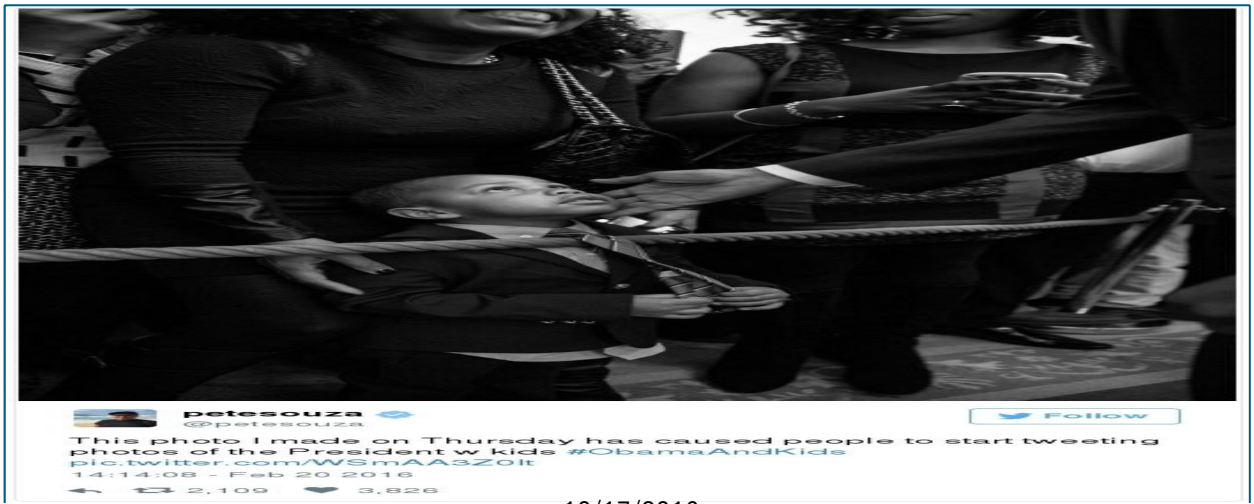
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

elisestefanik • 16 hours ago

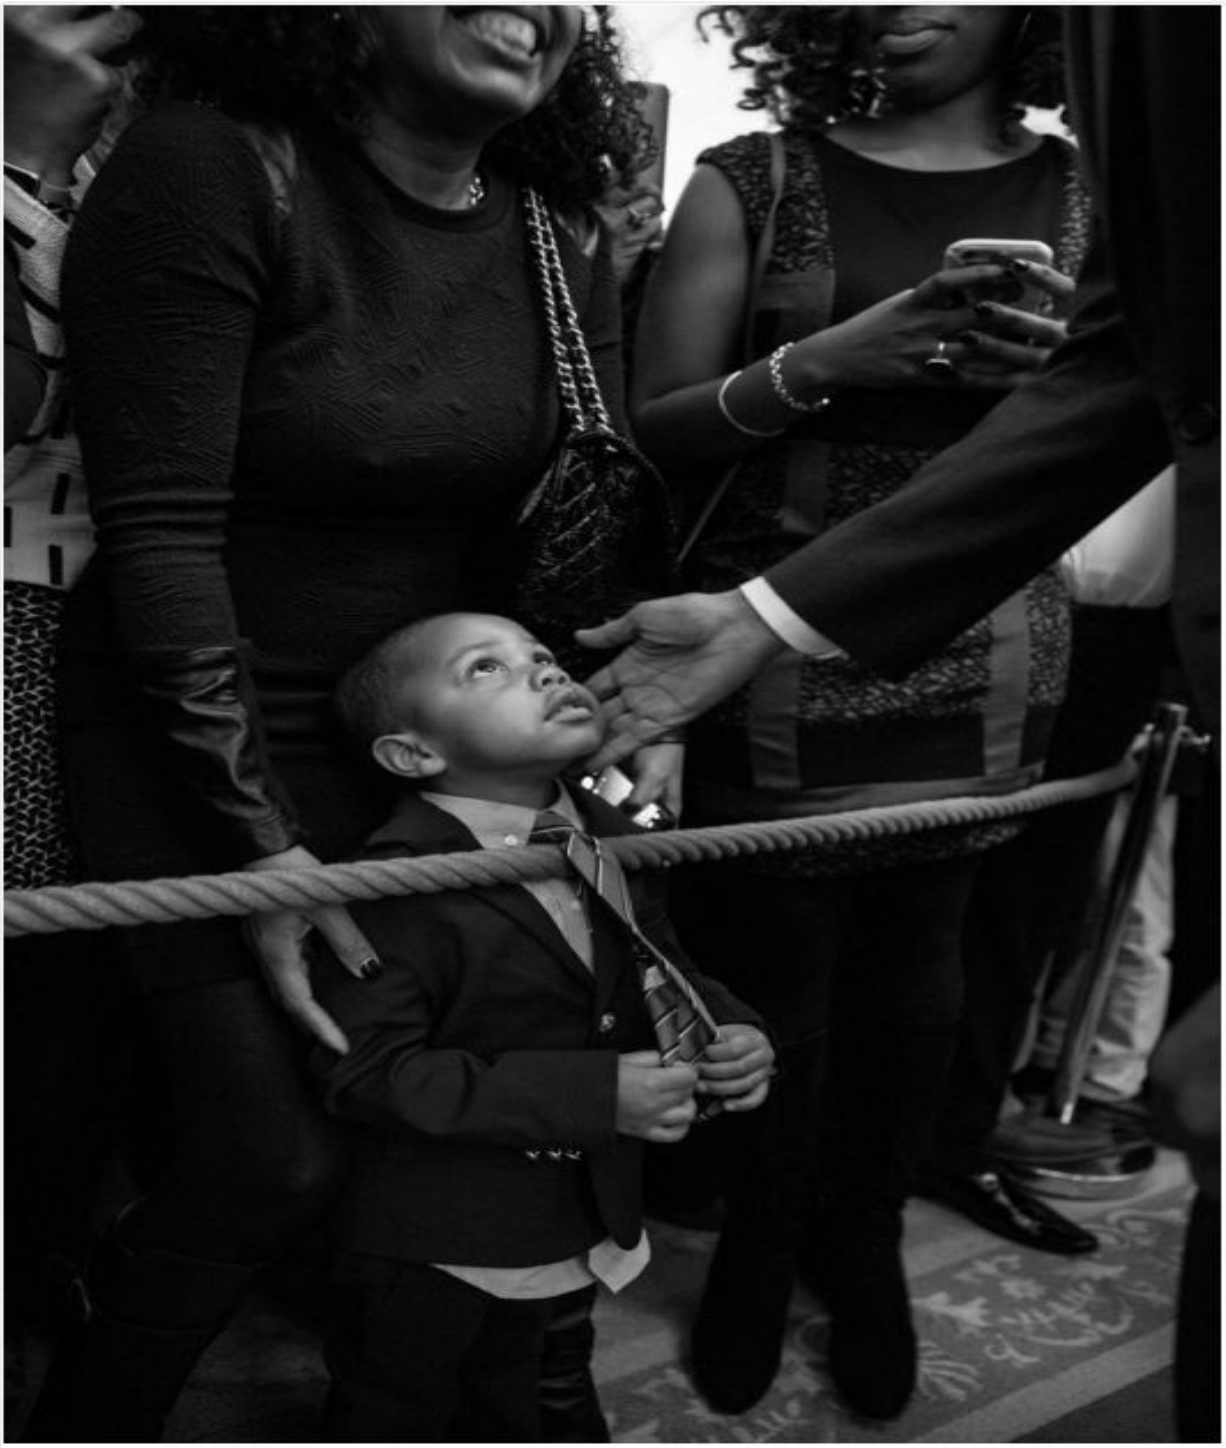
+ Follow

Powerful image shared on Facebook yesterday of 98 Justice Antonin Scalia clerks honoring his legacy and service. (Original Image posted and shared by Hannah Oh)

245 likes 0 comments Instagram



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



petesouza
@petesouza

Follow

This photo I made on Thursday has caused people to start tweeting photos of the President w kids #ObamaAndKids pic.twitter.com/WSmAA3Z0It
14:14:08 - Feb 20 2016

2,109 3,826

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

-- The New York Times editorial board argues that "superdelegates" need to better clarify their role in the Democratic election: "Even after Sanders's victory in New Hampshire, some supporters began fretting about a new menace: 'superdelegates' who could deliver the nomination to Clinton in July. Super delegates serve multiple functions at the convention, among them maintaining order — for example, by casting their votes to avoid deadlock in a fragmented field. That is why superdelegates shouldn't have to make ironclad pledges to transfer fealty to the biggest vote-getter .. Still, this issue presents the party with an important opportunity. By better explaining the role of superdelegates, and publicly acknowledging that the 2016 presidential nomination rightly belongs to the majority vote-getter, Democrats could show new, youthful voters that the party wants their energy and their ideas inside the tent. To these idealistic voters, superdelegate influence reeks of smoke-filled rooms and establishment deals, when in fact they were created to end such maneuverings."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Politico, "Donald Trump's Sizzling Sister Act ," by Ben Schreckinger: "For many minorities, Donald Trump's gold-plated brand is tarnished by a presidential campaign mired in racial controversy. Lucky for him, two sisters are on a mission to stud that tarnished brand with diamonds and wrap it in silk. African-American video bloggers Lynette 'Diamond' Hardaway and Rochelle 'Silk' Richardson have risen from obscurity to fame with a series of infectiously watchable videos in which the pair praises Trump and denigrates his rivals. In addition to their prodigious output of videos with titles like 'We are not giving Jeb the Keys to the White House. That set of keys is going to Donald Trump,' Diamond and Silk, former Democrats themselves, promote ditchandswitchnow.com to get black voters (and Democrats of all races) to switch their voter registrations in states with closed primaries so they are eligible to vote for Trump. They see in the businessman qualities that many others miss. 'He is very meek,' said Diamond. 'He's humble.'"

HOT ON THE LEFT

Gun-wielding protesters showed up to refugee event at Texas mosque. From the Dallas Morning News: "An event to welcome refugees at the Islamic Center of Irving drew a small group of camouflage-clad, gun-wielding protesters Saturday ... Such a standoff has become almost commonplace in Irving, home to the Ahmed 'clock boy' controversy and a series of other tense events that have

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Did Twitter's 'Trust and Safety' Council get Robert Stacy McCain banned? From Reason : "One [Twitter] user who won't be expressing himself at all is Robert Stacy McCain: a conservative journalist, blogger, self-described anti-feminist, and prominent GamerGate figure who was banned from Twitter on Friday night. Clicking on his page redirects to this 'account suspended' message that encourages turned the city into a symbol of Islamophobia for many. About a dozen anti-refugee protesters stood on the outskirts of the mosque's property Saturday, waving flags and holding signs that said, 'Say No To Syrian Refugees.'" users to re-read Twitter's policies on abusive behavior ... There's a difference between using strong language to disagree with people, and abusing them. If McCain has crossed that line, I'm not aware of it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DAYBOOK:

On the campaign trail: Candidates are all over the map today:

- Clinton: Menlo Park, Atherton, Piedmont, Calif.
- Sanders: Greenville, S.C.
- Trump: Atlanta
- Rubio: Franklin, Tenn., Little Rock, Ark., North Las Vegas, Nev.
- Cruz: Pahrump and Henderson, Nev.

At the White House: President Obama delivers remarks at the National Governors Association Dinner and Reception.

On Capitol Hill: The Senate and House are in recess.

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

-- Yesterday's nice day may have been an outlier, unfortunately. From Capital Weather Gang: "The forecast for Sunday has continued to look less pleasant as we close in. Clouds thicken through the morning and showers are possible by midday to early afternoon. We could even see a period of relatively steady rain late day. Before all that gets underway, highs make the mid-50s, or thereabouts. It's probably coolest west, where rain begins earliest."

-- Metro's ridership has plummeted to its lowest levels in 10 years. (Luz Lazo)

-- According to federal government data, Metro operators have had 47 "red signal violations" since 2012. The local transit authority has hired a neuroscientist and outside safety expert to combat these dangerous violations, which are thought to be caused by distraction and human error. (Michael Laris)

-- The Miami Heat beat the Wizards 114-94. (Jorge Castillo)

-- The Capitals beat the New Jersey Devils 4-3. (Isabelle Khurshudyan)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Maryland held a joint-committee meeting on a right to die bill, which would make the state the sixth to legalize aid in dying. (Ovetta Wiggins)

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Morgan Freeman recorded the voiceover for a new Clinton commercial:

Stand | Hillary Clinton

Watch Jeb announce he's dropping out:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush suspends presidential campaign

Trump's full victory speech:

Donald Trump's full speech in South Carolina

And a quick recap of how he won:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How Donald Trump won the South Carolina GOP primary, in 60 seconds

The Clinton campaign circulated this clip:

Hillary Clinton 2016 Be strong That's what I like about you

Funeralgoers remembered Antonin Scalia:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Family, dignitaries remember Justice Antonin Scalia

You are receiving this email because you signed up for the The Daily 202 newsletter or were registered on washingtonpost.com . For additional free newsletters or to manage your newsletters, click here .

We respect your privacy . If you believe that this email has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive email from The Washington Post, click here . Contact us for help.

©2016 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Cassandra Butts" <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com>
Date: 9/24/2008 7:44:01 AM
Subject: Re: Energy and EPA names

These seem wildly different in potential although all could play a roll.

On 9/24/08, Cassandra Butts <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com> wrote:
> John, to follow are some of the names that have come us as we have consulted > on top candidates for Energy and EPA. We'd appreciate your thoughts and > additions. Needless to say, your name has come up repeatedly in our > consultations. Best, Cassandra
>
> Energy
>
> -Frampton, George
> -Gee, Robert W.: From 1997 to 2000 he served as Assistant Secretary for > Policy and International Affairs and as Assistant Secretary for Fossil > Energy of the U.S. Department of Energy; oversaw the operation of the > Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and the national research program to develop > and demonstrate advanced clean coal, natural gas, and petroleum > technologies.
> -Jackson, Shirley Ann: Former chair of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission;
> current president of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute
> -Holstein, Elgie
> -Immelt, Jeff
> -Pershing, Jonathan
> -Schwarzenegger, Arnold
> -Schweitzer, Brian
>
> EPA
>
> -Bloomberg, Michael
> -Gregoire, Christine
> -Grumet, Jason
> -Hayes, David
> -Learner, Howard: executive director of the Environmental Law and Policy > Center, a Chicago-based environmental legal advocacy group that has been a > key player in setting up the region's cap-and-trade program for global > warming.
> -Sebelius, Kathleen
> -Stern, Todd
>

--
Sent from Gmail for mobile | mobile.google.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Huma Abedin" <huma@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/1/2015 11:09:36 AM
Subject: Re: Heads up for call with HRC

just to give people background here:
1. She believes she needs to do this video is because her integrity is being attacked and she is the only one who can say she didnt make a decision as secstate based on a donor.
2. Imp point: The foundation has had little luck getting their surrogates booked on any serious shows. So she feels like it has to be someone at her level or WJC level that engages directly in order for there to be any coverage of the defense.
3. She doesnt want to continue to have to have press yell these questions at her in Nevada and CA and if she doesnt do the video, that is the situation she will be in

_____
From: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
Sent: Friday, May 01, 2015 1:53 PM
To: Jennifer Palmieri
Cc: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Mandy Grunwald; Huma Abedin; Teddy Goff; Jim Margolis; Kristina Schake; Robby Mook; Dan Schwerin
Subject: RE: Heads up for call with HRC

For some reason I don't have the morning news round up -- can someone send that to me.

-----Original Message-----
From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, May 01, 2015 1:51 PM
To: Joel Benenson
Cc: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Mandy Grunwald; Huma Abedin; Teddy Goff; Jim Margolis; Kristina Schake; Robby Mook; Dan Schwerin
Subject: Re: Heads up for call with HRC

Given this morning's am shows - which were terrible - that is no longer a great argument.

Sent from my iPhone

> On May 1, 2015, at 1:49 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com> wrote:
>
> Thanks.
> Do we have some analysis of nightly news/front pages etc to make the case that this is not being covered heavily? Or at least enough based on day to day observation, i.e. not on front pages, not on nightly news or morning news...
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Friday, May 01, 2015 1:44 PM
> To: John Podesta; Joel Benenson; Jake Sullivan; Mandy Grunwald; Huma > Abedin; Teddy Goff; Jim Margolis; Kristina Schake; Robby Mook; Dan > Schwerin
> Subject: Heads up for call with HRC
>
> While on the phone on a different topic, HRC raised Clinton Cash convo with Jake and me. It was a difficult conversation. So folks should be ready to explain why we don't think a video makes sense.
>
> Moreover, my impression is she wants a much stronger response. Which means engaging more on details that we have to date not found in our interest to do so.
>
> Just wanted to update folks.
>
> Sent from my iPhone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Elise Annunziata" <eannunziata@cleanwater.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/26/2009 3:15:45 PM
Subject: [big campaign] House Passes American Clean Energy and Security Act of 2009

CLEAN WATER ACTION

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Friday, June 26, 2009

Contacts: Christine LeMieux, Global Warming and Energy Programs Coordinator
Phone: 202-895-0420, ext. 110
Email: clemieux@cleanwater.org

Roger Smith, Global Warming and Energy Policy Analyst
Phone: 860-232-6232
E-Mail: rsmith@cleanwater.org

Clean Water Action Statement on US Energy Policy

House Passes American Clean Energy and Security Act of 2009

(Washington, D.C.)

Statement of John DeCock, President, Clean Water Action

Today, the U.S. House of Representatives took the first meaningful steps on the long path toward transforming ou r energy economy and curbing global warming. The American Clean Energy and Security Act of 2009 (ACES) pas sed the House by a vote of 219-212. This action signals that Americans want to address the challenge of climate ch ange by transforming our economy and rewarding investments in clean, smart energy production. This bill will cr eate jobs and allow us to reap the economic and environmental benefits of a new energy economy. We can now m ove forward with the transformation of our energy policies that will reduce global warming pollution and mitigate the worst impacts of climate change.

Last week, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's (NOAA) report on climate change impacts in t he United States underscored that our climate is already changing across the country—altering our water cycle, in creasing floods and droughts, and threatening the quality and quantity of our drinking water. This damage could b e compounded if our energy choices continue to draw significantly from our water sources, while polluting what re mains.

Passage of this bill is a move in the right direction, but is not our destination.

Clean Water Action will continue to mobilize for an even stronger companion bill in the U.S. Senate, and will work with our allies to require more measures to reduce global warming and achieve the clean energy transformation w e need to boost our economy and to protect our water and other natural resources.

Clean Water Action believes the next steps on the path are clear:

- Create more clean energy jobs with stronger renewable energy and energy efficiency provisions;
- Increase investments that help foster a fair and effective international agreement;
- Prepare for the impacts of climate change on natural resources and vulnerable communities, changes that c an no longer be avoided;
- Provide strong, effective oversight by the US Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to ensure the progr am meets its goals;
- Develop a requirement that global warming polluters pay for their pollution, generating funds for initiatives that assist consumers and support efficiency, renewables and other clean energy programs;
- Halt all investment of limited public resources for energy sources that continue to waste and pollute water r esources – including coal and nuclear power.

Clean Water Action commends Representatives Waxman and Markey on their foresight and leadership on this issue, and hope that similar principals emerge in the Senate as our country gets down to the real work of developing solutions to this great challenge. We are at a crossroads in our history. Passing the American Clean Energy and Security Act provides the signpost we need to continue in the right direction.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clean Water Action is the nation's leading grassroots environmental campaign organization, with more than 1 million members nationwide. For over thirty years, Clean Water Action has been a leader in protecting America's waters, the public health and empowering people to take charge of their environmental future.
www.cleanwateraction.org

****

Elise Annunziata
National Deputy Political Director
Clean Water Action
www.cleanwateraction.org

913 Elm St., Suite 506
Manchester, NH 03101
(603) 622-8151
(603) 622-2661 Fax

****

This message (including any attachments) is intended only for the use of the person(s) to whom it is addressed, and may contain information that is privileged, confidential, and exempt from disclosure under applicable law. If you receive this message in error, please notify me immediately by email, telephone, or fax, and delete the original message from your records. Thank you.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
To: "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com> jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com
David@db-research.com
Date: 4/24/2015 12:04:38 PM
Subject: RE: Initial Economic Questions for Republicans

Of course I meant Paul Ryan.

It's just so confusing with 19 of them. It's like a football team that has its offense and defense on the field at the same time.

From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
Sent: Friday, April 24, 2015 2:52 PM
To: jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com; David@db-research.com
Cc: john.podesta@gmail.com; Jim Margolis; Joel Benenson; John Anzalone; re47@hillaryclinton.com; jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com; dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com
Subject: Initial Economic Questions for Republicans

On economic issues, I know Jake and his team will come up with a good list, but there are already two proposals on the table that I think we should try to get all GOPers to weigh in on:
--Rubio's tax plan that includes dropping the top rate for those making over $400k from 39.6 to 35.
--Rand Paul's 17% flat tax.
Also, it would be great to get:
--Dodd/Frank -- repeal? CFPB repeal?
--repeal of carried interest tax break
--repeal of oil company tax breaks
We already have the Senators' votes on Elizabeth Warren's student loan refinancing bills. We might get the other candidates too.
We might also get reaction to paid leave.

thx

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >
To: David Binder <David@db-research.com >
Cc: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Sent: Thu, Apr 23, 2015 9:43 pm
Subject: Re: Stories for tomorrow 4.24

Thanks. We do have some ideas on this, will discus in am.

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 23, 2015, at 9:33 PM, David Binder < David@db-research.com > wrote:

> One thing I think we need to push, that was effective in our groups, is to remind people of the wonderful things that the Clinton Foundation has done around the globe. In the midst of all this incoming stuff, can we remind the world what has been accomplished? In addition to confronting the accusations, do we also have an opportunity to insert the message below that was an effective response in our vulnerability research:
>
> Hillary Clinton's opponents are trying to start a controversy where none exists. The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Republican opponents want to confuse voters about the Clinton Foundation and its donors because all this good work is proof that what Hillary cares about most is helping hard-working people and families build better lives.
>
> From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Thursday, April 23, 2015 8:56 PM
> To: John Podesta; Jim Margolis; Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; John Anzalone; David Binder; Robby Mook; Jake Sullivan; Dan Schwerin
> Subject: Fwd: Stories for tomorrow 4.24
>
> For our eight am call tomorrow

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: Rebecca Chalif <rchalif@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: April 23, 2015 at 8:53:05 PM EDT
To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Ferguson <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@gpg.com >, Josh Schwerin <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Lehrich <jlehrich@hillaryclinton.com >, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Stories for tomorrow 4.24

Stories for tomorrow:

- Washington Post - Ros, Hamburger - Giustra profile
- New York Times, weekender - Tony Rodham
- ABC Brian Ross- Giustra, Canadian
- Ruth Marcus- no quid pro quo, but this is a problem for the Clintons, typical, they blur lines all the time
- WSJ- Cheryl holding up FOIAs for political reasons (next week)
- Bloomberg- tbd story, has Giustra on the record (tbd time)
- Bloomberg- Laureate
- NY Daily News- did we tell the NY Times whether or not HRC was briefed

Story Lines:

1. Nervous Dems
2. Playing by their own rules, fatigue
3. WJC isolated/wealth, foundation as a continuing drag on the campaign

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/3/2008 1:28:30 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/3

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 3rd, 2008

Today: New Mexico, South Dakota and Montana primaries

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time
10:05am BUSH: Participates in a photo opportunity and speaks to the 2008 NCAA Men's Basketball Champions at the White House

1pm McCain: Finance Luncheon in Memphis, TN

5pm McCain: Finance Reception in New Orleans, LA

9pm McCain: Speech and Rally in Kenner, LA
- Tracking scheduled for this event

News Clips:

MCCAIN AIPAC SPEECH NEWS

McCain Sharpens His Foreign Policy Attacks on Obama (NYT 6/3/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
As the bitter Democratic presidential nomination battle was consumed by rancorous maneuverings, Senator John McCain honed his national security message before Jewish leaders on Monday, saying Senator Barack Obama's policies toward Iraq and Iran would create chaos in the Middle East and endanger the United States and Israel.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/03/us/politics/03mccain.html?_r=1&ref=politics&oref=slogin
Link to transcript: http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2008/06/mccains_speech_to_aipac.html
Link to video: http://thepage.time.com/video-mccain-at-aipac/
Link to Obama's response: http://thepage.time.com/obama-camp-response-to-mccains-aipac-speech/

Iran Emerges As Key Issue In Jewish Vote (WSJ 6/3/08)
By JAY SOLOMON and ELIZABETH HOLMES; Page A8
John McCain told Washington's most powerful pro-Israel lobby that if elected president he would drastically ramp up financial pressure on Iran's rulers by targeting the country's gasoline imports and imposing sanctions against its central bank.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121244038734339131.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

McCain's Attack On Obama Gets Standing Ovation At AIPAC (Huffington Post 6/2/08)
By Seth Colter Walls
Republican strategists who hope to cut into Democrats' usual advantage among Jewish voters have some cause for optimism this morning. Speaking on Monday to the annual policy conference of the most powerful Jewish lobbying organization in Washington, DC, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), Sen. John McCain received his most enthusiastic standing ovation at the close of his most pointed attack on Sen. Barack Obama.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/02/mccains-attack-on-obama-g_n_104668.html

Both McCain, Obama exaggerating Iran's nuclear program (McClatchy 6/2/08)
Jonathan S. Landay
The presumptive Republican nominee for president and the leading contender for the Democratic nomination are exaggerating what's known about Iran's nuclear program as they duel over how best to deal with Tehran.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/227/story/39423.html

McCain, Obama funds invest in firms working in Iran (USA TODAY 6/3/08)
By Matt Kelley and Ken Dilanian
John McCain and Barack Obama have urged investors to steer clear of Iran, but their family investments include mutual funds with shares in companies doing business in the oil-rich country, their financial disclosures show.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-06-02-investments_N.htm

McCain Mocks Idea Of Presidential Talks With Enemies, Despite Fact That Majority Of Americans Favor It (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
Speaking at the America Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) meeting today, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) derided the idea of direct talks with the Iranian leadership, as favored by Sen. Barack Obama (D-IL), mocking "the hope that we can talk sense into them":
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/poll-favor-negotiations/

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain talks social issues in Nashville visit (The Tennessean 6/3/08)
By BRAD SCHRADE and THEO EMERY
Republican presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain was tested as a social conservative in a campaign stop in Nashville Monday, while he also repeated his familiar criticism of Democratic candidate Barack Obama's fitness to be commander-in-chief.
http://www.tennessean.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080603/NEWS0201/806030346&referrer=FRONTPAGECAROUSEL

McCain to appear with country singer who compared same-sex marriage to incest (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
In October 2007, country music singer John Rich, one half of Big & Rich, sparked controversy when he called homosexuality "unnatural" and compared same-sex marriage to incest:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/mccain-to-appear-with-country-singer-who-compared-same-sex-marriage-to-incest/

After losing in primary, McCain targets Tennessee (The Tennessean 6/3/08)
By JENNIFER BROOKS
Rolling into Nashville, John McCain laid out his strategy for winning over the two-thirds of Tennessee Republicans who didn't vote for him during the presidential primary.
http://www.tennessean.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080603/NEWS0201/806030347&referrer=FRONTPAGECAROUSEL

Obama focuses on economy (Boston Globe blog 6/2/08)
Posted by Foon Rhee
In the state with the nation's highest unemployment rate, Democrat Barack Obama said this afternoon that his likely Republican foe John McCain just wants to talk about Iraq "instead of offering real solutions" to the nation's economic woes.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2008/06/obama_focuses_o.html

Old Issue in N.J. Race Could Be Preview (Washington Post 6/3/08)
By Paul Kane; A05
Sen. Lautenberg Criticized Over Age, Raising Similar November Scenario for McCain
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/02/AR2008060202985.html

McCain has 'senior moment' on the campaign trail: 'I will win in January.' (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
Sen. John McCain had one of his infamous "senior moments" while speaking at a campaign rally in Nashville today. "If we do everything right — and we can and we will — I will win in January," he said, "and I will be the next President of the United States."
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/mccains-has-senior-moment-on-the-campaign-trail-i-will-win-in-january/
Link to video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6Bqy2vrPGV8

McCain 'Nitpicks' His 'Verb Tense,' Claims Troops Are Now 'Drawing Down' To Pre-Surge Levels (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
...Apparently, however, McCain is now acknowledging that he did misspeak. At a campaign event today, McCain "nitpicked" his "verb tense" and said that U.S. forces are currently in the process of drawing down to pre-surge levels:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/mccain-pre-surge/
Link to video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NvOeC8WvlfU

Cheney calls suspending gas tax a 'false notion' (Washington Post 6/3/08)
By BEN FELLER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vice President Dick Cheney on Monday rejected a suspension of the federal gasoline tax as proposed by his party's presumptive presidential nominee, Sen. John McCain. Cheney said it would offer little help to consumers coping with gas prices around $4 a gallon.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/02/AR2008060202328.html

TRB: The Illusionist (New Republic 6/3/08*)
*Print date: 6/11/08
by Jonathan Chait
...Actually, McCain is following the pattern of not just Bush but every Republican president since Ronald Reagan. Phase One is to enact tax cuts and promise that they'll cause revenues to rise, or will cause revenues to fall (leading to spending cuts), or somehow both at once, so, either way, there's no possibility that it will lead to deficits. Phase Two is deficits. Phase Three is to blame the deficits on big-spending congressional fat cats and to issue increasingly strident threats to cut expenditures, without going so far as to identify actual programs to cut.
http://www.tnr.com/politics/story.html?id=f5a811b8-a7e3-4615-8677-7f349950a9c7

McCain to try to claim mantle of change (AP 6/3/08)
By Liz Sidoti
With voters sour on the status quo, Republican John McCain plans to spend the next five months arguing that he has a history of fighting to reform government and that Democrat Barack Obama talks of change with nothing to show for it.
http://apnews.myway.com/article/20080603/D9129L6G0.html

November sit-out threats worry GOP (Washington Times 6/3/08)
By S.A. Miller
Republican voters increasingly say they have lost faith in the party and might not vote this year, compounding headaches for party leaders struggling to avert a November massacre at the polls.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/jun/03/november-sit-out-threats-worry-gop/

She's Back (Portfolio Magazine 6/2/08)
Could ousted Hewlett-Packard C.E.O. Carly Fiorina end up on the McCain ticket?
http://www.portfolio.com/views/columns/washington/2008/06/02/Possible-McCain-Fiorina-Ticket

McCain Aide Sees Sexism, a View That Fits a Pattern (Washington Post blog 6/2/08)
By Garance Franke-Ruta
A top adviser to presumptive Republican nominee Sen. John McCain said that she believes Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has faced sexism on the campaign trail.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/02/top_mccain_advisers_says_sexis.html

McCain Quietly Spending on TV in Swing States (Washington Post blog 6/2/08)
By Matthew Mosk
Republican John McCain has quietly spent about $1.5 million on television ads in key swing states over the past 90 days, trying to get an early edge with voters while his Democratic rival remains bogged down by a protracted primary battle.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/02/mccain_quietly_spending_on_tv.html

Exclusive: McCain Almost Took "One-Term" Pledge (Atlantic Online 6/2/08)
By Marc Ambinder
When he formally announced his presidential candidacy last year, Sen. John McCain was inches away from making an unprecedented pledge: if he were elected, he would serve only one term as president.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/06/exclusive_mccain_almost_took_o.php

McCain's Top Strategist Lobbied For Iran-Linked Firm (Huffington Post 6/2/08)
By Sam Stein
In the summer of 2005, John McCain's chief strategist Charlie Black, working for his firm Black, Kelly, Scruggs & Healey, was paid $60,000 to lobby the U.S. government on behalf of the Chinese oil conglomerate CNOOC. At the time, CNOOC was mounting an aggressive bid to buy Unocal, a California-based oil giant, and Black was tasked with churning up congressional support. But the bid ultimately fell through, in part because of objections over the China oil industry's ties to Iran, a country in which it had already invested tens of millions of dollars.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/02/senior-mccain-aide-had-cl_n_104696.html

On the budget, Bush and McCain are eerily similar (Carpetbagger Report 6/2/08)
The Up-Until-Recently John McCain took a fairly reasonable line on the federal budget. In 2001, this McCain saw

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's tax-cut plan as reckless and irresponsible, and voted accordingly. In 2003, the same McCain went in the same direction.
http://www.thecarpetbaggerreport.com/archives/15741.html

McCain's Timetable for Choosing a Running Mate (US News & World Report 6/2/08)
Insiders in John McCain's Republican presidential campaign expect him to make his choice of a vice presidential running mate during the first half of August, about two or three weeks before the start of the GOP nominating convention in Minnesota.
http://www.usnews.com/articles/news/campaign-2008/2008/06/02/mccains-timetable-for-choosing-a-running-mate.html

John McCain's reign of error (Philadephia Inquirer blog 6/2/08)
It's lucky for John McCain that most politically-aware Americans remain riveted by the Hillary Clinton sideshow (more on that later), because he continues to make inexplicable factual errors without any willingness to acknowledge them. If more people were paying attention, they might well wonder whether this guy is as sharp about foreign policy as he purports to be.
http://www.philly.com/philly/blogs/americandebate/19455269.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Calling Dr. Doom (NYT 6/3/08)
By DAVID BROOKS
It took Christopher Columbus about 70 days to get to the New World — a bit less than half as long as it took us to get through the 2008 primary calendar. But by Tuesday night, we'll have reached our destination, and people in the Obama and McCain camps are feeling good about themselves.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/03/opinion/03brooks.html?_r=1&hp&oref=slogin

Obama's judgment on Iraq falls short (LA Times 6/3/08)
By Jonah Goldberg
There is one candidate who's been consistently right about the war, and it isn't the Democrat.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-goldberg3-2008jun03,0,4829049.column

McCain plan bad for wounded GIs (Arizona Daily Star 6/3/08)
By John Gage
With 1.6 million American heroes returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, never has it been more urgent to strengthen the veterans' health-care system.
http://www.azstarnet.com/allheadlines/241845

Is There Life After Earmarks? (Washington Post 6/3/08)
By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum; A13
It looks as though 2008 will be a year of few earmarks.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/02/AR2008060202625_pf.html

McCain and Obama's Excellent Adventure (NYT blog 6/2/08)
By Dan Schnur
There was a time when John McCain and Barack Obama could have gone to Iraq together. There was a time, perhaps back in 2000, when candidate McCain could have made the offer in good faith. There was a time, perhaps back in 2004, when keynote speaker Obama could have accepted. But those two men no longer exist. Here in the present, neither candidate can afford the risk of high-mindedness or statesmanship when the stakes are so high.
http://campaignstops.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/02/mccain-and-obamas-excellent-adventure/?ref=opinion

BUSH NEWS

Bush gives Medal of Honor to soldier killed in Iraq (AP 6/2/08)
President Bush on Monday presented the nation's highest military award to a 19-year-old soldier who died saving the lives of four comrades in Iraq by jumping on a grenade tossed into their military vehicle. The honored soldier, Army Pfc. Ross McGinnis, "gave all for his country," the president said somberly.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jgmq1XAfrDpfeFyTbsiAeW7UmofgD91267880

Bush: 43M families hurt if tax cuts expire (CNNMoney 6/2/08)
By Jeanne Sahadi
President also says small business owners will take a hit if lawmakers fail to extend his 2001-03 tax relief. But critics say that's not necessarily the case.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://money.cnn.com/2008/06/02/news/economy/bush_taxcuts_anniversary/?postversion=2008060218

Cheney Offers False Excuse For His 'So?' Comment: I Meant, 'What's The Question, Martha?' (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
In an interview on the fifth anniversary of the Iraq invasion, Vice President Cheney told ABC's Martha Raddatz that he doesn't care about the American public's views on the war:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/cheney-so-revise/

Cheney forced to apologize for incest joke about West Virginians (ThinkProgress 6/2/08)
At the National Press Club today, Vice President Dick Cheney raised the ire of West Virginia lawmakers when he made an offhand incest joke about the state, saying he "had Cheneys on both sides of the family and we don't even live in West Virginia." West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, Sens. Robert Byrd (D) and Jay Rockefeller (D) and Reps. Shelley Moore Capito (R) and Nick Rahall (D) all condemned Cheney's attempt at humor. This evening, Cheney's spokesperson, Lea Anne McBride, put out a statement apologizing for the Vice President:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/02/cheney-forced-to-apologize-for-incest-joke-about-west-virginians/

OTHER TOP NEWS

Obama Is Poised To Clinch Victory (Washington Post 6/3/08)
By Shailagh Murray and Anne E. Kornblut; A01
On the eve of the final two primaries of a five-month marathon, Sen. Barack Obama stood poised to wrap up the Democratic presidential nomination, while Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton weighed whether to stay in the race in hopes of delaying what appears to be an inevitable outcome.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/02/AR2008060203095.html
See also: http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1811254,00.html

Kennedy Brain Surgery 'Successful' (AP 6/2/08)
By AP/MIKE BAKER
Sen. Edward M. Kennedy is out of surgery at Duke University, and his doctor says a procedure to treat his cancerous brain tumor "was successful and accomplished our goals."
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1811154,00.html

Byrd admitted to hospital (West Virginia Gazette 6/2/08)
U.S. Sen. Robert C. Byrd was admitted to a hospital Monday evening because of a high temperature, his spokesman said.
http://wvgazette.com/latest/200806020650

Pakistan Blast Was Suicide Attack (NYT 6/4/08)
By JANE PERLEZ and PIR ZUBAIR SHAH
ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The car-bomb attack on the Danish Embassy that killed eight people appears to have been carried out by a suicide bomber, Pakistan's Interior Ministry said Tuesday.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/04/world/asia/04pakistan.html?hp

U.N. chief: Increase food to avert crisis (CNN 6/3/08)
* 3-day Rome summit aims to avert widening hunger and civil unrest worldwide
* Ban urges nations to ease farming taxes, export bans and import tariffs
* Ban to request U.S. and other nations phase out subsidies for biofuels
* Food prices have been skyrocketing due to high oil prices, extreme weather http://www.cnn.com/2008/WORLD/europe/06/03/un.food.prices/

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director, Tracking/Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	7/5/2015 12:58:03 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 7.5.15
Attachments:	7.5.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips
July 5, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 5

Hillary Clinton Reassures Gay Youth in Viral Facebook Photo // NYT // Liam Stack – July 4, 2015 5
Hillary Clinton Accuses China of Hacking U.S. Computers // Reuters – July 4, 2015..... 6

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 8

Dan Merica (7/4/15, 6:43 AM) - Many ppl in Gorham seem genuinely impressed HRC is traveling this far north for the 4th in NH, say they haven't had many 2016 visits..... 8
Bill Clinton (7/4/15, 9:24 AM) - 239 years later, the United States of America is still in the future business. Happy Independence Day everyone! #4thofjuly..... 8

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 8

Protesters Challenge Hillary Clinton During Parade in New Hampshire // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015..... 8
Clinton, Bush struggle to shed dynasty labels during holiday parades in N.H. // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Ed O'Keefe – July 4, 2015..... 9
Clinton campaign gives new meaning to the term 'rope line' at New Hampshire parade // WaPo // Vanessa Williams – July 4, 2015..... 12
Bernie and Hillary's holiday weekend // Politico // Annie Karni & Jonathan Topaz – July 4, 2015 13
Clinton goes after a Bush in New Hampshire // CNN // Dan Merica – July 4, 2015..... 15
Clinton campaign corrals media // Dan Merica // CNN – July 4, 2015..... 17
Who Clinton was looking for in New Hampshire // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015..... 19
Clinton has strong words on Chinese hacking // CNN // Dan Merica & Mariano Castillo – July 5, 2015 20
Hillary Clinton Reporters Kept Behind Moving Rope Line At New Hampshire Parade // ABC News // Liz Kreutz – July 4, 2015..... 21
Clinton defends progressive record as campaigns hit Independence Day // The Guardian // Jana Kasperkevic – July 4, 2015..... 22
Hillary Clinton Says She Will Be Better Friend than Obama to Israel // Jewish Press // Tzvi Ben-Gedaly ahu – July 4, 2015..... 24
From Clinton, a multi-generational message in N.H. // Boston Globe // Monica Disare – July 4, 2015 25
Hillary Clinton Comments On Viral 'Humans of New York' Photo // TIME // Dan Stewart – July 4, 2015 27
Hillary Clinton Has The Top Comment On This Heartbreaking "Humans Of New York" Photo // Buzzfeed // David Mack – July 4, 2015..... 28
Hillary Clinton accuses China of 'stealing US secrets' // BBC – July 4, 2015..... 28
Union chief defends Hillary amid Bernie Sanders uprising // New York Post // Geoff Earle – July 4, 2015 29
Clinton, Chafee celebrate Fourth of July in the Granite State // WMUR9 // Kristen Carosa – July 4, 2015 30
Hillary Clinton tells supporters in Virginia that 'love triumphed' in gay marriage // Sentinel Republic // Alan Binder – July 4, 2015..... 30
Hillary Clinton shrugs off heckler while GOP candidates meet voters in New Hampshire, Iowa for Fourth of July campaigning // NY Daily News // Dennis Slattery – July 4, 2015..... 32
Clinton hears cheers and jeers // New Hampshire Union Leader // John Koziol – July 4, 2015. 33

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 34

DECLARED..... 34
O'MALLEY..... 34
Sanders, O'Malley race to be the Clinton alternative // WaPo // John Wagner – July 4, 2015... 34
Martin O'Malley finishes three-day tour in Clinton, Iowa // WQAD8 // Caroline Reinwald – July 4, 2015 37
SANDERS..... 38
Bernie Sanders Outpaces Martin O'Malley as Hillary Clinton Alternative // WSJ // Peter Nicholas and Colleen Mccain Nelson - July 5, 2015..... 38
Sanders snags key endorsement in New Hampshire // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015.... 40
Bernie Sanders Gains on Clinton in Early-State Polls, Hits Iowa Patriotic Parade Circuit // Slate // Beth Ethier – July 4, 2015..... 41
Sanders encouraged by Iowa crowds, rising polls // Des Moines Register // Kevin Hardy – July 4, 2015 42
'Feel the Bern': Activists spearhead Bernie Sanders social push // MSNBC // Eric Levitz – July 4, 2015 44
Our Bernie Sanders moment: This July 4, remember only true independence and revolution ever brings change // Salon // Patrick L. Smith – July 4, 2015..... 47
The Times Doctrine on Bernie Sanders // HuffPo // David Bromwich – July 4, 2015..... 51

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders Sets A 2016 Record By Drawing A Huge Overflow Crowd In Iowa // Politicus // Jason Easley – July 4, 2015 54
How Bernie Sanders threatens to derail Hillary 's coronation // NY Post // Michael Goodwin – July 5, 2015 55
WEBB 58
Jim Webb Announces Presidential Bid; Only Democratic Candidate Opposed To Marriage Equality // On Top // Carlos Santoscoy – July 4, 2015 58
CHAFEE 59
Chafee's campaign leaves some NH Democrats a bit puzzled // Miami Herald // Michelle R. Smith – July 4, 2015 59
UNDECLARED 60
BIDEN 60
The Joe Biden (mini-)boom // Pittsburgh Post-Gazette // David M. Shribman – July 5 , 2015.. 60

GOP 63

DECLARED 63
BUSH 63
Indignant Jeb Bush Says He Takes Donald Trump's Remarks Personally // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 4, 2015 63
Bush: 'Absolutely ' offended by Trump's comments on Mexicans // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – July 4, 2015 64
Jeb Bush: Trump comments meant 'to draw attention' // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 5, 2015 65
Jeb Bush's Giving Totaled 1.5 % of Income From 2007 to 2013 // The Bell Jar – July 5, 2015..... 67
Jeb Bush, Married To Mexican, Denounces Donald Trump, Takes 'Ugly' Remarks About Immigrants Personally // International Business Times // Elizabeth Whitman – July 4, 2015..... 68
Polls Show Jeb Bush In Good Standing To Win The GOP Nomination // Inquisitr – July 5, 2015 69
RUBIO 70
Trump fires back at Rubio after ICE says suspected killer was deported 5 times // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 4, 2015 70
Trump hammers Rubio: 'Zero credibility,' 'outright lies' to sell amnesty // Breitbart News // Matthew Boyle – July 4, 2015 71
PAUL 74
Don't dismiss Rand Paul's tax plan // Dallas News // Scott Burns – July 4, 2015 74
CRUZ 76
Ted Cruz: 'Asinine' to pull reruns of 'The Dukes of Hazzard' // WaPo // Katie Zezima – July 4, 2015 76
GOP presidential candidate Cruz wasn't always 'Ted' // Star-Telegram // Maria Recio & Anna M. Tinsley – July 4, 2015 77
Cruz defends Trump: 'Washington cartel' doesn't want illegal immigration debate // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 4, 2015 79
Ted Cruz Calls For US To Quit UN Human Rights Council After Vote Condemning Israel // International Business Times // Mark Hanrahan – July 4, 2015 80
Ted Cruz Is Right to Call for Retention Elections for the Supreme Court // National Review //Andrrew C. McCarthy – July 4, 2015 80
CHRISTIE 83
Christie slams Obama on Iran, hedges on breaking nuclear deal // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 4, 2015 83
Christie Won't Pledge to Undo Iran Deal // TIME // Zeke J Miller – July 4, 2015..... 84
Christie makes nice on the trail in New Hampshire // USA Today // Bob Jordan – July 4, 2015 85
Chris Christie: King of the 2016 long shots // Burlington County Times // Jonathan Bernstein – July 4, 2015 87
Green Pressure Applied Against Christie on Cap and Trade as He Enters Presidential Fray // The Blaze // Kevin Mooney – July 4, 2015 88
Christie campaign surges ahead on road to failure // Las Vegas Sun // Jonathan Bernstein – July 4, 2015 91
In N.H., Christie says he's 'Telling It Like It Is' // Boston Globe // James Pindell – July 4, 2015 92
Here's Chris Christie's big problem in a nutshell // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 4, 2015 94
Christie enters the race: Swinging for the fence // North Jersey // Matthew Hale – July 4, 2015 96
For Chris Christie, Freedom Means Nothing Left to Lose as New Jersey Voters Want Him to Resign // Politicus // Sarah Jones – July 4, 2015 98
PERRY 99
New Hampshire Republicans Not Ruling Perry Out // Texas Tribune // Abby Livingston – July 4, 2015 99
Report: Perry Emerges as Trump's Biggest Critic Among GOP Rivals // Newsmax // Todd Beamon – July 4, 2015 101
GRAHAM 102
Republican presidential candidate Lindsey Graham has a stark warning for the US // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 4, 2015 102
Graham sees 'perfect storm' from terror // Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – July 4, 2015..... 103
HUCKABEE 104
Mike Huckabee Vows To Prosecute Attacks Against Gay Marriage Opponents As Hate Crimes // On Top - July 4, 2015 104
FIORINA 105
Lt. governor offers support to Fiorina // Journal Gazette // Niki Kelly & Brian Francisco – July 5 , 2015 105
JINDAL 106
Bobby Jindal: The son of immigrants and new champion of the tough-on-immigrants crowd // WaPo // Janell Ross –

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 4, 2015..... 106
Bobby Jindal expresses optimism about his future in Iowa // Des Moines Register // Maya Kliger – July 4, 2015..... 110
Jindal poses with gun at campaign stop, met with online mockery // Statesman // July 4, 2015 111
Bobby Jindal's former media director brands him 'anti-gay' and 'destructive' // Pink News // Nick Duffy – July 4, 2015..... 111
Bobby Jindal Sued Over Anti-Gay Executive Order // Edge Media Network // John Reilly – July 4, 2015 112
Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal governs v ia cellphone // The Advocate // Mark Ballard & Marsha Shuler – July 4, 2015..... 113
TRUMP..... 116
Mitt Romney Criticizes Donald Trump for Comments on Mexican Immigrants // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015..... 116
NASCAR is the latest brand to dump Donald Trump // AP // July 4, 2015..... 116
GOP worries about Donald Trump fallout // CNN // Chris Moody – July 4, 2015..... 117
Trump stands by statements on Mexican illegal immigrants, surprised by backlash // Fox News – July 4, 2015..... 119
Trump comes up top in 'poll of polls' of Republican voters - despite growing backlash over his anti-immigrant comments // Daily Mail // Christopher Brennan – July 4, 2015..... 120
Republicans cast into turmoil as Donald Trump rides the populist surge // Telegraph // Philip Sherwell – July 5, 2015..... 121
Donald Trump Immigration: Panama Leaves Miss Universe Pageant, Protesting Offensive Comments About Mexicans // International Business Times // Elizabeth Whitman – July 4, 2015..... 124
Fox Panelist Rips Trump: 'Negotiate with Mexico? He Can't Ev en Negotiate with Macy's!' // Mediaite // Josh Feldman - July 4, 2015..... 124
Donald Trump's contracts with the city protected under the First Amendment, civil liberties lawyer says // New York Daily News // Erin Durkin & Celeste Katz – July 4, 2015..... 125
Trump Say s Comments on Mexicans Hav e Hurt Business // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – July 4, 2015 127
UNDECLARED..... 127
WALKER..... 127
Walker to drop open records restrictions in Wisconsin // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 4, 2015 127
To Celebrate the Fourth, Scott Walker's GOP Declares Secrecy // HuffPo // Mary Bottari – July 4, 2015 128
Scott Walker, Republican leaders remove open records restrictions from Wisconsin budget // The Capital Times // Jason Joyce – July 4, 2015..... 132
Wisconsin Open Records Law: Gov Scott Walker, Likely 2016 Candidate, Backtracks On Attempts To Limit Public Access To Records // International Business Times - Clark Mindock – July 4, 2015..... 133
Democrats underestimate Scott Walker at their own peril // Burlington County Times // Gene Lyons – July 5, 2015..... 134
Politics of immigration take root in Walker's hometown // Journal Sentinel // Mary Spicuzza – July 5, 2015..... 136
KASICH..... 142
For Ohio Gov. John Kasich, "Win with Jeb and John" has a nice -- even plausible – ring // Cleveland // Thomas Suddes – July 5, 201 5..... 142
Ohio education officials: Kasich vetoes likely mean less funding for some school districts // Hudson Hub Times // Marc Kovac – July 5, 2015..... 143
OTHER..... 145
New Hampshire Voters Bemoan Size of G.O.P. Field // NYT // Patrick Healy & Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015..... 145
Sleepover at Mitt's: Christie, Rubio bunk with Romney at N.H. retreat // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015..... 148
ObamaCare win turns up heat on GOP presidential field // The Hill // Peter Sullivan and Sarah Ferris – July 4, 2015..... 149
The GOP's pathetic crybaby agenda: Trump, Scalia and the whiny, paranoid new face of the right // Salon // Bill Curry – July 5 , 2015..... 152

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 158

Facing a Selfie Election, Presidential Hopefuls Grin and Bear It // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters and & Ashley Parker – July 4, 2015..... 159
Voters are shifting to Democrats, flashing a warning for Republicans // WaPo // Dan Balz - July 4, 2015 161
Presidential candidates campaign in July Fourth parades // AP // Kathleen Ronay ne – July 4, 2015 164
Presidential hopefuls discuss patriotism on July 4th // Des Moines Register – July 4, 201 5.... 166
Candidates do holiday march through New Hampshire // USA Today // David Jackson – July 4, 2015 171

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 172

Wirthman: Hillary Clinton's ev eryday feminism // The Denver Post // Lisa Wirthman – July 4, 2015 172
Editorial: Hillary Clinton's emails erode transparency claim // The Des Moines Register – July 4, 2015 175
Fair pay for hard work is not just happy talk // The Columbus Dispatch // E.J. Dionne – July 5, 2015 175
Hillary Clinton takes the knocks but keeps on trucking // Sydney Morning Herald // Annabel Crabb – July 4, 2015..... 177
Emotional decisions and Hillary Clinton's presidential bid (Your letters) // Syracuse // Max Malikow – July 4, 2015..... 178

TOP NEWS..... 179

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DOMESTIC..... 179
Gay rights activists in Philadelphia mark landmark march from 1965 // WaPo // Natalie Pompilio – July 4, 2015 179
Fatal shooting in San Francisco ignites immigration policy debate // LA Times // Louis Sahagun and Emily Alpert Reyes – July 4, 2015 180
INTERNATIONAL..... 183
Day of Reckoning for Greek Banks and Eurozone's Central Banker // NYT // Jacl Ewing & James Kanter – July 5, 2015 183
Spurned by the West, Georgians look to Russia despite past quarrels // WaPo // Michael Birnbaum – July 4, 2015 186
Iran Nuclear Talks Appear to Advance as Deadline Nears // WSJ // Jay Solomon & Laurence Norman – July 4, 2015 188

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Reassures Gay Youth in Viral Facebook Photo // NYT // Liam Stack – July 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton offered moral support to a distraught gay youth who shared his anxiety about his future in a viral photograph posted on the Humans of New York Facebook page, telling him on Friday that it would be "amazing."

The boy, who is not named in the photo, is shown frowning and holding his head in his hands while sitting on a stoop.

"I'm homosexual, and I'm afraid about what my future will be and that people won't like me," he said, according to the caption.

Two hours after the picture was posted, Mrs. Clinton typed out some words of encouragement and signed her comment "H," indicating that it was written by her and not by a member of her staff.

"Prediction from a grown-up: Your future is going to be amazing," she wrote. "You will surprise yourself with what you're capable of and the incredible things you go on to do. Find the people who love and believe in you — there will be lots of them."

Kristina Schake, Clinton's deputy communications director, took a screen shot of the comment and shared it on Twitter shortly after it was written.

Humans of New York is no stranger to viral content. Its posts, often showcasing the quirkier side of life in New York City, have been viewed millions of times and have inspired imitators in cities and countries around the world, including Syria; Mumbai, India; and Tehran.

But the nature of Friday's post — a young gay person who appeared little more than a child, and Mrs. Clinton's comforting response — gave it a lightning-in-a-bottle charge that helped it spread rapidly. Within 24 hours, it had been liked by more than 530,000 people and shared over 47,000 times, with more than 33,000 people scrolling through the comment thread to like Mrs. Clinton's response.

Mrs. Clinton has made support for gay people one of the cornerstones of her presidential campaign. Two days before the Supreme Court ruled last month that same-sex marriage is a constitutional right, her campaign released a video that featured a montage of same-sex weddings.

"Some have suggested that gay rights and human rights are separate and distinct, but in fact, they are one and the same," she said in the video. "Being L.G.B.T. does not make you less human."

Gay rights organizations scored a major victory with the Supreme Court decision on same-sex marriage, but significant challenges remain, they say. Discrimination is still an issue, and many young people face isolation and hostility from their families and communities.

According to the Trevor Project, a suicide prevention organization, lesbian, gay and bisexual young people are four times more likely than their straight peers to attempt suicide, and roughly a quarter of transgender youth report having made at least one suicide attempt.

Hillary Clinton Accuses China of Hacking U.S. Computers // Reuters – July 4, 2015

GLEN, N.H. (Reuters) - U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton accused China on Saturday of stealing commercial secrets and "huge amounts of government information," and of trying to "hack into everything that doesn't move in America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's language on China appeared to be far stronger than that usually used by President Barack Obama's Democratic administration.

Speaking at a campaign event in New Hampshire, Clinton said she wanted to see China's peaceful rise.

"But we also have to be fully vigilant, China's military is growing very quickly, they're establishing military installations that again threaten countries we have treaties with, like the Philippines because they are building on contested property," said Clinton, who was secretary of state from 2009 to 2013.

"They're also trying to hack into everything that doesn't move in America. Stealing commercial secrets ... from defense contractors, stealing huge amounts of government information, all looking for an advantage," she said.

Clinton is the front-runner to win the Democratic nomination for the November 2016 presidential election.

Asked about the remarks, a White House official declined to comment.

In the most recent case involving suspicions of Chinese hacking, Obama administration officials have said China is the top suspect in the massive hacking of a U.S. government agency that compromised the personnel records of at least 4.2 million current and former government workers.

China has denied hacking into the computers of the U.S. Office of Personnel Management.

IRAN AND PUTIN

Clinton also addressed the current talks over Iran's nuclear program and had strong words for Tehran.

She said that even if a deal is reached with Iran, Tehran's "aggressiveness will not end" and it will remain a principal state sponsor of terrorism.

Clinton said she hoped that "a strong verifiable deal" would be reached at talks in Vienna between world powers and Iran.

But she added that even with an agreement, "They will continue to be the principal state sponsor of terrorism. They will continue to destabilize governments in the region and beyond. They will continue to use their proxies like Hezbollah. And they will continue to be an existential threat to Israel."

The United States, other world powers and Iran have set a July 7 deadline to reach a deal to curb Tehran's nuclear program in exchange for a lifting of sanctions that have crippled Iran's economy.

At the campaign event, Clinton also said the United States has to be "much smarter" about how it deals with Russian President Vladimir Putin's territorial ambitions.

She said Putin's moves to expand Russia's boundaries, such as the annexation of Crimea last year, posed a challenge for the United States but she touted her experience as America's chief diplomat.

She noted that because of NATO members' agreement to protect fellow members, had Ukraine been a member of NATO when Crimea was annexed, "that would have caused us to have to respond."

She added on Putin: "I've dealt with him. I know him. He's not an easy man ... But I don't think there is any substitute other than constant engagement."

SOCIAL MEDIA

Dan Merica (7/4/15, 6:43 AM) - Many ppl in Gorham seem genuinely impressed HRC is traveling this far north for the 4th in NH, say they haven't had many 2016 visits.

Bill Clinton (7/4/15, 9:24 AM) - 239 years later, the United States of America is still in the future business. Happy Independence Day everyone! #4thofjuly

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Protesters Challenge Hillary Clinton During Parade in New Hampshire // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton made her first visit of the campaign to northern New Hampshire on Saturday, marching in a Fourth of July parade alongside dozens of her supporters and, for the first time since she became a candidate, being met by a handful of persistent protesters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton walked in front of a large sign with her campaign logo at the parade in Gorham, N.H., and a group of supporters chanted her name as they walked along. People along the sidewalks called out “Hillary!” to her on Main Street, urging her to shake their hands.

But there was other chanting as well, from a tall man on the sidelines who carried a sign that read “Benghazi” with red paint stains on it.

“Carpetbagger!” he called out repeatedly, a charge leveled against Mrs. Clinton when she first ran for the Senate in 2000 (and not used much since). He was joined by a half-dozen other protesters who followed her along the route in the working-class area, trying repeatedly to get her attention.

“Where were you at 3 o’clock in the morning when the phone rang!” the man yelled. “Tell us about when you were poor!”

A handful of Clinton volunteers eventually drifted toward the sidewalks, chanting her name in an effort to drown the protesters out. Mrs. Clinton never acknowledged them, as she took pictures with a group of beauty queens and stopped to talk to a wounded Marine, injured in Iraq, who was in a wheelchair and could not communicate.

“He can understand everything you say to him,” Nellie Bagli said of her 40-year-old son, Jose, who was seriously wounded in March 2006.

“I can see that in his eyes,” Mrs. Clinton said.

Ms. Bagli told reporters she lives in Florida and that the cooler climate of New Hampshire benefits her son’s health. She is unsure of whether she will support Mrs. Clinton, she said, adding that after what her son had gone through, “it’s hard to believe” what politicians say.

Mrs. Clinton’s aides, in what they said was an effort to allow voters to reach her freely without her being surrounded by a mass of reporters, kept the dozen journalists covering the event behind a length of rope carried by two campaign aides.

When the parade ended, Mrs. Clinton held up her hands in a shrug when asked whether the protesters were jarring.

At another point, she was asked the same question and said, “I’m just having a good time meeting everybody.”

Aides said they selected the location for Mrs. Clinton’s Fourth of July event because she had not visited the region yet during the campaign, and other parades were in parts of the state she had traveled to already.

Later, Mrs. Clinton made an unscheduled stop to the Northland Dairy Bar in nearby Berlin, which was fairly empty. She chatted with the patrons there, before heading toward a corner table. There were slices of pie waiting for her.

“O.K., you guys are not gonna film me eating,” Mrs. Clinton said, laughing, as she urged the reporters who were there to move on. “This is not newsworthy. Take a picture of me standing here in front of these great pies by myself. It’s a headline! It’s a headline.”

Clinton, Bush struggle to shed dynasty labels during holiday parades in N.H. // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Ed O’Keefe – July 4, 2015

GORHAM, N.H. — For Hillary Rodham Clinton, walking in Saturday’s Fourth of July parade in this mountain hamlet was supposed to showcase the sometimes-stiff candidate as accessible and in touch with the people — a champion for everyday Americans, as the Democratic presidential front-runner likes to put it.

But the image Clinton projected during this rare glimpse as a candidate away from the podium seemed to reinforce how very different she is from the voters she was courting. She marched briskly down Main Street in a cocoon of campaign staffers and Secret Service agents. Hecklers followed her, shouting epithets. The former secretary of state enthusiastically shook hands and exchanged pleasantries with supporters — “Good to see you!” “I need your vote.” “Let’s make it happen!” — but only occasionally slowed down to chat, such as when aides directed her to a Marine Corps veteran in a wheelchair.

The media, meanwhile, was kept at a distance and mostly out of earshot of Clinton’s interactions in this rural, working-class community. A few minutes into the parade, her aides unfurled a long rope across the street to physically block journalists from getting too close to the candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It feels like a coronation, doesn’t it?” one man shouted. “God bless the queen!”

Clinton, smiling in a red-white-and-blue pantsuit and navy Salvatore Ferragamo patent leather flats, pretended not to hear him and remarked, “I actually love parades.”

At another parade at the other end of New Hampshire, another dynasty candidate also tried to shake impressions of being aloof.

Jeb Bush has been laboring to rid himself of the burdens of his family’s political legacy. But as the former Republican governor of Florida walked the parade route in Amherst, it became clear how difficult it would be for voters to distinguish him from his father and brother, both former presidents.

A few people accidentally called him George. One man wore a red T-shirt that said, “Bush Hat Trick,” a reference to when hockey players score three goals in a game. “Where did you get that shirt?” Bush asked begrudgingly. When an older woman said, “I love your mother,” the candidate replied, “I love her, too!”

Others had different opinions.

“No more Bushes!” one woman shouted at the candidate. “No more Bushes!”

Marching in Independence Day parades is a time-honored political tradition in New Hampshire, which hosts the first presidential primary. With seven months until the primary, candidates fanned out across the state Saturday to walk with their supporters carrying signs, balloons or other insignia — and to win over new fans.

In Wolfeboro, a picturesque tourist town on Lake Winnipesaukee, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) marched in the morning parade. Both candidates, as well as their families, had spent the night at the home of Wolfeboro’s most famous part-time resident: Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican nominee. The three politicians were spotted getting ice cream together at Bailey’s Bubble on Friday night.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry (R), Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee (D) also marched in the Amherst parade with Bush. Other candidates had contingents if they, themselves, couldn’t participate. One of the biggest draws there was a blue school bus, powered by vegetable oil, to promote the candidacy of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). Riding aboard the bus were two chickens, Clucky and Chucky.

Bush’s group was relatively subdued. Sporting chinos and a button-down shirt, Bush walked with about 30 campaign volunteers. Their big attraction was a 1961 silver Corvette with red leather interior, driven by state Sen. Russell Prescott.

“I’m carrying water for Jeb Bush,” Prescott said. He literally was: A case of bottled water was on the floor of the car next to him. As the parade began, an EMT worker instructed Bush: “Keep everybody hydrated. I don’t want to have to work today.”

Bush was joined by son George P., the Texas land commissioner, and Bush’s daughter, Noelle, who rarely appears publicly with her father. Unlike her more gregarious brother, who kept near his father, she trailed behind, blending in with the crowd and handing out stickers.

Bush hustled on the parade route, darting back and forth across the street, seemingly determined to shake every hand on both sides. It was an impossible feat, of course, and quickly slowed down the parade. At one point, a parade marshal, Paula Schmida, asked Bush adviser Rich Killion to get the candidate to pick up the pace.

Like Clinton, Bush was confronted by aggressive activists, some of whom wore orange T-shirts and sunglasses furnished by NextGen Climate, the group funded by billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer.

One young woman handed Bush a small cup with a slushy treat, telling him that it represented a warming planet.

“Oh, yeah? I already got one of those,” Bush told her.

“Our second one today,” Killion said as he took the treat from Bush and nudged the woman back.

When another woman haggled over climate change with Bush, the candidate, clearly aggravated, told her to “chill out!”

In Gorham, Clinton was joined on the parade route by a few dozen supporters. They carried a big banner and signs with her H campaign logo and chanted “H-I-L-L-A-R-Y!”

But one man followed closely at Clinton’s side with a very different message: “Benghazi,” read the homemade sign,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

with what looked like red blood dripping from the letters. He screamed at her about the Sept. 11, 2012, terrorist attacks in Libya and her book-tour gaffe last year that she and former president Bill Clinton had been "dead broke."

"Where were you when the phone rang at 3 a.m. on September 11th?" he asked. "Tell us about when you were poor," he demanded.

Across the way, a man on a bicycle shouted at Clinton: "What about Benghazi? What about the e-mails? You're a liar!" One Clinton aide, noticing the man's spandex biking outfit, shot back, "Nice shorts."

Clinton did not seem fazed by the hecklers. Asked at the end how the parade went, she said, "It was fabulous!"

But by this point, the Clinton campaign's rope line barring journalists had lighted up Twitter. Within about an hour, Jennifer Horn, chairman of the New Hampshire Republican State Committee, was out with a statement calling the rope "a sad joke" and condemning Clinton for "arrogant and shameful behavior."

"Hillary Clinton continues to demonstrate her obvious contempt and disdain for the Granite State's style of grass-roots campaigning," Horn said.

At day's end, Clinton visited a diner-style restaurant in nearby Berlin to mix and mingle. "How are the fries?" she asked a woman and her two children, sliding into the booth to join them for a moment.

Clinton then headed to an empty table, where two slices of pie (blueberry and raspberry) awaited her. Reporters followed.

"Okay, you guys are not gonna film me eating," she said, sitting down with aides Huma Abedin, Kristina Schake and Mike Vlacich.

When one reporter asked her about Donald Trump, Clinton demurred.

"You know," she said, "I'm gonna sit down and have some pie."

Clinton campaign gives new meaning to the term 'rope line' at New Hampshire parade // WaPo // Vanessa Williams – July 4, 2015

It wasn't like A-list celebrities or pro ballers were being hounded by the paparazzi at Saturday's Independence Day parade in Gorham, N.H. It was just Hillary Clinton and the workaday press corps that regularly follows her around.

So why did the Democratic presidential candidate's campaign see fit to put up a rope line to keep reporters and photographers at bay while Clinton shook hands and greeted voters during an afternoon procession up Main Street?

Our colleague Philip Rucker reports that initially the press had been able to get close to Clinton and observe and listen as she chatted up voters. Then he said campaign aides unfurled a rope that stretched across the street, blocking access to the candidate. Rucker said they were kept 10 to 15 feet away from Clinton and could no longer hear what she was saying to people.

But the press could clearly hear what some people were saying to her. A group of protesters followed her along the route shouting such sentiments as "What about Benghazi?" and "Show us your e-mails!"

The conservative news site Twitchy was clearly enjoying the spectacle.

The New Hampshire Republican Party denounced "the use of a rope line to protect the arrogant Democrat frontrunner on a public street."

"Hillary Clinton continues to demonstrate her obvious contempt and disdain for the Granite State's style of grassroots campaigning," Jennifer Horn, chairman of the state GOP, said in a statement. "The use of a rope line at a New Hampshire parade is a sad joke and insults the traditions of our First-in-the-Nation primary."

Clinton herself was quite pleased with the event:

Liz Kreutz @ABCLiz
Hillary Clinton to @PhilipRucker on how she enjoyed the parade: "It was fabulous!"

Bernie and Hillary's holiday weekend // Politico // Annie Karni & Jonathan Topaz – July 4, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GORHAM, N.H. — Hillary Clinton trekked to this small town in the White Mountains Saturday to march in a low-key Fourth of July parade, where she was trailed by a vocal heckler and surrounded by so many cameras that her aides employed a rope to corral the press.

After about 25 minutes of marching at a brisk pace and shaking hands with locals, Clinton headed to a diner where she chatted about policy issues with a handful of late lunchers, and then sat down to eat pie alone with a few of her senior staffers. It was the second leg of her two-day Granite State tour — on Friday she spoke at a campaign cookout that attracted about 850 people in the liberal enclave of Hanover, vowing: “I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record in standing up and fighting for progressive values.”

Meanwhile, Clinton’s main Democratic rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, spent the holiday weekend campaigning in Iowa, where a crowd of about 2,500 people overflowed a Friday evening rally in Council Bluffs. On Saturday, riding high off the energy of the crowd, he marched in two parades, in Creston and Waukee, a Republican-leaning suburb of Des Moines, where the crowd yelled for him: “We love you Bernie, yes we do!”
With seven months to go before the first caucuses in the country, the split-screen appearances offered telling clues to the state of the race between the Democratic front-runner and her insurgent rival on the left. Clinton’s events and appearances are modest and controlled, marked by caution and distance. Despite a double-digit lead over Sanders, she’s still seeking to establish her credentials to her skeptics on the left.

For his part, Sanders is feeding off a wave of liberal enthusiasm and plowing forward with populist grit. He’s embracing his surging underdog role — and the media attention and crowds accompanying it.

Clinton’s van arrived in Gorham just before 2 p.m., when she greeted local elected officials and a union leader inside a pizza parlor. Earlier in the day, she spoke at a grassroots campaign organizing event outside of Bartlett, N.H., which drew about 100 people at the private home of a supporter.

The parade route — just under a mile along the town’s Main Street, dotted with Clinton campaign posters — was complicated by a persistent heckler who trailed Clinton waving a poster that read “Benghazi,” and yelling out taunts at the candidate (“Carpetbagger!” “Where were you at 3 in the morning when the phone rang!” “Tell us when you were poor!”). Clinton wore a grin-and-bear-it smile as she continued shaking hands. “I’m just having a good time meeting everybody,” she shrugged when asked by reporters about the disruption.

To further complicate matters, Clinton’s advance team, worried a swarm of over a dozen reporters and cameras were blocking the former secretary of state from seeing the locals along the route, herded the press away from the candidate with the unsightly aid of a rope line. Photographs of reporters being physically dragged along by campaign staffers only bolstered the image of Clinton as press-averse. Republicans pounced on the photographs. “Today, Republican presidential candidates marched in parades across New Hampshire that were open to the public without obstruction from their staff,” New Hampshire Republican State Committee Chairman Jennifer Horn said in a statement.
Despite the disruptions, Clinton managed to interact with a few parade-goers. She stopped to chat with a veteran after an aide pointed her toward Nellie Bagli, who was watching the parade with her disabled son, Jose, 40, a Marine who has been in a wheelchair since being injured by a grenade in Iraq in 2006.

“Thank you for your sacrifice,” Clinton told them, with emotion in her voice. “I’ll be thinking of you.” She told Bagli that the holiday was all about people like her son. But Bagli shrugged off the interaction with Clinton. “I’m not sure yet,” she said of who she plans to vote for. Pointing to her son, she said: “I lost a lot here. By losing that much, it’s hard to believe a lot.”

Clinton did not take any questions from the press, but told a gaggle of reporters as she headed for the diner: “I love parades, I love walking in parades. We got such a great response, a lot of enthusiasm and energy to celebrate the Fourth of July.”

At her third stop of the day, at Northland Restaurant & Dairy Bar, Clinton spoke with about eight diners before settling into a corner table with two top campaign aides and her state director, Mike Vlacich, in front of thick slices of blueberry and raspberry pie. She refused to answer a question about Donald Trump. “You know, I’m gonna sit down and have some pie,” she said, as a swarm of reporters was ushered out of the restaurant.
Roughly 1,500 miles away, in central Iowa, Sanders headed into the holiday weekend with the wind at his back, and his poll numbers showing him up to 33 percent in the Hawkeye State. On Wednesday night, he hosted by far the biggest rally of the presidential cycle, attracting roughly 10,000 people at a raucous rally in Madison, Wisconsin. At the Friday rally in Council Bluffs, campaign officials passed out envelopes for campaign contributions and signed up volunteers.

“They cheered when he called for raising the minimum wage to $15 an hour,” said a spokesman, in an ebullient statement released Friday evening touting “the biggest Iowa crowd so far for any presidential candidate.” “They applauded when he said it’s time to break up the big banks on Wall Street. They shouted approval when he credited Pope Francis for his call for bold action to prevent catastrophic climate change. They rose to their feet when he said the United States should join every other major country and provide health care as a right of citizenship."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders received another boost Friday — an endorsement from Larry Cohen, who recently stepped down as president of the Communications Workers of America. "This is not a close call," Cohen said at a press conference at a Council Bluffs union hall. "This is a guy who for his entire life has been there for working people."

Members of several other unions — including the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the International Association of Firefighters — also attended the event. Organized labor has been a core constituency for Sanders during his time in the Senate, and in a sign of his increasing traction, AFL-CIO chief Richard Trumka sent a memo this week to state, central and area divisions of the labor federation reminding them that its bylaws don't permit them to "endorse a presidential candidate" or "introduce, consider, debate, or pass resolutions or statements that indicate a preference for one candidate over another."

Pete D'Alessandro, Sanders' Iowa director, said Sanders' trip showed his appeal throughout the state, and not just in liberal bastions like Iowa City. "This isn't some regional campaign. The message is resonating everywhere," he said. The campaign will have 30-35 people on the ground in Iowa by the end of the month and has a goal for 75-100 people by caucus night next year, D'Alessandro said. Clinton is scheduled to make her fourth visit to Iowa on Tuesday.

Her campaign, meanwhile, shrugged off the rope line drama with humor and said the day went according to plan. "While the GOP may want to spin a good yarn on this, let's not get tied up in knots," spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement. "We wanted to accommodate the press, allow her to greet voters, and allow the press to be right there in the parade with her as opposed to preset locations. And that's what we did."

Clinton goes after a Bush in New Hampshire // CNN // Dan Merica – July 4, 2015

Hanover, New Hampshire – Hillary Clinton went after a member of the Bush family on Friday in New Hampshire. Just not the one who is running for President.

Instead, Clinton subtly knocked -- but did not name -- George W. Bush twice in a speech where she portrayed herself as a progressive fighter.

"If you look at the evidence, at the end of Bill Clinton's two terms, we had the longest peacetime expansion in American history with 22 million new jobs, a balanced budget and a surplus that would have paid off our national debt if it had not been rudely interrupted by the next administration," Clinton said to loud applause from the assembled Dartmouth College students and local Democrats.

Clinton argued that "there is just a pattern" in which a Republican President wrecks the economy and it is left to the succeeding Democratic President to fix it. As her proof, Clinton pointed to both her husband and President Barack Obama, who she argued does not get enough credit for his response to the recession when he took office 2009.

"There is just a pattern here where the other side keeps using the same old tired, failed policies. They don't work," Clinton said. "And then Democratic presidents have to come in and fix what was broken."

And as a pitch for herself, Clinton said, "So lets break that and have a Democratic President to continue the policies that actually work for the vast majority of Americans."

Clinton's visit to New Hampshire for the Fourth of July holiday is her fourth to the first-in-the-nation primary state since she launched her campaign in April. To date, the campaign has focused on small events and organizing, something Clinton's aides hope will pay off at primary time in January 2016.

At Friday's event, Clinton delivered her standard stump speech to a crowd of around 850, the campaign said.

"We have to take on the gun lobby one more time," Clinton said in a pitch for gun control. "At the very least, we need to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, people with serious mental challenges, terrorists, all of whom now are perfectly free to go and find a gun somewhere. This is a controversial issue, I am well aware of that. But I think it is the height of irresponsibility not to talk about it. So I will talk about it."

Clinton spoke at length about how difficult the presidency is, calling it the "hardest job in the world," but one she knows she wants.

After the speech, Clinton and her staff headed to Dairy Twirl, a small local ice cream shop in Lebanon, the town over from Hanover.

"It's Fourth of July. You've got to get some ice cream," she said, getting out of her van.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After ordering for herself, Clinton turned to the press and offered to buy.

"Would you guys like some ice cream?" Clinton asked the dozen or so reporters with her. "Those of you have traveled to the Upper Valley in pursuit of presidential politics. How about it? I'm paying. I'll buy if anybody wants it."

Instead of ice cream orders, though, Clinton was asked about Bernie Sanders, her Democratic challenger who has been surging lately, and why she hasn't drawn sizable crowds like the Independent Vermont senator.

"We each run our own campaigns, and I always knew this was going to be competitive," she said. "I want to have a great debate in the primary and caucus around the country and that is what I am looking forward to."

Earlier this week, Sanders was greeted by 9,600 people at an event in Madison, Wisconsin. Although crowd size does not equal electoral success, the Sanders campaign argues it shows excitement around their candidate and a lack of enthusiasm for Clinton.

The largest event Clinton has held so far was her campaign kickoff rally on New York's Roosevelt Island last month, where a few thousand people attended.

After taking two more questions, Clinton's ice cream appeared in the window.

"Is that for me?" she said at the size of the scoops. "Holy schmoley."

Clinton then shook a few more hands, met the owners of the shop and hopped into her van, headed for a fundraiser at the Holderness, New Hampshire home of Meg and Gary Hirshberg, the owners of the Stonyfield Farm organic yogurt company.

Clinton will celebrate the Fourth of July in Gorham, New Hampshire, where she will walk in their holiday parade.

Clinton campaign corrals media // Dan Merica // CNN – July 4, 2015

Gorham, New Hampshire (CNN)Hillary Clinton's campaign used a rope to keep journalists away from the candidate on Saturday while she walked in this small town's July Fourth parade.

The ensuing photos of journalists, including a CNN reporter, being somewhat dragged by a thin white rope as Clinton walked down Main Street caught fire online.

Initially, Clinton's campaign was not using a rope to corral the press, allowing journalists to get close to her and ask her questions.

But campaign aides said they brought the rope out because they feared the press scrum of around a dozen reporters and photojournalists would obstruct the view of New Hampshire voters attending the parade.

The rope was held by two of Clinton's advance staffers, who at times walked ahead of reporters, seemingly pulling them along the parade route.

"You guys, we are going to do 10 yards and a little more organized," said one of the advance staffers after breaking out the rope.

In explaining why they were using the rope, the staffer said, "so maybe a voter could see her, that kind of thing."

Clinton's Secret Service detail also urged journalists to abide by the mobile rope line.

"You are not going fast enough," one agent said when the rope tightened around a reporter's waist.

Since the campaign launched in April, Clinton's aides have tried to improve typically tense relations between the Clintons and the press, at times calling for a reset with reporters covering Clinton.

While the circus aspect of the event at times overshadowed Clinton's time at the parade, the candidate did glad-hand with many supporters and New Hampshire voters. At one point, she spoke with a wheelchair-bound Marine and his mother. The Iraq War veteran, who had a Marines blanket draped across most of his body, was injured by a grenade attack in March 2006.

Clinton walked away from the conversation somewhat shaken. "Whoa," she said when CNN asked her about the interaction.

But in addition to the corralled media and New Hampshire voters excited to see the presidential candidate, Clinton was followed by one vocal protester with a sign that read, "Benghazi." The older man, whose sign had fake blood spattered on it, continually shouted at the former secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary, where were you at 3 a.m. when the phone rang on September 11?" he yelled, referring to the 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi that left four Americans dead. He also yelled "carpetbagger," a reference to her 2000 Senate race in New York, and "Tell us when you were poor," a reference to a 2014 comment about being "dead broke" when she and former President Bill Clinton left the White House in 2001.

As the protester continued to follow Clinton, volunteers from the campaign followed him, chanting "Hillary, Hillary, Hillary."

Clinton was asked about the protesters, to which she responded, "I am just having a good time meeting everybody."

Clinton rarely comes in such close contact with protesters. Although there are regularly protesters outside her events, few ever get within shouting distance of her, let alone close enough to get her attention like the man.

A Clinton spokesperson told CNN called the rope a "soft barrier" that was necessary because the media mass around the candidate was making it "impossible" for her to talk to people.

One camera operator backpedaled into a toddler, the Clinton spokesperson said, and the rope made it possible for the parade to move smoothly.

But the Clinton campaign's use of a mobile rope line was catnip for Republicans, who seized on the issue.

"We all knew Hillary Clinton was desperate to avoid the media after months of controversy, but employing a moving rope line takes ducking reporters to absurd new heights," said Michael Short, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "Clearly the Fourth of July for Hillary Clinton means independence from answering tough questions."

The New Hampshire Republican Party took note.

"Clinton continues to demonstrate her obvious contempt and disdain for the Granite State's style of grassroots campaigning. The use of a rope line at a New Hampshire parade is a sad joke and insults the traditions of our First-in-the-Nation primary," New Hampshire Republican State Committee Chairman Jennifer Horn said in a statement.

But the Clinton campaign fired back.

"While the GOP may want to spin a good yarn on this, let's not get tied up in knots," said Nick Merrill, the campaign's traveling press secretary. "We wanted to accommodate the press, allow her to greet voters, and allow the press to be right there in the parade with her as opposed to preset locations. And that's what we did."

Who Clinton was looking for in New Hampshire // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015

Wolfeboro, New Hampshire (CNN)Hillary Clinton shook hands with countless supporters this weekend.

But there was one backer she recognized in particular when she made her fourth visit to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate: 9-year-old Ollie Olsen.

In June, Clinton held a rally outside Concord, New Hampshire, and signed a number of souvenirs supporters had left for her, one of which was a note Ollie wrote excusing him from school that day.

Ollie didn't realize she had signed it until the campaign tweeted out a picture, and he didn't get to meet the Democratic presidential hopeful.

But at Friday's grassroots event in Hanover, Ollie told CNN that Clinton came right up to him and said, "You're Ollie!"

"She said, 'You're the boy from the note,' and she noticed my grandma was a really good tennis player," he said.

Ollie was there with his mom Sarah, her boyfriend and her parents, and said they have no idea how she knew Sarah's mother, Lee, was a tennis player.

"I'm sure she was briefed, but that was really cute and just made us feel very special, even when she was about to go on stage in front of all these people she just made us feel very important," Sarah Olsen told CNN.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ollie and Clinton didn't talk for long, but they did take a picture with the note.

Ollie plans to campaign for Clinton this fall and said he's excited that Hillary Clinton could be the first woman president.

"It would be important because she would be the first woman president and that would be a lot of education for other kids learning Hillary Clinton was the first woman president," he told CNN. "It would be, like, as big as Abraham Lincoln."

For Sarah Olsen, the meeting is an important part of Ollie's education as a future New Hampshire voter.

"We want Ollie to go to all the different events and see Republicans and see Bernie Sanders and just kind of experience it and be able to make up his own mind for what he wants," she told CNN. "None of his friends know anything about politics. Granted, they're only 9, they don't vote for a while. They just completely don't understand why are all these people coming to New Hampshire, why this is so important."

Clinton has strong words on Chinese hacking // CNN // Dan Merica & Mariano Castillo – July 5, 2015

(CNN)Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton unleashed some of the strongest words to date about China's hacking of U.S. computers.

China is "trying to hack into everything that doesn't move" in the United States, Clinton said, accusing the Chinese of stealing information from both businesses and government agencies.

China is suspected of the recent theft of the personal data of about 18 million current, former and prospective federal employees who were affected by a cyber breach at the Office of Personnel Management.

Director of National Intelligence James Clapper told an intelligence conference last month that the Chinese are "the leading suspect" in the massive hack of the OPM.

"They're also trying to hack into everything that doesn't move in America," Clinton said at a campaign event in Glen, New Hampshire. "Stealing commercial secrets, blueprints from defense contractors, stealing huge amounts of government information. All looking for an advantage."

Clinton said America's response to China's rise will determine much of the future for the United States and the world.

"I want to see a peaceful rise for China," Clinton said. "I worked very hard on that as secretary of state, I will continue to do so. But we also have to be fully vigilant that China's military is growing very quickly and they are establishing military installations that again threaten countries we have treaties with, like the Philippines, because they are building on contested property."

Clinton was referring to China's building of manmade islands in disputed waters.

Hillary Clinton Reporters Kept Behind Moving Rope Line At New Hampshire Parade // ABC News // Liz Kreutz – July 4, 2015

At the Fourth of July parade Hillary Clinton marched in today in Gorham, New Hampshire, reporters following the candidate were kept -- and at moments, dragged -- behind an actual moving rope line.

The rope, which two Clinton staffers held on to on either side, was meant to give Clinton space as she walked down the parade route, but photos of reporters being dragged behind the rope as she marched have gone viral on Twitter.

The New Hampshire GOP released a statement critiquing Clinton, saying her use of the rope "insults the traditions of our First-in-the-Nation primary" and touted the Republican presidential candidates for marching in parades without "obstruction from their staff."

Clinton's campaign has not responded to ABC News' request for comment regarding the use of the rope for reporters or to the GOP criticism.

Clinton, meanwhile, seemed to enjoy the parade herself, as she waved to and greeted voters -- ignoring a group of loud protesters that trailed right behind her.

"Where were you at 3am when the phone rang? Name one accomplishment! Tell us about when you were poor!" shouted one man, holding up a sign that read "BENGHAZI."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton didn't let that rattle her.

"I'm just having a good time meeting everybody," Clinton said when asked whether she had anything to say to them.

And even by the end, her sentiment hadn't changed.

"It was fabulous," she said. "I love parades, I love walking in parades, got such a great response ... a lot of enthusiasm and energy to celebrate the Fourth of July."

Following the event, Clinton made a stop at Dairy Bar, a relatively empty nearby restaurant, where she mingled with patrons. Clinton was asked by this reporter about her thoughts to the backlash against Donald Trump. But she dismissed the question in lieu of dessert.

"I'm going to sit down and have some pie," she said.

Clinton defends progressive record as campaigns hit Independence Day // The Guardian // Jana Kasperkevic – July 4, 2015

As 2016 presidential candidates flocked to spend Independence Day in early voting states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton found herself defending her record on policy and the size of crowds at her events.

“I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record in standing up and fighting for progressive values,” Clinton told an audience in Hanover, New Hampshire, on Friday.

On Saturday, Independence Day itself, she spoke extensively about subjects including last week’s historic supreme court ruling on same-sex marriage, saying: “The language Justice Kennedy uses about the bonds between people is just almost mystical. It’s beautiful. So we have to do everything we can to end discrimination in the LGBT community.”

Clinton has come under greater-than-expected pressure from the independent Vermont senator Bernie Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist running a determinedly grassroots-focused campaign who nonetheless attracted nearly 10,000 people to a rally in Wisconsin on Wednesday. On Friday night, a Sanders event in Council Buffs, Iowa, was standing-room only.

On Friday, while visiting the Dairy Twirl ice cream shop in Lebanon, Clinton was asked why she was not drawing such big crowds.

“Well, we each run our own campaigns and I always knew this was gonna be competitive,” she said. “And I want to have a great debate in the primary and caucuses around the country and that’s what I’m looking forward to.”

Clinton also said her defeat by Barack Obama in the 2008 Democratic primary had taught her the importance of organizing every single day.

“That’s why I’m doing a lot of meetings and discussions about specific issues,” she said, “because I want to hear from people and I also want to connect them to the campaign.

“And I feel like it’s really working. It is building a campaign here in New Hampshire, using the grassroots, and coming up from that, because at the end of the day, I think that wins elections and wins caucuses.”

On the morning of 4 July, the former senator and secretary of state attended a grassroots organizing event in Glen.

Asked about the Obama administration’s involvement in ongoing nuclear talks with Iran, she said: “I’m hoping it’s a strong, verifiable deal that will put the lid on Iran’s nuclear weapons ambitions. Even if we are successful, however, Iran’s aggressiveness will not end.”

In an hour-long event, Clinton also discussed her ideas on college debt, the same-sex marriage ruling and the future makeup of the court.

College graduates and those with graduate degrees should get help to refinance their debt and be allowed to pay back their loans as a percentage of their incomes, she said, adding of her early life with her husband, former President Bill Clinton: “We were paying back loans while he was governor of Arkansas.”

Clinton encouraged people to read the supreme court’s decision extending same-sex marriage rights nationwide, saying “it’s not only a constitutionally based decision, which it should be, but there is a current underpinning it, which is [that] we need to respect each other, and we need to allow people to live and love and we need to support that".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about the future of the court, Clinton said it was possible the next president could have three to four appointments. If elected, she said she would appoint justices who would "bring an open mind and an open heart".

In the afternoon, Clinton was set to march in the Gorham Fourth of July parade. Former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee, another candidate for the Democratic nomination, was also campaigning in the state, planning to visit Merrimack and Amherst.

Sanders and the former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley were both in Iowa. Sanders was due to march in parades in Creston and Waukee.

Sanders has been gaining on Clinton. On Thursday, a Quinnipiac University poll found Clinton at 52% in Iowa while Sanders had climbed to 33%. On 7 May, Clinton led the same poll by 60% to 15%. The latest CNN poll shows Clinton only eight points ahead of Sanders in New Hampshire, although national surveys remain more clearly in Clinton's favor.

Republican presidential candidates also opted to celebrate Independence Day in the early voting states.

After a "sleepover" at 2012 candidate Mitt Romney's vacation home in New Hampshire, New Jersey governor Chris Christie and Florida senator Marco Rubio were to march in Wolfeboro's parade.

The former Texas governor Rick Perry, former Florida governor Jeb Bush and South Carolina senator Lindsey Graham joined Chafee for a parade in Amherst.
Bush and Chafee have old school ties in common. They duly met up, the Democratic candidate using Twitter to say: "Always fun to run into classmates @phillipsacademy on the campaign trail."

Bush, who was marching with his son George P Bush, the recently elected Texas land commissioner, was chided by a voter who told him he was holding up the parade.

"There's nothing behind us – other than Hillary," Bush said. A team of Clinton supporters were marching right behind a group backing the former Florida governor, their blue signs in sharp contrast with his red.

Hillary Clinton Says She Will Be Better Friend than Obama to Israel // Jewish Press // Tzvi Ben-Gedalyahu – July 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton has promised that Israel will have her as a better friend than President Barack Obama if she is elected President next year.

She also exclaimed that Iran poses an "existential threat" to Israel, as if any serious presidential contender thinks otherwise.

While strongly supporting attempts for a "good" deal with Iran, she is trying to reassure wealthy Jews that they can safely contribute to her campaign coffers and can sleep safely last night knowing that she will be good for Israel, even if Israelis spend the night running to bomb shelters.

That is what President Obama also said in 2008. That is what every presidential candidate says, but American Jews lover to hear because they want to believe it.

When it comes to the deal being negotiated between the P5+1 and Iran, Clinton is playing both sides of the fence, and it is not clear where she stands. Politico interviewed 10 donors and fundraisers and reported:

> Donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Clinton is no different from Obama and every other politician. "No deal is better than a bad deal," she said, but what is a bad deal? Is it possible to make any deal with Iran can call it "good?"

Since no one yet knows if a deal with Iran will be reached and if so, what it will contain, Clinton can safely hedge her bets.

At stake is $2 billion that Clinton's aides hope to raise for her campaign and super PACs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

in the meantime, she is boasting that her personality and experience as Secretary of State are guarantees for Americans Jews that she will be a lot friendlier than Obama when it comes to relations with Israel.

She started name-dropping, referring to former Israeli Ambassador to the United States Michael Oren as "Michael" whom she said she knows well.

The penchant for American Jews to buy assurances that the American-Israeli relation will be just fine and dandy was summed up by Politico's report on a fundraiser last month at the home of Democratic party donor Jay Jacobs. An Orthodox rabbi asked Clinton about threats to Israel, and Jacobs told Politico:

> She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel. And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer.

Good grief!

What did the rabbi think she would say? Did he really believe that Clinton would say, "Well, you know all the talk about threats to Israel is just talk to get more money from the military-industrial complex. Israel can fend for itself. Let's talk about the economy and immigration."

Of course she fervently supports Israel. That is what J Street also says.

At least she was honest when she stated, "I'm going to do what's in the best interest of the U.S."

That is what any president of the United States should do. He or she should be "pro-American" and not "pro-Israel."

The kicker is that being pro-Israel usually is the best thing for the United States, even if presidents can't admit it.

From Clinton, a multi-generational message in N.H. // Boston Globe // Monica Disare – July 4, 2015

HANOVER, N.H. — Hillary Rodham Clinton kicked off her Fourth of July weekend by telling about 850 people at Dartmouth College that two people motivated her run for president: her mother and her granddaughter.

Her mother, Clinton said, instilled in her a steadfast belief in kindness, while her granddaughter makes her think about "what kind of world will be waiting for her."

"That's what keeps me up at night," Clinton said.

Clinton's mixed-generational message was apt for the crowd she addressed Friday afternoon — Dartmouth students mingled with longtime Clinton supporters.

Lois Little, 67, of New London, N.H., became a Clinton fan 24 years ago but decided not to wear the "Madame President" shirt she bought during Clinton's unsuccessful 2008 presidential run to avoid jinxing Clinton's chances.

"She's a very dynamic person, very intelligent," Little said. Her husband nodded in agreement.

Among those who have watched Clinton for years were some who were lukewarm toward her — but nonetheless likely to vote for her. Julie McCashin, 52, of Hanover, said she was not a diehard Clinton fan, but she was "diehard anti-Republican." McCashin said Clinton has the best chance to beat the eventual GOP nominee.

Little and McCashin stood in the same crowd, eating hamburgers and potato salad, with Thuy Le, 20, a Dartmouth sophomore who said her philosophy aligns more with Senator Bernie Sanders, another Democratic presidential contender. Le watched Clinton's speech with a group of five other Dartmouth sophomores who said they were trying to decide between Clinton and Sanders.

Parker Gardner, 20, on campus for the summer, said that Clinton was likely the "best option" but he needed more information to be certain.

At the Friday event, he said he hoped to hear about her personal journey into politics, not just her policy positions.

Clinton will have to appeal to both demographics to be successful both in the Democratic primary and perhaps in the general election. Her speech tried to do just that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She argued that she is the best candidate to improve the economy, disparaging the economic policy efforts of former Republican presidents.

“These are folks who just don’t know the theory of original sin,” she said, “because we wouldn’t have had to have a recovery if we hadn’t had the kind of poor management and bad economic policies that put us into the ditch in the first place.”

In about 10 days, she said, she would release more details on her economic platform.

In the meantime, she ticked through a laundry list of issues important to her campaign, including voting rights, immigration, clean energy, cybersecurity, and removing big money from politics. She praised the Supreme Court’s recent decisions on health care and same-sex marriage.

Clinton ended her speech with a set of personal stories. She told the crowd about her mother’s troubled childhood and said her mother kept going because people showed her kindness along the way. She pledged to bring this type of kindness to the White House.

“I think we are a nation that really believes in a helping hand,” she said.

And she cited her young granddaughter as her inspiration to work toward creating a world the next generation will be proud to inherit.

“That flag which we’ll see in parades and at picnics and flying proudly in front of houses this weekend, that flag represents, I believe, humanity’s best progress,” Clinton said. “I want to be proud, and I want my daughter and granddaughter to be proud.”

Margaret Mulley, 65, said Clinton’s speech “was very competent and powerful.”

But not all the college students were convinced.

As Mariana Almeida, 19, and Andrew Jeon, 20, walked away from the event, they said they enjoyed the speech. But as for which candidate they will ultimately support — both walked away undecided.

Danielle Foullon, 54, left the event with one piece of advice for Clinton: “Hillary, don’t play it safe.”

Hillary Clinton Comments On Viral ‘Humans of New York’ Photo // TIME // Dan Stewart – July 4, 2015

Street photographer Brandon Stanton — better known as the creator of Humans of New York — posted a picture Friday of a tearful boy with the caption, “I’m homosexual and I’m afraid about what my future will be and that people won’t like me.”

The post garnered 498,000 ‘Likes’, about standard for a HONY post, but what Stanton may not have expected was a comment from Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Clinton wrote, “Prediction from a grown-up: Your future is going to be amazing. You will surprise yourself with what you’re capable of and the incredible things you go on to do. Find the people who love and believe in you – there will be lots of them.”

The photo initially became the subject of controversy when Stanton claimed Facebook had removed it from the site. But a Facebook spokesperson said Saturday the photo had not been intentionally deleted, but had been temporarily unavailable due to a bug. The photo is now available to be seen online, along with Clinton’s comment signed with her distinctive “-H.”

Humans of New York features photographs of ordinary people on the street along with quotes from the subjects, who typically do not identify themselves.

Hillary Clinton Has The Top Comment On This Heartbreaking “Humans Of New York” Photo // Buzzfeed // David Mack – July 4, 2015

You may have seen this heartbreaking “Humans of New York” picture pop up in your Facebook feed recently.

The young boy’s tears have elicited a ton of support in the HONY picture’s comments.

Someone else who commented on the picture also happens to be running for president.

Hillary Clinton posted this comment on the picture on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It reads:

Prediction from a grown-up: Your future is going to be amazing. You will surprise yourself with what you're capable of and the incredible things you go on to do. Find the people who love and believe in you - there will be lots of them. –H

The comment was signed "–H", indicating that the words were penned by Clinton herself and not an aide.

Hillary Clinton accuses China of 'stealing US secrets' // BBC – July 4, 2015

US Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton has accused China of stealing commercial secrets and government information.

She accused China of "trying to hack into everything that doesn't move in America", and urged vigilance.

US officials had named China as the chief suspect in the massive hack of the records of a US government agency earlier this year.

China had denied any involvement, and called US claims "irresponsible".

'Fully vigilant'

Speaking at a campaign event in New Hampshire, Ms Clinton said that China was stealing secrets from defence contractors and had taken "huge amounts of government information, all looking for an advantage."

She added that she wanted to see China's peaceful rise but that the US needed to stay "fully vigilant".

"China's military is growing very quickly, they're establishing military installations that again threaten countries we have treaties with, like the Philippines because they are building on contested property," she said.

US officials have blamed China for a major data breach of the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) that was revealed in June.

The hacking of federal government computers could have compromised the records of four million employees.

US intelligence chief James Clapper called China a "leading suspect" after the incident.

But China dismissed the accusation, saying that it was "irresponsible and unscientific".

China has previously argued that it is also the victim of hacking attacks.

Republican presidential candidates have used the recent OPM cyber hack to attack President Obama's administration, accusing it of "incompetence".

Marco Rubio and Rick Perry have called for the US to threaten sanctions against organisations linked to hacking, while Mike Huckabee has argued that the US should "hack China back".

Meanwhile, Democratic candidate Martin O'Malley has called for better funding for cyber security.

The hack against the OPM is not the first time that China has been blamed for a cyber attack against the US.

An earlier attempt to breach OPM networks was blocked in March 2014, with the US saying China was behind the attack.

Union chief defends Hillary amid Bernie Sanders uprising // New York Post // Geoff Earle – July 4, 2015

WASHINGTON — AFL-CIO boss Richard Trumka is using his political muscle to try to run interference for Hillary Rodham Clinton, after movement by some local labor groups to back rival Bernie Sanders.

The powerful union head advised state and local union chapters this week that the national union in DC handles presidential endorsements.

"I want to remind you all that the AFL-CIO endorsement for president and vice president belongs to the national AFL-CIO. State federations, central and area labor councils, and all other subordinate bodies must follow the national AFL-CIO endorsement," Trumka wrote, according to Politico.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's campaign is facing a growing challenge from Sanders. The South Carolina and Vermont AFL-CIOs passed resolutions this spring calling on "working people everywhere" to unite behind Sanders.

Clinton, Chafee celebrate Fourth of July in the Granite State // WMUR9 // Kristen Carosa – July 4, 2015

GLEN, N.H. —Presidential hopefuls Hillary Clinton and Lincoln Chafee celebrated the Fourth of July in New Hampshire Saturday.

Clinton opened an event in Glen by discussing her granddaughter.

"You know, you say to yourself, 'I want to do everything I can to make sure this precious little girl has every opportunity,'" Clinton said.

She said her campaign is about fighting for the middle class and helping those in need.

"I advocate to raise the minimum wage, that's why I am a supporter of the income tax credit. We need to get more money into people's pockets," she said. "I want to take a bright light and shine it on every regulation, every licensing requirement, every tax requirement and take a hard look at the difficulty of getting credit."

Clinton also spoke about the importance of early education.

"If people are not equipped for the jobs of the future then a lot of what we do today won't have staying power," she said.

Clinton also visited the town of Gorham later Saturday. She will head to Iowa Tuesday.

Chafee, the former Rhode Island governor, met voters during Fourth of July parades in Merrimack and Amherst.

Chafee worked with Clinton in the Senate and said he looks forward to seeing her on the presidential trail. He said he differs from Clinton because he voted against the war in Iraq.

"I bring a good resume, a vision for the future, a more peaceful world, not that hawkish approach is what I'm advocating. Bring those tax dollars home here to spend on our schools, our roads and bridges and our health care," Chafee said.

Chafee began his political career as a Republican, first holding public office in 1985.

Hillary Clinton tells supporters in Virginia that 'love triumphed' in gay marriage // Sentinel Republic // Alan Binder – July 4, 2015

Clinton headlined the state Democratic Party's annual Jefferson-Jackson event, previously a formal dinner but this year held as a campaign event at George Mason University's Patriot Center with general admission at $30.

The New Hampshire poll shows that many Democrats are responding favorably to Clinton's candidacy, including 74% who say they have a positive impression of her. She also is more trusted to handle the economy and health care, two of the leading domestic issues in the contest.

A fired-up Clinton then seemingly spoke directly at the 13 declared Republican presidential hopefuls. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts), who has said repeatedly that she will not run for president but was still being included in polls at that point.

"Hillary Clinton's early numbers had been higher than they reasonably could have been expected to remain", Smith said. "Equality triumphed, America triumphed".

Vice President Joe Biden clocks in at 8 percent, with 2 percent or less supporting Martin O'Malley, Jim Webb and Lincoln Chafee. Clinton has the money, the infrastructure, and the support from other prominent Democrats that Sanders lacks, but the Vermont senator has advantages, too: enthusiasm at the grassroots, the flexibility that comes with being a one-man band, and the ability to position himself as a scrappy underdog and outsider.

Clinton is seeing her strong lead over Sen. As a senator, Clinton backed civil unions and partner benefits for same-sex couples, and came out in favor of same-sex marriage in 2013, shortly before the Court struck down a key provision of the 1996 law. "The solution is for Congress to admit they screwed up, repeal the 'nightmare of Obamacare, ' and let states road-test real health care reforms", he said in a statement.

Ex- Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, who is seeking the GOP presidential nomination, also blasted the court's ruling. Neither governor would be able to do anything to stop same-sex marriage in their state if the high court rules it is a constitutional right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Friday's ruling is just one more step in securing equal rights for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people, she said. But she said she was looking forward to the Clinton rally, especially because "we don't have to dress up".

Yet it is important to remember that Obama and Clinton both opposed marriage equality as late as early 2012.

She also ripped Republicans for recently voting against allowing the Centers for Disease Control to study gun violence.

Mrs. Clinton asked "How can you watch massacre after massacre and take that vote?" "I think that break from the pack has already begun".

"I am for Hillary", Cho said.

"This is personal for me", said McAuliffe of Clinton.

The 2016 presidential race came to Virginia on Friday evening, ushered in by the roaring voice of Gov. Terry McAuliffe introducing Hillary Clinton. While we celebrate today, our work won't be finished until every American cannot only marry, but live, work, pray, learn and raise a family free from discrimination and prejudice.

Despite her "crush", the outspoken entertainer and LGBT rights activist said she's "long been" a fan of Clinton: "I had a hard time sort of deciding between Hillary and Obama". His fundraising efforts helped bankroll the campaigns of both Clinton and her husband, ex- President Bill Clinton. But most of all...because Hillary Clinton is a tenacious fighter.

Hillary Clinton shrugs off heckler while GOP candidates meet voters in New Hampshire, Iowa for Fourth of July campaigning // NY Daily News // Dennis Slattery – July 4, 2015

Fourth of July parade routes were transformed into campaign trails Saturday as presidential candidates spent the holiday shaking hands, mingling with voters, and dealing with hecklers.

Early primary states celebrating Independence Day -- including Iowa and New Hampshire -- were particularly awash in White House wannabes.

Democratic hopeful Hillary Clinton spent the day in the tiny hamlet of Gorham, N.H., where she was taunted by a relentless heckler with a string of grievances, including protesting her role leading the State Department during the 2012 Benghazi attacks.

"Hillary, where were you at 3 a.m. when the phone rang on September 11th?" the man yelled as he followed her along the parade route. "Can you name one accomplishment at State? Just one?"

Clinton shrugged off the shouter.

"I'm just having a good time meeting everybody," she told CNN.

Republican candidates got into the spirit as well, with New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio walking in a parade in Wolfeboro, N.H.

Former Govs. Jeb Bush of Florida, Rick Perry of Texas and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island as well as South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham worked the crowd in Amherst, N.H.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley met voters in Iowa.

Clinton hears cheers and jeers // New Hampshire Union Leader // John Koziol – July 4, 2015

GORHAM - Hillary Clinton marched in the town's historic Independence Day parade Saturday, exciting her base, provoking her detractors and in general, being met with mild amusement by the public.

Preceded by a gaggle of the touring press, some of whom appeared to be filming a video documentary; inside a cordon of uniformed and plainclothes security officer; flanked by staff; and backed by sign-carrying supporters, the former first lady, U.S. senator from New York and Secretary of State walked the entire parade route from Dublin Street down to the Gorham Town Common.

The Gorham parade was Clinton's third event in the North County yesterday, sandwiched in between a grassroots organizing event in Glen and a stop at the Northland Restaurant & Dairy Bar in Berlin to schmooze with patrons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is familiar with the Androscoggin Valley and Coos County, having campaigned here on the way to winning the Jan. 8, 2008, New Hampshire Democratic presidential primary and defeating then-Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Obama went on to win the Democratic presidential nomination and then the presidency in 2008 and he was re-elected in 2012. Despite those victories, however, Gorham was one prize that Obama could not claim in 2008, as Clinton bested him there by 330 votes to 222.

The presumptive Democratic presidential candidate for 2016 - although Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is mounting a strong challenge - Clinton yesterday saw visible signs, a few, not many, that her past will continue to be part of her future and that some people, like Sudie Francoeur and Carl Gagnon, both of Berlin, desperately do not want to see her in the Oval Office.

Exercising what they said was their First Amendment right of free speech on the most hallowed of national holidays, both Francoeur and Gagnon held signs with messages that were highly critical of Clinton's role in the deaths of the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans at the U.S. Embassy in Benghazi, Libya, on Sept. 11, 2012.

As he got within earshot of Clinton, Gagnon would lob verbal jabs, asking her, for example, to "tell us about when you were a poor person." One woman yelled that Clinton "oughtta be in prison, not the White House."

Nonetheless, Clinton was undeterred, frequently stepping into the groups of parade watchers on either side of the road to greet individuals and to occasionally exchange some words.

Francoeur said she had been a longtime Democrat but became disenchanted with what she said was its tilt toward socialism, adding that she was unhappy with Clinton in particular about what happened in Benghazi.

Gagnon, who said he's attended the Gorham 4th of July parade "since childhood," said Clinton has been a failure as a public servant and therefore should not even be considered as a presidential candidate.

He was dismissive of what he saw Saturday as Clinton marched down Main Street, with supporters loudly chanting her name while local residents - some parked in vehicles directly on the parade route or sitting in lawn chairs on the sidewalk - smiled and politely applauded, or occasionally let out a joyful whoop, or, less frequently, a boo.

"The American election process," said Gagnon, "has now turned into a coronation."

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

Sanders, O'Malley race to be the Clinton alternative // WaPo // John Wagner – July 4, 2015

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Iowa — Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, two candidates vying to become the chief challenger to Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination, crisscrossed Iowa over the past few days, stopping in some of the same cities and marching in small-town Fourth of July parades.

But at this point in the race, they could hardly be in different places.

During his swing, Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont, drew more than 2,500 people to a convention center here — a record crowd for Iowa. Supporters leapt to their feet and screamed as he decried the "grotesque level" of income inequality in the country and the outsize influence of the "billionaire class" on its politics.

O'Malley's biggest turnout during his three-day trip was 119 people, who gathered in the side room of a suburban bar outside Des Moines. The former Maryland governor's pitch included a self-deprecating joke about how little known he remains in the state that will hold the nation's first caucuses in February.

Presidential politics are replete with candidates who get hot during the summer only to fizzle in the fall. But the early rise of Sanders — a self-described democratic socialist — underscores how hungry the progressive base of the Democratic Party is for a truly authentic alternative to Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As his crowds have swelled in recent weeks, Sanders's poll numbers have jumped in Iowa and New Hampshire. O'Malley and the other more mainstream Democratic hopefuls, meanwhile, have stalled in the low single digits. Former senator Jim Webb of Virginia, who jumped into the race Thursday, and former Rhode Island senator and governor Lincoln Chafee have also stepped forward to challenge Clinton.

Scores of interviews suggest Sanders has clearly tapped into the anxieties of recession-weary voters, many of whom feel completely alienated from Washington.

Echoing many others who came to see Sanders here, Steve Pinegar, a 33-year-old heating and air-conditioning technician, said he is looking for someone outside the establishment and said he thinks that Sanders is the only candidate for the Democratic nomination who is speaking to him.

"I don't want to vote for anyone who's part of the grand scheme," Pinegar said, adding that he has grown disillusioned with President Obama's lack of progress on working-class issues. "I was all hopey-changey last time, but I'm done with that. . . . I feel like me and Bernie Sanders, we could go have lunch and talk about the issues."

Much of Sanders's hour-long stump speech focuses on issues that could affect the wallets of workers like Pinegar. Sanders wants to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour. He wants to guarantee family leave, sick time and vacation time — Americans are working too long, he says. He wants to make college free. And he promises that as president he would make corporations and the wealthy pay more in taxes while trying to cut taxes for those in lower brackets.

"The greed of the billionaire class and corporate America is destroying this great country," Sanders said Friday night, offering one of a few dozen lines that produced sustained applause from a crowd that included many Nebraskans from across the river.

Building on momentum

Some of Sanders's largest audiences lately have been in states without early nominating contests, including in Madison, Wis., where he attracted 10,000 people Wednesday.

It was clear from the outset of the race that there would be a bloc of non-Clinton voters, and polling suggests that Sanders — at least for now — has managed to corral most of them. That includes Democrats who were pining to see Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), a darling of the left, get into the race. She has suggested recently that she might campaign for Sanders.

A Quinnipiac University poll released last week showed Clinton drawing 52 percent of likely Democratic caucusgoers in Iowa, with Sanders at 33 percent. O'Malley lagged with 3 percent, followed by Webb and Chafee, with 1 percent each.

Sanders's numbers have been higher in New Hampshire, where voters are more familiar with him, given his representation of neighboring Vermont. A recent poll from the Granite State showed Sanders trailing Clinton by eight percentage points.

Joe Trippi, a longtime Democratic strategist, said Sanders's challenge will be to build on the momentum he has established and show that he can demonstrate a broader appeal than just to the party's left wing.

"If you're going to run a campaign based on 'I'm further to the left of the establishment,' there's a ready-made audience," said Trippi, who ran the 2004 presidential campaign of former Vermont governor Howard Dean.

Dean surged in that race based on anti-Iraq war sentiment only to collapse as voting began. Then Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), a candidate with more establishment support, emerged as the Democratic nominee. Trippi said part of the reason Dean lost support is people began to question whether he was the strongest candidate to beat George W. Bush in the general election.

The O'Malley camp is betting on a similar phenomenon this cycle: that once voters get to know all the candidates better, they will see O'Malley as a more viable alternative than Sanders. O'Malley, 52, has also been casting himself as a part of a "new generation" of leaders, a contrast with both Clinton, who is 67, and Sanders, who is 73.

In an interview following a stop Thursday in Waukee, O'Malley said Sanders has been on the rise partly because voters see him for now as a "protest candidate."

"People feel like big money has subsumed, taken over, their politics, and they're frustrated by it," O'Malley said. "People feel like their voices don't matter. People feel like they're not being heard, and right now, they want to protest about that. I'm not running for protest candidate; I'm running for president of the United States."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley's three-day swing has focused on his plan to address climate change by moving the country's electricity consumption entirely to clean energy by 2050. Aides say other more substantive proposals will help set him apart in coming months.

O'Malley, who served for eight years as Maryland's governor and seven years as Baltimore mayor, is also increasingly touting his executive experience as an asset. In contrast to Sanders, who talks a lot about legislation he has introduced, O'Malley touts bills that he muscled through in Maryland to legalize same-sex marriage, abolish the death penalty and provide new benefits to immigrants.

"There's a great distance in saying what we're for and actually accomplishing things," O'Malley told a crowd of about 70 people who came to see him at a coffeehouse in Newton on Friday.

Swaying voters

Some analysts suggest O'Malley waited too long to get into the race. By the time of O'Malley's May 30 announcement, Sanders had already made significant headway with progressive voters looking for an alternative to Clinton.

"People were looking for someone to get in that space, and Martin was playing coy, and Bernie wasn't," said one Democratic consultant formerly employed by O'Malley who spoke on the condition of anonymity to speak more freely.

In Newton and elsewhere, there is evidence that O'Malley is making strides with voters that doesn't show up in a meaningful way yet in the polls.

Susan Daniels, a retired property manager, said she came to the event in Newton "to expand my horizons" by hearing from a candidate she didn't know much about. She left inclined to caucus for O'Malley, impressed by his command of details without notes. She also has nagging doubts about supporting Clinton.

Interviews, however, also suggest that Sanders supporters might be harder to peel off than people think. While some who attend his events are still shopping for a candidate, many arrive already sold.

Daryl Kothenbeutel, a retired owner of a prairie seed business, drove about 90 minutes from Clear Lake to Fort Dodge on Thursday to see Sanders for the third time in recent weeks. He said he has been most impressed with Sanders's commitment to fighting climate change and that he likes his other prescriptions for the country.

"The man, I think, is our last hope for America. I really do," said Kothenbeutel, 71. "Hillary seems to bring up everything after Bernie does," Kothenbeutel said.

Tad Devine, a strategist for Sanders, said he thinks Sanders's support will continue to grow, in part because he has the ability to attract new voters to the race, as Obama did in 2008. Once party elites begin to understand that, Devine suggested, he said he thinks Sanders has the potential to win more backing from the Democratic establishment.

Sanders made headway with endorsements over the weekend in New Hampshire, winning the support of longtime party activist Dudley Dudley.

Dudley, who in the 1970s became the highest serving woman in the state's history as an executive councilor, hosted a house party in Durham for O'Malley just two months ago.

She told CNN that she has nothing against O'Malley, but she likes the way Sanders delivers his message.

"He has a way of stating it in a way that is no-nonsense and so straightforward," Dudley said.

Martin O'Malley finishes three-day tour in Clinton, Iowa // WQAD8 // Caroline Reinwald – July 4, 2015

Following a three-day tour across the state of Iowa, democratic presidential candidate, Martin O'Malley, stopped in Clinton, Iowa to speak to voters on Saturday.

During his visit, O'Malley talked about Social Security reform, immigration reform, and his climate change plan.

"We must set a goal as a nation of being 100-percent clean energy powered by 2050. We can do it and create a lot of jobs along the way," said O'Malley.

O'Malley is polling third behind democratic candidates Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders, but O'Malley says he plans to break away from the pack in the upcoming weeks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The people of Iowa are not intimidated by polls or like being told who they are supposed to vote for. They expect to meet every candidate to look them in the eye, ask them questions, shake their hand, and take the full measure of them," O'Malley said.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders Outpaces Martin O'Malley as Hillary Clinton Alternative // WSJ // Peter Nicholas and Colleen Mccain Nelson - July 5, 2015

Once considered the most viable Democratic challenger to Hillary Clinton, former Maryland Gov. O'Malley is struggling to get a toehold CARROLL, Iowa—Waiting for Martin O'Malley to arrive for a backyard campaign stop, Chris Henning and some of her friends tried to figure out what office the Democratic presidential candidate once held. Was he the former governor of Maryland or perhaps Virginia? They weren't sure.

Another Iowan who came out to hear Mr. O'Malley speak was at a loss as to his employment. "He's from the East Coast," Rosemary Partridge told a reporter. "Connecticut? I'm trying to guess. He's a senator."

At one time, the former Maryland governor seemed the most viable alternative to Hillary Clinton the Democratic Party would produce. Yet he is struggling to get a toehold, while the attention and donations from the party's liberal wing instead are going to an older, rumpled rival: Bernie Sanders, the 73-year-old senator from Vermont.

Mr. Sanders is the one drawing boisterous crowds with his fiery attacks on billionaires and wealthy corporations. Mr. Sanders drew about 10,000 people in Madison, Wis., last week, a turnout the campaign billed as the largest in either party to date.

"I've been waiting for him to run," said Florita Louis de Malavé, a librarian at the Sanders event in Madison. "He's not beholden to corporate interests. The other candidates are the same old, same old."

On the stump, Mr. Sanders pledges to take direct aim at the wealthy, diminish their power, expose their tax havens and break up the largest financial institutions in the country. He tells working-class Americans that he'll fight for higher wages, guaranteed health care, family and medical leave and paid vacations.

"This grotesque level of [income] inequality is immoral. It is bad economics. It is unsustainable, and it is not what the United States of America is supposed to be about," Mr. Sanders said in Madison.

Mr. Sanders's backers say this race is a choice between the senator from Vermont and the former secretary of state; Mr. O'Malley doesn't figure into their thinking. Mr. Sanders can win the nomination, they say, but if he doesn't, he may push Mrs. Clinton to the left.

"At the very least, I hope some of these ideas take hold," said Patrick Downing, a piano tuner and technician and luthier from Perry, Wis.

In Madison, many Sanders supporters drove long distances to see their candidate of choice, trekking in from other cities and states. Two hours before Mr. Sanders was scheduled to take the stage, thousands were already in line, spilling across the parking lot outside the arena.

Inside, a raucous crowd eventually filled nearly every one of the 10,000 seats, with more people standing in the aisles and on the floor of the arena. They donned Bernie buttons and chanted "Feel the Bern" while they waited for Mr. Sanders to take the stage.

If the Clinton campaign is worried about anyone in the Democratic field at this stage, it would seem to be Mr. Sanders—not the more mainstream, camera-ready Mr. O'Malley.

Speaking Friday in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton appeared to have Mr. Sanders in mind when she said: "I take a back seat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values."

Meantime, polling shows Mr. O'Malley's path to the nomination is getting tougher. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll last month showed him with just 2% support among registered voters planning to vote in the Democratic primary. Mr. Sanders had 15%; Mrs. Clinton, 75%.

Asked if they could see themselves supporting Mr. O'Malley, 12% said yes and 28% said no.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He’s not a shouter,” Jim Kessler, a senior vice president at the centrist think tank Third Way, said of Mr. O’Malley. “He’s a thoughtful and in some ways ponderous person…He doesn’t come across as much of a real populist. The message doesn’t come naturally to him.”

On the campaign trail, Mr. O’Malley seems to recognize the hurdles he faces. Appearing at a house party in Ames, Iowa, after his visit to Carroll, he told the crowd his name—not something Mrs. Clinton ever needs to do. He ran through the offices he’s held and other bits of biography before drawing contrasts with his rivals.

It seems clear from his stump speech that he wants to eclipse Mr. Sanders as the liberal challenger to Mrs. Clinton. He stresses the parts of his gubernatorial record that would most appeal to the left, telling how he signed legislation imposing stricter gun controls in Maryland, legalizing same-sex marriage and raising the state’s minimum wage.

“I have fearless progressive values,” Mr. O’Malley said in Ames.

He suggests that having enacted such measures he has a level of accomplishment that eludes Mr. Sanders, a legislator working in a polarized Congress. Asked how his brand of liberalism differs from that of Mr. Sanders, Mr. O’Malley told reporters in Carroll: “I’ve actually gotten these things done.”

Sanders snags key endorsement in New Hampshire // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015

Wolfeboro, New Hampshire (CNN)Sen. Bernie Sanders has snagged a key endorsement in New Hampshire that may sting a little for Martin O'Malley's campaign.

Longtime New Hampshire Democratic activist Dudley Dudley told CNN Friday that she has decided to endorse Bernie Sanders for the Democratic 2016 nomination. Her decision comes less than two months after she hosted O'Malley at both her Durham, New Hampshire homes.

Since then, according to a recent CNN/WMUR New Hampshire primary poll, frontrunner Hillary Clinton's lead over Sanders has shrunk from 38 percentage points to 8, with O'Malley trailing both. Likely Democratic primary voters are now more apt to see Sanders as the candidate who "best represents the values of Democrats like yourself," the poll found.

Sanders recently finished a two-day swing through the state that saw 500-person crowds and high attendance at more intimate house parties.

Dudley told CNN she was won over by Sanders focus on money in politics, but was particularly impressed by his style of delivering his message.

"He's very believable. A lot of people seem to say a lot of things that don't come to pass. I feel that he is compelling and trustworthy and I'm hoping that he will get the nomination," Dudley told CNN. "I particularly like what he has to say about Citizens United, about the need to have a more just tax system in this country, and to even out the income inequality. He has a way of stating it in a way that is no nonsense and so straight forward."

Sanders' campaign spokesperson Michael Briggs told CNN, "We are very grateful and appreciate the support from such a key figure in New Hampshire."

O'Malley's camp declined to comment on the endorsement.

As a state executive councilor in the 1970s, Dudley was the highest serving woman in the state's history. She also gained a reputation as a grassroots activist when she led a successful effort to stop the building of an oil refinery off the coast of New Hampshire.

During a house party on May 13, Dudley spoke positively about O'Malley, but told reporters after that event that while she opened her home, she was not ready to endorse.

O'Malley returned the kind words for Dudley and spent a considerable amount of time wooing the Democratic activists. In addition to the event, O'Malley filmed key portions of his announcement video at Dudley's house. Dudley said Friday that her Sanders endorsement is not so much about what other Democratic candidates are lacking, but about how Sanders has differentiated himself in the field.

"It wasn't in opposition to them. I'm just feeling that I like the way Sanders presents himself and puts his points of view," Dudley told CNN.

Dudley acknowledges that Sanders' road to the White House, let alone the Democratic nomination, will not be easy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Neither (race) is going to be a cakewalk, but I think that his stamina and energy and points of view will carry him through," she said.

Dudley has had mixed success in endorsements over the years. In 2008, she supported Barack Obama in the lead-up to the New Hampshire primary, but in 1992 she supported Paul Tsongas over Bill Clinton, and in 1980, she spearheaded an unsuccessful challenge to incumbent President Jimmy Carter with a write-in campaign for Ted Kennedy.

Bernie Sanders Gains on Clinton in Early-State Polls, Hits Iowa Patriotic Parade Circuit // Slate // Beth Ethier – July 4, 2015

On Saturday night, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders wrapped up a three-day charm offensive that took him through a half-dozen counties in Iowa. He brought standing-room crowds to small-town cafes and his Fourth of July schedule was packed with parades, with hours spent carrying banners with small armies in matching Bernie shirts and shaking hands in a state where his standing in the polls seems to be growing by the day.

Sanders didn't manage to replicate the astonishing turnout that packed his rally in a Madison, Wisconsin arena this week, if only because venues that size are harder to find down in Iowa, but his 2,500-strong crowd in Council Bluffs on Friday is reportedly the largest so far of any 2016 candidate who's visited the state.

Conceding in their headline that "OK, now Hillary Clinton seems to have some problems in Iowa," the Fix laid out poll numbers showing that Sanders' impressive crowds seem to be driven by a trend upward in support, at least in Iowa. Clinton still has a 19-point lead over Sanders in the state, 52-33, in the latest Quinnipiac poll, but that's not great news for a candidate who was ahead by 45 in May.

Sanders is gaining Iowa's support largely at Clinton's expense, not only from voters who identify themselves as very liberal but also from women. Clinton is showing "a 12-point drop among women, in a poll with a margin of error of 3.6 points," Philip Bump writes for the Fix. "It's real."

In Lebanon, New Hampshire on Friday, the Union Leader reports that Clinton tried gamely to treat the press corps to ice cream but was met instead with questions about the adoring fans following around her closest competitor, who's within single digits in some recent New Hampshire polling.

> Clinton had just come from an event at Dartmouth College in Hanover at which 850 people turned out. The turnout was high for a Clinton campaign stop in New Hampshire this go round, but nothing compared to the reported 10,000 people who turned out to see Sanders at a campaign stop in Wisconsin on Wednesday.
>
> When asked for her reaction to Sanders' big crowds and why she is not drawing the same numbers, she simply said, "We each run our own campaigns and I always knew it would be competitive. I want to have free debate in the primary and caucuses around the country."

Clinton booster Sen. Claire McCaskill of Missouri went on MSNBC's Morning Joe last week to downplay Bernie's large crowds, saying that "Well, you know, Rand Paul's father got massive crowds, Ron Paul. He got the same size crowds. Pat Buchanan got massive crowds. It's not unusual for someone who has an extreme message to have a following."

Even if McCaskill is right about that, there's still a cautionary tale in the Ron Paul example: the participatory structure of the Iowa caucuses allowed Paul's noisy faction to effectively stage a coup on the leadership of the state Republican party in 2012.

With a chance that Sanders has both noise and numbers in his favor, and with seven months left for him to win over voters in Iowa, Hillary should resist the urge to be dismissive of his newest fans as extremists and fanatics and start plotting to win them back to her side.

Sanders encouraged by Iowa crowds, rising polls // Des Moines Register // Kevin Hardy – July 4, 2015

On the tail end of a three-day Iowa swing, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders says he's feeling good about his momentum here and across the country.

More than 150 supporters marched with Sanders on Saturday in Waukee's Independence Day parade, the last of his eight Iowa stops this week.

"It's very gratifying to have so many people here in Waukee marching with me," said Sanders, an independent vying for the Democratic nomination for president. "I think our message is getting through. People are tired of seeing our great middle class disappear."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Iowa, Sanders has railed against money's influence on politics, big banks and the "billionaire class," while at the same time pitching policies to help strengthen the middle class, such as increasing the minimum hourly wage to $15, providing free college for all, rolling out a massive federal jobs program and making health care a universal right through a single-payer system.

"I think people want to see a change in the way we do economics, make our economic system work for working families and not just for billionaires," Sanders told reporters Saturday.

The senator's Iowa trip comes as national polls show him cutting into Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton's lead.

"Two or three months ago, not a lot of people here in Iowa knew who Bernie Sanders was or what our message was about," Sanders said. "I think it does indicate we're gaining some good momentum and I look forward to seeing it continue."

Sanders is drawing record crowds. On Wednesday night, more than 10,000 people attended his rally in Madison, Wisconsin, and nearly 2,500 attended a Friday evening event in Council Bluffs — the biggest Iowa crowd of any 2016 presidential contender yet. Sanders said he likes his chances in Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucuses.

"I think there's a lot of support and I think momentum is with us," he said.

In Waukee, Sanders led about 155 supporters who marched behind him. They chanted "Bernie, Bernie," donned "Bern Unit" shirts and cleverly inserted his name into a number of musical tunes.

"Bern, Bern, Bern, Bern is the word," they sang together to the tune of The Trashmen's 1963 hit, "Surfin' Bird."

Some parade-goers seemed surprised by Sanders' following.

"Wow, look at all those people," one woman said. "Dear God."

Sanders drew both traditional Democrats and conservatives on Saturday.

"This will be the first time I've caucused with the Democrats," said Michael Tallman, 25, of Des Moines.

Tallman, who works in banking, said Sanders seems like a candidate who will represent all people — rich or poor, male or female, gay or straight. He said many millennials are disturbed by the current political process and they could be key to boosting Sanders' shot at winning.

"I think he has a real chance," Tallman said. "We've seen it happen before."

Micheal Davenport, 35, of Des Moines said he generally votes conservatively. But he marched in support of Sanders Saturday.

Davenport is an anti-abortion Catholic (Sanders is staunchly pro-abortion rights). But Davenport said Pope Francis' call for tolerance and more moderate rhetoric surrounding social issues has made him rethink some issues.

"There's an interesting synchronicity between the Pope and Bernie," said Davenport, who works in security and is going back to school to become a teacher.

Davenport relates to Sanders stances on economic issues, which he says are just more pressing now than social issues.

"He's got the big mo," he said. "Great momentum."

AT THE EVENT

SETTING: Waukee Independence Day parade

CROWD: About 155 marching in parade

REACTION: Mills Roberts, 59, of West Des Moines said he's impressed with Sanders, whose rising stock is reminiscent of Barack Obama's come-from-behind campaign in 2008. "It has a little bit of that feel," he said as a crowd swarmed around the candidate shouting "Bernie, Bernie, Bernie."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OTHER STOPS: Creston Independence Day parade

WHAT'S NEXT: With his Iowa trip complete, Sanders will hold a campaign event in Maine on Monday. The senator has a fundraiser planned for July 16 in Washington and is scheduled to be in Iowa again July 17 for the Democratic Party's hall of fame celebration in Cedar Rapids. For details, go to DesMoines Register.com/candidate tracker.

'Feel the Bern': Activists spearhead Bernie Sanders social push // MSNBC // Eric Levitz – July 4, 2015

Bernie Sanders may trail Hillary Clinton by double digits in New Hampshire, but he leads the Democratic front-runner by more than 4,000 "points" on Twitter.

Between June 25 and July 1, the most popular hashtag associated with the Vermont senator's presidential campaign, "#feelthebern," was tweeted an average of 6,800 times-a-day, while "#hillary2016" garnered 2,700 tweets, according to Topsy, which tracks activity on social media.

The insurgent candidate's campaign picked up some momentum over the past week, too. Last Wednesday, Sanders made headlines by drawing 10,000 supporters to a campaign event in Madison, Wisconsin – the largest crowd assembled by any candidate so far this year. The following day, his campaign announced that it had raised $15 million since April 30, and a Quinnipiac poll showed Sanders gaining ground in the early voting state of Iowa.

Still, by the candidate's own estimation, it would take nothing short of a "political revolution" for Sanders to win the 2016 Democratic primary. Unable to compete with Clinton in fundraising or name recognition, Sanders will need to make social media fervor matter more than it ever has in an American election.

Winnie Wong and Charles Lenchner are spearheading that "revolution." Veteran political organizers, Wong and Lenchner created the #feelthebern hashtag and co-founded People for Bernie Sanders, a digital platform where the senator's supporters can network and organize outreach efforts both online and off. Through those efforts, People For Bernie has already enlisted 10,000 campaign volunteers, according to its organizers.

Wong believes that social media will play a greater role in 2016 than it has in any prior election.

"While I enjoy Quinnipiac polls, and watch them closely, I think there's a huge piece of data that they miss," Wong told msnbc. "In 2015, we have huge numbers of people taking to the internet to discuss everything. And those conversations will affect the outcome of the 2016 elections."

To put Sanders at the center of those conversations, People for Bernie works with data analysts to track the success of their hashtags and map the reach of their most influential Twitter supporters.

But behind such technical pursuits is an idealistic faith in the power of social media to expand democratic engagement – faith born of Wong and Lechner's experiences in New York City's Zuccotti Park in 2011.

"Many of us are graduates of Occupy Wall Street," Lenchner told msnbc. "And we feel like there's an enormous cohort of people that are disillusioned with the limited range of choices in American politics. We're committed to expanding the number and kinds of people that assert their power within the democratic system."

"Bernie is taking donations from people and from unions. There's no bull*. He's raising money from people, not corporations," Wong added.

To get a sense of the kind of anti-corporate voter that Wong and Lenchner wish to reach, Google the name "Killer Mike."

People For Bernie first reached out to the rapper from the popular group Run The Jewels in late May, tweeting to his account, "We hope that you decide to #feeltheBern. Any Q's feel free to hit us up."

Killer Mike – whose actual name is Michael Render – invited them to send more information. People for Bernie provided him with campaign memes and links to articles about Sanders' policy positions.

Last Monday, Killer Mike endorsed Sanders for president, telling his 149,000 Twitter followers, "I cannot support another Clinton or Bush ever. I am beginning to see American political families like monarchs and I have no affection for monarchs."

The fact that Sanders – the 2016 campaign's oldest candidate – is beloved on social media would seem more ironic if it weren't so familiar. In both 2008 and 2012, the elderly libertarian Rep. Ron Paul enjoyed a similarly energetic online following, while drawing similarly large, impassioned crowds to his campaign events. But that enthusiastic support proved too narrow to carry Paul anywhere near his party's nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some have called Sanders the left-wing version of Paul, and expect his campaign to run a similar course. But Lenchner argues that there's a key distinction between the two candidates – unlike Paul, Sanders' central policy positions actually enjoy broad public support.

"Ron Paul's signature's issue was the Federal Reserve and monetary policy, and I would say that's esoteric for most people," Lenchner said. "That's of a different caliber than Bernie's issues – There's too much inequality. We should take care of our veterans. We should allow our students to graduate without being in debt servitude. These are not complicated issues to explain."

Still, Lenchner doesn't mind the comparison with the Paul campaign. While the former Texas congressman failed to win his party's nomination, Lenchner believes his candidacy helped promote a libertarian view of criminal justice reform that has since gained traction within the GOP.

Ultimately, Wong and Lenchner are as concerned with promoting Sanders' policies as they are with promoting his candidacy. Both are veterans of the campaign to draft Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the Democratic presidential primary race, and believe that the threat of her candidacy forced Clinton to run on a significantly more progressive platform in 2016 than she did in 2008.

Sanders' candidacy has already brought mainstream media attention to proposals like free public college and a 90% top marginal tax-rate – policies that were far outside the left-pole of the 2012 debate.

"The traditional political game is one in which we're presented with a really narrow range of options," Lenchner said. "And expanding that range isn't a strategy in order to do something – it's one of the goals of politics itself."

Our Bernie Sanders moment: This July 4, remember only true independence and revolution ever brings change // Salon // Patrick L. Smith – July 4, 2015

One of the things progressives often get wrong has to do with how fundamental change comes about. The standard reasoning is that people are stirred when they hit the bottom of the bottom—a condition of diminished expectations. It takes an economic depression, or a lot of political repression, to prompt people to rise. We need things to get worse before they get better. Let the suffering come.

This appears to be an entirely logical dialectic. But politics as desperation, as we might call the thought, rarely, if ever, proves out. Almost always it turns out to be an error.

Follow this line, and you want the Kochs to smash what remains of the political process to smithereens. You want the Supreme Court handing down ever more irrational judgments, you want more cops-in-camo shooting African-Americans, you want more unemployment and more reckless ambition among the foreign policy cliques. Then, you declare, people will be stirred out of the stupefied apathy that grips this nation.

We ought to ask ourselves this July 4 the extent to which we are given to this argument. Speaking only for myself, I made the mistake too many times too many years ago not to have learned how wrong it is.

Those who, in another time, made revolution their work knew better. It is amid rising expectations, not falling, that people are most likely to exert themselves in pursuit of authentic change.

The key to this truth, I have always thought, lies in a people's consciousness of themselves. It is when they get some worthy things done, and so realize the power they possess, that they use it to effect change with true dedication. Nineteenth century Europe offers many examples making the point. If I have my history right, the Russian revolution is a classic case. (And so is the Berlin Wall's fall.)

But there is no need to go further than the event we now celebrate, thoughtfully or thoughtlessly as the case may be, to find an irrefutable demonstration of the point.

Let's ask ourselves this July 4: What exactly was on the minds of the signers gathered in Philadelphia 239 summers ago this weekend? Was George III's boot on the colonists' necks the primary sensation? The Declaration was the original American case of politics as desperation? It was all about the Stamp Act, the taxes on tea, the Boston Massacre?

Wrong read, obviously. The Declaration was a statement of principle reflecting the confidence of people who had the Boston Tea Party, the First Continental Congress, the battles of Lexington and Concord, the Second Continental Congress and Bunker Hill immediately behind them. In Jefferson's handwriting they read of a future that they understood would belong to them. The document exudes determination in its very cadences.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I mention this for a reason that may be plain by now. As anyone who pays attention knows, we have just witnessed at least two very significant political advances and probably a third. Suddenly, the expectations of many millions are rising.

The gay marriage and health care decisions, handed down by the worst, most corruptly biased Supreme Court to sit in my lifetime, suggest that those judges who are nothing more than creatures of conservative ideology and corporate interests recognized that they would risk a national revolt had they ruled the other way on these questions. This is my read.

What will come of the Charleston murders is still to be determined. But we have already seen an extraordinary display of solidarity and restraint as a forms of power among South Carolina blacks close to the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and it looks like this could eventually drive the worst of Old Dixie down.

The point not to be missed: We reach this national day with the wind at last at our backs and the road coming up to meet us, as the Irish say. I see a momentum in the cause of a progressive redefinition of what it means to be American that seemed little more than delusion or a faded memory but a few years ago, so thoroughly did the American right appear to triumph in the name of a perverse notion of patriotism.

Expectations rise. Returning to my original thought, a chance to get still more done, created by way of a lot of sacrifice and hard work, presents itself. What will people do with it? This is our question—not least because the 2016 election draws near, and I will return to these.

A little autobiography here. In many years abroad I often looked back and thought I saw some salutary impulse to resist the marketization of the political process and the commodification of all culture at the hands of corporations possessed of a conscienceless greed. It seemed just under the surface, waiting to break through.

Then I would return on home leave and find everyone kicking the dirt. Talk about diminished expectations. An assumption of powerlessness was everywhere I looked. I found it hard to be around. I had to put what I thought I saw from afar down to illusion, or an incurable streak of optimism wholly in the American grain.

What about Obama's victory in 2008, you ask. Yes, it seemed at the time a confirmation of the perceptions I describe. I have said this before in this space: I wept tears of joy when McCain capitulated—11 in the morning where I was. But soon enough, the cold, hard judgment rendered by the late, estimable Alex Cockburn seemed more the case: The junior senator was too pretty for his own good, Cockburn wrote before the election, and would never get his hands dirty.

A revised, altogether complicated take on Obama will have to get written, given how things have just turned, but it no longer seems I was so wrong as all that. What I thought I saw now takes form. The events of the past couple of weeks have been crystallizing in this respect.

I leave the foreign side out of this, you will note. It is the dark side of Obama's moon by any reasonable reckoning.

At writing, there are one and a half exceptions. Yes, the opening to Cuba is a triumphant stroke. (I wept the morning that was announced, too, half a century's suffering at American hands finally ended.) Iran may come good, depending on how Secretary of State Kerry does in the final days of negotiations on a deal governing the Iranian nuclear program.

But Cuba is as nothing next to the truly strategic blunders—Russia, Ukraine, Iraq redux, a god-awful misinterpretation of China and its intent and now NATO unbound. By the same token, any Iran deal will be purposely shorn of its proper significance: An agreement with Tehran should open out to a broad rapprochement, so altering numerous dysfunctional relationships, not least Washington's with Israel. But the White House is already clear that no such potential is to be explored. What Obama wants is primarily to assuage the Israeli right wing, and that is the wrong ambition. It has already cost Egyptians their first attempt at democratic government.

So the Cold War ends in Cuba and begins again on Russia's western border and across the Pacific. Status quo in the Middle East. This is the Obama record on the foreign side. I count it an appalling legacy.

I do not think we can forget this when celebrating the past couple of weeks' good news at home. In this there is a lesson in the Obama presidency, and I will return to it shortly.

For now, a couple of things that should be considered next to the crystallizing events of the past couple of weeks.

One is the unexpected (at least among many of us) success of Bernie Sanders since the Vermont senator announced he would run for the Democratic nomination. The other, of considerable importance if of somewhat lesser magnitude, was a remarkable piece published recently on this site called "Hillary Clinton is going to lose: She doesn't even see the frustrated progressive wave that will nominate Bernie Sanders."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Numerous students of American politics argue now that Sanders cannot win the nomination and is even further from carrying the election next year; he is important because he shows how weak Hillary is. As of now, both of these judgments seem right.

But I hold to "as of now." One, Sanders trails Clinton by a startlingly small margin in one poll after another. Two, you do not want to underestimate the power of rising expectations. Think again of the signers in Philadelphia and the events that propelled them there over a very short period. Political landscapes can change very quickly.

Listen to what Sanders has to say. To me it is perfectly clear, and I doubt he would be so shy of the language as American politicians customarily are: He is talking about a social democratic America, which is not a new idea. It is a 19th century idea buried and made "un-American" by very bad Americans posing as patriots.

In terms deployed previously in this space and in the books noted at this column's end, Sanders is talking about a demythologized America, a nation free of its exceptionalist tradition, one wherein we understand ourselves and what we do in historical terms. Myth or history: In my view, absolutely no distinction is more important now. At bottom, it is putting this question in front of us, if only implicitly, that makes Sanders important.

As to the Salon piece just noted, it is remarkable not only for its argument but also for who makes it. Read it here. Bill Curry was an adviser to Bill Clinton and twice ran for governor on the Democratic ticket in Connecticut. And here he is asserting, "There's a rumbling out there, but most Democrats are a long way from hearing it, let alone joining in."

Curry's piece astonished me for its to-the-point pith when I read it and has captivated me ever since. Here we have a mainstreamer and one-time White House insider identifying a progressive groundswell—his word—that has often seemed illusory because virtually no one in power dared acknowledge it. In effect, Curry pierces a conspiracy of silence, just as Sanders does.

More than this, Curry thinks this now-evident current in American politics is already strong enough to tip Hillary over.

None of us can forecast with authority at this early moment. What interests me is the power Curry assigns those who want to see authentic change and who see Hillary Clinton for precisely what she is: treacherously awful, whose nomination would amount to a political blight. Hillary would do one thing with the expectations now rising among Americans: Foil them, crush them, pervert them, turn them bitter. Take your pick, they all amount to the same thing.

I got off Hillary's bus long ago. Anyone remember November 1999, when, as first lady, she traveled to the West Bank, where she lunched and exchanged ceremonial praises with Suha Arafat, the late Yasser's wife? On departing she kissed Suha Arafat on the cheek—a kiss of Judas straight out of Matthew, for when Clinton arrived in Jerusalem to shrieks of protest, she thought nothing of denouncing Arafat and effectively denying the gesture of friendship made a matter of hours earlier.

Unforgivable, but that is Hillary. Opportunism incarnate is all I see. To be honest, until Sanders announced his candidacy I could not think of a single reason to vote. We were offered no choice.

In pursuing the Democratic nomination, Sanders has craftily averted all the "don't split the vote" rubbish one heard when Ralph Nader ran as the candidate of the Greens, the Vermont Progressives and the United Citizens Party. This is exceptionally astute. There is nothing better than winning, but a close second in the current American context is pushing candidates with alternative politics in voters' faces and forcing them to think about what they have to say.

Such candidates have a cumulative effect, in other words, that can take several election cycles to play out. The rapid pace of recent events notwithstanding, we have to think in terms of a generational project, it seems to me. In repudiating Nader in 2000, those who may otherwise have supported him missed this, so that when the election was over, George W. the victor, Democrats were at square one, no ground gained, as there could have been, in the course of the defeat.

I would support Sanders on this basis alone. In a phrase, he speaks to the groundswell. He is rising expectations, so obvious on this 239th anniversary, made flesh. And in this Sanders stands more or less alone among holders of high office for the moment, unless we count the reticent Elizabeth Warren.

And here is the lesson the Obama administration leaves us with. As expectations rise by way of big victories, we do not need another gradualist who comes out of the policy cliques, or is too weak to resist them, and is hence available to be betrayed in their internecine wars for power. If the successes of the past few weeks tell us anything, it is that transformers, not transitioners, are required if we are to make sense of our time. Obama wanted to be the former but has turned out the latter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More broadly, we must begin to identify mythologizers and exceptionalists, no matter their professed stripe—and Hillary and her former boss are of this type. And we must recognize the historicists among us, such as Bernie Sanders. If this is what sets Sanders fundamentally apart, I urge we learn from him the importance of the distinction: Unless Americans master the exceptionalist impulse and dispose of all its attendant rhetoric, no battle worth fighting can be decisively won.

Genuine Americans are critical Americans. This is by definition. And they are unceasingly critical of the definition itself. Critical Americans just handed us some excellent news. Happy 4th to them, especially.

The Times Doctrine on Bernie Sanders // HuffPo // David Bromwich – July 4, 2015

On the fourth of July, the New York Times gave its readers a first extended look at the political history of Bernie Sanders in Vermont. The article, by Sarah Lyall, is titled "Bernie Sanders's Revolutionary Roots Were Nurtured in '60s Vermont." This sketch of the young Sanders is free of obvious malice. It would serve its purpose less effectively if it were malicious.

The attitude that Lyall adopts toward Senator Sanders is, instead, mildly and cheerfully disparaging -- affectionate, but at the proper distance of condescension; ironically agreeable, as you are allowed to be in dealing with a second cousin or an eccentric uncle who is a bit of a blowhard. Hers is not the first such article to appear on Sanders in the Times. Is it safe to predict that this will remain the paper's approach to his campaign for as long as he stays in the race?

Though malice is absent, the pejorative shading here begins with the title. Does Sanders today describe himself as a revolutionist? "Revolutionary roots" implies that he does. Sanders indeed calls himself a democratic socialist. But it was a pretty steady difference between socialists and communists, throughout the twentieth century, that socialists would choose not to describe themselves as revolutionists. They were radical reformers and tended to reject the path of violence that revolutionists embrace. "Radical reformist roots" would have made a truer but a less eye-catching headline.

Symptomatic excerpts from the article follow in boldface, with my comments in italics:

[The young Bernie Sanders] came to Vermont in the late 1960s to help plan the upending of the old social order.

Did he in fact come to Vermont with a detailed plan? The word suggests that Sanders was a bit deluded. More likely, he came to Vermont with no plan except to organize and reform: something that people with political convictions have been known to do. The word "upending" is curious. It comes from football: a linebacker who tackles a charging halfback by a grabbing his ankles and tossing him head-over-heels is said to upend him. You can't do that to something as heterogeneous and extended as American society. The word suggests as much without having to say so. But it is unlikely that he ever used the word "upend"; once again, the relevant missing word and idea is reform.

+++

[A youthful article by Sanders in the Vermont Freeman gave] an apocalyptically alarmist account of the unbearable horror of having an office job in New York City.

The pileup of "apocalyptically alarmist" and "unbearable horror" triggers the sarcasm. You can almost hear the unwritten sequel: "An office job in New York City? Give me a break." Various personalities of the era - Bob Dylan, Simon and Garfunkel -- seem to have shared the sentiments of the young Sanders, but the incredulous adverb and adjectives do their work.

+++

Chalk some of this up to being young and unemployed. Mr. Sanders, now 73, has had a steady, nonrevolutionary job for quite some time now.

It is the usual dig. Resistance and protest come from dissatisfaction and failure; get a decent job and watch how your politics change.

+++

... barely 30, full of restless energy, with wild curly hair, a brash Brooklyn manner and a mind fizzing with plans to remake the world. Short on money but long on ideas...

Human-interest writing may come disguised as biography but it performs that duty imperfectly. The fizzing mind is there because it rhymes with the frizzy hair. "Short on money but long on ideas" is a cliché so lazy that the barb is robbed of its sting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

+++

[Sanders's description of himself as a freelance writer] is a bit of a stretch. A look through his journalistic output, such as it was, reveals that he had perhaps a dozen articles published.

How many articles do you have to publish to qualify as a freelance writer? Two dozen? The pedantry is polemical.

+++

[In a 1972 article by Sanders, the] opening passage, which deals with men's sexual fantasies, is meant to be satirically provocative but comes across as crassly sexist.

The article was reprinted in Mother Jones, and readers are free to check their impressions against Lyall's description. It opens with a suggestion that men too often fantasize themselves as rapists and women fantasize being raped: the pleasurable compulsiveness of the fantasies testifies to the sickness sex in American society. However shallow or wrong this speculation, Lyall's characterization of it as "crassly sexist" is false. The title, "Man -- And Woman," is enough to indicate the perspective.

Men think of women as an afterthought, the young Sanders was saying, and that is our mistake. The article declares that the typical male vice is "pigness" while the typical female vice is "slavishness." It advises men to stop being pigs and women to stop being slaves. Lyall says that this early article has drawn "unflattering attention," but her only link online yields a brief Times paragraph which alludes to criticism "bouncing around social media." In fact, the unflattering attention has mostly come from right-wing corporate and pro-war sites -- Town Hall, National Review, The Weekly Standard, Breitbart -- whose reasons for undermining Sanders are remote from feminism.

+++

"Sexual adjustment seemed to be very poor in those with cancer of the cervix," [Sanders] wrote, quoting a study in a journal called Psychosomatic Medicine.

"Wrote, quoting": but if he quoted it, he didn't write it. This is meant to emphasize again the supposed oddity of Sanders's sexual attitudes, but it should never have passed editing.

+++

He also made a half-hour film about his hero, Eugene V. Debs, the labor organizer who ran unsuccessfully for president five times.

What a peculiar fellow to have as a hero. The conjunction of "unsuccessfully" and "five times" makes Debs an average union organizer and a serial failure: he couldn't stop running for president. Not a word about Debs going to prison for his opposition to American involvement in the First World War. Would it be different -- and perhaps fairer -- to speak of Eugene V. Debs as "the union leader who founded the Social Democratic Party of America"? Of course, that would open up a weakness or two in the story of Sanders's hopeless eccentricity.

None of this is likely to change as the contest of ideas in the presidential race grows warmer. "What contest," you may ask. The Republican field has drawn amused regard from the mainstream media for its array of qualified and unqualified candidates -- the former seeking ever more assiduously to resemble the latter -- with its apparent consensus that climate change is a hoax and that we should have more wars, less immigration, no unions, and work together to facilitate the extinction of public education. The exception is Rand Paul, with his explicit criticism of mass warrantless surveillance and of the Iraq and Libya wars.

The Democrats have been saved from embarrassment by showing little interest in public discussion and only the beginnings of a debate. With the exception of Bernie Sanders: His announcement of his candidacy and his early speeches in Wisconsin and Iowa have shown no slackening in the force of his attacks on Wall Street and the big corporations. His voice today speaks almost alone for a wide dissatisfaction among the electorate with our politics generally, and the popular jealousy of the vested interests that for two decades have dictated policy and set the limits of reform far beyond the area of free trade and the bank interest rates. Public opinion must be controlled, domesticated, shepherded, and the dissatisfactions made somehow laughable. Every amusing and dismissive report on a figure like Sanders or Paul goes to serve that larger purpose.

Bernie Sanders Sets A 2016 Record By Drawing A Huge Overflow Crowd In Iowa // Politicus // Jason Easley – July 4, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders set a new record in Iowa by drawing an overflow crowd of 2,600 to a venue that only had 2,300 chairs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The biggest Iowa crowd so far for any presidential candidate turned out on a Friday night in Council Bluffs to hear Bernie Sanders ask them to join a new American political revolution to reclaim the government of the United States from the billionaire class.

At least 2,600 people filled the 2,300 chairs at the Mid-America Convention Center and stood at the rear of the cavernous convention hall.

It was a remarkable turnout on the eve of Saturday's Fourth of July celebration as the Bernie called on them to join a mass movement to restore the once-great American middle class.

They cheered when he called for raising the minimum wage to $15 an hour. They applauded when he said it's time to break up the big banks on Wall Street. They shouted approval when he credited Pope Francis for his call for bold action to prevent catastrophic climate change. They rose to their feet when he said the United States should join every other major country and provide health care as a right of citizenship.

The recent Quinnipiac Poll that showed Sanders gaining on Hillary Clinton in Iowa looks like it was no fluke.

Bernie Sanders is setting attendance records where ever he goes. Sen. Sanders has more grassroots enthusiasm for his campaign than any Republican candidate, yet the media continues to give airtime to clowns and controversy mongers like Donald Trump, Ted Cruz, and Mike Huckabee.

At some point, the press must be forced to wake up and realize that the issues that Bernie Sanders is talking about are the ones that matter to the American people. When the media ignores Bernie Sanders, they are ignoring the concerns of hard-working Americans.

By filling up arena and venues around the country when Sanders comes to their towns, the American people are forcing the corporate owned media to pay attention.

How Bernie Sanders threatens to derail Hillary's coronation // NY Post // Michael Goodwin – July 5, 2015

Trying to create a presidential persona and a rationale for running, Hillary Clinton relaunched her campaign at a memorial to FDR. She used the glorious setting of Four Freedoms Park to summon Roosevelt's legacy and frame her theme as "Four Fights."

She also invoked her husband and President Obama, as if piggy-backing on presidents would define her. Perhaps it will work, but her predicament recalls a Dem president she didn't mention: Lyndon Baines Johnson. The similarities must scare her.

LBJ looked certain to be re-elected in 1968, until a Minnesota senator with a penchant for poetry named Eugene McCarthy shocked the world by getting 42 percent in the New Hampshire primary, against Johnson's 49 percent. Less than three weeks later, the president famously declared that "I shall not seek, and I will not accept, the nomination of my party for another term as your president."

If there is a McCarthy-like figure on the scene today, it is Bernie Sanders, the scrappy underdog threatening to upset Hillary's coronation.

The news that Sanders is surging in polls in Iowa and New Hampshire must be sending shivers through Clinton's camp. Even though Hillary still leads in the 2016 first states, the gap has narrowed so much that her surrogates are lowering expectations, saying Sanders might win some showdowns.

That's amazing enough, but her problem could be even more serious. Echoing the Mark Twain line that "history doesn't repeat itself, but it does rhyme," the Clinton-Sanders dynamic is starting to rumble like the political earthquake of '68.

LBJ's demise is a textbook example of how quickly the bubble can burst. He had the power of incumbency while Hillary wears the mantle of inevitability. That didn't work for her in 2008, either, when Obama emerged to crash her party.

Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist, doesn't need to win the nomination — and he probably won't — to block Clinton. He only need show that she's not inevitable, and that there is a motivated, significant piece of the party that rejects her.

That is exactly what he's doing, as large, enthusiastic crowds greet him wherever he goes. If she looks beatable, more viable candidates will find the courage to run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's the McCarthy model. He ran as a dissident against the Vietnam War and the New Hampshire results in mid-March of '68 crystallized unhappiness with Johnson.

Nearly 20,000 American soldiers were dead by the end of 1967, and the election year would be the bloodiest of all. It started with a Jan. 1 attack on a US military base and February's Tet Offensive saw the deadliest single week of the war, when 543 Americans were killed and more than 2,500 wounded. Overall, 16,899 of our soldiers died in 1968, the most in any year.

In those dark days, many people, including top Democrats, grew disillusioned with Johnson, and McCarthy's promise to end the conflict found special resonance among draft-age students. Shaggy anti-war protesters shaved and got haircuts in a "clean for Gene" movement.

But the New Hampshire primary was McCarthy's high-water mark. After Johnson bowed out, Bobby Kennedy jumped in, as did Vice President Hubert Humphrey. Kennedy probably would have won, but was assassinated in June by Palestinian terrorist Sirhan Sirhan. Humphrey got the nod at the Chicago convention, a debacle marked by violent street protests that helped Republican Richard Nixon win the presidency.

For her part, Clinton already has veered left to head off a challenge from the progressive flank. But her long record as a relative military hawk who is cozy with Wall Street is proving a tough sell in a party increasingly more radical than she is.

The anti-Hillary movement is also picking up steam because of her shady dealings with international oligarchs and the rivers of cash flowing to the Clinton Foundation. Never reliably honest, she's been caught in lies about her e-mails as secretary of state, leading most voters to say she is untrustworthy. That, in turn, is keeping several GOP candidates ahead or close in hypothetical matchups.

Although she remains the likely nominee, there are many dents in Clinton's armor and a long way to go. By the end, 2016 could be the new 1968.

Bratton is better than his word

Bill Bratton's bite is worse than his bark. That's a very good thing for New York.

With crime in June falling to its lowest level since at least 1993, the top cop is showing he still has a talent for miracles. Through May, murder was up nearly 20 percent.

Bratton's reaction then was a disappointment, writing in The Post that the "relatively minor increase" did not mean crime was "raging out of control." He said he had a plan of action, but his lack of a clear promise sounded like he was preparing the city for a new normal of more violence.

Thankfully, that has not happened. June's numbers were dramatically lower than a year ago, with murders down 38 percent and fewer shootings, rapes, robberies and stolen cars.

Beyond the obvious benefits, the stats are comforting because they prove the NYPD still can move quickly and make a life-saving difference despite the handcuffs and insults coming from City Hall. It's just one month, but let's hope this is the start of a new, downward trend.

Congratulations to the commissioner and all the members of the NYPD. Once again, they showed why they are the Finest.

Smith's old wives tale

Former state Senate leader Malcolm Smith had delusions of grandeur, boasting that he, President Obama and Gov. David Paterson all had wives named Michelle. The implication was that he, too, was bound for glory.

His sentencing on federal bribery charges brought him back to earth with a thud. A Democrat, he was convicted of a scheme to buy his way onto the Republican mayoral ballot in 2013.

Leaving court last week, Smith said only, "I thank God for the opportunity I've had to serve." Presumably, he didn't mean his time in prison, which was set at seven years.

Oh, how the would-be mighty have fallen.

Pataki plays his 'Trump' card

Who's afraid of Donald Trump? Apparently most of the GOP presidential candidates except George Pataki.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even as Republicans try to attract Latino voters, the former three-term New York governor broke the party's shocking silence over Trump's statement that Mexican immigrants are "bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists."

In an open letter to competitors, Pataki said the comments "left me and a lot of other sensible people wondering what century we are living in," and urged others to join him in denouncing them.

Initially, only former Texas Gov. Rick Perry mumbled disagreement, but late Friday Marco Rubio finally denounced Trump's comments as "offensive." And yesterday, Jeb Bush chimed in, labeling Trump's remarks "extraordinarily ugly." Better late than never.

Pataki is a long shot for the nomination, but his refreshing capacity for decency has not been dimmed by his time out of office.

WEBB

Jim Webb Announces Presidential Bid; Only Democratic Candidate Opposed To Marriage Equality // On Top // Carlos Santoscoy – July 4, 2015

Former Virginia Senator Jim Webb on Thursday announced his bid for the White House.

Webb made his announcement in a 2,000-word Facebook post.

"After many months of thought, deliberation and discussion, I have decided to seek the office of the Presidency of the United States," Webb wrote.

He said that he had decided to run because "our country needs a fresh approach to solving the problems that confront us and too often unnecessarily divide us. ... And at the same time our fellow Americans need proven, experienced leadership that can be trusted to move us forward from a new President's first days in office."

Webb is the fifth candidate seeking the Democratic nomination. Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is considered the race's frontrunner. Also in the race are Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley and former Rhode Island Governor Lincoln Chafee. All of Webb's rivals support marriage equality.

While Webb is generally supportive of LGBT rights, he has yet to officially change his stance favoring civil unions, not marriage, for gay and lesbian couples. During a 2014 appearance on Meet the Press, Webb said that the debate "has been a good thing for the country."

CHAFEE

Chafee's campaign leaves some NH Democrats a bit puzzled // Miami Herald // Michelle R. Smith – July 4, 2015

LACONIA, N.H. - Presidential candidate Lincoln Chafee stands before a few dozen people at a meeting of New Hampshire's Belknap County Democrats. The Republican-turned-independent-turned-Democrat gets nods of approval when he tells them he was the only Republican senator to vote against authorizing the war in Iraq.

Then smiles turn to laughter when he pitches another idea: The U.S. should switch to the metric system.

The former Rhode Island governor has visited the first primary state of New Hampshire a dozen times this year. But he seems to be making barely a ripple — aside from curiosity about some of his policy platforms.

In Belknap County, at least some Democrats seemed intrigued by Chafee as someone who could represent an alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton, the commanding favorite for the nomination. But they are also puzzled by what he talks about sometimes.

Chafee told the group he wants to bring National Security Agency leaker Edward Snowden home, dropping all charges against him. Paula Trombi of Meredith said she liked some of what he said but was taken aback and disappointed by his position on Snowden. She also can't understand why he keeps talking about the metric system, of all things.

"With all the troubles that are going on, that seems almost odd to bring up," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dave Kerr, a selectman in Barnstead, said he agreed with Chafee that billions have been spent on the war that could have been better spent on roads and schools. But Kerr was leaving with a poster and a donation envelope for another Democratic rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who also opposed the Iraq war. A Sanders supporter had handed them out, and Kerr wondered why Chafee hadn't, also.

Chafee is known to dislike fundraising and is just starting to raise money for a race where spending is expected to be measured in the billions. His past campaigns — two Senate races as a Republican and a governor's race as an independent — have relied on an old New England family fortune amassed over generations.

Dave Pollak, chairman of Belknap County Democrats, said he agreed with Chafee that Snowden is a whistleblower and should not be prosecuted. With Chafee's background in different parties, Pollak sees him as someone who could bridge the ideological divide between Democrats and Republicans. He even likes the metric system idea.

But Pollak finds other aspects of Chafee's campaign peculiar.

Clinton's campaign is in contact with the group every week inviting its members to events, has multiple campaign offices open and created specialty groups for supporters such as "High Schoolers for Hillary." The Sanders campaign sends regular "rousing" emails on issues, Pollak said. The campaign for another rival, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also has staff in the state.

Chafee, on the other hand, has no campaign staff in New Hampshire yet and appears to be running on a shoestring. Although Chafee has a vacation home further north in Franconia, he said he hasn't been staying there during the campaign. Instead, he drives to his New Hampshire events from Rhode Island, a five-hour round trip this evening. He was back in Somersworth, New Hampshire, the following day.

It makes Pollak wonder how serious he is.

"What's the organization?" he asks. "What gives you confidence that he can get the voters out?"

Chafee gets testy when asked about matters like that. He says it's an "evolutionary process."

"You guys never ask anything about the substance," he told a reporter. "It's always about how many people, how much money have you raised. Ugh.

"I wish there was more intellectual discussion about the issues in these campaigns."

As he spoke, Chafee aide Jonathan Stevens handed out stickers saying "Trust Chafee." The design and motto are identical to the one from his 2010 campaign for governor. Asked if they're 2010 leftovers, Stevens replied, "We recycle everything."

Stickers bearing this year's motto, "Fresh Ideas for America," were nowhere in sight.

UNDECLARED

BIDEN

The Joe Biden (mini-)boom // Pittsburgh Post-Gazette // David M. Shribman – July 5, 2015

Suddenly everybody's talking about Joe Biden.

That itself is a phenomenon. The nation's first vice president, John Adams, described the job in a letter to his wife as "the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived or his imagination conceived," and indeed he did little in it. Its later occupants — and here the names Daniel D. Tompkins, Richard Mentor Johnson, Henry Wilson and Charles W. Fairbanks come to mind only if you're playing a particularly difficult trivia contest — have faded into the mists of history, forgettable and forgotten.

But in recent years vice presidents have become important forces in American political life. As late as 1977, the vice presidency was a political backwater; titanic political figures such as former Senate majority leader Lyndon B. Johnson and former Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller swiftly grew bored and depressed in the office. But all that changed when Sen. Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota negotiated an important role for the vice presidency as the price of joining former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia on the 1976 Democratic ticket, and strong vice presidents such as Albert Gore Jr. and Richard B. Cheney further changed the profile of the office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, in a major departure from American history, vice presidents recently have become formidable presidential candidates. Richard Nixon and Mr. Gore were in breathtakingly close presidential elections only to lose in disputed circumstances. George H.W. Bush ascended directly to the presidency. Mr. Mondale and Hubert H. Humphrey won tough battles for the Democratic presidential nomination but lost in the general election. The vice presidency has become a potent staging ground for a presidential campaign.

Which is why Mr. Biden now is in the news again — not for what he has done but for what he might do.

Today nobody has an inkling whether Mr. Biden will seek to ascend the greasy pole to the presidency. He is in deep mourning for his son, Beau Biden, who died at 46 in May, though the younger Mr. Biden (and his brother, Hunter) are thought to have hoped for a third Biden presidential candidacy. The first two, in 1988 and 2008, went nowhere, though Mr. Biden's elder-statesman wisdom and generous spirit positioned him to become Barack Obama's running mate in 2008.

Makeshift draft-Biden efforts have launched in the early political states of Iowa and New Hampshire, but they do not have the heft of either the Ready for Hillary or the Run Warren Run organizations that were created for former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who now is running for president, and Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who apparently is not. They pale in comparison, moreover, with the Draft Eisenhower effort of 1951 and 1952, when the former supreme commander of Allied forces hadn't even made clear whether he was a Republican or a Democrat.

The question for 2016 is whether either the vice presidency or Mr. Biden himself have the advantages Mr. Bush and Mr. Gore possessed when they sought to go directly from the office to the White House. Mr. Bush is the only person after Martin Van Buren to make that leap since 1837. Mr. Nixon, a two-term vice president under Gen. Eisenhower, failed to do so in 1960, though he prevailed eight years later, defeating another vice president, Mr. Humphrey.

None of the vice presidents who won presidential nominations began the race as far behind as Mr. Biden, nor did any face an established, perhaps even historic, rival with the profile of Ms. Clinton, wife of a onetime president, secretary of state to another and a U.S. senator. Mr. Biden is in single digits in the latest Iowa and New Hampshire polls, and Ms. Clinton holds a lead of nearly five-to-one over Mr. Biden in the RealClearPolitics survey.

Until recent times, the presidential prospects of a vice president such as Mr. Biden would be considered remote. Though 13 vice presidents have become presidents, all but four of them ascended through the death or resignation of an incumbent. John Adams (1796) and Thomas Jefferson (1800) pulled that off when the political system bore almost no resemblance to contemporary American politics.

Only in the 20th century, and only sporadically at that, has the vice presidency been regarded as a stepping stone. Three wealthy men of small accomplishment but large ambition sought the position with an eye on the presidency in the first half of the century. Two of them (Franklin Delano Roosevelt, successful 1920 Democratic nominee, and John F. Kennedy, unsuccessful 1956 Democratic contender) calculated the vice presidency would enhance their resumes. The third, Theodore Roosevelt, became president on the death of William McKinley in 1901.

Like Mr. Cheney before him, Mr. Biden's appeal for the vice presidency was based in large measure on the belief he would not seek the White House on his own. But Mr. Cheney, while an important vice president, did not have a history of seeking the presidency while Mr. Biden has been preoccupied with the notion for decades. Though his 1988 campaign ended amid charges he plagiarized part of his stump speech from the British Labor leader Nick Kinnock, it is largely forgotten today that Mr. Biden was regarded as a very strong contender and the one with perhaps the best-developed strategy for winning the White House.

That strategy — a Baby Boomer appeal by a man who wasn't part of that generation but nonetheless recognized the power of 75 million voters born between 1946 and 1964 — would have no resonance today. His attraction in 2016 would be as the tested man of experience, the onetime young-man-in-a-hurry who now possesses the seasoning, patience and perspective to guide the United States to the end of the second decade of the new century.

Ms. Clinton already has broken with the administration on the Pacific trade pact and will be under pressure to identify other areas in which she differs. Mr. Biden would face the same pressure but would have less incentive or inclination to identify differences with his patron.

But in two respects a Biden candidacy would help Ms. Clinton. He is five years older than she, thus removing the age issue. And he is still a member of the administration, thus removing the notion that Ms. Clinton is the candidate of a third Obama term.

GOP

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DECLARED

BUSH

Indignant Jeb Bush Says He Takes Donald Trump's Remarks Personally // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 4, 2015

MERRIMACK, N.H. – Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican and three children were raised to celebrate their bicultural roots, showed a flash of anger on Saturday as he said that he "absolutely" took personal offense when Donald Trump recently described Mexican immigrants coming to the United States as "rapists" and criminals.

Mr. Bush, a former Florida governor, used his strongest language yet to denounce Mr. Trump, a rival for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination and the second-place finisher behind Mr. Bush in a New Hampshire poll that was conducted after Mr. Trump made those remarks. Mr. Bush, after marching in an Independence Day parade here with two of his children, George and Noelle, said that Mr. Trump's views are "way out of the mainstream" of the party.

"To make these extraordinarily ugly kind of comments is not reflective of the Republican Party," Mr. Bush said about Mr. Trump, whose comments caused NBC, Univision, Macy's and others to cut ties with him.

"He's doing this — he's not a stupid guy, so I don't assume he thinks that every Mexican crossing the border is a rapist. He's doing this to inflame and incite and to draw attention, which seems to be the organizing principle of his campaign," Mr. Bush said.

Asked if he took Mr. Trump's remarks personally, given his family, Mr. Bush became a little cross.

"Yeah, of course it — absolutely — and a lot of other people" did as well, he said. "But politically, we're going to win when we're hopeful and optimistic and big and broad rather than errrrr, grrrr, just angry all the time. This is an exaggerated form of that, and there is no tolerance for it."

Another Republican candidate, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, gave a different answer on Friday when asked about Mr. Trump, a longtime friend. He criticized Mr. Trump's remarks but then appeared to vouch for him.

"I like Donald. He's a good guy," Mr. Christie said. "And as I said right from the beginning, he'll be as serious a candidate as he wants to be. Those are his choices."

Mr. Trump issued a statement in response to the criticism, saying, "Today, Jeb Bush once again proves that he is out of touch with the American people. Just like the simple question asked of Jeb on Iraq, where it took him five days and multiple answers to get it right, he doesn't understand anything about the border or border security. In fact, Jeb believes illegal immigrants who break our laws when they cross our border come "out of love." "

Bush: 'Absolutely' offended by Trump's comments on Mexicans // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – July 4, 2015

MERRIMACK, N.H. -- Jeb Bush says he's "absolutely" personally offended by Donald Trump's recent incendiary comments about Mexico and immigrants coming from the country.

Bush, the former Florida governor whose wife is from Mexico, made his comments about Trump to reporters at the end of two Independence Day parades in the first-in-the-nation primary state.

"I don't think he represents the Republican Party, and his views are way out of the mainstream of what Republicans think," Bush said. "No one suggests that we shouldn't control our borders – everybody has a belief that we should control our borders. But to make these extraordinarily ugly kind of comments is not reflective of the Republican Party. Trump is wrong on this."

"He's doing this to inflame and to incite and to get to draw attention which just seems to be the organization principle of his campaign. It doesn't represent the Republican Party or its values," Bush added.

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush begins marching in an Independence Day parade in Amherst, N.H., on Saturday. (Ed O'Keefe/The Washington Post)

During his announcement speech nearly three weeks ago, Trump blamed Mexico for allowing immigrants to illegally cross into the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They’re bringing drugs,” Trump said in his campaign announcement speech. “They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists.”

In the weeks since, several companies have cut ties to Trump and Democrats have seized on the remarks as further evidence of the GOP's difficulty in appealing to Latinos and other minority groups.

Bush was asked whether he's personally offended by the comments, given that his wife, Columba, was born in Mexico.

"Yeah, of course. Absolutely. And a lot of other people as well," he said. "But politically -- we’re going to win when we’re hopeful and optimistic and big and broad rather than 'RRRR'" he said -- literally, growling -- "just angry all the time. This is an exaggerated form of that and there is no tolerance for it."

Bush made similar, but less expansive comments about Trump while campaigning in Nevada last weekend. His comments on Saturday were sharper and more personal and came just a few hours after former Republican Party presidential nominee Mitt Romney said that Trump's comments were hurting the GOP.

"I think he made a severe error in saying what he did about Mexican-Americans," Romney said, according to CNN.

Bush and Trump sit atop the most recent polls of New Hampshire Republican primary voters, with several other GOP opponents who once topped the surveys -- including Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker -- sinking in those recent polls.

Bush spent more than four hours on Saturday marching with supporters and likely shaking thousands of hands. He has been spending the last few days at the Bush family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine. Given the proximity to New Hampshire, his son, Texas Land Commissioner George P. Bush, and his daughter, Noelle, tagged along for the parades.

Bush marched first in tiny Amherst before coming here to Merrimack. Several other presidential candidates, including Democrat Lincoln Chaffee and Republicans Lindsey O. Graham and Rick Perry also marched in the Amherst parade. Chaffee also marched here in Merrimack.

Jeb Bush: Trump comments meant 'to draw attention' // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 5, 2015

(CNN)Jeb Bush said Donald Trump doesn't represent the views of most Republicans, offering his most aggressive comments so far on the real estate titan who's used inflammatory language when talking about immigrants.

"This is a guy who was a Democrat for most of the last decade. I don't think he represents the Republican Party, and his views are way out of the mainstream of what most Republicans think," Bush told reporters after an Independence Day parade in Merrimack, New Hampshire, according to The New York Times.

Calling immigrants from Latin America "rapists," Trump has become a thorn in the side of many Republicans, who are trying to appeal to a wider tent of voters, including Latinos.

Bush, whose wife is from Mexico, stated a week ago in Nevada that he simply thought Trump was "wrong," adding that "maybe we will have a chance to have an honest discussion about it on a stage somewhere."

But on Saturday, Bush talked at length about his presidential rival after a week of continued pressure on Republicans -- including by other Republicans -- to make more forceful condemnations of Trump.

"Trump is wrong on this," Bush said. "He's doing this. He's not a stupid guy. Don't think he thinks every Mexican crossing the border is a rapist. He's doing this to inflame and incite and to draw attention, which seems to be his organizing principle of his campaign."

Trump fired back Saturday.

"Today, Jeb Bush once again proves that he is out of touch with the American people," he said in a statement.

"... He doesn't understand anything about the border or border security. In fact, Jeb believes illegal immigrants who break our laws when they cross our border come "out of love."

He said he is "proud to be fighting for a strong and secure border," describing it as a crucial issue.

Trump said Friday that the recent killing of a young woman in San Francisco by a suspect who police say is an undocumented immigrant is further proof of his argument.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about the slaying, Bush agreed that the border needs to be secure and that anyone who commits a crime "should be deported," chiding what he called "sanctuary cities that encourage this."

Sticking to his message about maintaining an optimistic tune, Bush said Republicans will do best "when we're hopeful" rather than "angry all the time."

"And this is an exaggerated form of that and there is no tolerance for that," he said, according to The New York Times.

Following his presidential announcement last month, Trump saw a sharp boost in his poll numbers and came in second place behind Bush according to the latest CNN/ORC International poll.

Bush has been on the receiving end of sharp rhetoric from Trump, who's criticized the former Florida governor for his positions on immigration and Common Core.

"He thinks people come over for love. I don't understand why he's in first place," Trump told CNN's Don Lemon earlier this week. "Maybe it's the Bush name. Last thing we need is another Bush. But I will tell you, I'm a little surprised he's in the position he's in."

Jeb Bush's Giving Totaled 1.5% of Income From 2007 to 2013 // The Bell Jar – July 5, 2015

In fact as shown above from Bush's own tax return data in many years his income and taxes were zero.

Bush's income skyrocketed after he finished his time as Florida governor in 2007.

While the internet has made much of Bush's post-political income (approaching $30 million since he stopped being Governor in 2007) and his high effective tax rate in recent years (nearing 42%), I'd like to focus our attention a bit more narrowly: How was Jeb Bush impacted by President Obama's decision to allow the tax cuts enacted by his brother, George W., to expire effective January 1, 2013? Returns from 2014 aren't yet filed because Bush is still waiting to receive tax paperwork from his business partnerships, aides said.

Mr Bush paid no federal taxes in 1985 and 1986, two years when his investment losses cancelled out his income.

Republican Jeb Bush planned to release 33 years of tax records on Tuesday in what was believed to be the most ever made public by a presidential candidate.

Clinton's campaign press secretary, Brian Fallon, said Tuesday that she "fully expects to release her tax returns again this time, as she did the last time she ran for president". He also gave more than $100,000 to charity that year.

He continued to make at least $1.85 million each year, with his highest total, $7.3 million, coming in 2013.

Bush's effective tax rate from 1981 to 2013 was about 36 percent – much higher than Romney's because most of Bush's income was regular income rather than capital gains, which are taxed a lower rate.

[Bush tax forms show income of million since 2007]. "And I don't believe that that is appropriate", Bush said. A bar graph rendering that comparison, showing Bush to the left of Bob Dole, who released 30 years of returns, sat atop the page when it went live. In 2004, Democratic nominee John Kerry disclosed 20 years of such records.

The tax returns can be viewed on Bush's website here.

No other candidate or prospective presidential candidate this year has committed to releasing as many tax returns as Bush. "None of Hillary Clinton's presidential opponents have revealed anything close to this amount of personal financial information".

Clinton's earning since 2014 put the couple in the top one-tenth of 1 percent of all Americans.

"I paid the government more than one in three dollars that I earned in my career".

Some of the information has already been publicly available.

He earns between $40,000 and $50,000 per domestic speaking engagement – which he noted during a news conference was less than the $65,000 that fellow presidential offspring Chelsea Clinton brings in.

In 2012, the previous year for which Mrs Clinton made financial disclosures, her wealth was estimated at $15m by OpenSecrets.org which tracks candidates and campaign finances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's Republican rivals did not indicate when their tax returns might be made public.

And his income only continued to grow.

Mr Bush is himself a very wealthy man, with a net worth of $19-22m [GBP12-14m].

Mr. Bush sat on several for-profit boards after he left the governor's office, including Cormatrix, Rayonier, Swisher Hygiene, Tenet Healthcare, Empower Software Holdings and Geo Fossil Fuels LLC.

Jeb Bush, Married To Mexican, Denounces Donald Trump, Takes 'Ugly' Remarks About Immigrants Personally // International Business Times // Elizabeth Whitman – July 4, 2015

Donald Trump's recent comments about Mexicans, which have offended a broad range of Latin American society, from celebrities to television channels, did not sit well with Jeb Bush. In fact, the former Florida governor and one of Trump's many fellow contenders for the 2016 Republican nomination for president took those remarks somewhat personally.

"He's doing this to inflame and incite and to draw attention, which seems to be the organizing principle of his campaign," Bush told the New York Times while in New Hampshire Saturday. And he "absolutely" felt the remarks on a personal level. Bush's wife, Columba, is Mexican. They have three children together, and Bush speaks fluent Spanish.

In June, Trump offered some thoughts on Mexican immigrants in the United States: "They are bringing drugs. They are bringing crime. They're rapists," he said in launching his first bid for the presidency. "Some, I assume, are good people," the business tycoon added.

Bush was also careful to deflect Trump's comments away from the party whose presidential nomination they both seek. "To make these extraordinarily ugly kind of comments is not reflective of the Republican Party," Bush said. "He's not a stupid guy, so I don't assume he thinks that every Mexican crossing the border is a rapist," he added.

As for the benefits of making such derogatory remarks, Bush suggested there were none. "But politically, we're going to win when we're hopeful and optimistic and big and broad rather than errrrr, grrrr, just angry all the time. This is an exaggerated form of that, and there is no tolerance for it."

In response to Trump's remarks, numerous entities have cut ties to the media mogul. Several Latin American countries have dropped out of this year's Miss Universe pageant or refused to broadcast the contest. Macy's, NBC, Serta and Univision have also cut business ties with him, and the City of New York is reviewing its contracts. Mayor Bill de Blasio called the remarks "disgusting and offensive."

Polls Show Jeb Bush In Good Standing To Win The GOP Nomination // Inquisitr – July 5, 2015

Marco Rubio had been gaining on Jeb Bush in the polls last month, but now the momentum has switched and Bush appears to have regained his front-runner status and is surging ahead of Rubio in one national poll, the Tampa Bay Times reports. In the newest CNN/ORC poll released this past week, Jeb Bush leads nationally among Republican candidates for president with 19 percent, a substantial improvement over his 13 percent in June in the same poll. Rubio has fallen from 14 percent to just six percent in the same time period in the same poll.

While Bush has gained on Rubio in the CNN/ORC poll, the Miami Herald reports that both candidates are still behind Hillary Clinton in possible general election match-ups measured in that poll. Hillary Clinton leads Bush 54 percent to 41 percent, while having a 59 to 34 percent lead over Donald Trump and a 56 to 39 percent lead over Marco Rubio.

Business Insider reports that Bush might well be once again the front-runner for the GOP nomination for president in 2016, according to a statement by CNN's polling director, Jennifer Agiesta.

"The findings suggest Bush is making progress toward being seen as the frontrunner in a field that has long lacked a clear leader," wrote Agiesta, "He holds a significant lead over the second-place candidate Trump, is seen as the candidate who could best handle illegal immigration and social issues, and runs about even with Trump and well ahead of the other candidates when Republicans are asked which candidate can best handle the economy."

A look at the latest polling data and averages at Real Clear Politics (RCP) shows that Jeb Bush has a very plausible path to winning the GOP nomination in 2016. Assuming some degree of accuracy of this polling data, here is how the early caucus and primary votes might well go, and how they could lead to a Jeb Bush nomination for president in 2016.

Bush is currently tied for second place, with Dr. Ben Carson, in the RCP average in Iowa with 9.3 percent, and Scott Walker leads with 17.5 percent in the average but he is believed to be slipping in the polls in Iowa. A renewed and serious effort by Jeb Bush in Iowa could still find him coming in second to Walker but perhaps a stronger-than-expected second that would lead to pundits saying maybe the Bush campaign is gaining strength.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The momentum of finishing better than expected in Iowa should have Jeb Bush going into New Hampshire gaining in the polls there, where Bush now leads with 15.2 percent in the RCP average while Walker and Trump come in second and third place respectively in New Hampshire. Poor finishes in Iowa and New Hampshire are likely to cause several of the under-performing candidates to suspend their candidacies.

After the strong performance in New Hampshire, Jeb Bush goes to South Carolina gaining in the polls, where he now leads 13.7 percent to 13.3 percent over Scott Walker in the RCP average. This will be very much like 2000 in South Carolina, where John McCain needed to beat George W. Bush in the state to stay in the race, and winning the state gave Bush a clear advantage over McCain. Same in South Carolina in 2016, except the candidates are Jeb Bush and Scott Walker. Same result, the candidate with the last name of Bush wins.

Florida will vote next, where Jeb Bush even now leads with 24.3 percent to Rubio at 18.7 and Walker at 11.7 in the RCP average of polls. Bush should win that more easily, after winning New Hampshire and South Carolina, and beyond that should easily win most of the remaining primary and caucus votes on his way to winning the GOP nomination in 2016. This will be very much like winning GOP campaigns of the past, including Mitt Romney in 2012, John McCain in 2008, George W. Bush in 2000, George H.W. Bush in 1988, and Ronald Reagan in 1980.

The current polling data shows Jeb Bush could very well follow the patterns of many of those winning candidates who become GOP nominees and win the GOP nomination for 2016. For that not to happen, one of the other candidates will have to become the clear choice of those who do not want Jeb Bush as the nominee, and win some early states to become the sole challenger to Bush early in the process. Either Marco Rubio or Scott Walker would have to defeat Bush in New Hampshire and South Carolina for that scenario to be possible, and for one of them to defeat Jeb Bush in 2016. The polling data today suggests that is not likely, but there is plenty of time for all of this to change.

RUBIO

Trump fires back at Rubio after ICE says suspected killer was deported 5 times // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 4, 2015

Donald Trump wants to know what Florida Senator Marco Rubio has to say about a San Francisco woman who may have been killed by a convicted felon with five previous deportations.

The New York businessman has come under fire for unfiltered comments on the kinds of criminality that accompanies illegal immigration.

“Our next president needs to be someone who brings Americans together — not someone who continues to divide,” Mr. Rubio wrote on Thursday. “Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from — not closer to — a solution.”

Mr. Trump took to Twitter on Thursday to highlight the case of Kathryn Steinle, 32, who was killed while she walked along the city’s Pier 14 with her father earlier in the week. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials said the man who was arrested in connection with her seemingly random killing had been deported five times.

“.@marcorubio what do you say to the family of Kathryn Steinle in CA who was viciously killed b/c we can’t secure our border? Stand up for US,” Mr. Trump Tweeted.

Suspect Francisco Sanchez, 45, was arrested shortly after Ms. Steinle’s killing.

Mr. Trump also used the story to fire back at his other critics as well. His rhetoric on illegal immigration has cost him several partnerships with major businesses like Macy’s, NBC, and Univision, and earned him harsh criticism from actress America Ferrera.

“Thank you America Ferrara [sic] for supporting lawless criminals from Mexico. One more needless death. 2 innocent lives taken,” Mr. Trump tweeted. “Our Southern border it totally out of control. This is an absolutely disgraceful. situation. We need border security!”

Trump hammers Rubio: ‘Zero credibility,’ ‘outright lies’ to sell amnesty // Breitbart News // Matthew Boyle – July 4, 2015

Rubio joined Democrats and liberals—as well as most of the mainstream media—in attacking Trump for calling out international criminals who exploit America's weak and insecure border to get into the United States illegally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Trump's comments are not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive," Rubio said. "Our next president needs to be someone who brings Americans together – not someone who continues to divide. Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from – not closer to – a solution. We need leaders who offer serious solutions to secure our border and fix our broken immigration system."

Rubio's statement follows what Trump said about illegal aliens two weeks ago in his presidential campaign announcement speech. "When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best," Trump said then. "They're sending people that have lots of problems… they're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people."

Rubio joins people like Barack Obama's 2012 presidential campaign co-chair and liberal actress Eva Longoria—who compared Trump to Adolf Hitler—and Univision programming president Alberto Ciurana–who compared Trump to Charleston, South Carolina, mass murderer Dylann Storm Roof. There are plenty of others throughout the mainstream media and institutional left who have slammed Trump as well, and some Republicans like former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former New York Gov. George Pataki.

Sending out a link to a Breitbart California article detailing how one such illegal alien like the criminals Trump called out in his announcement speech allegedly murdered a woman in San Francisco on Wednesday, Trump launched his initial response at Rubio via Twitter: "Our Southern border is unsecure. I am the only one that can fix it, nobody else has the guts to even talk about it."

"Our Southern border is totally out of control. This is an absolutely disgraceful. situation," Trump added. "We need border security!"

"Where are the other candidates now that this tragic murder has taken place b/c of our unsafe border," he added in another tweet. "We need a wall!"

In a fourth tweet, Trump sent a message directly to Rubio: ".@marcorubio what do you say to the family of Kathryn Steinle in CA who was viciously killed b/c we can't secure our border? Stand up for US."

In addition, a Trump adviser sent a lengthy statement to Breitbart News on Friday evening signaling that the real estate mogul isn't backing down.

"Mr. Trump will never apologize for wanting the American people to have a secure border," the Trump adviser said. "He is the sole candidate who will secure our broken southern border by building a massive wall. The American people deserve a wall to protect their safety, jobs and economy."

In addition, Trump's adviser told Breitbart News that his boss can't wait to expose Rubio's weakness on immigration:

> Senator Marco Rubio (R-FL) has zero credibility on securing our border. Nothing has been more "divisive" than the outright lies used to try and sell his amnesty for illegal immigrants to the American people. Hard working Americans cannot depend on Senator Rubio to protect their jobs. Senator Rubio's "Gang of Eight" bill, which was such an epic failure it never even came up for a vote in the House, would have given President Obama the immediate power to grant amnesty to millions of illegal immigrants.

Trump's team seems ready to hone in on Rubio's biggest weakness: That he worked with senior Democrats like Sens. Chuck Schumer (D-NY), Dick Durbin (D-IL), and the now-indicted Bob Menendez (D-NJ) to put forward an amnesty bill last Congress. Rubio eventually backed away from his own bill after he tanked in the polls.

"Rubio flip flopped on the bill for political expediency with the explanation that he could not expect President Obama to enforce it. Why would Rubio have given Obama this authority in the first place?" Trump's adviser said.

Just this past weekend in New Hampshire, Rubio used several of the same talking points he used to sell the Gang of Eight bill to push a pathway to citizenship for illegal aliens. When asked if he supports a pathway to citizenship for those who broke America's immigration laws, Rubio said: "I do."

> But first we have to prove to the American people that illegal immigration is under control and today that lack of confidence has made it impossible for us to make progress on immigration reform. So the first thing we have to do is we have to pass real reforms that secure the border more secure than it is today, an entry-exit tracking system to prevent visa overstays, and we also need to create an Electronic Verification system > for employers so they can verify that the people they're hiring are legally here. We need to put that in place and show it to the American people and prove that illegal immigration for the future is under control. After we do that the second step is we must modernize our legal immigration system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>
> Today, legal immigration is primarily on the basis of whether or not you have a relative living here. In the 21st century it must be based on what skills you have or what you can contribute economically. After we've done those two steps, I believe the American people will be very generous and responsible about what you do with those who have been here a long time. I think the best approach is to have them come forward, undergo a background check, pay a fine for having violated our law, start paying taxes—and in return for all of that—they will get a work permit that will allow them to work and travel legally in the United States. That's the only status they would be allowed to have for at least a decade.
>
> Then assuming if after a decade they've complied with all of that then they would be allowed to apply for permanent residency just like anybody else would—not through a special path—and then of course once you have permanent residency depending on how you acquire it, within three to five years, you could apply for citizenship. That is a long path. But I do think it's fair and reasonable. But we can't even get to that third step I've outlined until we've done the other two things first. That's just the reality of the political situation we have today in America.

Rubio made most of the same claims in nearly identical language during his advocacy for the Gang of Eight bill.

Trump has also been extraordinarily critical of the Obamatrade deal that Rubio voted for.

"Rubio's dangerous amnesty bill and his recent vote for Trade Promotion Authority – after never reading the Trans-Pacific Partnership – show an unsettling truth," Trump's adviser told Breitbart News.

Trump's team compared Rubio at that point to Obama himself—both of them, after all, were first-term U.S. Senators when they launched their White House bids.

"Rubio is a typical politician who is controlled by the special interests," Trump's adviser said. "The one-term Senator simply does not have the experience or judgment to be President."

Trump's adviser wrapped his statement to Breitbart News by noting that Trump will actually secure the border, unlike Rubio.

"Mr. Trump believes that a nation without borders is not a nation at all," Trump's adviser said. "Mr. Trump will never apologize for fighting for border security. It is common sense and will Make America Great Again!"

Trump is likely to turn the jets on Rubio, as Rubio continues sinking in the polls again—much like he did after he drove amnesty through the Senate last Congress. In an exclusive interview with Breitbart News in Trump Tower in New York City after his presidential campaign announcement, Trump said of Rubio: "I would say Marco Rubio is just not the guy."

"Rubio is weak on immigration and he's weak on jobs," Trump said in a previous interview with Breitbart News. "We need someone who is going to make the country great again, and Rubio is not going to make the country great again—and neither is [former Florida Gov. Jeb] Bush."

PAUL

Don't dismiss Rand Paul's tax plan // Dallas News // Scott Burns – July 4, 2015

Most news media dismissed Rand Paul's tax plan, like his candidacy for president, as a nonstarter. But many of those reports failed to grasp a gigantic part of the plan. They also wrongly concluded that the flat tax was a big break for high-income people but not so good for middle-income people.

Let's take a closer look at the plan the Republican senator from Kentucky proposes.

It would abolish the employment tax. The plan would end the most regressive tax in the lifetime of every living American. This is a big, big deal. All workers pay this tax on the first dollar of wages. But the tax stops at $118,500. Wages over that amount pay taxes for Medicare but not for Social Security. This tax has been rising since 1937.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 1937, the tax was 2 percent of the first $2,000. Today, including the Medicare tax, the rate is 15.3 percent on the first $118,500 in earnings. It's a big tax.

How big? Most Americans pay more employment taxes than income taxes. A recent report shows that the income tax burden was lower than the employment tax for most households with incomes under $200,000. Internal Revenue Service data tells us that 96 percent of households have incomes under that amount.

So take a look at your next pay stub. Think about what you could do with the largest "raise" most people have gotten in years. Then think about the trivial tinkering that most of the other candidates are offering.

The money to support Social Security and Medicare would come from a new 14.5 percent tax on corporate payrolls. Note that the tax is on the entire payroll, not just wages up to $118,500. So the tax could sustain our nation's most important social programs. And it wouldn't be regressive. The other benefit is that a later increase in the tax could bolster Social Security. The next generation wouldn't be short-changed on benefits.

Most proposals to improve Social Security focus on shrinking the benefits of future retirees while collecting the same regressive taxes. Young workers would be most affected. For years, public and media reaction to the idea of a flat tax has been that it would be tough on poor people but great for rich people. The reality is different.

The Rand Paul proposal calls for a flat tax rate of 14.5 percent on all taxable income. But first, some hefty deductions and exemptions come off the top.

How hefty? Under current tax law, a family of four that didn't itemize would have deductions of $28,600. That's four personal exemptions of $4,000 and a standard deduction of $12,600. Under Paul's tax plan, the same family would have $50,000 in exemptions and deductions. That means no taxes on an extra $21,400.

A family with $50,000 in income would pay no income taxes under Paul's plan. The same family would pay $2,287.50 under current law. That's a 100 percent tax cut.

Double income to $100,000, and the family would pay $7,250 under the Paul plan and $9,787.50 under current law. That's a 26 percent tax cut.

Double income again to $200,000, and the family would pay $21,750 under the Paul plan and $35,043.50 under current law. That's a 38 percent tax cut.

What about the big dogs? Yes, they'd get a big tax cut, too. The top 1 percent pays income taxes at an average tax rate of 22.8 percent according to IRS figures. So the drop to 14.5 percent would be about a 36 percent cut.

The Paul plan cuts the corporate tax rate to 14.5 percent. Right now the top rate is 35 percent. Armies of corporate finaglers, lobbyists and tax code whisperers work to avoid that rate. They do their best to cut the burden.

So reduce the rate. Then watch Apple and dozens of other companies repatriate billions in overseas earnings. Watch companies that have become corporate expatriates renew their love for Delaware. Watch companies decide to build factories and hire workers in America, not Asia or Mexico.

This is a new deal for America. If Republicans can't find the nerve to back it, pray that a smart Democrat does.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz: 'Asinine' to pull reruns of 'The Dukes of Hazzard' // WaPo // Katie Zezima – July 4, 2015

GREENVILLE, S.C. - Sen. Ted Cruz said Saturday that it is "asinine" that TV Land pulled "The Dukes of Hazzard" after widespread calls for the Confederate flag to come down.

"I think the cancellation of 'The Dukes of Hazzard' is utterly asinine and an example of corporate America's embrace of political correctness to a degree that is ridiculous," Cruz said in an interview with The Washington Post.

"I'm curious if the Torquemadas seeking to ban 'The Dukes of Hazzard' from our TV sets are equally exercised by all of the leftist college students with posters of Che Guevara in their college dorm rooms," Cruz said, referring to Tomas de Torquemada, who served as the first grand inquisitor of Spain.

Cruz visited South Carolina for the first time since Gov. Nikki Haley (R) called for the removal of the Confederate flag from near the state capitol in the wake of of the shooting deaths of nine people at a historic African American church in Charleston. Photos have surfaced of the alleged shooter, Dylann Roof, posing with the Confederate flag. Since then, a backlash has grown against the flag, with Alabama removing it from its state capitol and retailers pulling merchandise that displays the banner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two of Cruz's campaign co-chairs, South Carolina state Sen. Lee Bright and state Rep. Bill Chumley, have said that they will fight to keep the flag at a state house memorial.

The Texas Republican said that he has not spoken to Bright and Chumley; Cruz's campaign said last month they are going to "stand by" Bright and Chumley.

Bright likened the removal of the flag to a "Stalinist purge."

"It's not just the flag," Bright said in an interview with Politico last month. "They want to take down the Confederate monuments; I've gotten e-mails from people who want to rename streets. ... Anytime you want to basically remove the symbols of history from a state, that's something that just is very bad."

Chumley said on CNN last month that the people killed in the church "waited their turn to be shot."

"We need to be focusing on the nine families that are left and see that this doesn't happen again," he said. "These people sat in there and waited their turn to be shot. That's sad that somebody in there with the means of self-defense could have stopped this."

Cruz said, as he did in an interview with The Washington Post last month, that the issue of the Confederate flag is one for South Carolina to decide.

"I understand this is an issue and debate that evokes strong emotions. I understand those who see in the flag remembrances of our nation's shameful legacy of slavery and bigotry and hatred and oppression. I also understand those who see in the flag a recognition of their ancestor's sacrifices and our history and traditions separate and apart from the horrors of slavery," Cruz said Saturday.

"The issue should be decided by South Carolinians, not by those from other states parachuting in to lecture the citizens on how to resolve this question of state law," Cruz said. "That's the way our federalist system is supposed to work."

Cruz said the decision of Wal-Mart and other retailers to stop selling Confederate flag merchandise is theirs to make.

"I think that is a decision for each company and each individual in our free market to make. I believe in free speech. Free speech means that each of us can choose what to say and what not to say," he said.

Cruz said Guevara was "a sick, murderous, torturing, tyrant. And yet in the bizarro world that is modern political correctness, because he's a leftist, Che Guevara, like Chairman Mao on their kitschy little watches, is to be celebrated and glorified with no recognition of the thousands or even millions of souls tortured and murdered at their hands."

GOP presidential candidate Cruz wasn't always 'Ted' // Star-Telegram // Maria Recio & Anna M. Tinsley – July 4, 2015

Until U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, was 13, he had an altogether different first name than he does now.

He was named Rafael Edward after his father when he was born in 1970 and to distinguish him from the elder Cruz, he went by the diminutive "Rafaelito," which was shortened to "Felito."

"Until I was thirteen, I was 'Felito Cruz,'" writes the GOP presidential candidate in his just-released autobiography, A Time for Truth: Reigniting the Promise of America. "The problem with that name was that it seemed to rhyme with every major corn chip on the market. Fritos, Cheetos, Doritos, and Tostitos — a fact that other young children were quite happy to point out."

What to do? His mother Eleanor gave him the solution: change your name.

"There are a number of other possibilities," Cruz quotes her as saying "Rafael. Raph. Ralph. Edward. Ed. Eddie. Or you could go by Ted," she said.

Cruz said that he immediately warmed to "Ted."

"But my father was furious with the decision. He viewed it as a rejection of him and his heritage, which was not my intention," recalled Cruz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"'What do you mean Ted is a nickname for Edward?" he snapped at my mother. 'Who's ever heard of that?'"

"My mother's response was unfortunate. 'Well, there's Ted Kennedy,'" she said."

The late Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., the liberal "Lion of the Senate" was indeed known as "Ted."

Rafael Cruz, Sr. refused to utter his son's new name for two years.

No more 'two-step' in Texas

Fort Worth attorney Jason Smith is among those happy to see that the Texas Democratic Party is scrapping the "Texas Two-Step," a two-tiered system that awards delegates through both a popular vote on election night and also through post-election caucuses.

Smith filed a challenge to the way delegates were designated in 2008, after Democrat Hillary Clinton won the popular vote in Texas' primary but Democrat Barack Obama received more delegates through the caucus process.

Recently, both the Texas Democratic Party and the Republican Party of Texas made official plans to designate national convention delegates based on the outcomes of their primaries.

"The DNC's decision vindicates the principle of one person, one vote for Texas Democrats," Smith said.

Symbol of the struggle

U.S. Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, a long-time advocate for education for girls in the developing world, met June 23 with Malala Yousafzai, the 17-year old Nobel Peace Prize laureate.

The Pakistani girl, who is promoting education on a U.S. tour, became a symbol of the struggle for young women to get an education in 2012 when she was shot in the head for defying Taliban orders that girls not go to school.

After recovering in Britain, Malala, as she is internationally known, became a vocal advocate for girls' education and in 2014 was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

"Malala Yousafzai's accomplishments are a source of inspiration for me and many others," Granger said in a statement. "As the daughter of a teacher and principal, and a former educator myself, I know firsthand the profound impact that an education can have on a young adult."

"The work that Malala does improves the lives of young men and women throughout the world," she said.

Granger, chairwoman of the House Appropriations Committee subcommittee on State and Foreign Operations and Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., the ranking member of the appropriations committee and Granger's panel, met with Malala in the Capitol.

Cruz defends Trump: 'Washington cartel' doesn't want illegal immigration debate // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 4, 2015

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz defended Donald Trump in an interview on Friday, praising the businessman for boldness in addressing illegal immigration despite protests by the "Washington cartel."

"I like Donald Trump. He's bold, he's brash, and I get that it seems the favorite sport of the Washington media is to encourage some Republicans to attack other Republicans," Mr. Cruz told NBC's Chuck Todd in an interview on Meet The Press. "I ain't going to do it. I'm not interested in Republican on Republican violence," he said, Mediaite reported.

Mr. Trump has been the subject of harsh criticism, including from GOP candidates Marco Rubio and George Pataki, for comments he made in his campaign launch speech calling Mexican illegal immigrants rapists and criminals.

When Mr. Todd asked Mr. Cruz if "rhetoric matters," Mr. Cruz responded, "I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration. The Washington cartel doesn't want to address that," Mediaite reported.

Mr. Cruz admitted that Mr. Trump has a "colorful" way of speaking and said that was not the way he would speak, but added that he would not engage in the media's "game of throwing rocks and attacking other Republicans."

Ted Cruz Calls For US To Quit UN Human Rights Council After Vote Condemning Israel //

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

International Business Times // Mark Hanrahan – July 4, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz called Friday for the U.S. to withdraw from the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC), after the body voted to condemn Israel's conduct during the 2014 war in Gaza.

The U.S. was the only country to vote against the resolution put before the council Friday, with 41 voting in favor, and five countries abstaining. The resolution condemned Israel's targeting of innocent civilians during the conflict, and also called for an end to the impunity of Israeli officials responsible for alleged war crimes.

In a statement posted on his website, Cruz said that the single U.S. vote against the censure was a "meaningless gesture."

"It is time to stop ceding moral authority to the UNHRC and tell the truth about this hopelessly biased and anti-Semitic institution. ... The United States should stop legitimizing the UNHRC with our membership and withdraw now," he added.

Other critics of the resolution argued that it ignored criticism of the Palestinian side raised in an earlier U.N. Report, which accused both sides in the conflict of committing war crimes.

"We are troubled that this current resolution focuses exclusively on alleged Israeli violations, without any expressed reference to Palestinian violations," U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. in Geneva Keith Harper said as he explained why his country voted against the resolution, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also condemned the UNHRC in a statement, saying that the body was neither interested "in facts nor in true human rights," Haaretz reported.

The United Nations has long been a target of Republican ire. President George W. Bush's former ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, famously once remarked that if the U.N. building "lost ten stories it wouldn't make a bit of difference."

Ted Cruz Is Right to Call for Retention Elections for the Supreme Court // National Review // Andrrew C. McCarthy – July 4, 2015

Within the space of just 48 hours, the United States Supreme Court ruled that the president is above the law; that straightforward statutory words may be twisted to mean the opposite of what they say; that discrimination — heretofore, the textbook example of a willful act — can be committed unconsciously, thereby supplanting our constitutional foundation of equal opportunity for all with the totalitarian's dream of guaranteed outcomes for favored factions; and that five politically unaccountable lawyers, by dint of being issued robes, may impose their vision of the good society on 320 million Americans, reimagining our most basic institutions, our founding law, centuries of jurisprudence, and millennia of civilization.

Like millions of Americans, Senator Ted Cruz (R., Texas) thought this was a disastrous couple of days for the country. So did the rest of the Trumped-up cavalcade of GOP presidential hopefuls — or, at least, they said they did. Cruz, however, undertook to do something about it. He proposed an amendment to the Constitution that would subject the justices to retention elections.

"No social transformation without representation" adjured Justice Antonin Scalia in dissent from the five-justice diktat that 50 states end their democratic debate and redefine marriage to include same-sex couples. At least for now it is "couples." No coherent limiting principle stops Justice Anthony Kennedy's rendition of "All You Need Is Love" from devolving into "Why Don't We Do It in the Road?" — and yes, for the modern Supreme Court, Lennon and McCartney are more apt than Blackstone and Story to shed light on the countless ways we might "enjoy liberty as we learn its meaning."

Cruz's amendment simply takes up Scalia's suggestion. Our would-be overlords would be required to account to us if they wanted to continue ruling us. Here at National Review last week, the senator outlined his proposal: The justices would face the voters every eight years, earning retention only if they are approved by a popular national majority plus majorities in at least half of the states.

For this, Cruz has drawn the ire of the estimable George Will. The columnist lambastes the senator for trying to "turn the court into a third political branch" over "what he considers" the justices' "political behavior."

Well, Homer nods.

My abiding respect for him notwithstanding, Will has this one exactly backwards. What Cruz considers to be political behavior? Considers?

Alright, let's "consider" the same-sex marriage ruling. In an opinion dutifully joined by the Court's four

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"progressive" justices (Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer, Sonia Sotomayor, and Elena Kagan), Justice Kennedy ruled that the states were powerless to define marriage for themselves because our Constitution makes its definition a federal question — the answer to which Kennedy purported to find in a remote Fourteenth Amendment penumbra that had gone unexplored lo these 147 years.

But hold on: Just two terms ago, the jurisprudential blink of an eye, the same Anthony Kennedy writing for the same four progressives, ruled that the federal government was powerless to define marriage because our Constitution makes its definition a state question — the answer to which was for the people of each state to work out for themselves.

This breathtaking shift can be explained only by politics. It is not law. Law is obliged to be rigorously logical and consistent. It is in politics — the realm of opportunism, compromise, and the swerves of popular passion — that logic and consistency are merely an option, and often not even an aspiration.

The issue in 2013 was the Defense of Marriage Act, which progressives despised because it cut against the campaign to promote same-sex marriage in the states. The issue last week was the decision of several states to reaffirm marriage as traditionally understood, which progressives despised because it cut against the campaign to mandate same-sex marriage in the states. The legal rationales for the two decisions cannot be squared, but the legal rationales were beside the point. The Court was doing politics, through and through.

As I pointed out last weekend, the Court's four progressives are not jurists applying legal principles to resolve cases. They are a voting bloc of super-legislators, implementing an ideological agenda. In tandem with Kennedy and Chief Justice John Roberts, who walk on the wild side when personal or political calculation so dispose them, The Four prescribe policy that hundreds of millions of people — people who have no cases before the Court — are expected to accept without recourse. In this, The Four are indistinguishable from, say, the Congressional Black Caucus . . . except that the Caucus must account to its constituents and cannot, under the guise of "constitutional interpretation," proclaim its pieties as the last, unreviewable word on whatever subject.

Cruz is not "turning the court into a third political branch." Will has mistaken the coroner for the surgeon. The Court already is a third political branch. Cruz is trying to rein it in the only way a political branch gets reined in: by requiring political accountability.

Will frets about what would become of the high court's "prestige" if its incumbents were subjected to elections. But the point is not the justices' amour-propre. The Court's prestige does not owe to the jurists' insulation from electoral politics; it owes to their function in our system: the dispassionate reading of legal texts and application of developed legal principle. That function, not concern over spectacle, is why justices are not subjected to the ballot box.

And it is that function that the Supreme Court no longer performs. How, Will wonders, would a politically accountable Court "stand athwart rampant executives and overbearing congressional majorities"? When Will wrote those words, the ink was not yet dry on the Court's Obamacare ruling, which upheld a rampant executive rewrite of a law rammed through Congress by an overbearing majority. Yet it is somehow not parody.

Will is surely right to be concerned about the specter of national judicial elections. I suspect they would be less harrowing than he supposes. Cruz is not talking about having justices run against each other for office. At issue would be whether a justice's record warrants retention on the bench; if he or she were voted out of office, that would create a vacancy that would have to be filled in the familiar manner outlined in the Constitution. This would not be an election between candidates, each making commitments to this and that interest group in hopes of edging out the rival. It would be a referendum on the American people's conception of the judicial role and the justice's fidelity to it.

Of course it would be better if we did not have to do something like this. It would be better if Congress and presidents had used their constitutional appointment and impeachment powers to make clear that judges were expected merely to judge (a hard enough job). It would be better if Congress had used its constitutional control over the judiciary's jurisdiction to minimize the opportunities for judicial imperialism.

But they have not. Thus, as reformer types like to say, the system is broken. Cruz did not break it; the justices did, with lots of help. Cruz is trying to fix it: proposing a political check to pressure a politicized institution into reverting to the Court Will is nostalgic for — the nonpolitical branch that fortifies limited government. Conservatives, it should be stressed, are not asking for a Supreme Court that imposes our vision of marriage and market-based health care, or that excuses discrimination when it actually occurs. We are asking for a Supreme Court that upholds the constitutional framework of divided government; that assigns law- and policy-making to the people's representatives at the state or federal level, depending on the subject matter; and that upholds the liberty guarantees that are actually in the Constitution, rather than degrading them in an arrogant exploration of "existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We are asking to go back to ruling ourselves.

CHRISTIE

Christie slams Obama on Iran, hedges on breaking nuclear deal // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 4, 2015

WOLFEBORO, N.H. — Chris Christie thinks President Barack Obama's handling of the Iran nuclear talks has been the "single most disturbing" chapter of his presidency, but the New Jersey governor isn't sure he'd undo a deal if elected president.

Though Christie said Saturday morning that Obama should walk away from the nuclear talks, he indicated only that as president, he would investigate whether or not it made sense to stick to a deal the Obama administration and its allies are expected to conclude with Iran to prevent the country from obtaining nuclear weapons.

"I'm not one of those guys who's going to say to you, 'On day one I will abrogate the agreement,'" said Christie. It was a reference to rivals — including Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Marco Rubio, Rick Perry, Sen. Lindsey Graham, Sen. Ted Cruz and Gov. Bobby Jindal — who have said that as president they would break off any deal not approved by Congress. Christie cited the complexity of the region and the difficulty of predicting the state of the Middle East in January 2017, when the next president will assume office.

"On day one, I will look into and try to decide what to do with the agreement, depending on where we are at that moment," said Christie in response to a question at a breakfast gathering of local Republicans. "Because by the way it's not just us involved anymore. We have a number of our allies around the world who're at that table as well, and sanctions are most effective when not only we do it, but the other allies do it."

The UK, Germany, France, China and Russia are also party to the negotiations.

Christie harshly criticized Obama's negotiating performance, saying he had lost leverage by appearing too eager to reach a deal. "The best way to get a result as you know in any negotiation, whether you're negotiating an arms deal with Iran or whether you're buying a car, is to not look so desperate," he said. "Don't look like you want the car. Don't look like you're already driving the car, because the car salesman will go, 'Oh wow, I'm getting sticker today."

Christie said that if he were conducting negotiations, he would have walked away from the table and advised allies to reimpose tougher sanctions until Iran offered more favorable terms.

On Thursday, China's foreign minister said there was a "high possibility" that Iran would reach a final deal with world powers within a matter of days.

After the breakfast, Christie marched in Wolfeboro's Independence Day parade, along with Rubio and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Christie Won't Pledge to Undo Iran Deal // TIME // Zeke J Miller – July 4, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie said Saturday that while he is deeply troubled by the emerging Iranian nuclear agreement, he would not pledge to undo it should he take office.

Speaking to Republicans on July 4th in this lakeside vacation town, Christie sought to differentiate himself from the other 15 GOP candidates for president, casting himself as a leader who would carefully consider all options.

"I'm not one of those guys who's going to say to you, 'on Day One I will abrogate the agreement,'" Christie said, noting that the American president could not just act alone when China, Russia, Germany, France and the United Kingdom are also parties to the deal, should one emerge. "On Day One, I will look into it and try to decide, depending upon where we are at that moment."

As Christie was speaking, American and international negotiators were continuing talks in Vienna to complete the deal before this week's deadline. Christie said he would have long since walked away from the table, arguing that Iran cannot be trusted to implement the agreement.

"If I was negotiating this deal right now, I would be gone," he said. "I would be away from the table. I would be going back to our allies and saying these are not reliable negotiators on the other side—not the people we can count on to keep their word. They haven't shown us that."

But Christie added he could not commit to revoke an agreement without prior investigation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If I’m saddled with the deal as president, then on the first day I’ll be saying to my national security advisor, to my Secretary of State and to my head of national intelligence: give me all the information I need to let me know all the options I have to try to put this genie back in the bottle, and then we’ll make a decision,” he added.

The comments follow a pattern for Christie, who has tried to draw subtle differences between himself and the rest of the GOP field on a range of policy proposals. Christie told a crowd of more than 100 at the breakfast event to “be careful” of candidates who make promises about what they’ll do on “Day One.”

“I have grave, grave doubts that this is an agreement I will be willing to stand behind, but I also don’t want to be the kind of president who tells all of you something in a campaign and that either doesn’t do it, hoping you forget that I told you I would actually do it on the first day,” he said. “Or, who does it only because I promised it, even if at that moment it’s not what’s in the best interests of America.”

Christie makes nice on the trail in New Hampshire // USA Today // Bob Jordan – July 4, 2015

ASBURY PARK, N.J. — New Hampshire primary voters saw plenty of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie in the first week of his presidential campaign.

There he was making nice at the Pink Cadillac Diner. You could catch him at the American Legion hall. If not there, then perhaps at a pub or fielding questions at one of his trademark town halls. Wherever Christie went, he was folksy, humorous, engaging, many miles removed from his most caustic, "Sit down and shup up" YouTube moments.

But it remains to be seen, in a week where Donald Trump stole most of the headlines and shined in the polls, whether Christie's focus on the Granite State can improve his longshot chances for the 2016 Republican nomination.

Christie, trying to reverse a litany of polls showing voters view him unfavorably, was warmly received at each campaign stop he made during a five-day swing through New Hampshire through Saturday, but attendees generally said they were still making up their minds, in a Republican field expected to swell to some 16 candidates.

Christie officially became a candidate Tuesday.

"He comes across as a real guy but I'm still on the fence," said Tom Hamlin, a retired carpenter, after meeting Christie at a packed town hall in rural Ashland.

Dean Blake, a cook, also had praise for Christie, but added, "I'm undecided. We're so early with our primary and really relish our important role in the nominating process. A lot of us wait for all the candidates to meet the grassroots people, shake hands with us, and look us in the eye."

Because voters in New Hampshire tend to be fiscally conservative but more socially moderate than those in Iowa or South Carolina, two other key early-decision states, it has the profile of a state Christie could do well in, political experts say.

Matthew Hale, a Seton Hall University political scientist, said it takes effort to win over New Hampshire's voters.

"Campaigning in New Hampshire is unlike any place else in the country. It only works in person," Hale said. "Governor Christie knows that and is quite good at face-to-face politics."

Christie's campaign skills should serve him well, said David Redlawsk, a Rutgers University professor and the director of the Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling.

"He has a shot of being in the top tier in New Hampshire but right now it's unclear if he can get there just on his campaign style alone," Redlawsk said. "I think he will need to benefit from stumbles by other candidates and need Republicans to overlook his baggage on the theory that he would be a strong general election contender."

Christie has held 11 town halls this year in New Hampshire, including eight before his announcement. That's the most of any candidate.

"I assure you no one will catch up," Christie said. "We're just going to keep doing them."

Nonetheless, Christie has his work cut out for him. There is no clear front-runner among New Hampshire Republicans, according to a recent CNN poll, but six candidates polled higher than Christie. And with so many candidates in the field, it will become that much more difficult to get noticed.

At week's end, even Christie found himself fielding questions about fellow candidate Trump, who caused an international stir with his harsh comments about Mexican immigrants, followed by blow back from business partners cutting their Trump ties. The "bad" publicity notwithstanding, Trump was second only to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in some national, Iowa and New Hampshire polls. Christie, newly wonkish on policy matters ranging from education to entitlements, still languishes in the back of the pack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During his week in New Hampshire, Christie also showed a willingness to pivot on positions in order to gain broader acceptance.

At one of the town halls, Christie tried to downplay concerns his foreign policy positions are too hawkish.

Christie in May had laid out a get-tough vision that included a call for more troops, more Navy ships, and more combat aircraft. He also urged active American engagement in global conflicts, declaring at the time that "we have never ignored the crises in the world around us."

But he added this modification when chatting with a morning audience at the Pink Cadillac Diner on Thursday: "Let me be really clear: I'm not a president who'd be looking to go to war at all."

That was good enough for retiree Cathy Spreeman, a Rochester resident.

"I've always liked Chris Christie," she said. "I like him because when somebody is being stupid, he'll tell them they're being stupid."

Chris Christie: King of the 2016 long shots // Burlington County Times // Jonathan Bernstein – July 4, 2015

Of the nine Republican presidential candidates I consider viable, I have Gov. Chris Christie, who made his bid official Tuesday, as dead last.

From the start, Christie was probably too moderate to have much of a chance at the nomination, and it wasn't clear if Republicans nationwide would ever warm to his New Jersey style. While conservatives might have forgiven him for some of his positions (as they did Mitt Romney), they wouldn't forget his embrace of President Barack Obama after Superstorm Sandy, just before the 2012 election. Then the trouble his staff created in blocking traffic on the George Washington Bridge destroyed his November electability argument by attaching a scandal to his candidacy.

Still, Christie remains a candidate with conventional qualifications (unlike, say, Carly Fiorina or Ben Carson), and he is in the Republican mainstream on policy (unlike Rand Paul). A sudden surge in public opinion would make a lot of his liabilities look less formidable.

Christie may have a better chance of creating a surge moment than most other long shots in the 2016 race — Mike Huckabee, Bobby Jindal, Rick Perry, John Kasish and Rick Santorum. I suspect a poll of Republican operatives might find that opinion widespread.

Any candidate in the 2016 cycle can have a polling surge. But only plausible nominees (that is, those who have conventional credentials and mainstream party positions on policy) can take advantage of such a leap. If one of them suddenly moves to the top of the heap early, then party actors might rush to support him or her. (By contrast, if a Carson or a Fiorina gets the same polling rush, the party figures wouldn't jump on board; they might even try to derail such a contender.)

A public-opinion groundswell isn't enough to clinch the nomination (ask Rick Perry, who lost his 2012 momentum in his awful debate performances). But the eventual winner needs to get such a lift at some point in his or her campaign. We understand how those surges happen. A candidate who attracts national media attention early in the cycle, long before most voters are paying attention, is likely to receive even higher rankings in subsequent polls because voters are likely to think first of candidates whose names they've seen more recently. That showing leads to more media attention, producing even larger poll numbers. (Are those public-opinion surges, and the campaign events that spark them, really that random? I don't think we political scientists have a good handle on the answer yet.)

In Christie's case, even if he moves back up in the polls temporarily, his prospects are dismal, as reflected in his campaign's own spin. His team is trying to make us believe, for example, that Vermont and Massachusetts — where they believe Christie will do well — are crucial Republican primaries. With no endorsements from governors to tout, his campaign is reduced to letting Politico know that "he occasionally texts" with Gov. Nikki Haley of South Carolina as an example of his (potential?) party support in early primary states.

Still, none of the other viable candidates — not Jeb Bush nor Marco Rubio nor Scott Walker nor others — has stepped up over the last six months, so at least Christie hasn't fallen any further behind. For a few more months, that's probably all it takes to make sticking around a reasonable choice.

Green Pressure Applied Against Christie on Cap and Trade as He Enters Presidential Fray // The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Blaze // Kevin Mooney – July 4, 2015

With Governor Chris Christie of New Jersey now officially entering the presidential fray, his decision to withdraw from a multi-state "cap and trade" coalition, is expected to come under increased scrutiny and criticism. Christie announced his decision during a May 2011 press conference much to the consternation of environmental activists who hold considerable power and influence in the state.

The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, widely known as RGGI, calls for participating states to cut their emissions by 10 percent. During his press conference, the Republican governor described RGGI as an ineffective, counterproductive program that would result in higher costs for state residents without producing any tangible environmental benefits.

"RGGI does nothing more than tax electricity, tax our citizens, tax our businesses, with no discernable or measurable impact upon our environment. Because states such as Pennsylvania are not RGGI members it's just possible that by making the cap too stringent clean New Jersey plants would be forced to close only to be replaced by power from dirty Pennsylvania coal plants," Christie said. "It doesn't make any sense environmentally or economically and the continuation of this tax makes no sense for my efforts and the Lieutenant Governor's continued efforts to make New Jersey a more business-friendly environment and a place where private sector jobs can continue to be created."

But now, there is a movement afoot at the state level that could force N.J. back into a "cap and trade" arrangement in anticipation of federal regulations built around President Obama's Clean Power Plan proposal. Team Obama is aiming for a 30 percent reduction in carbon emissions by 2030. The Environmental Protection Agency is expected to release a new rule later this year, perhaps as early as August, setting state-by-state goals for reducing carbon emissions. Legal analysts familiar with the EPA proposal have expressed concern that state officials could be persuaded to embrace a "back door cap and trade" strategy as a way to preempt federal regulations. This approach would avoid straight up and down votes in state legislatures where opposition to cap and trade policies could gather strength, they warn.

"The politics of carbon trading has generally been pretty toxic whenever it comes up at the federal level," Gregory Sopkin, a partner at Wilkinson, Barker Knauer, LLP, said in an interview. "Even during the Obama Administration when it had Democrats in control of both houses of Congress, cap and trade didn't pass because the public generally opposed. So now, with about 30 state legislatures controlled by Republicans, you can imagine that a lot of environmental groups are not going to like this sort of political accountability we could have if a proposal needed to pass both chambers."

But in those states where political opposition would most likely scuttle cap and trade proposals, a "Common Elements Approach" could be presented as a "middle ground" where states craft their own individual, as opposed to multi-state, plans to achieve certain emissions targets, according to a white paper Sopkin co-authored on behalf of his firm.

"The state adopting this approach with select common elements in its state plan could, after approval by EPA of the individual state plan, partner with states with similar state plans and effectively back in to multi-state CO2 trading markets," the paper explains. "These markets would not necessarily share common regions or electrical interconnections, but would share 'common elements.' "

At the state level, there is growing concern over the impact a "federal implementation plan" or FIP, could have on the coal industry, Sopkin noted. For this reason, state officials are willing to entertain alternative carbon trading plans folded within the "Common Elements Approach" that would supposedly provide them with greater flexibility, he said.

Environmental organizations such as the Center for New Energy Economy, which is part of Colorado State University, The Great Plains Institute based in Minneapolis, Minn., the Southern Alliance for Clean Energy based in Knoxville, Tenn. and RGGI have been organizing meetings with state officials across the country.

"Not all of the meetings are publicized, and they take many forms, but we do know these groups support the EPA plan and that they are pushing the states in a certain direction," Matthew Larson, an associate with the firm and a co-author of the paper, said. Michael Bloomberg, the former mayor of New York, has been a particularly active player in the northeast while Jay Nixon, the governor of Missouri, has been holding court with environmentalists in his state, Larson added.

Where Christie is concerned, RGGI was never enforceable between states. He was able to take advantage of the fact that any state could leave the coalition at any time. However, this would not be an option under the EPA proposal.

"RGGI is different from the Common Elements Approach in which each state would have its own plan, which involves trading with other states," Sopkin said. "Ultimately, we don't believe RGGI is an adequate model for what the EPA would require."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If new regional agreements are implemented, it is possible N.J. could be forced back into the cap and trade plan similar to what Christie unraveled back in 2011.

So what happens if a state presses ahead with carbon trading without any new legislation under the Clean Power Plan?

"I would expect, parties within that state will bring suit saying you do not have the authority to do this," Sopkin said. "But you could also see litigation from the other side if they don't believe the plan is sufficient enough to comply with the EPA requirements. You could have citizen suits involving Sierra Club and other environmental groups. There could be a lot of pressure on both sides."

But just prior to Christie's official announcement on Tuesday, the U.S. Supreme Court added a new wrinkle that could solidify state opposition to green regulatory schemes. In Michigan v. EPA, the justices overturned an EPA rule for reducing emissions of mercury and other substances from coal-fired power plants. As this decision could set a strong precedent for cases that involve EPA overreach, states and utilities may want to stay their hand and avoid preemptively complying with the agency's climate rule before legalities are settled. That's what the language of the ruling strongly suggests.

Christie's decision to withdraw from cap and trade has been opposed by N.J. environmental groups and Democratic lawmakers. He has vetoed bills that called for the state to rejoin RGGI.

Even so, the governor has sent out mixed signals on environmental policies that he will need to clarify on the campaign trail. Back in November 2010, he expressed skepticism toward the idea that human activity drove climate change during a town hall meeting in Toms River, N.J. But during the press conference announcing his decision to withdraw from RGGI, he moved decisively in the opposite direction while also embracing wind and solar power initiatives.

Recall that Christie was endorsed by the N.J. Environmental Federation during his first run for governor. Since then, he has lost support from the greenies, but hasn't exactly convinced conservatives across the country of his free-market credentials. He has arrived at the point where it is necessary to clarify his position on the "science" underpinning global warming alarmism.

Christie campaign surges ahead on road to failure // Las Vegas Sun // Jonathan Bernstein – July 4, 2015

Of the nine Republican presidential candidates I consider viable, I have New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who made his bid official Tuesday, as dead last.

From the start, he was probably too moderate to have much of a chance at the nomination, and it wasn't clear whether Republicans nationwide would ever warm to his New Jersey style. While conservatives might have forgiven him for some of his positions (as they did Mitt Romney), they wouldn't forget his embrace of Barack Obama after Hurricane Sandy, just before the 2012 election. Then the trouble his staff created in blocking traffic on the George Washington Bridge destroyed his November electability argument by attaching a scandal to his candidacy.

Still, he remains a candidate with conventional qualifications (unlike, say, Carly Fiorina or Ben Carson), and he is in the Republican mainstream on policy (unlike Rand Paul). A sudden surge in public opinion would make a lot of Christie's liabilities look less formidable.

Christie may have a better chance of creating a surge moment than most other long shots in the 2016 race: Mike Huckabee, Bobby Jindal, Rick Perry, John Kasish and Rick Santorum. I suspect a poll of Republican operatives might find that opinion widespread.

Any candidate in the 2016 cycle can have a polling surge. But only plausible nominees (that is, those who have conventional credentials and mainstream party positions on policy) can take advantage of such a leap. If one of them suddenly moves to the top of the heap early, party actors might rush to support him or her. (By contrast, if a Ben Carson or a Carly Fiorina gets the same polling rush, the party figures wouldn't jump on board; they might even try to derail such a contender.)

A public-opinion groundswell isn't enough to clinch the nomination (ask Perry, who lost his 2012 momentum in his awful debate performances). But the eventual winner needs to get such a lift at some point in his or her campaign.

We understand how those surges happen. A candidate who attracts national media attention early in the cycle, long before most voters are paying attention, is likely to receive even higher rankings in subsequent polls because voters are likely to think first of candidates whose names they've seen more recently. That showing leads to more media attention, producing even larger poll numbers. (Are those public-opinion surges, and the campaign events that spark them, really that random? I don't think we political scientists have a good handle on the answer yet.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Christie's case, even if he moves back up in the polls temporarily, his prospects are dismal, as reflected in his campaign's own spin. His team is trying to make us believe, for example, that Vermont and Massachusetts — where his team members believe Christie will do well — are crucial Republican primaries. With no endorsements from governors to tout, his campaign is reduced to letting Politico know that "he occasionally texts" with Gov. Nikki Haley of South Carolina as an example of his (potential?) party support in early primary states.

Still, none of the other viable candidates — not Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Scott Walker or others — has stepped up over the past six months, so at least Christie hasn't fallen any further behind. For a few more months, that's probably all it takes to make sticking around a reasonable choice.

In N.H., Christie says he's 'Telling It Like It Is' // Boston Globe // James Pindell – July 4, 2015

SANDOWN, N.H. — Governor Chris Christie of New Jersey, in the middle of a five-day presidential announcement tour in New Hampshire, travels with a campaign banner that says "Telling It Like It Is."

But the "it" Christie talks about these days is mostly himself.

This week Christie became the 14th Republican to announce his intention to run for president in 2016. Two years ago Christie led the field, but he is in a much weakened position today.

Under his watch, New Jersey has undergone nine credit rating downgrades. The state is ranked 48th in private-sector job growth. He faces a public employee pension crisis. In addition, the so-called Bridgegate scandal, involving his once inner circle of aides, is still not over.

And when it comes to issues, Christie, a moderate, is hardly a darling of the Republican base.

As a result, in his presidential announcement launch and during five straight days of campaigning in the Granite State, Christie has treated the presidential contest like a season of "The Bachelorette": trying to win over voters with charm and personal rapport.

His answers to voters' questions are laced with "man" and "buddy" and "let me tell ya." When Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush released their announcement videos, they featured everyday people talking about their lives. Christie's pitch was two minutes of the candidate talking about the moment his mother died.

He has repeated the story at town hall meetings in New Hampshire. He has given marital advice, revealed how often he gets a test for prostate cancer, and told a lengthy story about his daughter's Notre Dame tuition bill.

"The first thing that came to mind after seeing him is that he has a strong personality," said New Hampshire state Representative Joe Hagan, a Republican from Chester, who attended Christie's town hall meeting in Sandown on Tuesday night.

Privately his aides note that Christie is trying, in part, to use the playbook of Republican John McCain's win in the 2000 New Hampshire primary.

Like McCain back then, he is essentially skipping Iowa, running an underdog campaign on the cheap, and hoping his big personality will win people over at endless town hall meetings at VFW halls, schools, diners, and even bars.

Whether this approach will work is unclear.

Sarah Crawford Stewart, a key New Hampshire aide to McCain in both his 2000 and 2008 victories, said Christie faces a more complicated campaign than McCain did 16 years ago.

"Back then, McCain was the only Republican really going after independent voters who can vote in the Republican primary," Crawford Stewart said. "I think there is a lot of opportunity in that space this year, and more Republican candidates are going to be going after that group later in the campaign than even these candidates realize."

Still, Christie's performance at the 138 town hall meetings he has held in New Jersey made him a prominent national politician. Christie aides believe they can recreate the magic of his YouTube town hall moments in another state.

"Christie is an excellent campaigner in small groups — he is engaging and funny, and can connect," said David Redlawsk, who heads up the Rutgers-Eagleton Poll in New Jersey.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jodi Nelson, vice chairwoman of the Derry Republicans, said Christie is standing out by being a truth-teller.

“At this point in the contest, people are just trying to get a sense of all of these candidates, and Christie is someone out trying to meet everyone,” Nelson said.

Boston College political science professor Dave Hawkins says Christie is bringing a different style of campaign than McCain did.

“Their approach to what they call ‘straight talk’ is different,” Hawkins said. “McCain used humor and tried to bring everyone together. He called for campaign finance reform and an end to pork-barrel spending as a way to demonstrate he was an honest broker against the system.”

Christie tries to earn points by going after political opponents — liberals, Democrats, and teachers’ unions, Hawkins said.

“McCain also had an inspiring war hero biography that was central to his story,” he said. “When people think of Christie, they think of a brash New Jersey guy who yells at people.”

But these days Christie is doing less yelling. His style, he says, is “take or leave it.”

“I am going to tell you what I think. If you like it, great. And if you don’t, my goodness, there are 13 other candidates to pick from, so you will find somebody who you agree with more than you agree with me. But you need to know what you are buying,” Christie said.

To Jeff Pattera of Sandown, that approach puts Christie in the top tier of candidates he might support in the February presidential primary.

In modern politics, Pattera said, Christie’s personality “is refreshing.”

Here's Chris Christie's big problem in a nutshell // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 4, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) has a big problem.

Two years ago, when he was a candidate for governor, he was the big-tent candidate. He was attractive to both conservative and moderate Republican voters. And he attracted a broad swath of traditionally Democratic voters — he won 48% of the Latino vote, one-fifth of the African-American vote, and 31% of Democrats overall.

Two years later, as he officially dips his toe into the race for president, he's no one's candidate.

"His issue at this point is that both moderates and conservatives within the GOP hate him," said Tom Jensen, the director of Public Policy Polling. "There was a time when maybe you could see everyone else splitting the conservatives and Christie getting the centrists, but even they don't like him now."

Two years after being touted as potentially the GOP's best hope against Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, Christie faces a steep uphill climb to the Republican nomination. He's boxed in by members of his own party who are similar to him ideologically. And he's lost his appeal as a moderate candidate because people have grown tired of his brash personality.

That is manifesting itself in early-voting states like Iowa — which Christie has been mostly avoiding so far, opting instead to press full-steam ahead into New Hampshire. Home Depot founder Ken Langone, perhaps Christie's most significant donor and Wall Street supporter, said "the hell with Iowa" in an interview this week, leading to a round of bad press in the state. Iowa Republicans are souring on him, too — just 28% view him favorably, according to a recent Des Moines Register poll, compared with 58% who view him unfavorably.

"His problem is that there isn't even a single fix for his problems," Jensen said. "Some people don't like him because he's too liberal, some people don't like him because he's a jerk, some people don't like him because he's a Cowboys fan. It would be hard enough to overcome one of those problems, but near impossible to overcome all of them."

The chart below shows the change in Christie's fortunes, illustrating how the percentages of Americans who hold favorable and unfavorable views of the New Jersey governor have shifted over time. Christie's net favorability peaked in January 2013, when 51% of Americans had a favorable opinion, and just 23% had an unfavorable opinion.

Those numbers have flipped upside-down, with polling last month showing 27% favorable and 55% unfavorable:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the past year and a half, different elements have pummeled his image in and out of his home state. There's the Bridgegate scandal, to which he was never directly linked but which clearly damaged his reputation as an executive.

Then there's his economic record: He has endured nine credit downgrades, and New Jersey's credit rating is second-worst in the nation. He has had continual problems with his state's budget. And Democrats point to the fact that New Jersey ranks 48th in job creation.

"He likes to tell people that he isn't responsible for New Jersey's economic failures because he inherited a bad economy," one Democratic strategist told Business Insider. "But since the Great Recession the country has bounced back and New Jersey's neighboring states haven't just recovered all the jobs they lost – they've added significantly more."

One poll released this week displayed, in brutal fashion, how his home state's voters have turned on him. Among the highlights:

> A clear majority (57%) of New Jerseyans think Christie should resign now that he is officially running for president, compared with 37% who think he should be allowed to stay in office.
>
> His approval rating in the state sits at just 36%, compared with 58% who disapprove.
>
> Christie trails Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, 49-32, in a hypothetical general-election matchup.
>
> Christie also trails his Republican opponents in primary matchups. Republican voters in the state think both former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and US Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida) would make better presidents. And Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker draws even with Christie.

Then there's this: Just 27% of New Jersey residents say Christie would make a good president, compared with 69%. Christie is well aware of this fact, and he has attributed it in an interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly to the notion that "a lot of those people ... want me to stay" as governor.

But Monmouth followed up with poll respondents in an attempt to fact check Christie's claim. It found that just 5% who said Christie wouldn't make a good president said they gave that response because they hope he stays on as governor. On the other hand, 89% confirmed for a second time that they really think he would make a bad president.

"I'm not sure how the governor defines 'a lot,' but any common sense usage of the term would have to be significantly greater than five percent," said Patrick Murray, the director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute.

Christie enters the race: Swinging for the fence // North Jersey // Matthew Hale – July 4, 2015

CHRIS CHRISTIE is a Met Fan. There is always hope. Despite almost identical records this year, Yankee fans have a lot more confidence in their team's playoff chances than Met fans do. That is because the Yankees always have an air of inevitability about them; the Mets? It's always about hope.

In the summer of 2011, Chris Christie was the Yankees. Every spring Yankee fans expect them to make the World Series. Even Yankee haters have the sense that no matter what they do, the Yankees will in fact make it to the Promised Land. Back in 2011 Christie was full of confidence and swagger, and even his harshest critics seemed resigned to the fact he was eventually headed to the World Series of politics otherwise known as the White House.

In the summer of 2015, Chris Christie is the Mets. In the end, while Mets and Christie fans alike hope they can go all the way, they have a gut sense that maybe this is not their year.

Hope flourishes

Last week Governor Christie formally announced he was running for president. For all candidates, announcement week is a time where hope flourishes and nothing is inevitable. It is no exception with Christie. So since he is a diehard Mets fan, here are a few things that Christie has to "hope" will happen for him to thread the needle and win his party's nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1) A solid re-introduction to inattentive primary voters

I took my generally-indifferent-to-electoral-politics 12-year-old daughter to Christie's formal announcement at Livingston High School on June 30. Her thoughts afterward spoke volumes. What stood out to her were his "conviction and honesty." I know my jaw dropped also, but, hey, she is only 12. However, I soon realized that my daughter was probably like many voters in Iowa and New Hampshire. She doesn't (nor should she) pay enough attention to what is going on in New Jersey politics to realize that voter sentiment in the state toward the governor is such that those terms may well rest on the bottom of a list of adjectives they'd invoke to describe him.

Much has been made of how low Christie's poll ratings are in New Jersey and even his overall negative ratings nationwide. However, like my daughter, at this point voters in Iowa and especially New Hampshire probably don't care or don't know about New Jersey or his record in it.

What they will soon know is what my daughter saw. Christie still has the capacity to deliver a gut-grabbing, straight-talk juggernaut town hall performance that has the room believing every single word. That counts for a lot in New Hampshire and Iowa, where it is all about seeing the candidates face to face. Christie has to hope that he connects with voters in New Hampshire in the same way he connected with my daughter and the crowd in Livingston this week.

2) The YouTube monster reawakens

I did a quick YouTube search by candidate names and then sorted them by number of views. The overall lesson is: Get on Jimmy Fallon's show. Christie doing "Dad Dancing with Jimmy Fallon" has been viewed almost 9 million times, while Jeb Bush's recent slow jam of the news with Fallon is just under 1.5 million views. But even this back-of-the-envelope look shows that Christie owns YouTube, at least among serious (e.g. non-Trump) candidates. He has almost 20 different posts with more than 200,000 hits. That is more than current frontrunners Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Scott Walker combined.

Christie must reawaken the kind of viral video activity he had back when he was a Yankee. Luckily for the governor, the debates, his town hall-style meetings and New Hampshire in general are a natural breeding ground for the YouTube moments that can make or break candidates. Can you imagine how many hits Gary Hart's 1984 axe throwing would have today? Christie and his team have the capacity to create a moment like that and he has to hope it happens.

3) Christie's jabs become haymakers that land

Christie has been on his best behavior lately. It has been a long time since he called anyone an "idiot" or "numbnuts." As a result, we haven't been focusing on one of the governor's greatest strengths. He will take on anyone, anywhere, anytime. In his announcement speech, Christie took a few smacks at President Obama and "Second Mate" Hillary Clinton. But he also took some vague jabs at fellow Republicans. Earlier this year, he was a little more pointed when in the space of about six hours he took swings at Jeb Bush, Ted Cruz and his favorite target, Rand Paul.

In a field of 15 plus, presidential candidates can either try to stay above the fray hoping to look more presidential or they can attack their opponents with joy and vigor. Guess which one is better suited for Christie? He is, perhaps, the best debater of the bunch. A well-placed haymaker from Christie might make Jeb Bush look entitled and privileged; Scott Walker or Marco Rubio inexperienced and untested; or any of the other candidates just plain crazy and unelectable. Christie has to hope that happens. Even better if he can make those moments go viral.

Every year the Mets have moments of magic and hope. So far this year it has been early outings from rookie pitchers Noah Syndergaard and Steven Matza and an 11-game winning streak back in April. But talk to most Met fans and while they are still hopeful, they are expecting the inevitable bad news to come.

Christie has done an amazing job at steadying his sinking ship and repositioning himself to make a serious run for his party's nomination. His opening announcement tour continues to be well received and he clearly has the talent and capacity to throw a couple of no hitters. There is hope in the Christie camp.

For Chris Christie, Freedom Means Nothing Left to Lose as New Jersey Voters Want Him to Resign // Politicus // Sarah Jones – July 4, 2015

New Jersey wants to be free of Governor Chris Christie (R-NJ) according to a Monmouth University poll taken after the Governor announced his bid for the Republican presidential nomination.

It's not that they don't want to lose Christie, either, contrary to what Christie believes. Only 5% said that's why they don't want Christie to run. It's more that they really, really, really do not think he will be a good President. In fact, a majority would like the Republican governor to resign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From the Monmouth University poll released on Thursday:

A large majority feels that Christie has abandoned his commitment to the state and few say he is a good fit for the Oval Office.

Just 27% of New Jerseyans say Chris Christie would make a good president. More than two-thirds (69%) say he would not. A few months ago, Christie was asked on national TV about similar poll results. He responded that survey participants told pollsters he would not make a good president because “a lot of those people…want me to stay.” Monmouth followed up with the participants in our poll and found that just 5% of those who said he would not make a good president say they gave that response because they would rather have Christie stay in New Jersey. Fully 89% of this group, though, confirmed that their answer meant they really think he would make a bad president.

And…. New Jersey would like Chris Christie to resign. Fifty-seven percent of Garden State residents want Christie to get out of the Governor’s mansion, and only 26% say he can run for president and govern New Jersey effectively at the same time:
A majority (57%) of Garden State residents say the governor should resign now that he’s thrown his hat into the ring, compared to 37% who say he should stay in office. Even more New Jerseyans (71%) feel that Christie cannot run for president and govern New Jersey effectively at the same time. Just 26% say he can do both well.

“Chris Christie may be looking for a new job. Just don’t expect his current employer to provide a good reference,” said Patrick Murray, director of the independent Monmouth University Polling Institute.

Familiarity breeds contempt and all of that.

They hate him in New Jersey. So, like a Republican lost in his Fox bubble, Christie figures this means he should run for national office.

You are probably thinking about reality and history and how being hated in the state where a candidate is currently in office doesn’t bode well for running for a bigger office, but being hated and hatred are working out super well for Donald Trump. The Republican expert in bankruptcy is currently polling in second place for his party’s nomination. There is nothing the Republican base likes more than someone America hates.

Freedom for Christ Christie this Fourth of July is just another word for nothing left to lose.

PERRY

New Hampshire Republicans Not Ruling Perry Out // Texas Tribune // Abby Livingston – July 4, 2015

DERRY, N.H. — If Rick Perry has a base in New Hampshire, it’s made up of women and veterans.

At a Friday night campaign event, an adoring crowd ate up every word from the Texas governor. Perry playfully referred to each female supporter he met as "girl," no matter her age. And when the party’s hostess presented him with a New Hampshire-shaped pin, he said, “Pin me.”

And with only two veterans in the GOP nomination hunt, veterans say they have a special affinity for Perry, a former Air Force cargo pilot.

Perry’s New Hampshire political team ensured that parallel-parked cars outside snaked down the street for blocks. But attendance isn’t commitment among New Hampshire’s high-maintenance, fickle electorate.

Even the event’s host, retired Air Force fighter pilot Rob Hampton, is still on the fence.

“He’s on our short list,” he said of Perry.

New Hampshire and Iowa, the other early primary state, are small enough in population that Perry has enough time as an out-of-office former official to make his case. Candidates like Ted Cruz, meanwhile, are tied down with official duties.

Betty Gay, a relocated Texan who now lives in New Hampshire, was at the event and said she liked Perry’s economic positions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But she worries about Republican candidates taking a hard line on gay marriage and abortion and alienating women and voters with friends and family members who are gay.

“That’s my concern,” the retired Lamar University graduate said.

New Hampshire is traditionally more economically conservative than Iowa. Perry cautiously answered a question on the U.S. Supreme Court’s recent gay marriage ruling.

“I agree with those four justices that were on the losing side is who I agree with,” Perry said. “But the fact is, we’re a rule-of-law country and they make decisions up there that from time to time I don’t agree with. But we are a country of rules and laws, and if we get away from that, we’ve lost everything that we have.”

He then promised to appoint conservative judges as president.

“He finally got to the answer where he said we are a nation of laws, even if we don’t like them,” Gay said. “So I thought that was the answer. But I got the impression he didn’t really want to come out and say it’s a non-issue… because he knows some people here are very upset about it.”

In contrast, New Hampshire state Rep. Ken Weyler is all-in for Perry.

Weyler does not want Perry to just do well in New Hampshire – his aim is for Perry to run the table.

Weyler is part of a conservative initiative called the “603 Alliance.” 603 is the state’s area code, and the group seeks to consolidate conservative support behind a single candidate so that Democratic and registered Independent voters cannot cross over and determine the nominee in the state’s open Republican primary.

But six months out from that election, Perry lags behind his GOP rivals in state polling. A decisive victory over the crowded and talented GOP field is a tall order for Perry.

“We have to start emphasizing, we want a resume, not a slogan. We want something real,” Weyler said. “And we want a record of accomplishment. We want a veteran… I’m trying to get the veteran vote behind him.”

Like a Perry campaign swing in March, the candidate’s articulate and wide-ranging stump speech played well in this setting. Voter by voter, Perry is effectively erasing memories of his 2011 debate flop.

“For crying out loud!” Gay said when asked about Perry’s 2011 troubles. “If anybody can say they have never been deep into a discussion and all of the sudden their mind switches to a different track…”

“Baloney!” she exclaimed.

Perry’s Texas rival for the GOP nomination, Cruz, will spend the Fourth of July doing campaign and book tour events in Greenville, South Carolina.

Report: Perry Emerges as Trump's Biggest Critic Among GOP Rivals // Newsmax // Todd Beam on – July 4, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry is emerging as the strongest critic of fellow Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump and his controversial remarks on illegal immigrants.

"I don't think Donald Trump's remarks reflect the Republican Party," Perry said Thursday after a speech at the National Press Club in Washington in which he called on the GOP to reach out to African Americans in the upcoming election.

He sharpened his attacks later in an interview with Fox News, The Texas Tribune reports.

"I think that was huge error on his part and, number one, it's wrong," Perry said of Trump's remarks on illegals in his June 16 announcement speech. "What I would say is that we want somebody who’s actually dealt with this before, not somebody that’s just going to shoot from the hip.

"I will suggest to you I know how to secure the border, and the border security is the real issue here," he said.

Perry, who stepped down in January as the Lone Star State's longest-serving governor, last year deployed 1,000 National Guard troops to the Texas-Mexico border to combat the surge in illegal immigrant children pouring into the country.

His Thursday attacks on Trump marked a sharp departure from Perry's comments the previous day, in which he told Fox that the billionaire developer's remarks on immigration simply were ones "that I certainly wouldn't have made."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perry's campaign, however, played Thursday's criticism for all that it was worth, the Tribune reports. Staffers immediately released the comments to reporters, with video from the interview and transcripts highlighting the remarks.

Perry himself even sent out this Twitter message linking to the release:
In response, Trump criticized Perry on Saturday, telling Fox News the former governor had not done more "in terms of protecting people" from illegals crossing the South Texas border.

Still, Perry remains far behind Trump in the polls. He finished 8 percentage points behind Trump, who placed second, with 12 percent of those surveyed saying that they supported him.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush finished first, with 19 percent.

GRAHAM

Republican presidential candidate Lindsey Graham has a stark warning for the US // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 4, 2015

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-South Carolina) has a warning for the US: if we don't reform entitlements, we could end up like Greece.

On Saturday, the Republican presidential candidate told Business Insider that the US risks a Greek-style financial crisis if Congress doesn't reform entitlement programs.

"If you can't do a grand bargain where you reform entitlements and flatten out the tax code, we could become Greece," Graham said.

Years of debt and subsequent austerity measures have stifled the Greek economy.

This week, Greece defaulted on its loan payments to the International Monetary Fund. The country will vote Sunday on a referendum that will decide if Greece will accept another bailout from its three main creditors: the IMF, the European Central Bank, and the European Commission

In order to prevent a similar situation, Graham proposed a broad range of solutions outlined in the 2012 Simpson-Bowles plan — a broad, relatively centrist entitlement reform plan that died in Congress.

The Senator said that in order to curb rising costs of Medicare, Social Security, and other programs, he'd raise the retirement age, trim benefits, and flatten out the tax code.

Graham said he would be willing to eliminate some tax deductions to get centrist Democrats on board. Graham told Business Insider that the Senate Democrats like Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-New York) and Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Illinois) had expressed interest in entitlement reform, as long as the plans included new revenue.

The South Carolina Senator said his plan may upset the hard-liners of both parties, but could be a good compromise.

"You're not going to get Bernie Sanders, you're probably not going to get the folks on the right to agree on revenue," Graham said. "We got to have a bipartisan plan in order to avoid becoming Greece."

It's unlikely the US would run into a problem like Greece's, since the US controls the currency that it owes its debt in. If the debt became too great, the US could physically print its way out of debt, which would devalue its currency significantly and lead to inflation, but would not leave the country at the mercy of the IMF or other creditors.

The South Carolina Senator also brushed off concerns about Greece leaving the European Union and seeking a greater alliance with Russia.

"That'd be like getting a ticket on the Titanic. I'm not so sure that's the way to go for Greece," Graham said.

Graham sees 'perfect storm' from terror // Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – July 4, 2015

MANCHESTER - Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the U.S. government is losing the ability to defend Americans "because of stupid politics."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican presidential hopeful spoke before campaigning in New Hampshire on the Fourth of July, when the State Department warned about potential terror threats related to the holiday weekend.

Graham, long a defense hawk, continues to advocate for more robust national security and surveillance.

"People kind of push back on me that I'm too much of an alarmist - that I'm over-selling. I don't think I am," Graham said in an interview with the New Hampshire Union Leader. "I think there's a perfect storm brewing out there for us to get hit hard. In the face of increased threats, we are literally reducing our defense and intelligence capability."

Graham had argued for renewal of the Patriot Act to ensure the National Security Agency maintains surveillance authority.

Graham, a retired Air Force lawyer and judge advocate, sits on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

This weekend was the first time Graham campaigned in New Hampshire since the shooting in a church in Charleston, S.C., two weeks ago. Graham postponed a visit in order to be in his home state to address the murders, including controversy over the Confederate flag flying on state house grounds. Graham, in a change of position on the flag, joined other leaders in his state in calling for the flag to be removed from state house grounds.

Graham, in the interview, shook his head as he said he still cannot understand how a 21-year-old like Dylann Roof could go into a church, be invited to worship, and then shoot people.

"That's a level of hate that's hard to understand," Graham said.

Roof was arrested and charged with killing nine people at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston.

"But at the end of the day, 48 hours after the shooting, the families appeared in court to confront the killer. They say, 'You destroyed my life, but I forgive you, I love you.' That kind of love can only come from God," Graham said. "It changed my state. There's been a soul-searching in South Carolina like I have never seen. Churches have been full. People have been reaching out, holding each other. The flag will come down Monday. It won't solve all of our problems, but it is a step forward."

HUCKABEE

Mike Huckabee Vows To Prosecute Attacks Against Gay Marriage Opponents As Hate Crimes //
On Top - July 4, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee on Thursday denounced the Supreme Court ruling striking down state bans on gay marriage, saying that as president he would protect opponents.

In a Fox News op-ed, Huckabee claimed that the Supreme Court's ruling was an “out-of-control act of unconstitutional judicial tyranny.”

“While some cowardly politicians will wave the white flag and surrender to the false god of judicial supremacy, I refuse to light a match to our Constitution,” he wrote. “We must resist and reject judicial tyranny, not retreat.”

Huckabee pledged as president to sign executive orders that “support traditional marriage and protect businesses, churches, non-profits, schools and universities, hospitals, and other organizations from discrimination, intimidation, civil penalties, or criminal attacks for exercising their religious beliefs” and direct the attorney general to “protect liberty and prosecute any violations of First Amendment rights of individuals, businesses, religious organizations, institutions, and civil servants, including those who believe in traditional marriage.”

“The Justice Department will protect and defend the rights of American citizens to follow their religious convictions without discrimination, and prosecute attacks on people of faith and their religious liberty.”

“I will aggressively prosecute attacks against people of faith as hate crimes,” he added.

A graphic posted on the Huckabee campaign Facebook page quotes the former governor as saying, “An attack on Christians and their religious liberty is a hate crime that be prosecuted.”

FIORINA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lt. governor offers support to Fiorina // Journal Gazette // Niki Kelly & Brian Francisco – July 5, 2015

Indiana Lt. Gov. Sue Ellspermann on Monday announced that she supports Republican Carly Fiorina in her bid for the presidency in 2016.

"As a former business owner, I appreciate that Carly, previous CEO of a Fortune 100 company, has the background to grow our economy and lead our country," Ellspermann said.

"With her breadth and depth of experience as a business leader, as the former Chair of the CIA's Advisory Board and as the leader of multiple nonprofit organizations, Carly brings a fresh, yet informed perspective to Washington. I believe Carly will place problem-solving before politics, a behavior Americans desire and deserve."

Ellspermann will co-chair Fiorina's Indiana efforts with Suzanne Jaworowski, the communications and government affairs director for Hallador Energy/Sunrise Coal.

A news release said Ellspermann and Jaworowski will work to communicate Fiorina's unique credentials and accomplishments and will help build a grass-roots network of support.

Fiorina is a businesswoman and former CEO of Hewlett-Packard.

She is the only female Republican candidate and recently came in second in the Western Conservative Summit's GOP presidential straw poll.

Donnellyvisits Iraq

Sen. Joe Donnelly, D-Ind., is part of a congressional delegation that has been in Iraq on a fact-finding trip, his office announced Monday.

The delegation met with U.S. military leaders and Iraqi officials, including Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi, to discuss the fight against Islamic State militants in Iraq.

"With more than 3,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and more on the way, I felt it was critical to hear directly from our commanders on the ground and our Iraqi allies – Shia, Sunni, and Kurdish – about the current strategy. We also discussed what role the U.S. and our coalition partners in the region should play going forward," said Donnelly, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, in a statement.

Donnelly is part of a delegation led by Sen. Tim Kaine, D-Va.

According to Kaine's office, others in the group are Democratic Reps. Brian Higgins of New York, Tulsi Gabbard of Hawaii, Stephen Lynch and Jim McGovern of Massachusetts and Peter Welch of Vermont.

The delegation visited Iraq and Kuwait last weekend, traveled to Jordan on Monday and was in Turkey on Tuesday.

Hale not running

State Rep. Christina Hale, D-Indianapolis, announced Monday that she will campaign for re-election next year rather than run for an open U.S. Senate seat, the Associated Press reported.

Hale's decision leaves former U.S. Rep. Baron Hill, a native of Seymour, as the only announced Democratic candidate for the seat held by Republican Sen. Dan Coats, who will not seek re-election.

Two Republicans – former state GOP Chairman Eric Holcomb of Indianapolis and U.S. Rep. Marlin Stutzman, R-3rd, of Howe – seek to replace Coats.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal: The son of im migrants and new champion of the tough-on-immigrants crowd // WaPo // Janell Ross – July 4, 2015

Bobby Jindal lives in a very interesting and unique political space.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He's one of many, many men and one woman vying for the GOP nomination in 2016. He's a young governor but is widely regarded as a withered-though-once-rising political star. He's the first Indian-American to be considered a serious candidate for the White House, but he shuns that label and believes that every American should strive to live a non-hyphenated experience.

He's the pro-melting pot candidate in a world in which the American salad bowl is seen as a hipper or at least more inclusive national metaphor. He expresses significant concern about the danger he insists some immigrants can represent in the United States and countries abroad. And this month, all of that may have attracted more attention than Jindal's formal announcement that he's running for president.

First, a bit of background.

In January, Jindal took a trip to Europe, gave some speeches and did some interviews. They included the idea that some European countries have mistakenly allowed Muslim immigrants to establish almost autonomous communities in which strict religious laws, known as Sharia, govern life. Some of these places had become "no-go" zones for non-Muslims, Jindal claimed.

Amid criticism that his comments were not only counterfactual but flavored by more than a little bit of influence from people like Pamela Geller, who has long warned of the dangers created by so-called "creeping Sharia," Jindal doubled down. In a satellite interview from London with CNN, Jindal said:

> I knew that by speaking the truth we were going to make people upset. ... The huge issue, the big issue in non-assimilation is the fact that you have people that want to come to our country but not adopt our values, not adopt our language and in some cases want to set apart their own enclaves and hold on to their own values. I think that's dangerous.

Then in February, Jindal came to Washington, D.C., addressed an anti-Common Core curriculum organization, and repeated these thoughts.

All that was looming in the backdrop when Jindal announced his bid for the White House on June 24. And true to his politics, Jindal's speech included references to the exceptionalism of America, the experiences of his immigrant parents and the "assault" that Christianity faces.

Then, he went on.

> As for me, I'm sick and tired of people dividing Americans. And I'm done with all this talk about hyphenated Americans. We are not Indian-Americans, Irish-Americans, African-Americans, rich Americans, or poor Americans – we are all Americans.

> While I'm at it, here's another thing you aren't allowed to say, but I'm going to say it anyway: We cannot allow people to immigrate to this country so that they can use our freedoms to undermine our freedoms. ... It is not unreasonable to demand that if you immigrate to America, you must do so legally, and you must be ready and willing to embrace our values, learn English and roll up your sleeves and get to work.

That was all too much for a certain subset of Americans. For those whose social media accounts have yet to feature the #Jindian and #BobbyJindalIsSoWhite hashtags, please brace yourself.

Writer Hari Kondabolu, formerly part of the writing team at the now-canceled political comedy show "Totally Biased with W. Kamau Bell," told the publication Colorlines that after Jindal's announcement, he was irritated. Kondabolu, who is Indian American, was bothered by what he sees as Jindal's cynical games with race and identity, fear of immigrants and the desire of older Indian Americans to be fully included in American life. So, he started the #BobbyJindalIsSoWhite hashtag.

Then, he went at Jindal hard. Real hard.

Soon, someone else shared their sense that Jindal pulled a downright #jindian move when he allowed official and unofficial gubernatorial portraits of himself to depict a man whose skin mysteriously appeared several shades lighter than Jindal's own to be hung in public spaces.

And then there was this -- quite possibly the sharpest critique of them all -- from comedian and "Daily Show" alum Aasif Mandvi:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It wasn't long before conservative fans of Jindal and others rose to Jindal's defense. They described the online commentary as deeply offensive, inappropriate, cruel and an exemplar of the left's hypocrisy. Jindal's campaign even had some fun with it, printing T-shirts with the slogan "Tanned. Rested. Ready."

All that might have faded into the mass of ideas shared on social media if a pro-Jindal super PAC hadn't begun running ads in Iowa in recent days playing up -- what else -- Jindal's views about immigrants.

“I think our immigration system is broken,” Jindal said in a clip included in the ad. “If folks want to immigrate to America, they should do so legally. They should adopt our values. They should learn English. And they should roll up their sleeves and get to work.”

Here, we see the super PAC's version of Jindal, equipped and willing to say what others won't or can't about America's immigrants -- perhaps because he is the brown-skinned son of Indian Hindu immigrants. He "learned" English. He speaks with a vaguely Southern-American-inflected accent. He converted to Christianity. He rejects a life in which Indian Americans don't focus on the latter portion of that label. Why can't others just do the same? In fact, Jindal should be trusted to lead the United States, the argument goes, precisely because of all of the above.

Jindal seems to subscribe to the idea that immigrants arrive with a range of deficits and can't become better until they become American in the ways that he believes matter. In the ad, it seems Jindal is American precisely because he believes in a constant effort to emulate and approximate "standard American-ness" -- what many would say is actually white-ness or at least a very muted Indian-American-ness -- whenever and however possible.

Think that's reading a little too deeply? In January, while in London, Jindal shared these insights:

> I am not suggesting for one second that people should be shy or embarrassed about their ethnic heritage. But I am explicitly saying that it is completely reasonable for nations to discriminate between allowing people into their country who want to embrace their culture, or allowing people into their country who want to destroy their culture, or establish a separate culture within.

Now, to be very clear, there are very large shares of Americans who share Jindal's views.

The 2014 General Social Survey -- one of the most expansive looks at social attitudes and change in United States each year since 1972 -- found that a full 93 percent of Americans said that being able to speak English is very or fairly important to being an American, compared to just 64 percent who said that one's birthplace determines whether or not you're an American. In that same poll, 92 percent pointed to citizenship and 91 percent said following America's laws make you an American.

But lest anyone think that Jindal's views are all there is, also consider this:

In a September 2012 CNN/Opinion Research poll, Americans were nearly evenly split on questions of cultural assimilation. About 48 percent said it is better for the United States to encourage immigrants to blend in by "giving up some important aspects of their own culture." But 44 percent said the country should encourage, "immigrants to maintain their own culture" even if it means they "do not blend as well." And 5 percent said they thought some mixture of both approaches would be ideal.

Finally, a Pew Research Center poll released in June 2014 found some appreciable differences between the way that white, black and Latino Americans view immigrants. And not surprisingly, there were even bigger differences between Republicans and Democrats.

Now, Jindal is certainly entitled to advance whatever themes and policy ideas he thinks best. It's also worth noting that the content of the super PAC's ads are outside Jindal's control, even if they were created from snippets of his public speeches and closely mirror his own, oft-used rhetoric.

But it's also clear that Jindal is one of the few candidates -- besides Donald Trump -- who has decided that talking about the threats he believes are posed by unassimilated immigrants is part of his path to the White House.

Conservative defenders would do well not to aggressively police the way that Indian Americans discuss or even ridicule Jindal's choices. That obscures the kind of learning and information exchange -- no matter how embarrassing, squirm-inducing or painful -- that every American surely knows can come from humor and debate.

At the same time, those who would dismiss Jindal as a political actor worthy of nothing more than identity-centered ridicule might do well to think about just how appealing a candidate willing to talk tough on immigration and push assimilation and speaking English can be to many Americans.

Bobby Jindal expresses optimism about his future in Iowa // Des Moines Register // Maya Kliger

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– July 4, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Bobby Jindal wrapped up a five-day swing through Iowa with stops at two metro-area parades on Independence Day.

The governor of Louisiana was encouraged by the reception he received throughout the week, and he said was optimistic about future trips back to the state hosting the first-in-the-nation caucuses.

"I think this is a marathon, not a sprint. I think that we got great responses everywhere we went. Everywhere we went, people were signing up to be volunteers and to learn more about the campaign," he said. "But everywhere we went, we also committed that we'd be coming back, and we'd be spending a lot of time here.

"We intend to do town halls and go to restaurants and factories, and do exactly what we've done this week, and do that over and over. And I think that will absolutely generate great results for us."

In both Urbandale and Windsor Heights, Jindal eagerly spoke to people in the crowd, oftentimes falling behind the rest of the parade.

Many of the people he spoke to, although not positive they will ultimately caucus for him, expressed support because of his conservative values and what they described as his genuine demeanor.

"So far, he (Jindal) is my favorite. He seems like just a person, you know?" said Pat Green, 64, of Urbandale. "I think we need down-to-earth people to run our country because the majority of the country is down-to-earth."

Despite the fact that Jindal is at the bottom of recent polls, he was recognized Saturday because of his campaign ads and media appearances.

Those who knew of him at the parades referenced the video his campaign released of Jindal and his wife telling their children he was running for president, his ads concerning immigration and his interview this past week with Fox News commentator Sean Hannity.

AT THE EVENT

SETTINGS: Fourth of July parades in Urbandale and Windsor Heights.

CROWDS: Jindal greeted dozens at both parades.

REACTION: Many were eager to shake hands and take pictures with the governor, though few were sure that they'll be Jindal supporters.

WHAT'S NEXT: Saturday was the last of a five-day swing through Iowa. The Jindal campaign is planning on coming back later in the month.

Jindal poses with gun at campaign stop, met with online mockery // Statesman // July 4, 2015

SIBLEY, Iowa — Republican presidential candidate and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal posted a photo of himself holding and admiring a weapon while at a campaign stop in Iowa Friday.

Jindal's photo caption reads: "My kind of campaign stop; Capital Armament in Sibley."

According to the company's Facebook page, CapArms is a veteran-owned company that manufactures ammunition, firearms and smokeless gunpowder.

Jindal has proven to be a strong supporter of gun ownership rights during his tenure as governor, signing several pro-gun rights bills into law in the state of Louisiana.

Still, not everyone is buying Jindal's affection for weapons, especially on social media. The photo received some mocking comments on Twitter, saying he was pandering to constituents and calling him a poser. One commenter called it Jindal's Dukakis moment, referencing the 1988 campaign photo of Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis riding in a tank. Politico refers to that image as one of the "worst campaign backfires in history."

Bobby Jindal's former media director brands him 'anti-gay' and 'destructive' // Pink News // Nick Duffy – July 4, 2015

Republican Presidential hopeful Bobby Jindal has been attacked by his former head of news media.

The Governor of Louisiana has in the past said his party doesn't need the support of gay people, and has continually tried to force through “religious freedom” laws in his state which would allow anti-gay discrimination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, in a column for the New Orleans Advocate, Jindal’s former news media director Taylor Huckaby lashed out at him.

Mr Huckaby, who is gay, wrote: “During my years in the Jindal machine, I became entrenched in the culture that gave birth to what we see today: fire-and-brimstone Jindal, chomping at the bit to stand in the church house door and refuse Americans their individual right to marry the one they love.

He continues: “I regret nothing more than my complicity in the state’s relentless attacks against my fellow LGBTQ citizens.

“Being anti-gay was (and is) a system requirement for working in Louisiana conservative politics, and it bred a powerful self-hatred.”

Savaging his former employer, he writes: “Jindal’s signature strategy of rallying bigotry diminishes in power with each passing moment.

“Whatever procedural or bureaucratic chicanery he attempts in order to block our freedom to marry will be fruitless, petty and ultimately unsuccessful.

“This Independence Day marks the final Fourth of July Louisiana will observe under Jindal’s dishonest, destructive administration — and also the first Fourth of July that queer Americans may marry whomever they choose.

“For many, that’s something worth celebrating — and as Jindal fades into irrelevance, my deepest hope is that Louisiana elects new leaders who govern differently, leaders who prize fairness, charity, dignity, prudence and kindness above all.”

Governor Jindal has previously defended anti-gay Duck Dynasty star Phil Robertson, who has equated homosexuality with bestiality and claimed that AIDS is “God’s punishment” for homosexuality.

The Governor claimed the Robertsons were “great citizens” of Louisiana, and went on to attack the “politically correct crowd” for criticising the comments by Robertson.

The Human Rights Campaign earlier this year marked an op-ed from Governor Jindal – and he definitely didn’t pass with flying colours.

An attempted put-down of President Barack Obama’s State of the Union address last year backfired, when Governor Jindal used the wrong “your” in a tweet.

Bobby Jindal Sued Over Anti-Gay Executive Order // Edge Media Network // John Reilly – July 4, 2015

Bobby Jindal had better get the lawyers ready.

The ACLU Foundation of Louisiana, the Forum for Equality Foundation and six individual plaintiffs have filed a lawsuit challenging an executive order issued by the Louisiana governor that would allow people to discriminate against same-sex couples.

The "Marriage and Conscience Order," as issued by Jindal in May, prohibits the state or its agents from denying tax exemptions or credits, grants, contracts, certification or accreditation from a person or business who refuses to provide services to LGBT people if they believe that doing so would violate their personal moral or religious beliefs regarding homosexuality or same-sex marriage. Jindal, a Republican presidential hopeful, issued the order after a bill that was similar in scope failed to obtain enough votes to move out of committee in the Louisiana House of Representatives.

In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs argue that Jindal's order is unconstitutional because it goes beyond his authority as governor, as spelled out by the separation of powers clause in the Louisiana state constitution. The lawsuit also alleges that the order creates a special class of people and businesses who are protected due to their opposition to marriage equality, while other people and businesses who support marriage equality are not afforded those same rights. As a result of the protections afforded to only those who oppose marriage equality, the plaintiffs argue that the order essentially "sanctions discrimination" against not only same-sex couples, but those who support them.

"Governor Jindal's unauthorized taking of the legislature's power to make new laws or change existing laws violates the Louisiana Constitution," the lawsuit reads. "Governor Jindal's 'Marriage and Conscience Order' also exceeds the authority granted to him for issuing executive orders. The governor is given authority to issue executive orders to see that laws are faithfully executed. The statute does not give the governor the authority to create a new law or overrule the legislature's decision to not pass a law."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Governor Jindal has violated the Louisiana Constitution by setting up special protections for those who share his belief system," said Marjorie Esman, the executive director of the ACLU Foundation of Louisiana. "In our country no one is above the law, including the Governor. He swore to uphold the laws of Louisiana. This lawsuit seeks to hold him to that oath."

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal governs via cellphone // The Advocate // Mark Ballard & Marsha Shuler – July 4, 2015

Even before officially joining the presidential sweepstakes, Gov. Bobby Jindal spent far less time in Louisiana than his predecessors.

Since announcing June 24 that he was seeking the Republican presidential nomination, Jindal has been in Louisiana only one day, according to campaign news releases and the lieutenant governor's records. And with just six months left in his administration, Jindal is expected to spend more and more time in the early primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

He'll be governing Louisiana by cellphone.

"He has a tremendous amount of horsepower and bandwidth," said Timmy Teepell, Jindal's longtime political strategist. "He'll be able to campaign and handle his duties as governor without a problem. He will keep a very busy schedule."

Even before he announced, Jindal spent a lot of time tending to politics out-of-state.

So far this year, he has spent four days out of every 10 somewhere other than in Louisiana, which is about the same rate he was gone in 2014, according to the records of lieutenant governor, who by law is supposed to take over when the governor leaves the state.

The governor's office has stopped issuing press releases alerting the public when Jindal is gone. But just like before the announcement, Louisiana taxpayers are paying the salaries and expenses of the State Police troopers who provide security for him, which includes renting and driving the black Suburbans in which Jindal travels.

The governor's aides send the lieutenant governor a notice when Jindal leaves the state, as required by law, but otherwise there is no coordination or communication with Lt. Gov. Jay Dardenne, who is technically in charge. "The governor is chief executive at all times," Jindal's Communications Director Mike Reed said.

Though it may not look good, computers and cellphones make it a lot easier for an absent chief executive to keep abreast of the issues and make decisions, former Gov. Mike Foster said in an interview last week.

"I don't really see it as a big deal. It's something somebody can gripe about. Whether it hurts your efficiency, I doubt that," said Foster, who was criticized in his day for not traveling very much.

Short of a something like a hurricane or the Mississippi River flooding, Foster said, Jindal's presence in Baton Rouge isn't necessary.

"I'm sure if there's a hurricane he would be back here. I would be surprised if he weren't," Foster said. "You know when they are coming, and you have time to get back."

But maybe the timing for a presidential run is a little off, said former Gov. Buddy Roemer, who ran for president in 2012.

"He can do that. That is fun," Roemer said of Jindal's presidential bid. "But his responsibility is governor. And for that he should stay with the job or quit. Let the lieutenant governor do it. I want to make that point. I don't mind Bobby running for president, just not as governor."

Similarly, former Gov. Kathleen Blanco criticized Jindal's divided attention. "I don't know how a governor can take off so much time from his job, but my experience was different," she said.

Her last six months in office were wall-to-wall work as Louisiana recovered from the 2005 hurricanes. Usually her trips out of state were to Washington, D.C., to argue with congressmen and federal officials about the conditions and requirements of loans and grants needed to rebuild flooded homes, damaged schools and weakened levees.

Seventy-three-year-old state Sen. Francis Thompson, who just finished his 40th legislative session and has seen five other governors wind down their administrations, said all the state's chief executives have their own styles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some are more hands-on; others, like Jindal, delegate authority and responsibilities. But all governors rely on their staffs to keep an even keel, particularly during the final days of their tenure.

“It’s so critical that the staff stays engaged,” said Thompson, D-Delhi. “They still have a role to play. Capital outlay goes nowhere without them. We still have a number of lawsuits. We are still fooling with BP,” the British oil giant responsible for the historic crude oil release in the Gulf of Mexico after the 2010 Deepwater Horizon accident.

Though a state government budget crisis — lawmakers had to fill a $1.6 billion deficit — was averted this year, the solutions are precarious. Its balance could be upset by any number of factors, such as another drop in oil prices or a lack of confidence in the state by credit rating agencies or the success of a lawsuit, like the one filed last week by the Louisiana Chemical Association, challenging the constitutionality of one of the revenue-raising rollbacks in tax breaks that impact businesses.

But short of a calamity like that, being in Baton Rouge is not that necessary, said Terry Ryder, who was Blanco’s executive counsel and Foster’s deputy chief of staff. “He’s got staff in Baton Rouge that can handle it and, as needed, consult him by cellphone. There’s the signature machine (to sign documents),” said Ryder, now a Baton Rouge lawyer.

Jindal receives a binder every morning with briefing materials about what is going on that day. He usually reaches out by breakfast with questions, said his chief of staff, Melissa Mann. The governor calls throughout the day to walk through the questions and issue directives.

“My job is to keep everything running on time. If legislators have issues, I help them sort through them,” Mann said June 26 at the end of her first week on the job. “If the cabinet brings up issues that rise to the level of the governor’s attention, then we have additional conferences on the phone.”

An Oak Grove native who joined the administration in 2008 after graduating from LSU, Mann got the fourth-floor corner office on June 19 after Jindal’s fourth chief of staff, Kyle Plotkin, joined the presidential campaign team.

“We have a pretty good idea of when the governor needs to be briefed on something, when it rises to his level and when we need input and decisions,” Mann said. “We understand the positions and the policies. We’ve been doing this for seven and a half years, so there’s going to be some hard guardrails we understand.”

Commissioner of Administration Kristy Nichols is Jindal’s chief budget adviser and is in charge of the day-to-day operations of the state government bureaucracy. Nothing much has changed for her. Over the years, she has met with Jindal regularly — daily during legislative sessions or weekly, depending on what’s going on. She contacts Jindal through the chief of staff.

The rhythm Nichols and Jindal have developed over the years is in-depth briefings on issues like the budget, operations of state government, upcoming discussions with the Legislature, forecasting future finances and major contracts that are being considered, she said.

“After having been with him for this length of time, I have a good feel of what really needs to be decided by him. But I certainly always brief him on issues that need to be brought to his attention,” Nichols said.

“He’s always got his finger on the pulse of what’s going on here,” said Revenue Secretary Tim Barfield, who, like Nichols, has served in several jobs during the Jindal administration. “From the things I see in my department, I don’t see his physical presence necessary.”

“We’ve finished our final legislative session. We are not going to be advancing a lot of new initiatives,” Mann said. “We’re going to be more overseeing that transition and ensuring that cabinet agencies are prepared for the transition period. ... We’re going to make sure we finish well.”

TRUMP

Mitt Romney Criticizes Donald Trump for Comments on Mexican Immigrants // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015

Mitt Romney criticized the real-estate mogul and presidential candidate Donald Trump on Saturday, saying he was damaging the Republican Party with his comments linking Mexican immigrants to crime.

Mr. Romney, the 2012 Republican presidential nominee, spoke at a Fourth of July parade in Wolfeboro, N.H., where he owns a home. He was asked whether Mr. Trump’s comments depicting Mexican immigrants as violent predators had hurt a party that has been trying to make inroads with Hispanics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Yes," he replied, in remarks reported by CNN. "I think he made a severe error in saying what he did about Mexican-Americans."

Some of Mr. Trump's Republican rivals, like Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, former governors Jeb Bush of Florida and George E. Pataki of New York, have also taken issue with his comments. And the Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton has been alluding to the comments in trying to portray the Republican field as a whole as anti-immigrant.

NASCAR is the latest brand to dump Donald Trump // AP // July 4, 2015

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — NASCAR is the latest corporation to distance itself from Donald Trump.

On the same day one of its top sponsors called on NASCAR to take a stance against Trump, the motorsports series said it will not hold its season-ending awards ceremony at the Trump National Doral Miami.

"We looked at everything we saw coming down and what we heard from our sponsors and our partners and what we feel we should be doing, and that's what led us to the decision today," NASCAR spokesman David Higdon said Friday at Daytona International Speedway.

A message seeking comment from Trump left by The Associated Press was not returned.

Higdon was responding to a letter released by Camping World CEO Marcus Lemonis, whose company is the title sponsor of NASCAR's Truck Series. Lemonis made it clear he would not attend or participate in the awards ceremony if it was held at a Trump property. The ceremony was held at Doral last year.

"My company ... has enjoyed a long running relationship with NASCAR as I believe the vision of our companies both embody family, respect, unity, comradery and diversity," Lemonis wrote in a letter to NASCAR Chairman Brian France. "These sentiments are at the core of what our country stands for and will continue to embrace. ... Due to recent and ongoing blatantly bigoted and racist comments from Donald Trump in regards to immigrants of the United States, I would like to inform you that I will not, nor will any representative of Camping World, participate or attend in the ceremonial event if it is held at any Trump property.

"Our company will not stand to support any person or organization that associates with such beliefs and we feel strongly about distancing ourselves from any negative and discriminatory comments made against any gender, ethnicity, age group or so forth. I would hope that the entire NASCAR organization would agree with my sentiments."

NASCAR and Camping World are the latest to distance themselves from Trump following his inflammatory statements regarding immigrants from Mexico.

NBC, which is one of NASCAR's television broadcast partners, parted ways with Trump earlier this week.

Higdon said NASCAR is looking for another place to hold its awards ceremony and plans to formally announce a location later this summer.

GOP worries about Donald Trump fallout // CNN // Chris Moody – July 4, 2015

Washington (CNN)Republicans seeking to broaden the party's appeal to Latino voters have a challenge: Donald Trump.

The bombastic businessman, who is seeking the GOP presidential nomination, is leaving many Republicans worried about the fallout from his comments that immigrants from Latin America are "killers" and "rapists."

"Donald Trump's comments are hurtful for the cause of Republicans who want to reach out not just to Latinos but across many different ethnic barriers," said Ben Domenech, founder of The Federalist, a conservative opinion website, who co-authored a 2012 guide for Republicans on Hispanic outreach. "The problem with those comments is made worse by the fact that people will continue to confuse Trump with a Republican, which he is not, as opposed to thinking of him as an entertainer, which he is."

Since losing the 2012 presidential election, Republicans have emphasized efforts to bring Latino voters into the fold. As a whole, the rapidly-growing group supported President Barack Obama over Republican Mitt Romney 71% to 27%, according to the Pew Research Center. The Republican National Committee pledged to spend $10 million on minority outreach after the election and made some in-roads during last year's mid-term races 2014, Pew found.

Trump, who is polling near the top of Republican presidential contenders, has already lost partnerships with companies including NBC and Macy's after his comments stirred a public uproar.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Earlier this week, RNC chairman Reince Priebus, who initiated the party's multi-million outreach program called Trump's comments "not helpful," according to The Washington Post.

Conservative groups unaffiliated with the official party that coordinate Latino outreach efforts are speaking out against Trump's characterization of immigrants.

"He's just wrong on policy. Flat-out. It's unkind and it mischaracterizes the contributions of the entire immigrant community," said Daniel Garza, executive director of the Libre Initiative. "They've brought wealth to America and ingenuity and innovation. The fact that Donald Trump is wrong both on sentiment and policy has allowed the Latino left to pile on. And there's something valid about what they're saying, that this is wrong in both content, style and policy."

Despite the outcry, Trump has refused to back down or walk back his remarks.

"If you look at the statistics of people coming, you look at the statistics on rape, on crime, on everything coming in illegally into this country it's mind-boggling!" Trump told CNN's Don Lemon in an interview Wednesday. "Somebody's doing the raping, Don! I mean somebody's doing it! Who's doing the raping?"

Meanwhile, Trump's fellow Republican presidential candidates have distanced themselves from Trump on immigration.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who delivered a speech at the National Press Club in which he called on minority voters to give Republicans a chance to make their case, said: "I don't think Donald Trump's remarks reflect the Republican Party."

And Florida Sen. Marco Rubio said last week that candidates "will be held accountable by the voters for what they say."

"I can tell you what I believe, particularly about Mexican-Americans: they are a community that has contributed greatly to this country, they work extremely hard, they've been very productive citizens of our country, and I think that's true of many ethnic groups in this country," he said.

Trump stands by statements on Mexican illegal immigrants, surprised by backlash // Fox News – July 4, 2015

Republican presidential candidate and real estate mogul Donald Trump on Saturday stood by statements he made recently that too many illegal immigrants from Mexico are criminals but said he was surprised by the backlash and that his comments are causing financial concerns.

“The crime is raging and it’s violent. And if you talk about it, it’s racist,” Trump told Fox News, three days after a purported illegal Mexican immigrant deported five previous times allegedly killed a woman in San Francisco.

Trump first made his inflammatory remarks during his non-scripted, June 16 presidential announcement speech.

“When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending the best,” he said during the announcement. “They're not sending you, they're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems. They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime. They're rapists and some, I assume, are good people, but I speak to border guards and they're telling us what we're getting."

Since then, a list of businesses have announced plans to cut ties with Trump’s vast business empire, while fellow Republican candidates and others have questioned Trump’s remarks.

NBC and Univision, for example, have decided not to air the Trump-owned Miss Universe Pageant, Macy’s is dropping his signature clothing line, New York Democratic Mayor Bill de Blasio has ordered a review of Trump's city contracts and NASCAR is moving an annual banquet from the Trump National Doral resort in Miami.

“I didn’t know it was going to be this severe,” Trump said Saturday, adding that he was surprised by the NASCAR decision, considering he has a good relationship with the group. “I am a whipping post.”

Still, Trump has drawn support from Americans who say he is openly confronting the severity of the immigration problem that others won’t publicly knowledge.

Trump also said Saturday that the problem isn’t limited to Mexico, that everybody entering the United States is not criminal or problematic and that his concerns are rooted in national security.

“It’s about safety,” he said. “Some of the people coming here are very violent people, not all.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump and fellow GOP White House candidate and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio have publicly exchanged remarks since Trump's presidential announcement, with Rubio saying Trump's comments about Mexicans were "offensive, inaccurate and divisive."

After Mexican illegal immigrant Francisco Sanchez apparently killed 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle in San Francisco in a random attack Wednesday, Trump, who has proposed build a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border, sent a direct tweet to Rubio, the son of Cuban parents who has made immigration reform a part of his presidential campaign.

"What do you say to the family of Kathryn Steinle in CA who was viciously killed b/c we can't secure our border? Stand up for US," Trump tweeted.

Federal officials said local authorities repeatedly released Sanchez, who was in their custody as recently as this spring.

On Saturday, Trump said Rubio was "weak on immigration" and that fellow GOP White House candidate and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry "could have done a lot more."

He praised what he considers fellow candidate and Texas GOP Sen. Ted Cruz's tough immigration stance, calling him "very brave."

Trump comes up top in 'poll of polls' of Republican voters - despite growing backlash over his anti-immigrant comments // Daily Mail // Christopher Brennan – July 4, 2015

Donald Trump continues to stand by controversial comments he made about Mexican immigrants as his standings in Republican primary polls improve despite increasing criticism.

The presidential hopeful placed ahead of perceived front-runner Jeb Bush in a new aggregated 'poll of polls' with 13.6 per cent support compared to the former Florida governor's 13.3.

The rise comes as public figures and businesses continue to admonish Trump because of the comments saying that those crossing the border from Mexico illegally were 'rapists'.

Former Republican candidate Mitt Romney told CNN Saturday that the businessman 'made a severe error in saying what he did about Mexican-Americans'.

Trump defended the remarks,and used an interview on Fox and Friends Saturday morning to take a dig at fellow presidential hopeful Marco Rubio.

'Rubio is weak on immigration,' Trump told Fox, while praising the stance of Tea Party favorite Ted Cruz.

He linked policy at the southern US border to crimes, including the San Francisco shooting of 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle by a man who had been deported back to Mexico five times.

'The crime is raging and people don't want to talk about it. And if you talk about it you're a racist,' he said Saturday.

Trump has continued to lose partnerships business after saying in his presidential announcement that migrants from Mexico are 'bringing drugs, they're bringing crime, they're rapists. And some I assume are good people'.

On Saturday NASCAR decided not to hold an event at one of his hotel's in Miami. Univision and NBC have cut ties with his Miss USA and Miss Universe pageants after outrage among Hispanic and Latino groups.

'I'm a little surprised at NASCAR to be honest', Trump said.

While Trump's polling numbers have risen beyond Jeb Bush's, Romney, whose father was born in Mexico, replied that the comments have hurt the Republican party.

He replied 'yes' when asked about the matter, according to CNN.

Former New York Governor and Republican candidate George Pataki, who Trump criticized for not doing well in the polls, sent an open letter to those in his party to denounce the Apprentice host.

Some presidential candidates such as Bush have been keen to court the Hispanic vote, speaking Spanish on prominent television appearances and during his announcement speech in a bid to make inroads to the crucial 2016 demographic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump has repeatedly said that he love Mexico despite many saying that his 'rapists' comments were racist against people from the country.

The candidate said that he was being targeted 'from all sides' because he is successful.

He denied that the ordeal was helping him by making him more recognizable. 'This is not good for my brand, I think it's bad for my brand. Maybe I'm leading in polls, but this is certainly not good. I lose customers, lose people,' he said.

Romney, who spoke at a New Hampshire event he attended with New Jersey Governor Chris Christie and Florida Senator Marco Rubio, refused to say who he is endorsing for the Republican nomination, adding that his decision will come later.

Republicans cast into turmoil as Donald Trump rides the populist surge // Telegraph // Philip Sherwell – July 5, 2015

For Donald Trump the entrepreneur, it was a damaging week. Two major television networks severed ties, Macy's dropped his clothing line and Carlos Slim, the even richer Mexican tycoon, ended a joint venture with him.

But for Donald Trump the inveterate showman and Republican challenger for president, the week was a triumph as he climbed in the opinion polls and dominated media coverage, despite the backlash against his decision to condemn Mexican immigrants as rapists and drug traffickers.

"Wow, Huffington Post just stated that I am number one in the polls of Republican candidates," the brash billionaire bragged as the week closed, citing the liberal media outlet that has been a platform for many of the strongest attacks on him. "Thank you, but the work has just begun!"

Mr Trump was touting his first place in an average of 105 polls. Of the 14 candidates who have declared, Trump topped the field with 13.6 per cent support to 13.3 per cent for Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor and son and brother of two past presidents.

The property mogul, reality television star and beauty pageant owner with the most flamboyant comb-over in public life may seem like a caricature and a political joke.

But the Republican hierarchy is not laughing as he rides an anti-establishment populist tide, shooting from the hip with his overheated rhetoric. They are concerned not because they think he has a chance of securing the nomination but because they fear he could influence the election by scarring the party's reputation.

"Donald Trump is like watching a roadside accident," Ari Fleischer, a former spokesman for George W Bush, told Politico. "Everybody pulls over to see the mess. And Trump thinks that's entertainment. But running for president is serious. And the risk for the party is that he tarnishes everybody."

Mr Fleischer was a co-author of the party's post-mortem into the 2012 presidential election defeat. That soul-searching concluded that the Republicans needed to broaden their appeal to younger voters, women and crucially the demographic of Hispanics.

Mr Fleischer's old boss won 40 per cent of the Latino vote in 2004. Mitt Romney took just 27 per cent eight years later. The party fears efforts to reverse that trend will be set back by Mr Trump's comments, especially if his poll rating secures him a place at the first televised debate next month.

"There's a danger that Trump will crowd out our message with his antics," a senior Romney financial donor who is considering his 2016 options said.

"At first we all just thought he would crash and burn, but now the problem is who he takes down with him."

Mr Trump has long revelled in controversy and was a champion of the "birther movement" that questioned whether Barack Obama was born in America. But it was his comments about Mexican immigrants when he declared his candidacy that have dominated attention.

"Mexico is sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with them," he said. "They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists." And then he added as an afterthought: "And some, I assume, are good people."

His solution is to build a wall along the border and make Mexico pay for it.

Mr Trump's rivals in the race were at first unsure how to respond. Marco Rubio, the Florida senator and son of Cuban immigrants, finally on Thursday called the comments "not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican and who delivered his declaration speech in English and Spanish and supports creating a path for legalising the status of undocumented immigrants, said: “His remarks do not represent the values of the Republican party and they do not represent my values.”

Univision, the largest Spanish-language network in the US, and NBC said they were dropping their broadcasts of the Miss USA and Miss Universe pageants, which Mr Trump co-owns, while Macy’s axed his line of suits and ties.

The latest to distance itself from Mr Trump is Nascar, the motor racing body, which said it would no longer use one of his hotels for its end-of-season awards. Speaking to Fox News yesterday, Mr Trump, 69, said he was surprised by Nascar’s decision and at the strength of the backlash.

“I knew it was going to be bad because all my life I have been told: if you are successful you don’t run for office,” he said. “I didn’t know it was going to be this severe.”

But he defended his stance and said he had become a “whipping post” for speaking up on immigration and crime.The lone fellow candidate to speak up for Mr Trump was Ted Cruz, the Texas senator whose father is Cuban, saying he “speaks the truth”.

This is what attracts grassroots supporters such as Ken Crow, a leader of the Tea Party in the first-voting caucus of Iowa. He reeled off a list of reasons why he was backing Mr Trump. “Americans are sick and tired of corrupt government and career politicians,” he said. “He will straighten out the economy and defend our borders. Americans want a John Wayne right now, someone who’ll be a champion of our country.”

The Trump candidacy is playing up strains between Tea Party activists and senior party figures, with Mr Fleischer adding that his comments were irresponsible and “hurtful”.

And John Weaver, an adviser on John McCain’s 2008 presidential campaign, noted: “I remember growing up in Kermit [Texas], every time the carnival came to town it drew a big crowd. But nobody wanted the carnival barker to be mayor.”

Donald Trump Immigration: Panama Leaves Miss Universe Pageant, Protesting Offensive Comments About Mexicans // International Business Times // Elizabeth Whitman – July 4, 2015

Add Panama to the growing list of Latin American nations refusing to participate in this year's Miss Universe pageant, a contest partially owned by 2016 presidential candidate Donald Trump, after the business tycoon generated global backlash with disparaging remarks about Mexicans immigrating to the United States.

“They are bringing drugs. They are bringing crime. They’re rapists,” Trump said in June, referring to Mexican immigrants. “Some, I assume, are good people,” he added. He also suggested building a wall between the United States and Mexico.

Protesting these words, Panama's Miss Panama Organization and its Telemetro television channel announced they would neither participate in nor broadcast this year's contest, the Associated Press reported Saturday. The entities described their decision as "a message of solidarity" to Mexicans.

With this move, Panama joins a growing chorus of voices from the Latin American community blasting Trump's remarks as offensive and ignorant. Colombian Paulina Vega, the reigning Miss Universe, condemned Trump's comments in an Instagram post Thursday as "unjust and hurtful."

Organizers in Costa Rica and Mexico have also withdrawn from this year's contest.

"We reject the xenophobic and offensive statements by the owner of the Miss Universe pageant against our Mexican brothers and sisters, and therefore, against all Latin Americans," Teletica, the television network that organizes Miss Costa Rica, said Wednesday in a statement.

Teletica added it would not broadcast the annual pageant. "We will only reconsider our decision if Donald Trump retracts his comments immediately and apologizes for his inadmissible statements, or if he separates himself completely from the organization of the pageant," it said.

Miss Universe is a beauty pageant that began in 1973. It is part of the Miss Universe Organization, a venture jointly owned by Donald Trump and NBCUniversal that includes Miss USA and Miss Teen USA, according to its corporate website. The organization "uses its global grassroots reach to empower women to be self-confident and strive to be their personal best."

Fox Panelist Rips Trump: ‘Negotiate with Mexico? He Can’t Even Negotiate with Macy’s!’ // Mediaite // Josh Feldman - July 4, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump's presidential campaign has given conservatives and Republicans lots of mixed feelings. But Fox's Eric Bolling, at least, continues to be one of Trump's biggest cable news defenders. On today's Cashin' In Panelist Jonathan Hoenig, however, wasn't quite on board. He told Bolling, "He's not just a fool, but he's a fraud... Negotiate with Mexico? He can't even negotiate with Macy's!"

And quite frankly, Bolling was the only one really defending Trump. Wayne Rogers said "if Trump can't survive in the free market, that's his problem," while Michelle Fields said she's not a Trump fan and that NBC probably did the right thing (even if they hypocritically embrace Al Sharpton and Brian Williams).

Bolling still defended Trump, arguing that he's bringing "fresh new ideas" and is someone willing to stand up for America. Rogers pointed out that there are other candidates who fit that description already, while Hoenig made it abundantly clear he just really doesn't like Trump.

Presidents, he said, don't make over-the-top threats and don't "alienate America's major corporations." Hoenig pointed out how Trump used to be a Democrat, and when Bolling talked about getting someone with a different kind of track record in the White House, Hoenig said, "Trump's got a record of bankruptcy."

Donald Trump's contracts with the city protected under the First Amendment, civil liberties lawyer says // New York Daily News // Erin Durkin & Celeste Katz – July 4, 2015

Donald Trump's city contracts might be saved by something his billions can't buy: Free speech.

City politicians eager to dump the GOP presidential candidate over his recent anti-Mexican rant are likely to find their efforts thwarted by the First Amendment, according to a leading civil liberties lawyer.

While Macy's, Univision and NBC all cut ties with The Donald in recent days, nixing his deals with the city would not be as fast or easy, according to both Trump and experts.

Mayor de Blasio already promised a review of Trump's contracts, including his sweet deal to operate New York's newest golf course — a $230 million Bronx layout.

And City Councilman Mark Levine called on the Parks Department to immediately use the "out" clauses in its contracts to cut ties with Trump over his "despicable" comments.

Other Trump-operated city attractions include the Wollman and Lasker skating rinks, along with the Central Park carousel.

"Our parks are public spaces where everyone should feel welcome, and an association with Mr. Trump directly contradicts this spirit," said Levine, whose district includes Upper West Side and Harlem.

"The Parks Department should exercise this option to sever all ties with Mr. Trump immediately."

But don't cancel those Trump tee times just yet.

While Trump's comments during his presidential kickoff speech about Mexico importing "rapists" to the U.S. caused a furor, the odds on voiding any of his city contracts are longer than a 900-yard par five.

"They can't do that," said prominent civil rights lawyer Norman Siegel. "There's a thing called the First Amendment, and the city of New York can't cancel a binding contract because they don't like the political views of Donald Trump."

Ron Lieberman, an executive vice president in the Trump Organization, echoed the attorney.

"Our position is clear on that: There's nothing to be reviewed," said Lieberman. "They don't have the constitutional right to put these contracts in play.

"They're binding contracts. There's all sorts of rights and provisions — and millions and millions of dollars that would have to be paid back to us. It would be an incredible mistake."

The contract for the Ferry Park golf course, provided by City Controller Scott Stringer's office, specifies the agreement between Trump and Parks "is terminable at will by the Commissioner in his sole absolute discretion, at any time."

There's a caveat: "Such termination shall not be arbitrary or capricious."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Parks Department punted Daily News inquiries about Trump to City Hall, and the Law Department declined to comment.

Siegel, former head of the New York Civil Liberties Union, agreed Trump's comments were “offensive and wrong-minded.” But he warned it would “set a terrible precedent” to penalize Trump for expressing his opinion.

It’s easy to see why Trump would want to stay the (golf) course.

He's got a contract to run the nearly 200-acre site next to the Whitestone Bridge — a former landfill with Manhattan skyline views — while charging far more per person per round than other courses operating on city land. City residents pay $169 for 18 holes on weekends, while nonresidents pay $215.

Under a deal struck during the Bloomberg Administration, the city footed the approximately $230 million bill for the construction of the course - and, as The News has reported, taxpayers could have to shell out as much as $300,000 a year for the massive amount of water needed to maintain the greens.

Trump Says Comments on Mexicans Have Hurt Business // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – July 4, 2015

Donald Trump admits that racially charged comments he made while announcing a run for the White House have hurt his business interests. And he swears he doesn't care.

"For the people that say I’m doing it for my brand -- this isn’t good for my brand," the real estate mogul and Republican candidate said Saturday on Fox & Friends. "I think it’s bad for my brand. I don’t care. You know maybe I’m leading in polls, but this is certainly not good. I lose customers. I lose people."

Trump, who nonetheless described his ongoing operations as "very powerful, very strong" during the interview, shrugged off the defection of multiple high-profile business and media partners over his characterization of Mexican immigrants as violent criminals and "rapists."

"I’ve always said if you’re a successful person, it’s very hard to run for office, because they come at you at all different sides," Trump said.

Macy's, Serta mattresses, Univision, NASCAR, and NBC, which carried his TV show The Apprentice, have all terminated agreements with Trump in recent days over the assertion, made on June 16 during Trump's announcement of a presidential run, that Mexico is "sending people that have lots of problems... They’re bringing drugs. They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists."

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio said the city would review contracts it has with the mogul, and his rivals in both parties have also condemned his comments.

Still, Trump's recent surge in the polls has suggested the some voters don't mind the rhetoric. Some may even warm to it.

In the Saturday interview, Trump continued to defend the comments.

"The crime is raging — it’s raging — and it’s violent," he said. "People don’t even want to talk about it, and if you talk about it, you’re a racist. I don’t understand it."

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Walker to drop open records restrictions in Wisconsin // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 4, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) said his state is jettisoning part of its proposed budget that would eliminate many opens records laws.

Walker announced the move late Saturday alongside State Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald (R), Assembly Speaker Robin Vos (R) and the co-chairs of the state’s joint budget committee.

“[The proposal] will be removed from the budget entirely,” they said in a statement, according to The Associated Press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"[It] was never intended to inhibit transparency in government in any way," they added.

AP said the budget language would have exempted nearly anything created by Wisconsin government officials from the state's open records law.

Republicans added the details into the proposed budget late Thursday evening.

The Wisconsin legislature is now forming a committee to research the transparency issue and publicly discuss possible solutions.

Walker is reportedly formally launching his 2016 GOP presidential bid July 13 after the completion of his state budget.

A RealClearPolitics average of recent polls shows him second only to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush among potential Republican voters.

He also has a commanding lead in recent sampling of Iowa caucus voters.

To Celebrate the Fourth, Scott Walker's GOP Declares Secrecy // HuffPo // Mary Bottari – July 4, 2015

America fought a revolution against secret and unaccountable government, but this Fourth of July Scott Walker and the Wisconsin GOP are planning on gutting Wisconsin's open records law, the strongest in the nation.

On the same day that Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker announced his run for president, the Wisconsin GOP has proposed a virtual gutting of Wisconsin's open records law, long considered one of the best in the nation. The drastic changes were proposed in a last-minute, anonymous budget motion, with zero public input on the eve of a holiday weekend. The motion will be rolled into the state's massive budget bill and voted on in the coming weeks.

The unprecedented proposal would give lawmakers broad authority to hide the special interests who are working to influence legislation. It would keep legislative drafting files under wraps, create a new "deliberative materials" exemption in the open records law that would exempt records at all levels of government, and give the legislature an easy way to hide even more records from disclosure in the future.

The move to gut the open records law appears to come in direct response to a lawsuit that the Center for Media and Democracy filed against Governor Walker in May. State Rep. Gordon Hintz, a democrat from Oshkosh on the Joint Finance Committee, tweeted that GOP budget leaders made it clear to the committee that Walker had signed off on the changes, including the changes to the open records law.

CMD was the first to reveal that Walker's office had struck the "search for truth" from the university's mission and eliminated the "Wisconsin Idea," and sued Walker after he withheld records pertaining to the changes, based on a claimed "deliberative process privilege." Although Walker's lawyers claim there already exists a deliberative privilege in Wisconsin law, that clearly is not true, because if it were, his allies in the legislature wouldn't have to add one through the budget process.

The sweeping proposal would gut the public records law as it applies to the legislature and governor's office, hiding special interest influence over public policy. The measure would help candidate Walker sidestep public scrutiny as more and more national media outlets file records requests with his office. The Joint Finance Committee chairs, Sen. Alberta Darling (R) and Rep. John Nygren (R), have refused to say who asked for the changes.

Bill Lueders, president of the transparency watchdog Wisconsin Freedom of Information Council, called the proposal a "cowardly" and a "shocking assault on the state's long and proud tradition of open government."

"These radical and sweeping changes represent a full-frontal attack on Wisconsin's history of open government," Lueders said. "They are clearly intended to block the public from discovering what factors drive the official actions of government, especially the Legislature, and will inevitably lead to abuse, malfeasance and corruption."

Ron Sklansky, a former 35-year senior staff attorney at the nonpartisan Wisconsin Legislative Counsel and an experts on open records, told CMD he had never seen a legislative proposal put forward that was as "devastating" to the open records law as this one. The measure is "almost a complete gutting of open records as it applies to the legislative and executive branch. It prevents the public from investigating the undue influence of special interests on the passage of legislation and the development of executive branch proposals and rule making," he said.

Although the proposal passed the Joint Finance Committee along party lines--with all Republicans voting in favor and all Democrats against--the move has prompted outrage across the political spectrum. The president of the right-wing MacIver Institute, Brett Healy, said the proposal "looks to be a huge step backwards for open government." Wisconsin's Republican Attorney General, Brad Schimel, said "Transparency is the cornerstone of democracy and the provisions in the Budget Bill limiting access to public records move Wisconsin in the wrong direction." Hours later, Walker's spokesperson promised vaguely that the governor would work with the legislature to address the issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Critically, some legislators are saying they will not vote for the controversial budget with the changes included. "I will not support a budget that includes this assault on democracy," GOP Senator Robert Cowles said. And other GOP Reps. expressed discomfort and surprise with the move.

The proposal would:

1) Create a new "deliberative materials" exemption

The amendments would exempt all "deliberative materials" from disclosure under the public records law, protecting anything that might have informed a policy decision.

"Deliberative materials" are broadly defined as "communications and other materials, including opinions, analyses, briefings, background information, recommendations, suggestions, drafts, correspondence about drafts, and notes, created or prepared in the process of reaching a decision concerning a policy or course of action."

This measure could protect the disclosure of communications, draft legislation, or background materials from groups like the American Legislative Exchange Council, or "ALEC." It would allow legislators to hide their communications with lobbyists or campaign donors seeking policy favors. And it would allow the governor to hide how the executive budget was developed--including, for example, how, and why, his office might have sought to alter the purpose of the university system.

2) Allow legislators to hide the identify of any person who communicates about the development of policy

This could allow lawmakers to hide the special interests who are working to influence legislation.

For example, CMD has filed an open records request with Joint Finance Chair Alberta Darling, who received thousands of dollars of contributions from Bill Minahan, whose company Building Committee Inc. received a $500,000 unsecured loan from the Wisconsin Economic Development Corporation (WEDC), then promptly went bust leaving taxpayers to foot the bill.

The Wisconsin State Journall used the open records law to take a deep dive into this loan, documenting that it came shortly after Minahan gave Walker a $10,000 contribution and linking it to Walker's chief of staff Keith Gilkes and second-in-command Mike Huebsch. Most recently, the State Journal discovered that Minahan loan had not gone through the underwriting required by law and many more loans failed to go through proper underwriting, putting millions of taxpayer dollars at risk.

WEDC has been the subject of two damning state audits which documented continued lawbreaking at Walker's flagship jobs agency. Shortly after the last audit was published, two legislators threatened to get rid of the highly respected non-partisan audit bureau. CMD sent records requests to Reps. Adam Jarchow and David Craig, curious as to who was behind the radical move to destroy the audit bureau, but has not yet received their response.

3) Hide the "drafting files" showing how legislation is developed

"Drafting files" reveal the process of developing a bill or budget provision, and are used regularly by journalists to gain insight into how policy is developed. And those insights can sometimes be embarrassing.

Drafting files were key to undermining Walker's claims about his offices changes to the Wisconsin Idea. After the deletion of the "search for truth" sparked a "political firestorm" in Wisconsin and around the country, the governor blamed the change on a "drafting error," and then on a "miscommunication," then claimed that the university never raised concerns about the changes. Yet those statements were contradicted by the drafting files examined by the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, and documents obtained through records requests, earning Walker a "pants on fire" rating from Politifact.

Drafting files also informed other important investigations. In 2014, for example, a Wisconsin State Journal examination of drafting files showed a wealthy, divorced donor to Rep. Joel Kleefisch helping to write a bill that would have lowered his child support payments. If these amendments were enacted, those records--and the donor's influence--would have been kept secret.

Additionally, drafting records aren't just important for accountability, "they are needed by the courts to discern the legislative intent behind the construction of statutes," said Sklansky who noted that legislative intent was a consideration in the recent Supreme Courts ruling on the federal health care law last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Supreme Court Justice David Prosser, for example, a former Republican legislator, regularly consults drafting files and legislative records to ascertain legislative intent.
4) Allow the legislature to override the Public Records Law via legislative rule

The proposal also gives the legislature the ability to exempt any additional records from disclosure merely by adopting a new rule by majority vote--without having to go through the legislative process.

By eliminating access to records that had previously been public, this move limits the ability of the press and public to play their watchdog role. Taken together with proposals to dismantle the nonpartisan Government Accountability Board (after it investigated alleged campaign finance violations by Walker's campaign) and the nonpartisan Legislative Audit Bureau (after it critiqued Walker's jobs agency in a scathing audit), all evidence indicates that Governor Walker and his allies are seeking to muzzle the watchdogs.

Scott Walker, Republican leaders remove open records restrictions from Wisconsin budget // The Capital Times // Jason Joyce – July 4, 2015

It appears Wisconsin's tradition of open records and transparent government may be safe — for the weekend, at least.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, along with the co-chairs of the Legislature's Joint Finance committee, Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald and Assembly Speaker Robin Vos, all Republicans, responded to substantial pushback over a measure that would severely limit access to legislative records with a Saturday afternoon statement, saying "the provisions relating to any changes in the state's open records law will be removed from the budget in its entirety."

The Joint Finance Committee, controlled like both houses of the Legislature by Republicans, passed the measure on a party line vote late Thursday as part of "Motion #999," which often includes last-minute wishlist items, non-fiscal policy and nods to special interests.

"We are steadfastly committed to open and accountable government," read the statement. "The intended policy goal of these changes was to provide a reasonable solution to protect constituents' privacy and to encourage a deliberative process between elected officials and their staff in developing policy. It was never intended to inhibit transparent government in any way."

Republicans have avoided identifying who is behind the proposal, but Rep. Gordon Hintz, D-Oshkosh, a member of the JFC, tweeted Friday that his Republican colleagues on the panel assured him that Walker had gone over the motion, signing off on "motions including open records changes after crossing out what he'd veto."

The statement also says a Legislative Council committee will be formed to examine the issue of records access more closely and outside the budget deliberation process.

Speaking with reporters Saturday morning, Walker made no mention of any plans to address the issue this weekend, insisting that he planned to wait until a Monday meeting with legislative leaders to iron out an issue that was met by sharp criticism from all sides over the past two days. He also avoided answering questions about his role in crafting and proposing the measure.

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel posted a brief video of Walker's meeting with reporters.

The governor, who will announce he's running for president in Waukesha on July 13, was first asked if his office had any input on the proposal.

"As I mentioned yesterday, we're going to sit down and talk to the legislative leaders about that. We had already planned a follow-up meeting the other day in terms of the arena where we had all four legislative leaders," Walker said. "I think it's pretty clear they need to make some changes on that and we're going to work with them on it Monday."

Walker was then asked if he planned to veto the measure from the final budget if it cleared the Assembly and Senate.

"Certainly it will all depend. We haven't made commitments on any other vetoes, but those are things obviously a lot of concerns about. My hope is, after talking to them on Monday we get to a point where it's either out completely or there are significant changes to it," Walker said. "Again, as you know at the end of the legislative processs, there's a lot of things the legislative leadership works on and for us, there's other things in there. We'll review it and we'll see what passes not just the Joint Finance Committee, but what gets through the Assembly and the Senate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finally, Walker was asked if he was aware of the proposal and if he objected to it.

"Again, those are all things we'll talk about on Monday. We'll talk about what we're going to do going forward. There's always all sorts of ideas that float around the Capitol before the end of the Joint Finance Committee process, but I think it's pretty clear that lawmakers from both parties, as well as others, want us to make changes and we're going to make sure that happens starting with a meeting on Monday," Walker said.

Walker went on to say it's "overall, a very positive budget" and called attention to property tax cuts.

The proposal to limit access to legislative records, effective as of July 1, the first day of the state's fiscal year, was immediately greeted with criticism Thursday afternoon with legislators from both parties condemning it within 24 hours of its passage.

The Capital Times and other media organizations have filed open records requests for documents related to the drafting of the measure, which could have been ignored had the proposal passed with the state budget and been signed into law by Walker.

Wisconsin Open Records Law: Gov Scott Walker, Likely 2016 Candidate, Backtracks On Attempts To Limit Public Access To Records // International Business Times - Clark Mindock – July 4, 2015

Expected 2016 Republican presidential candidate and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker backtracked on legislation that would have restricted open records access amid harsh backlash from critics in the last two days, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reported Saturday. The open records law was part of a broader state budget plan currently being considered.

A joint finance committee for the state Senate and Assembly voted Thursday along party lines to advance a measure that included the open records restrictions. The same day, Walker filed a letter with the Federal Election Commission announcing he had met the formal qualifications to be considered a candidate for president. However, he said, he was not yet making an official announcement.

The open records provisions would have exempted certain records from public scrutiny, including records from the Walker administration and draft legislation.

"After substantive discussion over the last day, we have agreed that the provisions relating to any changes in the state's open records law will be removed from the budget in its entirety. We are steadfastly committed to open and accountable government," a joint statement from Walker and GOP lawmakers read, according to the Journal Sentinel. "The intended policy goal of these changes was to provide a reasonable solution to protect constituents' privacy and to encourage a deliberative process between elected officials and their staff in developing policy. It was never intended to inhibit transparent government in any way."

The Wisconsin Legislature is expected to hold a series of votes next week. It will consider the budget, a 20-week abortion ban that makes no exception for rape or incest cases, major tax changes, public funding for a Milwaukee Bucks arena and possible changes to the prevailing wage for public workers, which establishes minimum wages for those workers.

